YOUNG people are conspicuously absent from most Protestant churches. They attend Sunday school classes in considerable numbers, and they are still to be found in some young people's societies. At the services of worship they are an inconsiderable part of the congregation. Too little attention has been paid to the needs of young people. They are at the time of mating, choosing their life calling and making up their lists of life-long friends. It is in the recreational atmosphere that much of this goes on. For this reason the recreation of the young people is more important to them than many things which older people plan for them. The churches that hold young people are studying the things young people like to do. The modern dance with its exaggerated sex appeal is impossible for most evangelical churches. The thing that is almost sure to get them is amateur dramatics. A growing demand for books with one act plays indicates this. Dramatic interpretation gives them the feel of different characters and a wide range of life experiences. The thing is done in a group, and the rehearsals are often fully as enjoyable as the presentation. Nor are the old-time socials to be despised, once they are divorced from all commercialism. Young people will still gather for parlor games and a sing. The country outing has a real appeal. City young people who can be made to see the country through the eyes of one who has lived there will find a whole day slipping away in educational experiences. The trouble with the conventional young people's society is that altogether too much it imposes upon young people the ideas of older folks as to how young people should be organized. A society that is all prayer-meeting without play and sociability is apt to disappear after while.

Domestic Service and Christian Ideals

THE servant problem shows a propensity, alarming to many, to solve itself by the disappearance of the servant. The call of the munitions factory enormously aggravated a situation in the home which was already sufficiently baffling. When domestic servants practically disappeared during the heaviest of the war strain those who had grown dependent upon them, with more or less grace, accepted the deprivation as one of the prices of victory in arms. It was a behest of patriotism not to complain too loudly.

All the same there was storing up in the minds and sensibilities of large numbers, at whom hoity-toity domestics had turned up their noses, and out of whose kitchens they had danced to the doubled and trebled remuneration of the factory, a resentment which the most ardent patriotism could not sweeten. And when the war strain was relieved, when factories reduced their output and employment conditions reached a stage where industrial managers could choose among applicants, and could regain a voice in the fixing of wages, none manifested more vindictive glee than certain types of householders. Their joy in seeing—prospectively—the heady servant girl brought to her knees and her senses was one of the choicest boons of the return to "normalcy."

But their joy was largely in the prospect. Normalcy in servanthood seems still elusively far off. The return to the back door of the home from the front door of the factory has been made upon exceedingly tardy foot, where it has been essayed at all. The slump in the labor market has been strong and abrupt, in certain regions and at certain periods positively cataclysmic. But hosts who deserted the kitchen and the chamber for the factory have not returned at all, or have been driven back only under the lash of the sternest necessity. The vindictive householder has thus been left to the gnawings of his unappeased revenge, or is subjected to diurnal and perennial torture at the hands of sullen or capricious slaves, who show at every turn that they perform their assigned tasks only because driven by want. Such service does not insure an idyllic home.

A writer in one of the standard magazines recently made a long-delayed trip to England. Not since before the war had he ventured. He had heard rumors of the passing of the obeisant English servant, and dreaded the encounter with the dear old England, to the sum of whose delights this impeccably deferential guild had contributed so materially. In reporting his experiences one of his most pointed observations was the blasting of this canard. He found the English servant in his old place, chastened by the post-war reverses into deferential normalcy, performing his old ready duties, accepting the menial's alms with all of the old suavity, and in every way re-establishing the British traditions of the servant guild. Upon returning to his native land, and finding his liberal tip accepted by a servant with a sneer, our writer was moved to severe strictures upon a civilization whose servant class knows its place so ill and so far fails of the spirit proper to it.

Those who are baffled and distressed over this situation may find some comfort in realizing that much more than half of the American people are not concerned at all. They do not even understand what these social problem-makers are worrying themselves about. They would not recognize a servant problem if they should meet it on the street. There are whole towns of considerable size and social pretensions where the domestic menial is unknown, where the first housewife who installs a "maid" as a permanent feature of her establishment is laughed at by the whole neighborhood for her lofty pretenses. And in the larger centers, where the servant problem is a lively topic of discussion in certain types of women's clubs, and where it even strays into the newspapers occasionally, the larger proportion of the citizens are not directly concerned. Estimated by bulk, therefore, the servant problem is one of the least which troubles the American people.

But it is large enough and vexatious enough to furnish ground for much thought, and especially do its ethical and social aspects force themselves upon every citizen of democratic and Christian sentiments. What is the proper place for the servant in a democratic order? Where does the servant belong in the Christian social system? Have we not worn rather threadbare the assumed teachings of the Philemon-Onesimus incident? Is a Christianity which simply accepts the prevailing social order, and fits the individual into it in complacent submission wherever he may chance to be,—is that sort of Christianity the final word, or the present word for American society? Can any place be found for the menial, which the prevailing American home of pretensions persists in seeking to create and hold down in her place, if we seriously contemplate building a Christian civilization in America? Are not our most precious and safely guarded traditions set against the order on which we now seek to establish the home?

In the general industrial field we are more conscious of these traditions. In numberless industrial establishments of first importance in their communities, the executive who sits today in the place of power, and determines policies—all too arbitrarily often and in high-handed disregard of the ideals or will of underlying employes—has yet risen from among the lowest of the low of these underlings. How often the president of the concern boasts of having begun as the office boy! And where the highest officers did not begin in lowly positions in the establishments over which they now preside, in the great majority of cases they did begin at the bottom in some other establishment.

The home cannot be modeled upon the factory. It is a radically different kind of institution, let us agree. But where is there in the domestic scheme, vexed and often well-nigh wrecked by the "servant problem," any aspect or tendency corresponding to this program which, in spite of offensive domineering by certain types of industrial officials, does go far toward preserving sacred American traditions? Domestic servants are being herded into a class. There is little or no escape from the guild, certainly none into the upper social strata created by the type of home subsisting upon this guild. Could anything sooner down a social leader among the women of our cities than the boast that she once served as a domestic on meager wages in a home of the same class where she now presides and guides the social destinies? Only let your horrified imagination play upon the spectacle of a brilliant social leader standing before a woman's club, or sitting at the head of her banqueting table, and uttering such a confession in the presence of her guests or her sorority!

Yet your industrial leader among American men is doing that very thing in his field every day, is furnishing glowing copy for the newspaper and magazine biographers, and is the proudest one of the listeners or readers when his record of rise from among the lowly is exploited.

Is it not clear that the most baffling feature of the problem of domestic service is the ethical, the social? Can any one devise a way to fit our scheme into a democratic, Christian order? If not, what then? That is the question to face. What then? Can institutions assuming to mediate Christianity to our society, can ministers of religion commissioned to interpret the essences of the Christian truth, can agents and agencies claiming to accept and to aid in incorporating these principles into a working social order—can all or any of these evade the demand that domestic life be put upon a thoroughly democratic and Christian basis?

It has been possible to defer this demand until this time because domestic service has been organized so largely along racial lines. In wide sections the Negro has been thrust into this menial office, and has accepted it with a high degree of unanimity and with careless grace. Many a traveler has noted the dearth, or even the complete absence in some regions, of the highly useful self-service restaurants, and has been informed by local social philosophers that such institutions do not and cannot thrive in those localities because any form of domestic service is associated with the "nigger," and members of the "dominant race" cannot bring themselves to assume duties of waiting even upon themselves at table. Elsewhere other races have been drawn or thrust into this tight-bound guild. And such are temporarily or permanently "inferior," because they thus serve. Indeed, has not the native American of sound mind, and born of self-respecting American parentage, so far disappeared from employed service in the home that isolated instances are noted as freaks. The ranks of domestic service are recruited very limitedly from native American defectives, and predominantly from "inferior" races and "ignorant" foreigners.

With the public school system in full swing, with eagerly exploited ideals in the general industrial field, and with ardent preachments from hosts of self-made public men in every walk of life, there would seem little prospect of the solution of the "servant problem" in a domestic system which is built upon the maintenance of a menial class, a guild whose bonds grow tighter every day upon the individual caught in them, and where the individual's only hope is a complacent social hopelessness.

It would seem time that the mind of the sincere Christian home builder should play upon this question. Surely he, more particularly she, can lead our civilization out into an estate which offers more promise of a solution than does any proposal now being widely or seriously considered. How many frankly believe that the American home of higher pretensions should continue to be builded upon the service of a class condemned by racial "inferiority," or by defective intelligence, or by hard and embittering economic necessity, to slaving at their tasks as social outcasts? Are the socially quickened minds of American women disposed to muddle along in the present evil estate, or have they the intelligence and the Christian insights to devise a program of partnership in home making which shall be thoroughly democratic and thoroughly Christian, and therefore genuinely American?

"Where Prayers Cross"

THERE are welcome signs of a religious awakening in different parts of England, for which all good men will give thanks. The reports, especially from East Anglia, as we read them in the London Methodist Times, recall the days ago, when tides of refreshing renewed the life of the church. The depth, warmth, and enthusiasm make one think of Wesley, whose heroic and ceaseless evangelism saved England from something like a French Revolution, by capturing for Christ the men who else had fomented strife and confusion.

Yet we detect tokens of misgiving on the part of religious leaders in England, as Dr. Shillito expressed it so vividly in these pages in his recent articles. To what are we to be revived? is the question in their hearts. Are we to be content with the present attitude of the churches toward the many problems of the time—practical problems, not matters of theory? Are we to be satisfied with a religious life, however individual and satisfying, which acquiesces in war, in social wrongs, and in business compromises? They feel that half of the gospel, to use the phrase of Newman, is not adequate to the appalling needs of the world as it is. Suppose a man is converted from his personal sins—and such need no one doubts—will he carry his fresh vision and insight into his life as a citizen and as a member of an industrial order which becomes more and more intolerable?

It recalls the days of Thomas Chalmers and Frederick Robertson, who were contemporaries, or nearly so. Robertson said he gave up the evangelicalism of his youth because he found it was not ethical in its results. Chalmers, on the other hand, said he preached morality until there was not a moral man in his parish, and he went to evangelicalism and found what he had missed in his ethical preaching. Which of these two men was right? Which wrong? Surely either one without the other would be imperfect. Chalmers discovered that ethical preaching alone was a failure, while Robertson saw that evangelical preaching without an ethical purpose was inadequate. So, after all, there was no great difference between them.

Men must be both religious and moral, their spiritual faith and experience bearing fruit not only in noble private character, but also in fraternal righteousness and service to the common good.

Just so, there need be no contrast, much less conflict, between the emphasis in our day upon individual conversion and social regeneration. Either without the other is imperfect. The gospel of salvation and the gospel of the kingdom belong together, and neither will long survive the neglect of the other. Our reflections are suggested by an extraordinarily interesting book, entitled "Evangelism: A Reinterpretation," made up of a number of essays by distinguished men of the Methodist fellowship in England. They seek to recapture the old evangelistic fervor, with its joys and victories, and to relate it to the intellectual, social and religious conditions of our new and strange time. It is a difficult undertaking, and it cannot be said that they are entirely successful. For example, one writer remarks about the influence of the idea of evolution upon evangelism: "A vague belief that everything is on the upward move results in a new watchword that all human nature wants is a chance, not a change." But surely it needs both a chance and a change. The implication is that we should give up the belief in an advancing world in favor of the pessimistic faith that everything is on the downward move! A revivalism founded on pessimism will not make much headway among us.

Many interesting and valuable things are said in these essays; but what strikes us is the absence of the social note to which Dr. Shillito referred. Indeed, the confusion of the book in this respect, as well as in some others, is typical of the confusion in the mind of the modern church. Underlying this confusion there is, apparently, an irreconcilable difference in faith and outlook. Many good and true men seem to hold that the world is not only rotten, but hopeless, and that it is the mission of the church to save a few—as many as possible—from the general wreck of divine failure. Others, equally good and true, see the whole world as a subject of redemption. They are sure that Jesus meant what he said when he told us to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." They are not blind to the horrors of the present order, its inscrutable fates, its profound injustices, its unspeakable brutalities; but they believe that he that is in us is greater than he that is in the world. Two such different points of view dictate different methods of work, and no one need be told that it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to work together. While reading this book of essays, we have been following another discussion provoked by the Modern Churchman's Union at Ripton College, in which there was some plain speaking about the older theological views as stumbling-blocks to the younger generation. The editor of The Challenge puts it in a forthright manner:

We do not wish to be unsympathetic with those older people who, during the turmoil of the latter half of the last century, preferred sheltering behind untenable defenses to risking the strains and perils of an unfettered faith; better for them the prison house than the battlefield. But now, when the fiercest struggle is over, when, by the heroic labors of those pioneers who braved assaults from without and slanders from within the church in their quest for a reasonable belief, the victory has been won; when none need hesitate to welcome the message of science or to accept a modern interpretation of the gospel, there is no longer any excuse for timidity. Time has shown that it is possible to welcome what criticism and biology teach, and to remain sanely and wholeheartedly Christian. It is nowadays manifest beyond all dispute that a full and devoted and ardent Christian faith, a passionate loyalty to Christ, a message powerful for conversion and edification, is wholly compatible with a modern attitude towards doctrine. And those who deny this and insist that men who hold these opinions are "not Christians," are simply blaspheming against the Holy Ghost—

Those are plain words, and the time has come when they need to be spoken in all love and goodwill; but that is not all that is needed. We do not want a new cleavage, much less a new sociological sectarianism replacing the theological variety. Christ is larger than any of our "attitudes" or "views," and in his fellowship there is room for good men to disagree without being disagreeable, the more so if they are loyal to his name and spirit. It is time for us to seek the higher unity of things which differ, and not go on in the dim half-lights "where prayers cross," lest we who follow one Lord and ought to march together, welcoming variety in unity, be like "ignorant armies that clash by night." At a time when the brotherhood of the world is broken, and civilization seems trembling on the edge of chaos, it ill becomes any group of Christian men to impugn the loyalty of another group. What we need is the influence, impact—yes, the evangelism—of a united Christianity, using all methods at its command, toiling equally in behalf of better manhood and a nobler social order.

The Bad Temper

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me one who said, I have a Very Bad Temper.

And he said it with what he thought was Humility, but it was as it had been a certain sort of Pride.

And I said, Thou art a Narrow-Minded Man.

Then was he angry, and I knew that he was no Liar when he said that he had a Bad Temper.

And when he had said More or Less, I silenced him, and said, I believed thee when thou saidst that thou hadst a Bad Temper; I did not ask thee to make such a Display of it.

And he said, Thou hast Insulted me; for a Quick Temper is not the sign of a Narrow Mind, but of a Warm and Generous Nature; for if I am quick to be angry I am quick also to get over it, and very ready to Make Amends.

Now we spake in the Garden, and I left him for a moment, and when I returned I had been in the Kitchen, and I brought back an Egg.

And I threw the Egg at the Back Fence, and it Brake and spattered the Fence.

And I said, Thou speakest of Making Amends. Gather up that Egg again, and clean off the Fence, and put the Egg back into the Shell, and set an Hen upon it, and make of it a Plymouth Rock Rooster. Then talk to me of Making Amends for thine outbursts of Temper. For thou spatterest over all thy friends, and splashest them with thy fury, and then thou dost leave them to clean off thy rage and try to forget thine unreasonable words, and thou thinkest thou hast Made Amends.

And I said, The best way to Make Amends for a Bad Temper is to keep thy temper to thyself.

And he said, Verily thou didst say of me that I had a Narrow Mind, and I will take that from no man.

And I said, Thou wilt take it once again from me. Thou hast a Narrow Mind. He who hath a Bad Temper is a man who is capable of seeing but one aspect of a thing at a time, and incapable of withholding his snap judgment until he may learn the whole truth. And because he is both narrow-minded and childish, therefore doth he fly into a rage, as thou hast done and habitually dost do. Flatter not thyself that this is the sign of a generous nature, for I have told thee already of what it is a sign.

And he was silent.

And I went and got out the hose, and started to wash off the Egg from the Fence.

And he would not have it so, but caught the Nozzle from my hand and himself washed off the Egg from the Fence.

And he said—

Though I be not able to produce a Plymouth Rock Rooster from that Egg, yet hath it not been wholly wasted.

And I am inclined to think that he had Learned Something that was worth the price of an Egg.

And Eggs just then were Eggs.

And I should like to buy some more of them and teach to other men, and some women, the same lesson.

The Heart's Country

IN Rome there is no glory now,
And Greece no longer rings with song;
Proud Babylon, once queen of earth,
Has been as dust for ages long;
On those proud realms the sun has set,
The light still shines—on Olivet.

Old Egypt, once a land of kings,
Is now consumed by beggar hordes;
Assyria, the mighty one,

No longer boasts her gleaming swords;
On these the blight of ancient death;
Life still abides—for Nazareth.

Though Rome is still a mighty name,
And Greece is prized for lore and art,
Though Egypt still has wonders strange,
One land can satisfy the heart:
In tears we seek our "ain countree"—
Dear Bethlehem, sweet Galilee.

Where the Faiths of Men Meet

By John Kelman

[One of the most fruitful and suggestive books among the autumn publications is "The Foundations of Faith," by Dr. John Kelman, pastor Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York; being the Cole lectures delivered before the Vanderbilt University for 1921. It shows modern religious thinking at its best, catholic in sympathy, wide-ranging in interest, and constructive in its insight. Besides the lecture which gives title to the book, the subjects discussed are The Basis of Authority, The Character of God, The Incarnate Love, Means and Ends, and Where the Faiths of Men Meet. The following excerpts from the closing lecture are very striking, alike for their conception of the life of Jesus and their interpretation of him as the fulfillment of the religious need and aspiration of humanity. The Galilean ministry corresponds to the bright, sunny, joyous religion of the Greeks, while the later period of opposition and tragedy corresponds to the profounder and more somber religion of the east. In the experience of Jesus, as in his faith, both elements of life are comprehended, conquered, and transfigured, making his experience and personality the place where the faiths of men meet, and his religion not a competing, but a completing religion. The other lectures are of equal worth and beauty, and together they make a distinct contribution to the religious thought of the day.—THE EDITOR.]

THE childhood of Jesus was spent in the highland village of Nazareth. When he was old enough to stray beyond the daily walk, hand in hand with his mother, to the village well, his first excursions must have been to a little hill whose summit is but ten minutes distant from the well. Looking north from that hilltop he saw the great road that led from the sea to the furthest east by way of Safed, far-flung like a gigantic rifle-sling along the mountainsides. Back and forward along that road there passed every day long strings of camels. Those eastward-bound carried from the Phœnician seaports much merchandise gathered from all the shores of the Mediterranean, to be sold in the markets of lands across the desert. The west-bound caravans that crossed them, swung beneath heavy bales of silks and rare aromatic spices, and all manner of precious products from Persia and even India, to the Phœnician ships that swung at their anchors in Tyre and Sidon. Far thoughts must have followed them in both directions, as the child learned his first lessons about the breadth of the world of his day. Turning southward upon his hilltop, in the twilight of a frosty evening, he would see there, far below him, the wine-red fringes of the great plain of Esdraelon, on which from immemorable generations the battles of the world had been fought, so that the colour of the plain must necessarily suggest a land soaked in ancient blood. Through the clear air a sound would reach him of the clang of iron upon stone, as the sentries of Roman cohorts changed guard, or the armored bands started upon the last stretch of their march to the garrison at Capernaum. Nazareth in those days was to some extent what it still is, a crucible town in which many nations fused and blended; and the twofold vision of the hilltop must have supplied material for much thinking through his childhood and youth.

There came at last a day when, with all the kaleidoscope of life turning itself in his young mind, he felt that the time had come for gathering the varied knowledge into clear decision and a definite course. There had appeared upon the Jordan the figure of John the Baptist, who seemed to be a prophet born for leading men to great decisions, and for separating the chaff from the wheat, not only among men but among the ideas of his time. Jesus, with countless crowds of Galileans, visited the Jordan, and came back from his interview with John with the memory of divine acknowledgment which must be the master-thought of all his remaining years. But first he must choose his course, and the story of the three temptations seems to indicate a clear presentation to his mind of three alternative careers, among which he might select the one which would give him scope for his divinely appointed mission. There was the career of commerce and of industry already graphically presented to his imagination by the caravans on the Safed road—the world's way of transforming the precious stones of every land into bread for the merchant and the workman. There was the possibility of imperialism and military power and dominance. The vision of Rome with its emperor and its armies was one which must necessarily impress every active and virile mind of those times; and with his powers it would have been easy enough for him to dominate the world by military force, and create an empire such as even Rome had never dreamed of. Or, if he felt an incongruity in such ambitions, if they jarred upon his sensitive religious spirit, there was the career of the religious teacher who by some astounding wonder might at a leap set himself upon the throne of human faith. Such were the careers that were obvious and entirely practicable, and he rejected each of them in turn. It was not that in any of them there was that which he condemned as intrinsically wicked. It was enough for him to know that they were not careers for him, and that the line of the Father's purpose led him into another road.

A DEFINITE DECISION

The road into which it did lead him was, in comparison with those other careers, the simplest in all the world. He went back to Galilee, spoke now and again in the synagogues, accepted invitations to feasts, associated with fishermen and peasants, and sent forth his messages quite casually as the occasion suggested. No life was ever simpler or more characteristically human than the life of those years in Galilee. They are, essentially, the days of the Son of Man. Hither and thither he wandered, by the seaside or upon the mountains, with the sun and the rain in his face, and the winds of God blowing upon him. He noted the ploughman at the plough. He saw the life of peasants in their humble dwellings. For him the lilies clothed themselves in more than regal splendor. To him the birds of the air sang continually. On a visit to Jerusalem he was interviewed by night by Nicodemus, a wise old man, fettered and fossilized by much learning in the schools of the rabbis. His introductory words are laden with all the politeness, formality, and stupidity of a typical man of the schools. To all this ponderous artificiality Jesus answers with a word, reminding him that he had never listened to the wind.

The beatitudes, rightly understood, show perhaps as strikingly as anything the bright and sunny spirit of those early days. Blessed are the poor. Blessed are the hungry. Blessed are they that mourn—it has been supposed to proclaim a melancholy kind of blessedness. But the people who thus interpret it have forgotten the word that always follows, and which gives its meaning to every text—for. The hungry are not blessed because they are hungry, but because they shall be filled. The mourning are not blessed because they mourn but because they shall be comforted. The poor are not blessed because they are poor, but because they are heirs of a kingdom. And this exhilaration of the beatitudes is characteristic of the whole spirit of the teaching. The wild joy of living is in it everywhere, the exuberance of a heart at leisure from the business of the world and eagerly rejoicing. Above all, love is in it, a wonderfully gracious and generous appreciation of man, woman, and child around him, which finds its well-springs in a higher love, the love of the Father in heaven. With his Father he is in constant communion, and in that communion there is perfect satisfaction and rest. All the world is beautiful to him, and all men and women are his brothers and sisters. He has the freedom of land and sea and air, loving them and the creatures that pass along their ways, as one who is everywhere at home. For certain days this brilliant ministry endured, falling like a splash of sunshine upon the gray life of many a Galilean peasant, and astonishing his followers with its amazing naturalness and sweet gladness. It was the first phase of his ministry.

A SUNNY BLESSEDNESS

But there fell upon this glad path the shadow of the cross. Just as upon the garden of Joseph of Arimathea the shadow of the cross fell upon its appointed day, and swept round that garden, touching alike its flowers, its luxuriant pathways, and its new-cut tomb; so upon all thoughts of life and death, and upon everything that grew in the whole garden of the world, fell the shadow of the cross of Calvary upon the way of Jesus. Gradually it darkened on him, and we see his references to it becoming more and more frequent as he proceeded. Incomprehensible to his followers, but unmistakably certain to himself, it deepened steadily until it created for him the second phase of his life and teaching. Then it brought with it the sense of pain in the heart of life, the sure and inevitable cross in the center of every banner that man may carry, either into festival or into battle. Joy that has no pain in the heart of it is but the laughter of fools. Success that wants that dark element of sorrow and defeat is but an elusive dream. Love that is all selfishness and has no sacrifice is the sorest delusion of all, and turns inevitably into loneliness or hatred. In a word the finished product of life is composite, and for the fusing of it there is necessary the bitter amalgam of pain. It claimed him with a mysterious clutch. Sin was in that shadow as well as pain. To him sinners were neither outcasts nor aliens as they were to the Pharisees. Their grim business concerned him intimately and he made it his own, until at the last the dark element of suffering sprang at the throat of life itself, bearing with it the sin of all the world in the final death-grip of the cross of Calvary, whereon dying he mastered sin and death forever. This was the second phase of his ministry.

THE WORLD OF JESUS' TIME

Let us turn our minds now to the world of Jesus' time and man's search for God in it. While it was various in detail, yet it grouped itself into two main types which comprehended every phase of it. On the one hand there was the Greek spirit and all that it represented in the world. To the Greek, God was practically the view. He lived in a land of hills deep in green acanthus. The gods loved the sunlight in which their worshippers built their houses, and the sunlight loved the sea, so that the poet could sing of the "Numberless laughter of the waves." Nay, the sun was God to multitudes, and the worship of Apollo dominates alike the bright thinking and the happy emotions of the age of Pericles. In every wind among the reeds there was the sweet music of the pipes of Pan—that alluring and wonderful music that always whispered so much more than it told, and drew out the hearts of men and women beyond the dusty and prosaic earth into a wonderland of half-expressed desire and wistfulness. Harmony too was there, and balance, and rationality of thought—a world not only exquisite but well-ordered, a world of essential sanity, and endless possibilities of delight.

Yet upon this lovely paradise of a world there fell strange shadows. The Greek knew nothing of the cross and would have considered it foolishness if he had known. But all that the cross stood for, the sorrow and the darkness of mankind, fell upon his world also. The pipes of Pan, with all their exquisite suggestiveness, could yet play cruel music; and nature seemed to claim man for her victim when man daringly aspired to be her companion. And when this shadow fell upon the Greek he had no refuge anywhere in which to hide from it. He knew the truth that there is in beauty, the essential rightness of love and sunshine, yet these were not the portion of any man beyond certain days and limits. So he longed for an immortality beyond the grasp of his faith, and sought with blind fingers, like a groping child, for the bosom of God whereon to lay his weary head and find love made perfect. But nature has no breasts of tenderness, and the groping man sooner or later was clasped by the lean fingers of death. Thus the world of the Greek was hopelessly unintelligible.

EAST AND WEST

Such was the religion of the west. Contrasted with it, manifest in many forms, was another religion, which found sorrow and failure to be the most impressive facts of life. Pain and death, and all their train of disappointing experience, were accepted by the east and pressed to its bleeding heart. What else was there to do? The Greek, even after his disillusion, persistently refused to turn his eyes from beholding vanity. The Oriental proclaimed that all is vanity, even in his wine cups. Egypt, with its august and ancient religion of the dead, the whole middle east with its perpetual sacrifices offered to bloody gods whom men tried to appease and yet never finally succeeded in appeasing, these were the immediate environment of Palestine. And in the still further east, connected with Mediterranean lands by many streams of commerce and of travel, was that great and already long-established faith whose fundamental dogma was the illusion of experience and the evil of desire, whose hope and aim was the death of these in nirvana.

Compare these two phases of faith with the two periods in the life of Jesus, and a close correspondence will at once appear. He took them both up into his hands, confirmed the essential truth of each, and flung away the error which bound man to despair. We have already said that Christianity is not a new faith rivalling the old. It is the faith, interpreting all the others and correcting them. Christ stands not for a religion but for religion, the finding of God and eternal life by men. There were no wholesome elements in the best thought of Greece which are not to be found in the Galilean gospel of Jesus; while the dark tragedy that oppressed the eastern lands from Egypt to the Ganges and beyond it, found its match and its remedy in the cross of Calvary. In the Galilean gospel, the love of the Father and the promise of eternal life heartened men and fortified them for the bitterest disappointments that beset their appreciation of the world, and told them that the bright gospel of the sunshine and the wind would outlive the catastrophe that threatened it in death and disillusion. To the eastern he proclaimed that, dark though the tragedy of life might be, yet the cross was mighty to turn it into salvation. He faced the bitterness of sorrow, death, and sin in his cross, as Buddha never did in his law of renunciation. Yet he believed, and taught men to believe, not in death as the ultimate word, but in life—a life that at last would be free from all precariousness, and would stand eternally secure from the attack of evil. Thus did Jesus make for the Greek the passing dream into a reality, and the passing beauty into an eternal splendor. Thus for the oriental he faced sin and sorrow, but refused to admit their tyranny. Taking upon himself that load in all its crushing sorrow, he redeemed man from his bondage and gave him immortal freedom. Thus did he combine within himself all that any man had ever sought and found of God.

COMPLETE MAN

Here then is the true syncretism, which acknowledges and takes up into itself every worthy element in man's thought of God, and yet refuses to allow men to rest in faiths that had imperfectly expressed these. For this was Jesus Christ, complete and perfect man, who had gone through the full circle of human experience, from the laughter of the child to the cry of the broken heart. He is man's brother, standing beside him in every phase of human life, undergoing and understanding it. He descended into hell, the hell of man's guilty conscience and despair, and having sounded the depths of sorrow which had haunted men with their evil dreams, he brought back from the ultimate abyss the great human heritage of an eternal hope. Complete and perfect man, and yet surely how much more! He was not as we are, east and west alike, the victim of life: he was its Master and its Lord. He brought all the power and wisdom and love of eternity, and set them free in full play upon the creatures and events of time. Surely this is very God come in the flesh, claiming all man's joy and sorrow as divine, directing men to find them in the life of God where alone they can dwell safely, revealing everything in the light of the eternal love as the only interpretation of any phase of human life.

There is abundant evidence that this was the effect of Christ upon the early Christians. Apart from the countless records of their faith and its tests both in living and in dying, we have a rejuvenated world rising from the ashes of the spent and outworn history of Greece and Rome. Pater in his Marius the Epicurean has given us in a few sentences such a picture of that world as will send its message down through many generations. "What desire, what fulfillment of desire, had wrought so pathetically on these ranks of aged men and women of humble condition? Those young men, bent now so discreetly on the details of their sacred service had faced life and were glad. . . . Some credible message from beyond the flaming rampart of the world—a message of hope regarding the place of men's souls and their interest in the sum of things."

CHRIST IS INEVITABLE

This then is the sum of the whole matter. The foundations of our Christian faith are laid, not in metaphysical abstractions, but in the deep, permanent, and essential facts of human nature, seen and interpreted in the light of Christ. That interpretation is not only convincing, it is inevitable. It takes up and fulfills not only the desire of man's heart but every fact of his human experience, which never finds itself until it finds itself in him. He is indeed for us the image of the invisible. God Almighty is just like Christ, and there is nothing more to learn concerning God beyond him. Christ comes to us, to take up alike the joy and sorrow of our daily lives, their love and pain, and to reveal them all as parts of that life which is the life indeed. In him we find God mighty to master sin and set us free from its dominion, strong to save to the uttermost because he loves to the uttermost. In him we find the eternal God meeting us in all the ordinary byways of our journey through the days and years, and leading us at last to our places in the eternal life and love.

Twelfth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

IN August, 1918, while waiting for a steamer to go to America on a speaking tour, I heard six of a series of eight sermons by Dr Glover at Westminster Chapel. He was preaching at the Chapel for a month, Dr. Jowett being away on a holiday, and the theme of his series dealt with "Jesus in the Experience of Men." Since that time he has written a book under the same title, as sequel to his "Jesus of History"; but the sermons were different from the chapters of the book when it appeared. In some ways they were better than the book, one of them, for example, being in the form of a story, telling how the first statue of Jesus as the Good Shepherd was carved. They were not lectures, but preaching of a very real kind, at once stimulating and searching. It was interesting to study the congregations, many of whom were ministers—most of them on holiday, like myself—and all eager to hear Dr. Glover. It is always so, whenever and wherever he speaks. In my diary I find the following entry recalling those summer days:

August 12, 1918:—Whether I get a steamer or not does not much matter, so long as Dr. Glover preaches at the Westminster Chapel. His series of sermons on the Jesus of Experience will make as rich a book as his studies of the Jesus of History. A layman who is a Doctor of Divinity, an orator with an atrocious elocution, he is a scholar who knows more than the law allows any one man to know. At times his manner suggests a professor in a class-room, but he is a truly great preacher—simple, direct, earnest, with no thought other than to make clear his vision of Jesus in the lives of men. Rarely have I heard sermons so packed with forthright thinking and fruitful insight. There is ripe scholarship without pedantry and noble eloquence without oratory. Perhaps the outstanding impression is a fresh, vivid sense of reality, as of one who is looking straight at the truth he is talking about. He "speaks things," as Cromwell would say. Vital faith and fearless thinking are joined with a conviction of the genuineness of the man, and his knowledge of Jesus in his own experience. He dodges no issue, no fact, no difficulty, and his knowledge of the social, intellectual and spiritual world in which Jesus lived, and in which the church began her morning march, is extraordinary. He has a curious power of taking us back into those times. There are many ministries, but one Spirit. Some are prophets, some evangelists, some teachers. Dr. Glover is a great teacher of the truth as it is in Jesus.

FOUR YEARS IN THE WAR

The first sermon of the series was preached on August 4, the anniversary of that dark day, four years before, when England entered the war. Memories of that great decision, thoughts of its meaning, its cost in blood and sorrow, filled all our minds; and instead of the morning prayer Dr. Glover talked to us out of a full heart, in the gentle words which men use when they speak of such matters. What is the meaning of this "long-lived storm of great events?" he asked. What difference has it made? It is the task of the church, if it is to be the priest of God to the nation, to trace and measure the reactions of events in the deeper life of the people. How does it stand today in that inner life of thought, of motive, of faith, down where "the shell-burred cables creep?" The Bible, and especially the Old Testament, is a record of the reactions in the life of a nation to the terrible deeds of God. The Assyrian army lives in the inner life of man, because through its movements the soul of Isaiah was given new reach and range of vision. When Titus destroyed Jerusalem he released into the world a new Israel, the church of Christ. Acts which absorb the minds of men at the moment live afterwards chiefly in the literature of the soul. Will it be so today? Surely he who awakened the soul of Israel through the march of the Assyrian host, has some word to speak in this terror and tumult. Who will read for us the new and living Word of God, written in the facts and events of the day? Are there elect souls who can hear for others the still small voice speaking in the storm? Then he asked all to join in the Lord's Prayer, as alone adequate to upbear the thoughts and yearnings of the hour. Never have I heard that brief, grand prayer so surcharged with feeling, lifting a troubled people into the fellowship and consolation of God.

IS JESUS GOING?

The sermon which followed had two texts—I Cor. 2:8, and Heb. 8:8—portraying Christ the same yesterday, today and forever, in contrast with the phantasmagoria of "world-rulers of the darkness" which haunted the ancient world. In "Paradise Lost" we see that dæmon world, "thrones, dominions, principalities and powers," in its most glorious form, but we do not realize how real and terrifying it was to the ancient mind. To us all that history of war in the spirit sphere is a dim, shadowy mythology, but to the men of that day it was real, proven by long belief, and confirmed by the best and most catholic of philosophic thinkers. Indeed, it was more real than Jesus. He, and not the dæmon dominions, was the doubtful element. For us the whole thing has vanished, like the baseless fabric of a dream. We do not believe it. We think no more of it, neither about Satan, nor his hosts. But if the legend of spirits at war was a part of the early Christian faith, what becomes of Jesus? Is he going too, along with the rest of the strange tales, to take his place among the old imaginings? No; Jesus abides and grows, first, because he is rooted in historic fact, as actual and well attested a figure in history as any one of us. Men knew him, saw him, spoke with him. He was as definitely historical as Cæsar himself. Second, he abides because, even today, he is more real than any of us, revealed in the depth, intensity, and fullness of his experience both of the dark facts of life and of the reality of God. Further, he abides because he is still unexhausted; because the race has not yet used to the full his experience of life and his intuitions of God. There is no example in history of a great personality putting a lesson to the world and passing away before the lesson is learned to the very end, and transcended. So far from transcending Jesus, we are still far, very far, behind him. The closing passages of the sermon were memorable, as much for their vital insight as for the quiet, compelling earnestness of the preacher; so much so that, looking toward the pulpit, we saw no man but Jesus only.

So far as I understand these modern times in which we live, religion is only possible to the modern man along the lines of Jesus Christ. For you and me there are no other religions. Of course, there are people who play at being Buddhists and Hindus; and we may wonder what the reflective Buddhist and the reflective Hindu think of them. All sorts of poses are adopted by men and women, but serious thinkers do not pose, and any man who comes to grips with history and philosophy knows that Buddha and Mohammed and the Hindu sages are not for us. It is Jesus or nobody, and we have not exhausted what he has to say. The plain fact is that God for Jesus, God in Jesus, is an unexplored treasure still; and for us, apart from Jesus, God is little better than an abstract noun; and, as I grow older, I find abstract nouns of less and less use. Let us put it this way. If we spoke straight out we should say that God could not do better than follow the example of Jesus. That means that Jesus fulfills our conception of God, but that is not enough. He is constantly enlarging our idea of God, revealing great tracts of God unsuspected by us. God interpretable in and through Jesus is unexhausted by you and me. That means that Jesus is going to stay.

I have not touched the fourth point yet, which is less theoretical than any of the others. There are about us hundreds of men and women who have found that in the terrible business of keeping level with life in the more terrible business of fighting one's character through to something like decency, Jesus is still a dependable factor. We are not dealing with propositions in the air; we are dealing with Someone to whom we can go and say, "Come and help me," and he does. If some of the psychologists will not quite let us say that, they must concede that we find help when we bring him in. In other words, where you touch Jesus you touch the real still. Is not that true? Do you not know men and women who have been remade by Jesus Christ? In your own lives, too, you know that help that Jesus has been and is. The fact that you can depend upon him, that you can utilize him, means that he stays.

My last point is this: If all this is so, do not we feel again the importance of keeping the gaze fixed upon him? That beautiful verse in Hebrews speaks of "Looking away and fixing the eyes upon Jesus"—keeping full in the forefront, not a theological figure, but the real, one, true, vivid Jesus; yesterday and today the same, and forever; tender, intelligent, sympathetic, wonderful, available; just the kind of Jesus to whom people went with every sort of trouble, lost children, the storm at sea, all sorts and kinds of things; the Jesus who could be interrupted by mothers with little children; and like it; the Jesus who took his friends away and lay under the trees with them when they were tired; the Jesus who knew their problems and helped them. Let us remember in all our thinking that Jesus in glory—and I do not know much about glory—is the same, and is to be interpreted by those stories of his life which we know so well in the gospels, and that he is not more inaccessible now than he was then, but better proved, better attested, better known, and more available for you and me. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?"

THE COMPROMISING CHURCH

Of course the volume discussing "Jesus in the Experience of Men," as we now have it, contains much more than the eight sermons delivered in Westminster Chapel. All the sermons were recast and extended, losing much in essay form, and the story of the Good Shepherd was omitted entirely—much to my regret. Six other chapters were added, none more arresting than the one entitled "The Compromising Church," in which we hear a layman speaking very plainly about the narrowness and cowardice of the church. The complaint of educated people, he says, is that the church, for all its talk, is unsympathetic with progress and with intellectual advance. It is mistrustful of art, and afraid of science and socialism; it clings to out-of-date scholarship and pre-Christian psychology, and presses philanthropy without economics and missions without anthropology. So far from representing Jesus to the world, it has made him odious to the intelligent mind. He does not mince matters in denouncing the alliance of English religion with special privilege, and its economic orthodoxy. Its weak spot has always been its uncertainty what to make of Jesus, and its unwillingness to obey him. "Its associations tainted with capitalism; its creed mere jargon—what is to help the church?" he asks. Still, he has faith in the church triumphant—when the church has dropped its reluctance to take Jesus seriously, when it believes he means what he says, and when it is willing to believe that Jesus and truth will prevail.

A GREAT LAY PREACHER

Such is the preaching of a great layman, who is also a great scholar, a historian of authority, and the Public Orator of the University of Cambridge. Even these excerpts from a single sermon show how real and vital his preaching is. There is hardly any man now living from whom preachers may learn more, except in his manner of delivery, and that is soon forgotten in the vividness of his insight and appeal. Few men unite as he does those three rarest of gifts, accurate knowledge, the ability to describe what he knows as if it were a new discovery, and to do so in words which anybody can understand. One of the greatest of living scholars, he is the least bookish of men, and the learned and the unlearned alike hear him gladly. His amazing knowledge never obscures the freshness of his vision. The Life of Jesus loses much of its power by sheer familiarity; we know it so well that we hardly know it at all. But when Dr. Glover writes of the Jesus of History, the old, old story is so real, so living, that we seem almost to be listening to it for the first time. Arnold says that Gray doubled his force by his style. The same is true of Dr. Glover, whose style is as lucid, as virile, as direct as his thought, and withal rich in rhythm and color, with now a flash of crimson and now a gleam of gold. Above all, he bases himself on experience; in all his preaching the emphasis falls on fact that can be tested and relied on. No man can hear him without feeling that he is dealing with realities, and that he will not go an inch beyond what he sees to be verifiable and true.

There are those who say that the preaching of Dr. Glover, and his religious thinking in general, is too individualistic. It is a strange criticism to one who knows his writings, as, for example, his Angus lectures on "The Christian Tradition and its Verification," in which his appeal, as always, is to the Christian experience of the ages, communal and cumulative, as against the errors of individual insight. Better still, because in briefer form, is the Swarthmore lecture on "The Nature and Purpose of a Christian Society": a little gem, worth its weight in gold. When asked why, in a lecture delivered to a Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, he took such a turn, he said that he did it deliberately and of set purpose, in order to appeal to the experience of the historic church; whereas the Quaker differentia is, for the most part, an appeal against the historic church, "the apostasy," in fact, to quote George Fox. For, he added, "I believe that any real light that comes to man from God, directly or indirectly, will be confirmed by the light that comes to others from him. It is for some such reason that I appeal to the experience of the historic church." As a study of the experience of the church, its creative fellowship, the type of character and quality of personality it has produced, as well as the body of truth which has been, and remains, its unique treasure, it would be hard to name another little book like it.

THE PASSION FOR CHRIST

However, it is with Dr. Glover the preacher—not the scholar, the historian, or the literary critic—that we have now to do; doubly so because he is a layman, and ministers need to know what kind of sermons a great layman preaches. As a further example, and one showing not only the depth and simplicity of his faith, but also his skill in direct appeal, in the use of familiar language, and his habit of avoiding the set phrases of theology, let us take one of the noblest sermons of which I have any knowledge, entitled "Why Jesus is My Master." Five reasons are given for his willingness to be called a "slave" of Jesus. Being a man of modern education—critical, hesitating, sceptical—he finds that intellectually Jesus is the clearest and sincerest Teacher that man has. It does not matter that he lived long ago. It is not the date, but the depth that counts, and Jesus went to the bottom of things once for all. The lucidity of his moral vision is only equalled by his faith in man. Indeed, he is the only teacher who really offers any hope for humanity, any way out of the pit of personal and social sin. What is more to the point, he not only has hope for man, but he has the power to pick us up and set us on our feet when we slip and fall into the mire. His magic of personality, and his skill in making and leading men, compel his abject surrender and devotion.

Who is the leader that you want to find? What sort of a spirit? How does he handle men? You know the difference between one man and another; how one may steal a horse and the other may not look over the hedge. Why? Because it is he that takes the horse; it is just him. That is not grammar perhaps, but it is human experience. What is it about him? somebody asks. I do not know, but it is in him. Here is a story—a true one. It comes from Italy, from one of the great periods of Garibaldi. He had conquered Sicily for Italy; he had conquered a large part of the Neapolitan kingdom on the mainland, and was held up on a river. A well-known Englishman drifted into the camp, and while strolling about came upon a soldier in rags. The terms in which Garibaldi enlisted his men were these: he paid them nothing, he gave them no clothes, he gave them no food, and if they looted the Italians he shot them. The Englishman got to talking with the boy in rags about the situation. Yes, he was depressed. He said: "The other day, as I was sitting here on the hill, I was wondering how long I could stand it, or whether I would go, desert. Things had got so far, then he came by. I had never spoken to him. But he saw me and came up to me, and clapped me on the shoulder and said, 'Courage, tomorrow we shall fight for our country!' Do you think I could go after that?"

Now, what is that? We call it personal magnetism. I do not know quite what that means; it is just a long way of saying, "It's him." That is the reason why Jesus enlists people to stand with him. There is something about him that, as you get to know him, makes it impossible to have anything but enthusiasm for him. The more you know of him the more He is. The great regret of a Christian man is that he has not served him enough; that he has not more to give him. That is the experience of the Christian church. It is always the Person: the highest thing we can guess of God, his personality. And here is one who comes into our midst, a person full of power and charm. He takes our lives and makes good things out of them. He takes our temptations and beats them down under our feet. He forgives our sins; he restores us; goes with us, loves us and is ours. Do you wonder why men and women want to be called the slaves of Jesus Christ?

I want to put this to some of you: Can you face up to what he is? Can you see what he has done for men? What he has made of men, what he has enabled them to do, the way in which he has used them for the everlasting happiness and betterment of the race? Can you see that and say, "I do not think he has anything for me?" He has, and that is the gospel; that he who enlisted others, charmed them, kept them, used them, is going to enlist you, and he is going to do with you more than you dream. How old are you? Eighteen? Forty? Fifty? There is no telling what Jesus Christ can do with a man or woman once they have surrendered. What I urge is that you surrender to him. That is all.

The Singer

IF I had peace to sit and sing,
Then I could make a lovely thing;
But I am stung with goads and whips,
So I build songs like iron ships.

Let it be something for my song,
If it is sometimes swift and strong.

ANNA WICKHAM.

The Nation Christlike

METHINKS, I see a nation brave and strong
Rise up the ancient curse of war to end;

Rise up to prove herself the whole world's friend,
And by her patient justice conquer wrong!
The bloody weapons which to Mars belong
She flings aside, as worthless to defend,
And still more vain her empire to extend
Of commerce, science, freedom, art and song.

The treasures others waste to arm and fight

She pours to heal the sorrows of the world.
Defenseless she? by plunderers soon hurled
To ruin? Nay! Who can resist her might?
She links all peoples in a league of love!—
America, canst thou that nation prove?

Bahaism and Its Ambitious Claims

By Orvis F. Jordan

MECCA for Mohammedans, Jerusalem for Jews and Christians, but Chicago has now become the center for a religion that would supersede Mohammedanism, Judaism, Christianity and all other religions if its ambitions are realized. On the banks of the drainage canal to the north of Chicago, in the village of Wilmette and overlooking Lake Michigan, the teamsters are already at work making a great excavation. Here, it is announced, the foundations will soon be laid for a great temple toward which the faithful will turn their eyes every day from many sections of the earth. It is the temple of the Bahaists.

While this new religion now has nearly eighty years of history, it has encountered many persecutions and the new building will be the first significant structure erected in its history in the western world. Its only other great temple is in Turkestan. That a faith originating in Persia among the Mohammedans should seek the protection of tolerant America for its world temple is not without significance.

Plans for the new structure are believed to have been revealed to the architect by divine inspiration. Louis Bourgeois, the architect, is one of the faithful, of course, and he has been able to produce a sketch of his idea of a building intended to illustrate the fundamental tenets of the faith. A great central dome of unusual proportions is surrounded by nine minarets, nine being one of the sacred numbers in the new religion which attaches great importance to numbers. The insignia of the great religions of earth will be found on the dome woven into new patterns. One will be able to decipher the Greek cross, the Roman cross, the crescent and the Jewish triangles among the various devices. The building is to be open to the people of all faiths and religions, nine great doors leading into sanctuaries of nine great world faiths. The central sanctuary under the dome is reserved for those who hold to the present limited ideas of God and divine truth. H. B. Mayoingle, president of the Architectural League of America, has pronounced the drawings for the building as the first new idea in architecture since the thirteenth century. It will cost a million and a half dollars.

The great building will be lighted by electricity at night. It will be a beacon to the sailors on the lake and also to the motorists up and down Sheridan Road, one of the leading highways into Chicago. It is planned to organize choirs of children in great musical services, and in each chapel it will be permitted to the followers of the various world religions to read their own sacred scriptures and to worship in their own particular ways. It is reported that the big building is to be offered to the Christian churches for services on occasion.

AMBITIOUS BUILDING PROJECT

About the temple, it is said, there will be erected a number of other buildings. Abdul Baha, the spiritual head of the new religion, who resides in Acca, writes thus with regard to the plan for the various buildings: "When these institutions—college, hospital, hospice and establishments for the incurables, university for the study of the higher sciences and advanced educational courses, and various philanthropic buildings—are built, the doors will be open to all the nations and to all religions. There will be drawn absolutely no line of demarkation. The charities will be dispensed irrespective of race and color. The gates will be flung wide to mankind; prejudice toward none, love for all. The central building will be devoted to the purpose of prayer and worship. Thus for the first time religion will be harmonized with science, and science will be the handmaid of religion, both showering their material and spiritual gifts on all humanity."

A student of religion naturally wants to find and become acquainted with the group which has conceived such ambitious projects. In Chicago the Bahaists meet on the eighteenth floor of the Masonic Temple where they compete for popular favor with the various other new religions which hope to supersede Christianity. Here one will find New Thought, Theosophy and many of the other cults which have made Chicago like Athens the city where winds of new doctrine take the spiritually unaware off of their feet.

"THE SPLENDOR OF GOD"

At the Sunday afternoon meetings of the new religion a hundred people was considered a crowd until the publicity of the new building increased the crowd of curiosity seekers that attended the meetings. Dependable statistics with regard to new religions in America are notoriously hard to secure, but the best information seems to be that there are in America about two thousand adherents of the Bahaist faith, and that about two hundred of these live in Chicago. The groups in New York and Washington are said to contain some people of large means, and it has been by their generosity that the movement has been able to maintain an aggressive publicity bureau and to purchase the land upon which the new temple is to be erected. Contributions are said to be coming in from Persia for the new temple. In Chicago a paper is published called the Star of the West. It comes out every nineteen days, the first day of each Bahaist month. This peculiar chronology corresponds with the Bahaist ambition to reform the calendar and to make a new year with nineteen months of nineteen days, since nineteen is the most holy number of all those which possess religious significance. In New York is published a monthly magazine which comes out every thirty days in approved western style, and which is called Reality. It is already to be found upon the news stands in radical book stores. One may read this new magazine from cover to cover, and find nothing in it oriental. The faith is here expounded in terms of occidental idealism, indicating the wonderful adaptability of the new faith to western environment.

The group in Chicago was once very much larger, but when Baha-o'-Ullah, the Splendor of God, died at the age of 75, there came a terrible dissension over the question of the succession. In the process there were charges and counter charges of immorality, lying and other grave sins, during which the Chicago literary expounder of the faith, Ibrahim Khieralla, was separated from his wife and daughter and lost his authority. His books are still to be found in the public library, and have value as an exposition of the teachings of Baha-o'-Ullah.

The present head of the new faith, Abdul Baha, visited Chicago in 1912 and during the period of his visit to America spoke in various cities. He laid the foundation stone of the new temple at Wilmette with a golden trowel. At that time the enterprise was shrouded in the deepest mystery. Instead of meeting with opposition, he was welcomed into many Christian pulpits and spoke at the Peace Conference at Mohonk. The Unitarians were particularly interested in Abdul Baha because he sounded as his fundamental note that of unity. It is interesting to note in the July 21 issue of the Christian Register, the most authoritative interpreter of the Unitarian faith in America, an article on the new religion which is all praise. One can understand this only when one learns that there seem to be two statements of the doctrine of the Bahaists, one for the general public and one for the esoteric group which is initiated into the mysteries of the faith. Certain non-evangelicals who have rejected the incarnation of God in Christ, have found great sympathy with a religion which holds to an incarnation of God in Baha-o'-Ullah in the nineteenth century!

However, many orthodox pulpits were also opened to the Persian visitor. Dr. Cadman of Brooklyn defended his hospitality to the visitor as exhibiting the freedom of the Christian church in hearing all religious views. Dr. Percy Stickney Grant of New York permitted the visitor to speak in his Episcopal Church of the Ascension. St. Marks-on-the-Bowery opened a room for the Sunday afternoon meetings of the Bahaist group. In England there grew up a considerable sympathy with the new religion. Dr. T. K. Cheyne, editor of the Encyclopedia Biblica, has sometimes been counted as a convert, though that is probably an over-statement of the facts. In no country more than in England has the new movement secured attention from the educated and elite.

CONNECTION WITH ISLAM

In order to understand the history of the Bahaists one must know something of Islam and its history. The religion of the Prophet, contrary to the usual western impression, has quite as many sects as does occidental Christianity. Particularly, the Mohammedans of Persia have no fellowship with the Turkish Caliphate. The story of these divisions is too long for the compass of the present article, but they may be found in any standard reference work, such as the Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. The general distinction is that Turkish Mohammedanism has tended to be formal and materialistic, while the Persian Mohammedanism has had in it room for a great deal of mysticism. This is of course a matter of national temperament. The Persians of the Shiah sect have always held to the doctrine of Twelve Imans, the descendants of Ali and Fatima, daughters of Mohammed. In the tenth century the twelfth Iman disappeared into a well, and it was expected he would appear as a Mahdi, a kind of Mohammedan Messiah. In 1844, Mirza Ali Mahomet took the title of the Bab, or the Gate, through whom communication might be set up with the Twelfth Iman. The career of the Bab was a brief and tragic one. Some of his disciples were charged with an attempt to assassinate the Shah. It is asserted that the Bab was innocent of any knowledge of this plan, if it existed. The story was made the excuse for a general persecution in which the Bab and many of his followers were killed in 1850. The new religion had its martyr, and this was quite as valuable as was the martyrdom of Joseph Smith to the later history of the Mormons. Before the Bab died he advanced in his claims to be the Mahdi, later to be Nukta, or the point of Divine Unity. His revelation was called the abrogation of Islam and the Koran. He may well be described as a Mohammedan Gnostic.

With the death of the Bab there was a great quarrel over succession. The Bab had appointed Subh-i-Azal as his successor, but among the variant claimants to the honors was one named Mirza Husian Ali, the son of a concubine mother, who assumed the title of Baha-o'-Ullah, "the Glory of God." Both these men were placed under police supervision on account of quarrels, the former being located on Cyprus and the latter at Acca, Syria. The division resulted in the formation of two rival religions, the Babis and the Azalis. Baha-o'-Ullah attracted most of the Babis to himself and they became Bahists. Following the death of Baha-o'-Ullah, the succession was again disputed, but it fell to the eldest son of the departed leader, and Abdul Baha, once known as Abbas Effendi, is now the leader of the cult throughout the world, not by election, but by divine revelation.

TWELVE BASIC PRINCIPLES

The magazine, "Reality," publishes twelve basic bahai principles. These are as follows: "The oneness of mankind, independent investigation of truth, the foundation of all religions in one, religion must be the cause of unity, religion must be in accord with science and reason, equality between men and women, prejudice of all kinds must be forgotten, universal peace, universal education, solution of the economic problem, an international auxiliary language, an international tribunal." These basic principles, the reader says at once, are the great underlying convictions of spiritually-minded people in the western world. If Bahaism were this and only this, most of us would be compelled to confess that we were Bahaists.

However, the history of the movement has been strangely out of accord with these principles. No religious movement in modern times has had more sectarian quarrels than has Bahaism, in spite of its principle that "religion must be the cause of unity." The principle of the equality of men and women accords splendidly with modern conviction in the occidental world, but it is strangely out of accord with the actual practice of Baha-o'-Ullah who had two wives and a concubine. He kept these secluded in a harem in accordance with oriental custom. Nor is there anything in Bahaist ethical teaching that implies opposition to bigamy, for this would at once alienate the two hundred thousand Bahaists of Persia who are numerically the main body of the new religion. The solution of the economic problem is not to be accomplished by a scientific program elaborated in the light of experience, but by the process of bringing the warring parties to the House of Justice at Wilmette where their cause will be heard. World peace is to be accomplished in the same way by the establishment of the Bahaist court to hear the disputes. In the matter of the international auxiliary language, Esperanto has been cultivated in recent years. The Chicago Sunday school used to operate in Esperanto. The teaching of the cult with regard to the intermarriage of the races has led to a great falling away in the southern states. There is no longer a Bahaist society in Atlanta, following the marriage in Washington of a Negro and an English white woman with the blessing of Abdul Baha.

The missionary approach to America by the new religion assumes that one may be at the same time a Bahaist and a Christian. The two religions are not incompatible, it is said. It is just this method of approach which makes the new faith unique among all the cults of America. It sounds so broad, and enables the new believer to proceed a long way before he burns the bridges behind him. Of course sooner or later he learns that the new scriptures of Baha-o'-Ullah supersede the old ones, and that a new Christ has taken the place of the Christ of Galilee.

One asks, what has been added to the good old religion of the New Testament? Do we not have there the doctrine of the unity of the human race? Do not women and little children get their charter of liberty there? Is not the love of the truth one of the fundamental Christian attitudes? World peace, education, economic betterment and many another good cause have gone to the scriptures of the Christian church and found their support there.

A PAPER RELIGION

An examination of the claims of the new religion must take into account that we are comparing a religious system as yet untried by the great mass of the human race with another religion which has lived through nineteen centuries and ministered in varying degree to most of the peoples of earth. Just as paper socialism always looks more attractive than the orthodox political economy as studied in the experience of the struggling mass of workers, so a paper religion has a big advantage over religions against which the mistakes of the centuries may be recounted. To be fair we must consider both Bahaism and Christianity in the light of their claims and also in the light of their achievements.

As a means of satisfying the theological curiosity which is ever in the mind of man, the Bahaist system has much less to offer than Christianity. The God of Bahaism is remote and unintelligible, and can be approached only through successive incarnations. The Christian prays "Our Father which art in heaven," while the Bahaist when he prays addresses "Baha-o'-Ullah." The gnosticism of Bahaism is far inferior to the ethical theism of Christianity. Gnosticism, whether we find it in early Christianity, Persian Mohammedanism, Christian Science or even in the new religion of H. G. Wells has low ethical value. Bahaism has but little to say of sin or salvation. Nineteen hundred years of history has proven that Christianity has performed a wonderful service in the world by its reinforcement of ethics with religious sanctions.

Nor is the Christ of Bahaism the commanding figure that Christianity possesses. One need not fail in appreciation of the many excellences to be found in Baha-o'-Ullah to say confidently that the world will never place on the same plane the Christ of Galilee and that Persian religionist who quarreled with his brothers over the succession and finally won the victory over them.

Leaving to one side the theological satisfaction of the two religions which some today may affect to despise, but which will never be outgrown considerations in the study of any religion, one asks concerning the social ideals of the two religions. To begin with, Bahaism is a theocratic autocracy. Its leaders have one by one been self-appointed. This compares unfavorably with the evangelical section of Christianity, and even with Catholic Christianity where the pope himself must be elected by a college of cardinals. The religion that would successfully preach democracy to this modern age must be itself a democracy, and the discontent that people have nowadays with the alleged lack of democracy in the church would be multiplied a thousand times were Christianity to be superseded by Bahaism.

VISION OF PEACE

In Bahaism there has been a commendable interest in world peace and in the overcoming of all sorts of prejudice whether it rested upon racial, national or credal bases. Christianity has been an international religion ever since it burst the bonds of Judaism in the first century. Though in actual practice it has sanctioned wars and persecutions, these are coming increasingly to be felt as inconsistencies. Bahaism also in its actual history has shown a similar inconsistency between profession and practice.

In the matter of worship, Christianity seems to hold elements of great superiority. A new religion cannot create forms of worship de novo. These are the growth of the centuries, the creation of inspired genius. Unless Bahaism takes over the forms of worship of Christianity, she must confess herself for many centuries inferior. The present mood of the Bahaist is to minimize worship, just as H. G. Wells does. An approved statement of principles in the magazine Reality says: "Bahaism has no clergy, no religious ceremonial, no public prayers; its only dogma is belief in God and his Manifestations."

Ethically the new religion can hardly claim to be in the same class with Christianity. One reads with astonishment that "Monogamy is universally recommended . . ." Here follows an ellipsis in the article in Reality. Monogamy may be recommended, but it is a fact that some of the leading lights of the new religion have been polygamists, just as many Mohammedans are. While professing to give woman an equal status in human society, the new religion if adopted in the western world would soon lower immeasurably the dignity of women. One notes with approval that the new religion teaches that everyone must have an occupation. The education of children is enjoined and regulated. One misses, however, the fine spirit of sympathy and consideration for the rights of others which is to be found in the sermon on the mount. In all Bahaism there is no such adequate ethical principle as the golden rule, and no such masterly summarization of the meaning of all law, human and divine, as is to be found in Jesus' principle of love.

WHAT CHRISTIANS MAY LEARN

Christianity has learned something from every new religion with which she has come into contact. She may well learn from Bahaism a certain attitude of reverence for all religion, such as the Bahaist documents profess. Instead of talking of false religions, we should with Paul find God at work in every religion to bring men to himself. Our missionaries have in most lands ceased to talk about the "heathen." They resent the old fashioned diatribes against Confucius and Buddha. Furthermore, Christianity may well emphasize more strongly her doctrine of the unity of the human race, which is also one of the cardinal tenets of Bahaism. If the new religion has originated nothing, here, it has at least served usefully in insisting that no lines shall separate the race into hostile camps.

The Bahaist dream of the religious unity of the whole world as a basis for social unity is sound. The only question is, What religion is best prepared to serve in this way? So far the response of the world to Christianity is more encouraging than the response to Bahaism. A world full of altars will hardly take for its religion a system without an altar. A world full of sorrow and sin will scarcely find its salvation in a religious system in which ethics is subordinated to mystical speculation.

In the good providence of God, it may be that Bahaism is intended as a gate by which the Mohammendan world may come to contemplate Christianity without prejudice. The missionary approach of Christianity to the Mohammedan world has all too often failed because trinitarian speculation was obtruded as fundamental to Christianity. The Mohammendan is a monotheist and he thinks the Christian is not. The worship of Mary and the saints by Catholics gave Mohammedanism its original opportunity. Bahaism gives a basis for believing in a revelation of God through human life, just as Christianity has always taught. When the Mohammedan world is convinced that it has no real addition to religious knowledge through Baha-o'-Ullah, and in him are to be found many serious relapses, we may hope that the followers of the Prophet will add to the truth of the Koran, the larger truth of the gospel of Christ.

Upper Silesia: Sowing Seeds of Another War

TWO wrongs never made a right. We shall not redress the wrong Germany did the world by doing her injustice, now. France will not cure the world of militarism by substituting a French for a Prussian variety. If Upper Silesia becomes another Alsace-Lorraine the seeds of another war are sown. Neither France nor Germany will ever bring peace by ruining the other. The French policy today seems to differ little from that of Germany in '71. Militarism will look about the same to the world whether it issues from the Quay 'dOrsay or from the Wilhelmstrasse. There are twenty million Germans too many, said the "Old Tiger," Clemenceau. Since it is impossible to kill them all, as a Clovis or Charlemagne might have done, it is proposed to take away their means of livelihood and effect the same ends. The world war did not begin on the Belgian border in 1914. It was precipitated then, but its roots were to be found in Napoleonism and even in times many years before the Corsican's. In the long series of imperialistic wars no victor was ever ready to wipe the slate clean and build for the future on the basis of peace and justice. Every peace was the peace of victory and a future planned on the basis of force.

The writer has recently been in Germany, France and England. Americans at home can have little idea of the critical character of the Upper Silesian question. It may be said without exaggeration that it is critical enough to bring on another war and that right soon. Lloyd George has saved the day, for the nonce, by his denunciation of the French policy. But he has not settled it by referring it to the League of Nations Council. There the decision must be unanimous, and France has a vote, Germany no voice at all. It was a victory for the League to have such reference made, but unless France withdraws from the ballot as an interested nation desiring a truly impartial verdict, she can disable the League through enforcement of her arbitrary will. In France one hears Lloyd George bitterly denounced for this action. In Germany he hears nothing but words of disappointment because he compromised on reference to the League instead of insisting on the terms of the plebiscite. In England he hears only friendly words for Germany on this issue and caustic ones for France. In fact, every European ally of the French has forsaken them on the Silesian issue.

The Decision of the Plebiscite

Upper Silesia has been German for six hundred and fifty years. While there are many Poles there the old Slavic stock is not Polish. The language of Warsaw is not understood by them. When Polish propagandists came in they had to speak in German to be understood. Under any application of the Fourteen Points no question about Upper Silesia would have been raised. But it is the richest industrial district in Germany and under the French militaristic policy of ruining German industry the question of its status was raised. A plebiscite was taken last March. This resulted in a great majority for the continuance of German government. After shutting out 200,000 Germans who had immigrated into the district since 1904, still the vote was carried by a three to two majority. Take it any way you wish and the result was German. The vote for Germany was 707,000; that for Poland 474,000. Eighty-nine parishes went unanimously German; not one went unanimously Polish. Every town went German. Every district, excepting only two purely rural districts on the lower Polish border, went German. The Germans carried all the larger parishes, a total of 845; the Poles carried 691 parishes, all of them small and rural, e. g., they carried a rural parish of 34 while the Germans carried a town parish of 35,000. The Germans got 80 per cent of the vote in the industrial towns and even carried the Polish rural districts as a whole by a 20 per cent majority.

From a historical standpoint the Polish claim is invalid; what a merry reconstruction of the world there would be if it were attempted to recast its geography according to imperial possessions of seven hundred years ago! Germany would get Alsace-Lorraine, England large sections of France and the Red Men all of America. From a racial standpoint the Polish claim has a doubtful validity because the old Silesian Slavs are not Polish and 43 per cent of them voted for a German government. From the vote taken last March, under Allied auspices, with strong Polish bias and with 200,000 Germans not voting, the result was unquestionable. Poland carried only two rural districts. England proposes they be given to Poland. France demands that they be gerrymandered into a unity with as many adjoining as their majority can overcome and all given to Poland, and makes this demand only after failure to overthrow the whole plebiscite. She would repay the rape of Alsace-Lorraine with the rape of Upper Silesia.

The Industrial Protest

Upper Silesia covers approximately 5,000 square miles. It has been producing for Germany one-fourth of both her lead and coal and two-thirds of her zinc. It is twice as rich as the Ruhr basin in coal. So rich are its beds that, at the present rate of mining, they will yield for 1,200 years. The region is rich in wood and water and has been knit together into an indivisible unity of industrial plants with wood, water, road coal and ore. You could no more divide it than you could divide a horse and give each a part of a working animal, said Dr. Walter Rathenau, one of the great German captains of industry. A delegation from our party went through this territory. They found it one of the best industrial districts in the world from the standpoint of housing, hours, sanitation and all living conditions, but badly demoralized at present by the presence of Korfanty's guerillas. They commit dreadful atrocities on occasion and hold the district in terror, without governing or even occupying the territory as an armed force of organized men, with the result that the established government cannot function and the entire industrial organization is deranged.

Our delegation found that the work-day was regularly eight hours in normal times, that the wage averaged well with continental wages, with provision made for extras for children in the home. Coal and cottage are furnished at cost, with provision that no man can be turned out for striking. Collective bargaining is legalized and 90 per cent of the workmen are in the unions. Every factory and mine has its workers' councils and insurance for accident, illness and unemployment is legally provided. The capital and management are largely German, but many Poles have come in as workingmen. They tended to lower the living standards but the above named legal provisions have largely remedied that. The great majority of them voted German in the plebiscite because of the superior guarantees given them under German management. German labor protests the delivery of this district to Polish hands because that would deliver their fellow-workmen over to the primitive conditions of Polish industry; and the Polish wage earners protest also. Poland has great undeveloped coal areas and does not need those of Upper Silesia. The economic as well as the political balance weighs heavily on the German side in the Upper Silesian question.

Justice or the Seeds of War

I plead not for Germany, but for justice. I have just been over the French battle-fields and can understand France's great fear and her frantic demand for security, but it is difficult to comprehend her statesmen again putting their dependence in military instead of judicial forces. Certainly history never proved anything more conclusively than the folly of that procedure and to no nations did she ever demonstrate it more conclusively than to France and Germany. Germany should rebuild France, even German officials of the new regime frankly said that; and that may mean more than merely reconstructing the devastated areas; but this situation in Upper Silesia does not involve that question. It is purely an attempt to disembowel German industry, to create an imperial alliance with Poland, a step in a military plan to extend a powerful France over the Saar and the Ruhr and thus take Germany's industrial base in the west and give Poland her eastern industrial base in Upper Silesia, with a Franco-Polish military alliance. Here is a piece of machtpolitik which outruns any Prussia ever accomplished and which gives fair rivalry to all that she intended in 1914.

If the plebiscite of last March had gone Polish by even a small majority, no one doubts that the whole province would now be safely in Polish hands. It went German by a 50 per cent majority and the district is now overrun by Polish guerillas, with the Allied Commission inert and plans for a pseudo-judicial rape of the eastern half well on foot. The industrial, moral and mental bond of the province is German. Germans assembled in mass meetings, where the common people predominated and men of the new regime alone gave the addresses, and adopted the cry "Upper Silesia, yesterday, today and forever, undivided and inseparable from the German mother." The whole world demands justice from the Germany that yesterday made war; all the world unborn demands justice from the Allies that war may not again be made—with right on the German side the next time. Let the two districts which are next to Poland and which alone voted Polish go to Poland. They are rural, the Poles are in a majority and they are rich in coal and ore. The Poles have vast undeveloped minerals near them and they are not so developed as to break the productive unity of the district. By the same sign let the rest go to Germany, as it was voted to do, thus keeping the unity, both political and industrial, intact, and above all proving good faith and honest intentions and sowing seeds of peace through justice.

The issue is in the hands of the great council of the League of Nations at Geneva. The league's future may be determined, as may that of Europe, by the decision. It may decide in accord with the plebiscite and so beget the confidence of the world, or against the plebiscite and so prove itself a mere League of Victors.

RELIGION AMONG AMERICAN MEN

A GREAT cross section of American life —this our army in the World War has surely been. What it has shown of the real religious life of American men, and the vital lessons which the church should learn from it, are presented in this, the first of the studies made by the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook. Every minister who wishes to know the heart of the average American man—and especially the young man—should read this significant volume. Cloth, $2.00.

Modern Churchmen and the Reporters

WHEN in a tight corner, blame the reporter! This is a maxim upon which many public men in church and state have acted. Sometimes there is ground for the charge against the journalist; more often the speaker has only himself to blame. The modern churchmen's union has a grievance against those who culled certain phrases from the Dean of Carlisle's speech and started a fierce controversy in which the dean was gravely misjudged. Now it is impossible to demand of a workaday journalist that he should be familiar with the niceties of language used in theological circles. He has, moreover, to condense his report and when he has done with it, there are the scissors of the sub-editors. The public taste also demands graphic and even dramatic touches, and in matters theological there is an eager interest and a most profound ignorance. Dr. Rashdall and others, if they wish to discuss theology in public should take the press into their confidence and prepare a digest of their words, or if they dread misunderstanding they can send their own accounts to the press. In any case it is a poor thing to do as speakers sometimes do, win the applause of a section of their audience by fierce words which are carefully neutralized afterwards. Do they ever do such things across the Atlantic?

Worship—Protestant and Catholic

In a recent discussion of public worship in "The Challenge," there is an appeal for a synthesis by means of which the distinctive gifts of each community of Christians may be brought together in one:

"The Catholic eucharist dramatizes the sacrifice of Christ and the soul's response to it. Christian singing expresses the soul's aspiration to God. The Quaker silence symbolizes the communion of the spirit of God with the spirit of man, far down beneath the reach of words. The improvisation of speech in sermon and prayer present afresh from day to day the unfolding purpose of God in the history of man. 'The Love Feast' of the Methodist or 'The Lord's Supper' of the Congregationalist fitly expresses the intimate communion of those who can unite in a confessed experience of the grace of Christ. It is a rich provision, but is it all? Or is it anywhere perfectly combined?"

The answer, as the officials say, "must be in the negative." But there can be no doubt that thousands of Christians long for such a worship which will gather into itself all that is good in every church. One thing must be remembered; it is not forgotten by the writers of the article: "We want a type of service better adapted to the needs of those who have never accepted, or no longer consciously accept Christianity, and another type for those who accepting it in principle, want opportunity to discuss it in all its bearings." The normal service of worship is almost in a secret code, which the faithful can interpret—but what of the seekers?

The Modern Bishop

Last week I found myself among Anglican friends in Oxford. They spoke to me as they always do, with perfect frankness. We talked of bishops. They declared that few churchmen today would undertake the toil of a bishopric except under a sense of duty. The life is one of perpetual work, far too much of which is purely business. The church was over-organizing itself and the burden of this fell on the bishops. There should be more of them and they should be set free for their own spiritual leadership. It is clear, however, that even now they are seeking more and more to come into touch with the people. Dr. Temple preaches on the sands at Blackpool; the Bishop of Woolwich speaks to men on Tuesdays at noon in the borough market-place; his first subject was "What is God Doing?" The Bishop of Peterborough, who has a very wide diocese, partly agricultural, has been making a pilgrimage through Rutland from village to village, holding open-air mission services on the village greens. "At the close of each open-air mission the bishop shook hands with each one present and the following day, as he set forth in his purple cassock, with staff in hand to the next village, he was accompanied by many of the villagers, the shepherd literally followed by the sheep, who walked with him to the borders of their parish, where he was met by the parish priest and villagers of the village to which he was going." This is good news; and we expect to have more of such intimate human relationships between fathers in God and their children. Some such journeys Silvester Horne and Dr. J. D. Jones used to make together; and we hear of Congregational moderators who in ministries of the same kind do the work of a bishop.

The World, Ireland,—Charlie Chaplin

It seems a pity that any of us should be distracted from giving our whole attention to Charlie Chaplin. But some will allow such trifles as the League of Nations and the future of Ireland to take up time which ought to be given to Charlie or to the last prize-fight. There appear to be signs even that the people of this country are awakening out of that mood of helplessness which has been upon them. The men of science have expressed their doubt whether it is the function of science to provide poison-gas for future wars. There is at least a hope for peace in Ireland. In democratic countries it is always difficult to know when to take seriously the protestations of leaders and when to look upon them as concessions to the crowd. There are those among us who before giving always cry, "We will never yield." (Do they ever do this in America?) The washing of the dirty linen after the coal-strike showed clearly that while certain spokesmen were vehemently defending a policy in public, they were equally strongly opposing it behind the closed doors. For the moment we wait in hope of a conference between the cabinet and Sinn Fein. If that comes about, it is hard to see how Ireland can go back to its old sorrowful ways.

A Missionary of Science

Is it widely known that the first modern medical work in China was undertaken by a doctor who had a strong faith in scientific truth? When Thomas Richardson Colledge opened his hospital at Macao in 1827, though himself a devout Christian, he made no claim to be a medical missionary, but he had faith in medical truth. "All truth is of God," he wrote in conjunction with Peter Parker of the American Board. "The introduction of medical truth into China would be the demolition of much error. As a means, then, to awaken the dormant mind of China, may we not place a high value upon medical truth and seek its introduction with a good hope of its becoming the handmaid of religious truth? THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Excellent Way*

WEYMOUTH makes the last verse of the twelfth chapter of First Corinthians read: "And now I will point out to you a way of life which transcends all others." Then follows the masterpiece of Paul. I have been listening to the New York Symphony Orchestra, led by Rene Pollain, for two weeks. One night they played a selection by Mozart—pure music—pure music! How it thrilled us. Do you not have this same sensation when you run into this thirteenth chapter? It is pure religion. It is the real thing. Jesus played his masterpiece when he gave us the "Prodigal son"—that is the biggest, sweetest note ever reached under our skies. Jesus' most eminent disciple comes closest to his master here. The excellent way is the Way of Love, the life that transcends all others is the Life of Love. Love is a powerful thing as Jesus and Paul conceive it. Love is not a weak, silly sentiment; not a blind, indulgent, unfair thing. The father of the prodigal represents love; the element Paul talks about is a big, strong element. "Love suffers a long time, knows no jealousy, is neither conceited nor self-assertive, does not blaze out in passionate anger nor brood over wrongs, finds no pleasure in injustice to others, joyfully champions the truth, knows how to be silent, is full of trust, hope and endurance. Love never fails. Prophecies will come to an end, languages will die away, knowledge and theories will be brought to an end, but the conquering course of love will go on and on." I want you to see how big, how strong, how fair, how broad love is as conceived by Paul. Practicing what he preached, Paul did not hesitate to deal firmly with the Corinthians. He told them plainly what they must and must not do. Among the early disciples it seems that they called the church "The Way." Jesus had not then become institutionalized. There was no hard and fast organization. It was just "The Way." There was no written creed, they just lived a certain "Way," i. e., with a certain spirit. It was a loving way, a sacrificial way, an unselfish sharing way, an eager, telling way, a happy, emotional, free way, an optimistic, hopeful, faithful way—the only way. O, that we might live like that now! But the church is almost cursed by institutionalism. We have iron rules now; we have written creeds now; we have heresies now; we have men over us to determine what we shall say and when we may say it; we have rich dictators now. It almost seems that Christianity has ceased to be a "way" at all, but a "form." We have the shell now, the crust, the form. Where is the freedom? Where is the life? Where is the love? It is all constitutions, precedents, by-laws, chairmen, secretaries, authorities, books, systems, fixed days, fixed apportionments, fixed beliefs, fixed forms. This is nice for those who like that sort of thing—little, prescribed, determined things. There are those who like to live in a fashionable eastern hotel room, others of us like to roam the mountains, sail the seas and fill our lungs with fresh air. Some people like pressed, assorted and labeled flowers, others of us love the gardens and the fields with all the dew of a morning and all the fragrance of living, growing flowers and trees. I know a brilliant university professor who believes that Christianity is being institutionalized to its death. He thinks we are doing to the teachings of Jesus just what the old Pharisees and Rabbis did to the teachings of Moses and the great prophets.

*Oct. 16, "Paul Writes to the Christians at Corinth." I Cor. 1:10, 11; 13:1-13.

I tell you there is something to that idea. It would do you good to consider that! May it not be that the forms are squeezing the very life out of our religion. In Nuremburg, Germany, I looked at that frightful device, "The Iron Virgin," hideous beyond words. Into her hollow insides the poor, luckless prisoner was crammed and then the door was shut and the miserable victim was squeezed into uniformity—and death! Dare we think? Dare we love? Dare we live? Dare we act? We need a protest against organized, institutionalized Protestantism. I see men now out with microscopes looking for the mint, anise and cummin. Have they forgotten all they ever knew about justice, mercy and righteousness? Forms, ceremonies, millinery, days, words, conformity absorb our thought. Yes, and the world fights and the times are out of joint! Has Jesus a clear program for today? Yes—The Way of Love! Hear that O England and Ireland. Hear that, ye who come up to the congress on disarmament. Hear that, ye who stand in the pulpits and point the road to life. Life is love and love is happiness and peace. An apostolic church—restoration—early practices—Love—The Way.

BOOKS

THE NEXT WAR. By Will Irwin. Mr. Irwin has rendered a service of inestimable value in gathering together and making graphic the terrible facts and figures of the great war and in showing what they forecast for "the Next War." Dr. Frank Crane pronounces this volume "the greatest book of these times" and declares that it should be placed in the hands of every teacher, preacher and legislator in the United States and taught in every public school. For he sees that it is only by the general realization of what war means for the future, that a public opinion can be developed strong enough to overthrow the entrenched forces of nationalistic capitalism, greed and selfishness.

The style is simple and clear; the facts are wonderfully marshalled; the logic is irresistible. "This book staggers my imagination," says Dr. Crane; "it sweeps away the last cowardly subterfuge of my intellect; it grips my heart in its terrific amazing revelation. It makes the American see the horrible ditch of destruction toward which we are surely striding." The closing chapter but one deals with "Proposed Ways to Peace" while the last chapter is entitled "The Tempter."

Pastors and educators should not content themselves with giving to their hearers the terrible descriptive sections that form the main substance of this work, but should press on to the constructive portion. We must create in the modern mind the idea of such a world organization that national greed may be restrained, international wrongs set right and justice maintained by the united moral power of the world functioning through appropriate instrumentalities. (Dutton. $1.50).

THE FOUNDATION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE. By James Mickel Williams. This volume, formidably erudite in appearance, is designed by the author as the first of a series of six which will together constitute a complete system of social philosophy. The fundamental thesis of the volume in question is the necessity for an adequate and clear-cut analysis of the psychological implications which underly political, legal, economic and social science. Political theory, for instance, has been based upon certain axioms of sovereignty which have never been subjected to thoroughgoing rational analysis. "The political theory of thinkers in each state developed along the line of the political attitude of the state;" instances are obvious in the case of modern Germany, not to mention the France of the days of Louis Quatorze, and the Revolutionary era, as well as modern England and the United States, etc.

Similar "axioms" hold sway in the various other fields above indicated. The author carefully traces the outworkings of such axioms in the field of jurisprudence, with special discussion of interpretations of private rights and the development of private property, and in the allied fields of economics, history and sociology. Though his sympathies would seem to lie on the radical side of the fence, he at least attempts to preserve a tone of strict impartiality such as benefits the social psychologist.

The last two chapters deal respectively with the field and the methods of social psychology in the light of the foregoing discussion. "Social psychology was defined as the science of the motives of the behaviour of men living in social relations . . . What we find in human society are men animated by more or less conscious motives, and their reactions to others are affected by what they believe others' motives to be. . . A man's estimate of himself is determined by what others think of him. . . Only the great moral character cares supremely for the approval of the man within the breast." For this reason analysis of ordinary human motives, attitudes and behaviour, is in the author's opinion fundamental to any right formulation of the social sciences. The material for such a formulation the writer finds in the many contemporary as well as historical studies—monographs, journals devoted to the social sciences, etc.

CORRESPONDENCE

An Open Letter to Professor Taylor

Dr. Alva W. Taylor,
Care of The Christian Century,
Chicago, Ill.

My Dear Sir: I have been greatly interested in your articles in The Christian Century, although they have been certainly provocative. That they are unfair toward business and industry is not a peculiar phenomenon, since all the world in these days seems to be arrayed on the same side. Nothing that I have seen written with regard to the United States Steel Corporation incident has shown an appreciation of the real significance of the struggle made by the labor unions to dominate that corporation.

It seems dishonest for thinkers and writers to disclaim socialism in one breath and in the next attack the present industrial regime or so-called "capitalistic system." If a man is committed frankly to the socialistic viewpoint, we know where he stands. If he is committed to the conviction that on the whole the present social and economic regime is in spite of its faults and failings grounded in fundamental human instincts, that it is performing a vitally essential and beneficent function, it should receive his unequivocal support and sympathy in its efforts to adapt itself to changing conditions. He should not indeed be blind to its evils but in his zeal for reform he would take care not to injure the main root, trunk and branches of the tree.

I have before me your article of August 4 in The Christian Century in which you assert the iniquity of the present division of property and the failure of the present industrial system to distribute profits according to merit or earning power. However, it seems clear that as contrasted with a socialistic regime, the present system does distribute profits according to merits or earning power. To the extent that liberty and equal opportunities exist, great differences will always arise and exist in regard to the acquisition and possession of property. "Property rights," that is, the right to acquire, retain, transfer and transmit property are founded in the most ancient and deeply-rooted of human instincts, although in a sense constituted by and conferred by the state. If on the whole it is well for society that the system of private property should continue, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that substantial inequalities in the acquisition and possession of property will continue to exist. The acquisition of wealth is not in fact inconsistent with coincident benefit to the general public as well as to employes and associates. An increase in the accumulation of capital is an absolute necessity if there is to be an increase in the amount of leisure and goods available to the individual, and such increase can only be secured by greater accumulations of capital. A rich man is not a parasite if he does not work with his own hands or brain. Although highly desirable that every member of society should be a worker as long as health and life permit, and although the number of those who do not work is insignificant, yet as a matter of fact the capital which the wealthy man places at the disposal of productive industry is a greater contribution to society than any work he may do himself. Abundant capital raises wages and the standard of living.

In the fourth paragraph of your article you state that the ethical demand is not for an arbitrary division of property but for a more equitable distribution of profits. You fail to discriminate here between ordinary business profits and income derived from or based on possession of natural resources of the soil, such as lumber, oil and minerals, and the unearned increment contributed by society to the value of land on account of its situation. It is in respect to the latter that readjustments will be made if possible to do so without dislocating the economic fabric. The state might well reserve certain resources, water powers, etc., from private possession, but you altogether misconceive the situation when you regard ordinary profits arising from business as excessive. It is an economic law that profits tend to become narrower. There is a large element of adventure and risk in business on this account as well as on account of the precarious tenure of business after it is acquired. The general view that profits of business are excessive is unfounded except so far as profits may be based on a monopoly of natural resources.

During the war the wages of the workman were raised unprecedentedly and he was practically exempted from taxation. The trusts and larger corporations with watered capitalizations also escaped with a light tax, but tens of thousands of middle class corporations were stripped of their profits by federal taxation, forced into bankruptcy in large numbers, and the majority of them are in a very precarious situation. This is the principal reason for the present economic crisis and lack of employment.

Business has been simply bled white by taxation and the idea that business corporations have distributed in dividends or retained in their surpluses large profits which ethically should have been distributed more equitably (presumably with employes) is the essence of irony to those who are behind the scenes.

I cannot conceive why you should say that capitalism results in the denial of individual incentive, because capitalism is certainly based on and exists by virtue of the economic incentive to the individual to acquire property and the right to retain it and transmit it after he gets it.

It also seems to me absurd to state that possessors of legal privileges in their blind unreasoning fury are crying for the dungeon for socialists. Socialists and other theorists seem to pursue their career of propaganda without let or hindrance, while our legislatures and congress are sitting up nights to think of more laws to restrict business.

The business world is full of plans these days for securing greater cooperation and closer relations between employers and employes. Almost every conceivable plan is being tried. Some of them seem to have substantial merit. They have secured for the employe a participation in shop management, larger remuneration and various other benefits. They have produced a better feeling and benefited business as well. These efforts for better industrial relations have been the result not only of practical business considerations but a sincere desire to benefit all concerned,—to help the employe as well as benefit the business. It is highly significant that all of these plans have met the bitter hostility of the labor unions and in no case have they been initiated or suggested by the unions. The unions fear that they will weaken and destroy their prestige and power. Labor leaders in fact wish to maintain the cleavage between employer and employe. All these constructive and liberal plans have been evolved by business men in consultation with their own employes and against the determined opposition of the trade unions. The industrial world is thus making progress toward better relations against the efforts of the trade unions.

In conclusion, I wish to recognize the correctness of your insistence on the ethical obligations and responsibilities resting upon men of means and wealth. Certainly there never has been an age in which the responsibilities resting upon men of means have been more deeply felt and in which so sincere an effort has been made to meet them.

H. AINSWORTH.

Moline, Ill.

Professor Taylor's Response

Mr. Ainsworth's argument may be answered under nine points. We will follow them in the order under which he makes them.

1. It is dishonest to disclaim socialism and then attack the present "capitalistic system."

"Dishonest" is a bad word to use in a discussion. We will translate it into "inconsistent." Is the "present industrial regime" or "capitalistic system" the only alternative to socialism? I am not a socialist but I quite agree with a great English employer who told us this summer that either the present industrial system would have to be "socialized" through some kind of industrial democratizing or we would get socialism. That would not come about because socialism is best but in angry and radical reaction against inequalities. Witness Russia! Socialism is possible only where there has been a czar. Judge Gary makes ten socialists to where Victor Berger makes one.

2. As contrasted with socialism, the present system does distribute profits according to earning power.

I never contended for socialism. I am not a socialist. I could as easily follow John Calvin as Karl Marx. To make that contrast misses the mark utterly. To be sure there will always be differences. Even if all were of equal ability there would be different aspirations. But when 65 per cent of the families in America or more than 70 per cent in England own nothing beyond household and personal effects, that is, possess no capital, either the system results in an inequitable distribution or God made an awful botch of creation; for to say so great a majority is incapable or unwilling to get on is to pronounce an awful judgment on the Creator's handiwork. By all means we want to retain private ownership. But let us make it possible for the 65 per cent to own and to profit in character and citizenship by a sense of possession. My private slogan is one coined long ago by an Irish landlord who, in pleading for some plan whereby tenants could purchase said, "Ownership turns sand into gold."

3. An increase in the amount of capital is necessary if there are to be goods available to give individuals leisure.

We agree. Also that there must be greater production. Labor slacks on the job and Mr. Hoover's committee of engineers reports management about one-half efficient in production. Mr. Ainsworth may answer for capitalistic management; for labor I will allow another large British employer to answer. He says, Labor cannot be expected to produce until it, in some way, shares in the profits of production, and is insured a security of life as against both low wages and unemployment.

4. We must discriminate between ordinary business profits and income derived from the possession of natural resources.

Here we agree. Most of the swollen fortunes are from the latter. If we could separate the income derived from the exploitation of nature's gifts from a legitimate business profit, giving society the former, we would have fewer multi-millionaires, fewer property-less families, less danger of socialism, and perhaps no argument between Mr. Ainsworth and myself. But "capital" as a whole always fights against such a division and usually calls those who believe all "natural monopolies" should belong to all the people socialists.

5. Business takes risks.

It does; it risks profits and in many cases capital. But labor risks bread and home and the very necessities of life—by so much is its risk the greater, and it is always "laid off" when profits cease.

6. During the war wages were raised to an unprecedented degree.

They were; and so was the cost of living. Many skilled trades received increases greater than the increase in the cost of living, but the average for all did not keep up, and today wages are still being cut while the cost of living is again tilting upward. Wages must come down, but is it fair to reduce wages more rapidly than the cost of living is reduced?

7. Business has been bled white by taxation.

No doubt many businesses have, certainly not U. S. Steel nor Standard Oil nor coal—and the railroads are insured certain profits. Many smaller corporations and businesses are suffering. But who is going to pay for the war? I recently looked upon ground made sacred by the bleeding unto death of two million brave lads. Our taxation schemes are inequitable and need revision but they will only be made more inequitable if so revised as to give profits immunity by assessing the costs up to consumption. Is there no patriotism in profits? Cannot business reward those brave dead by paying without complaining?

8. Does capitalism result in the denial of incentive?

Not to those who possess it or can get it. We plead for those who cannot get it, and their name is legion under our present great machine organization of industry. Somehow the millions who work for wages and small salaries must be given the incentive of personal ownership. I do not know how it will be done, but I am convinced that the same inventive and organizing genius that developed our magnificent industrial machinery can evolve a better human organization to work it, once it undertakes the task.

9. The business world is full of plans for better cooperation with labor, but the unions oppose them.

They do. Why not also acknowledge that most of them are conceived in opposition to the unions? Both oppositions are wrong. Somehow the craft brotherhood must admit shop organization between management and labor, and capital must adjust such organization to craft's brotherhood, or there will be perpetual conflicts and loss.

Mr. Ainsworth refers to supposed efforts of the unions to dominate the United States Steel Corporation. He might have referred to efforts to obtain unions in steel, but "dominate" is a very strong word to use when there are no unions. It is like charging Mr. Bryan with dictating to the Democratic party.

The Truth About Germany

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: An article by Alva Taylor in The Christian Century of Sept. 22, "Germany From The Inside," is very commendable. It will help the readers of your valuable paper to clear up a situation much misunderstood. The article verifies my own knowledge of the situation as it concerns Germany. I happen to have a sister living in Germany, city of Stettin, whose correspondence substantiates the conditions described by Professor Taylor.

All the newspaper talk of a stubborn Germany, which refuses to acknowledge her defeat and their thriving industry, etc., is either well organized propaganda or ignorant illusion. The facts are different. And any person who will take the trouble to learn conditions at first hand, in a fashion as Mr. Taylor did, will come back and repeat the same story. I regret very much that Dr. Taylor could not have gone to Russia and get us the real facts of an "Inside Russia." It might have proven a real illumination for many people.

This sort of investigation may not suit the Ku Klux Klan type of Americans who have erected for themselves a self-appointed standard of justice, but what does it matter? Real Americans desire to know the truth.

A Better Frances Willard Memorial

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your issue of Sept. 22 at hand and glanced over, before settling down to work, as I have come to look upon it as my very best weekly ally.

I would like to add a word about your item, "Frances Willard Memorial Church." Certainly we cannot raise too many memorials to that noble woman, but I am inclined to think that this proposed church is a cloak for a reactionary sectarianism, a spirit alien to Frances Willard.

Such a church, denominational, is out of place here, for in the brief time that she spent in Churchville, her life was related to the Congregational church. Her parents belonged to it. She was buried from it, and in one of her rare visits to Churchville, she speaks of visiting the church of her parents.

Again, there may be room for a community church here; there is no real need for a new building for the Methodists. Churchville is a village of about 400 people, almost stationary in population. It has four churches, Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational. The united protestant congregations could easily be seated in any one church, any ordinary Sunday. A union evening service may call out 150 people. All the buildings are in good condition and ample enough for the work that the churches are now doing. And I believe that outside of a few extreme partisans, the whole scheme is felt to be a waste of good money where it is not needed.

If we are to have a memorial church to such a character, why not first try to get the three churches together in the spirit of Frances Willard, form a community church or something of the kind? This would indeed be a worthy memorial. But if the proposed plan goes through it will postpone the day of goodwill and set up a building that will have to be supported by, as well as built by, outsiders.

Politics and Religion

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have studied with careful attention the editorial in issue of Sept. 22 entitled "Political Disloyalty Under the Guise of Religion." The entire article brings out nothing but harmonious response from my mind.

But more particularly does this part of it appeal to me: "All the signs point to the necessity of the American's reorganizing his social ideals, and of finding a new basis and relationship for his political ideas on the one part and his religious ideas on the other."

The notable tendency of the Christian world, both politically and religiously, to react favorably to imperialistic schemes, has its source in a lingering belief in the "authority" of ancient systems which our civilization should be outgrowing and throwing off. And it is, in the main, accomplishing this. But there are powerful reactionary elements in politics and religion and these elements are strengthened by the fact that in the matter of religion we retain the authority of an outlived system founded in the supernatural.

It is probably the case that "millions of thoughtful Americans . . . are groping for guiding principles and adequate social forms"—and may it not be that our "groping" is protracted by the very fact that an eye is turned to an antiquated system of belief to furnish from its receding and glimmering light the means of finding our way out of the uncertainties of our present situation?

It is true that "the American mind has found itself capable of maintaining a double sovereignty when one sovereignty lies in the spiritual and religious field and the other in the temporal or political," but when one of these sovereignties rests in the mind and will of the people and the other in the notion of a supernatural absolutism which has invaded the world order and there established a kingdom of authority over, and subversive of, the free thought of man, is there not a contradiction of theory which leads to confusion and in fact to the very situation pointed out and properly condemned in the article under consideration?

Can we have democracy in the political world order and at the same time accept absolutism in the religious world order? It now requires "rigorous and unrelenting zeal (to) keep the two realms and their institutions separate." The fact is that we are not succeeding in keeping them entirely separate.

A Full-Fledged Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have been informed that recently you carried an article in your paper stating that under the leadership of LeRoy D. Anderson, pastor of First church, Fort Worth, the Breckenridge church was making progress, etc.

I wish to state that LeRoy D. Anderson is pastor of the Breckenridge, Texas, church; that Breckenridge is 120 miles from Fort Worth, is in the midst of the richest oil belt in the world; that the church has its own financial budget of $12,000 per annum, is carrying on its own work, able to be weaned, has all its teeth and is eating meat. In our congregation we have a number of men rated as multi-millionaires, and we have in view the building of a modern church building. The church itself is giving largely to missions and education. Recently one of the members made a gift of $6,000 to one of our colleges and we are sending several boys and girls to school, paying all expenses.

We have our own moving picture machine, and give free Friday night pictures; we open our building to all meetings for the general benefit of the community, including good roads, railroad, etc. At present this church is interested in furnishing preaching to two other points besides its own pulpit. The church is in a community which has grown from 250 to 20,000 in two years and coming here are people of culture from all quarters of the globe. The county and city have recently placed bonds aggregating several millions for sewerage, paving and pikes. In fact the water's fine—come to Breckenridge.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Seminary Starts a School for Laymen

Many laymen are in the steady employ of the church as directors of religious education, business managers, secretaries and in other functions. Most of these have come to their positions without training or with inadequate training, with the exception of the directors of education. Auburn Seminary has recently introduced a course for lay helpers in religion. Dr. Edward P. St. John, a teacher of religious education, is dean of the department. Courses will be given in Christian belief, the Bible, church history, church and Sunday school organization, educational psychology, religious pedagogy, story telling, child study, play and games, physical education, sociology, missions, young people's work, and church and Sunday school music."

Disciples Will Hold Metropolitan Convention

An innovation in Chicago Disciples custom is the coming Metropolitan Convention of the Chicago area, to be held in Memorial Church, October 10 and 11. This convention will include sessions of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, the Chicago Union of Women's Missionary Societies, and other organizations. The sessions will be presided over alternately by Rev. O. F. Jordan, president of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society and Mrs. J. B. Jackson of the women's union. National officers will be present to present the world wide program of the denomination, including Rev. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society, Prof. Alva W. Taylor, Mrs. J. M. Stearns and others. The area included reaches from Waukegan on the north to Gary on the south. It is said the gathering will be a sort of miniature national convention.

Presbyterian Newspaper Applauds Disciples Missionary

The following editorial appeared in The Continent last week: "Hearty applause justly follows the General Convention of the Disciples of Christ for 1921, lately concluded, which very frankly revoked the hasty and foolish action of their 1920 convention demanding the recall from China of all missionaries willing to welcome unimmersed Christians to the fellowship of life and work in local mission congregations. Rev. Frank Garrett, secretary of the Disciples mission organization in China, at whom the drastic resolution of a year ago was chiefly aimed, did come home—but not to resign. He came instead to demonstrate to his constituency how impossible (and wicked) it would be in a heathen land to cut a dividing line between unimmersed and immersed converts—how absurd, too, under the auspices of a denomination which continually cries aloud for Christian unity. And he carried the day magnificently. The convention after hearing his whole argument vindicated his position by a vote of four to one. Whether this reversal is regarded as signifying a twelvemonth growth in grace or a seasonable recovery from temporary aberration, it is an outcome to rejoice in and a token of high promise for the future health and strength of this important brotherhood of aggressive Christians."

Moody's Son Angered at Spirit of Premillennialists

Mr. Will R. Moody, son of the famous evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, founder of Northfield, is out of patience with the censorious spirit of the premillennialists. Mr. Moody made the following statement recently which is worthy of wide consideration: "It is natural that I should sympathize with the views of those who look for the personal return of Christ. There are certain passages of Scripture which are difficult of interpretation in any other way. At the same time I am conscious of the grounds on which the second view of our Lord's return rest; namely, the continuous experience of his coming to the individual. The Christian service of those who hold this view is characterized by as great self-sacrifice and loyalty as that of those who hold the former view. In the foreign mission field as in the homeland, their devotion is expressing itself in earnest work in Christ's name in behalf of the world for which he died. It is in the realization of the fact that both those who are termed premillennialists and those who are postmillennialists have a common devotion to Christ that it is grievous to hear of the spirited contention which is seeking to divide the church into two bodies. At a time when Christian forces should be united as never before in earnest effort for the extension of the gospel of Christ, it is the work of the devil to dissipate energies in unprofitable discussions and dissension. Only recently we have learned of this contention being carried beyond the confines of Christian lands into the missionary field, and among those who have gone out to make known the glorious gospel of Christ in non-Christian countries an utterly unchristian and pharisaical spirit has been engendered to the discredit of the cause."

Methodists Advertise for Preachers

The most systematic denomination in America with reference to ministerial supply, the Methodist, is advertising for ministers in each issue of the denominational papers. It is noticeable that the salaries offered are better than formerly. District superintendents are having the greatest difficulty in securing men, and the reports from many conferences indicate a number of places marked "to be supplied." Either the standard of living for the ministry must be raised or else there must be a radical movement toward the establishment of community churches.

Episcopalians May Boycott Miami

The tourist hotels in Miami, Fla., need not look for any Episcopalians this winter if the city authorities do not bring to justice the criminals who assaulted Archdeacon Irwin recently. The latter was doing a work among Negroes and was charged falsely with stirring up racial feeling. He was violently assaulted, and his bishop had to come to his relief with money and physical protection. Both the Churchman and the Living Church, leading organs of the Episcopal denomination, are demanding that their

Disciples and the Federal Council

ONE of the important actions of the Winona Lake Convention of the Disciples of Christ was the adoption of a resolution approving a budget item of twenty thousand dollars per year as their appropriate share in the support of the Federal Council of Churches. For several years contributions have been made to the treasury of the Federal Council by individuals and churches, and the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity has devoted a portion of its income to this purpose. This was done largely to assure the officials of the Federal Council of the good faith of the Disciples in connection with cooperative activities, and not as a proportionate gift for so important a cause. Last year the St. Louis Convention took the forward step of electing twenty-eight members to the ruling bodies of the council, and this year for the first time this official body signified its intention of bearing an adequate portion of the financial burden involved in the manifold interdenominational activities carried on by the Federal Council. These activities include evangelism, social welfare, mercy and relief, inter-racial relations, international justice and goodwill, local federations, rebuilding devastated churches in Europe, army and navy service, and the like. Without exception the constituent communions that have held meetings since the Boston quadrennial last December have approved substantial apportionments for the support of the council in various amounts ranging from thirty-five thousand dollars downward. In this manner, as well as by private donations, the great work of the Federal Council is made possible, a work which under most economical administration requires a budget of three hundred thousand dollars annually. It is a matter of satisfaction to all Disciples of the cooperative spirit that their convention has now taken an unequivocal step in support of this most pronounced and effective form of Christian unity. The Disciples representatives on the council are already formulating plans to enlist the churches in this imperative undertaking.

people stay away from Miami this winter if nothing is done about the case of the brave priest.

Committee Organized to Book Sir William Ramsay

Sir William Ramsay, the most noted of the scholars who have studied the life of St. Paul, is coming to this country this autumn. His books are known to every theological student in the land. His contribution to the study of new testament history has been to bring archeological reinforcement to the historicity of the life of Paul. He has retraced the footsteps of the great apostle. A committee of the friends of Sir William Ramsay has been formed, and Americans will try to make the most of the visit of the distinguished Bible scholar. The committee has secured a secretary located in Brooklyn who will arrange the bookings for the lecturer.

Dr. Burton Makes Another Tour of Orient

Few Christian statesmen have a better knowledge of the orient than does Prof. Ernest DeWitt Burton of the University of Chicago. Dr. Burton is chairman of the Educational Commission of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, and in this capacity he has recently sailed for Japan. He will visit Korea and China before returning to this country. As director of the university libraries and head of the department of New Testament and early Christian literature, Dr. Burton finds every day well occupied. His yearly output of labor is enormous in view of his frail physique.

Harvard University Requires Bible Knowledge

Harvard has one of the most liberal elective systems in this country, but in one department there have always been required courses, in English. All students not pursuing scientific courses will be required henceforth to acquire knowledge of the Bible and of Shakespeare as a part of the equipment of an educated man. While this is not the highest motive for the study of the Bible, who can doubt that the new requirement will mean a great deal to the religious life of Harvard students?

Wireless Supplies Lack of Preachers

The complaint about the dearth of preachers is being met by some churches through the utilization of modern inventions. Herron Hill Presbyterian church of Pittsburgh has been without a minister for some time. The Westinghouse Manufacturing Company has installed a wireless outfit by which the service in Calvary Episcopal church is now received by the Presbyterian congregation, including the singing and the sermon. The Presbyterians have participated in the Episcopal service in every way except by sending over their collection. Many shut-ins in various parts of the country now listen in on this service. An outfit in Kansas is now sending out wireless sermons. This is due to the efforts of a loyal layman, who tends the baby to let his wife go to church, but sends out his pastor's morning sermon.

Mrs. Montgomery Wants Discussion

Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery is the first and only woman in the world to stand at the head of a religious denomination. In her recent letter to the churches affiliated with the Northern Baptist Convention she deals courageously with denominational problems. The solution of moot questions by free discussion has impressed her as the need of every religious communion in America and on this point she says: "But how can we come to clear ideas and statements concerning the truth if there is a fear of free discussion of ideas—not motives and men, but of ideas? 'You must believe this. You must not believe that.' This leads nowhere. But if we hear why we ought to believe this and not believe that, then out of such discussion light would spring. But we seem to be strangely afraid of such discussions, and no medium can be found for them. I have been in France and England, and I must say that one of the things which struck me in our country here is the fear of frank discussion of ideas. Perhaps we are too practical. We want so much to see results that we think discussion of ideas to be a waste of time. That is perhaps the reason we swallow so easily imported ideas. A frank discussion of ideas will not spoil the organized work; it will vitalize it. So the middle-of-the-way Baptists ought not to seek to shut off discussion, but only to request of the extremists that they discuss ideas, and not persons, and still less, motives."

Colleges Have Good Enrollment

Industrial depression has injured the educational prospects of a good many young men. Yet the colleges continue to report a considerable increase in their student body. Hiram college may be considered typical. Last year it started the year with 188 students. This year it starts with 315. In this school Dr. Arthur J. Culler was recently installed as dean of men and professor of New Testament; Miss Margaret Rand as dean of women and professor of history; Ernest G. Walker as professor of psychology and education, and J. Harold DuBois as professor of philosophy and religious education.

Pan-Presbyterian Aftermath

DISCUSSION, not legislative action, was the main feature of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance held in Pittsburgh two weeks since. Nevertheless some motions were passed which are of wide interest to the Christian world, with reference to the Lambeth proposals for the union of Christendom. It was voted that each constituent denomination should answer the proposals as it thought best, with the stipulation that in such conferences with the Episcopalians, the Presbyterians should meet "on equal terms, unrestricted as to questions of ecclesiastical order." There was a tinge of rebuke in another phrase of the resolution where it was said "words of unity should be accompanied by acts of unity, especially at the Lord's table." There was wide difference of opinion in the alliance with regard to the spirit in which the Lambeth proposals should be answered, Dr. D. J. Burrell of New York dismissing them summarily, while the Scottish delegates were in favor of meeting them half-way without conceding to the Episcopalians in any way that Presbyterian churches are not churches.

The Presbyterian attitude on the Sabbath is not as tight as it used to be. It was once a matter of conscience that no man should run on the Sabbath day unless he ran after his hat when the wind took it off, and then he was to "run piously." Dr. William C. Covert of Chicago spoke on this subject urging the protection of the day of rest from the attacks of commercial interests which seek to turn the day into one of commercial profit. On this subject the Presbyterians found themselves in the most happy unity.

On the foreign missions program were some of the most eminent missionary leaders of the world. It was shown by Dr. Arthur J. Brown that the solution of the world's unrest was to be achieved only by the establishment of the Christian principle in the hearts of the various peoples of earth.

The address of William Jennings Bryan was not pleasing to the British delegates on account of the bitter arraignment of the British government for permitting the smuggling of liquor from the Bahama Islands. These delegates took the position that the United States was the only nation which had laws which would prevent smuggling on the Florida coast and it was this government and not the British government which should enforce the eighteenth amendment.

Dr. William Park of Belfast, who presided at the sessions of the Pittsburgh meeting, is a pastor of long experience and of gracious spirit. His successor as chosen by vote of the representatives, is Dr. John McNaugher, president of the United Presbyterian Seminary of Pittsburgh. Dr. McNaugher was chairman of the local committee for this meeting of the alliance, and his competency in the discharge of this duty commended him to the suffrage of the representatives. Dr. James I. Good of the Reformed church in the United States was chosen American vice president, and to succeed the late Dr. William Henry Roberts as American secretary Dr. Henry B. Master was chosen, Dr. J. R. Fleming of Edinburgh continues as general secretary of the world organization. The next meeting of the alliance will be at Cardiff, Wales, in 1925.

view of religion to such common themes as church advertising. On a recent Sunday he was discussing the latter subject and made the following interesting observations: "Not all advertising of religion is effective. The mottoes hung in street cars asking, Are you prepared to die? Are you saved? excite as much derision as serious thought. They are like one of these zealous signs which I say last summer in California at the entrance to a tunnel where many autos passed. It read, 'Prepare to Meet Thy God.' A more effective method is to build a million dollar temple in a strange style of architecture or to build bright Greek temples and have them paid for before they are dedicated. But there are some things which it is useless to advertise by any means. No amount of publicity for a certain make of ox-carts would sell them in our community. People will not be persuaded to buy kerosene when they can have gas or electric light. Neither will any amount of zeal for out-worn or impossible forms of faith make them attractive to those whose thoughts live in the twentieth century."

Negro Presbyterians
Get Together

The Presbyterian ministers of African blood will meet in Chicago the first week in October to face the problems which are peculiar to their churches. They have formed the Afro-American Presbyterian Council. A rising racial consciousness is one of the significant social facts in connection with the negro race at this time. Negroes have not become Presbyterians in large numbers, but there will be sixty churches represented in the coming meeting.

Eight Cities Organize for Evangelism

Eight large cities are planning to attack the problem of recruiting the churches in a united way this winter. These cities are Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha and Chicago. Dr. Goodell of the Commission on Evangelism of the Federal Council is visiting these cities and assisting in setting up a local organization. He is accompanied by the secretaries of evangelism of the various denominations. These are Rev. Herbert F. Stilwell, Baptist; Rev. F. L. Fagley, Congregationalist; Rev. J. M. Bader, Disciple; Rev. George B. Dean, Methodist; Rev. O. E. Goddard, Southern Methodist; Rev. Charles E. Shaffer, German Reformed; Rev. R. C. Helfenstein, Christian, and Rev. J. E. Shannon, United Brethren.

National Baptist Convention in Chicago

Negro Baptists number 3,000,000 members in the United States in a total Negro population of 14,000,000. Their churches are in two different national organizations, one of the National Baptist Convention, Incorporated, and the other the National Baptist Convention, Unincorporated. Each one claims to be the simon-pure Baptist organization, while the other represents heresy and schism. The "Incorporated" body met in Chicago recently. The convention dealt courageously with the race problem, disavowing any desire for racial amalgamation, but also opposing segregation. The convention next year will go to San Francisco. The rival convention was held in New Or-

Wallace Tuttle

BASS-BARITONE
SINGING EVANGELIST

"Wallace Tuttle handles the choir splendidly. He has poise and dignity. He does not think it necessary to dust the carpet and liberate all the germs, in physical exertion of feet stamping, to keep his singers on the qui vive and foster a proper morale. During the invitation, one would not have his attention taken from the earnest words of the preacher in those solemn moments when the destiny of a soul is in the balance. The music comes in perfect blend, supplementing the appeal, without wait or pause, but in perfect consonance with the exhortation. Tuttle's directing of music gives a sense of reserve and quiet power, shot through and through with reverence and consecration."—Rev. Charles A. Finch, Central Christian Church, Texarkana, Ark.-Tex.

Cuban Churches Become Self-Supporting

Protestant mission work has gone on in Cuba for a generation and self-supporting churches have in some instances been developed. The Baptists report two churches taking on the burdens of self-support this year. Cuban Baptist churches have adopted a budget for the coming year of five thousand dollars.

Will Keep the Ministers Reading

It may be doubted whether any denomination in America other than the "Christian denomination" has taken official action to secure books for ministers. In these days of high costs the book list has been cut down in making provision for the physical necessities in many ministers' homes. The Illinois conference of the Christian denomination has established a conference library out of which books may be drawn by the conference ministers. These are in charge of the secretary of religious education. The books cover the following interests: Christian principles, devotions, evangelism, religious education, missions, church finances, church organization and government. It is easy to criticise this list of interests, but nevertheless the ministers of the Illinois conference will have much more in the way of spiritual resources than most ministers of the United States have. The Campbell Institute, a Disciples club, voted last summer to establish a library for parcel post circulation, but no action has been taken on the proposal.

Third Order of Franciscan Friars

It will be seven hundred years in October since St. Francis of Assisi founded the third Order of Franciscan Friars, made up of men and women who could not take the full vows of renunciation. Seven hundred years is a long time for such a society to live, but this month the anniversary will be observed in Chicago. The order practices charity and has a mental outlook that is worthy of imitation. Its members try to "start practically from the idea that he himself owes a duty to his neighbor rather than that his neighbor owes a duty to him; he is more concerned to curb his own arrogance and selfishness than to curb that of others."

Norwegian Seminary Changes Affiliations

The Norwegian Baptist Divinity House of Chicago has recently made a change in affiliation. After a number of years of relationship to the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, it is moving to the northwest side, where it will be affiliated with the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary. Here the students will be given a generous mixture of premillennialism with their studies. Prof. Henrik Gunderson will continue as dean and will teach New Testament Greek in the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary. The latter institution is carrying on undergraduate instruction while the work at the University of Chicago is on a graduate basis.

Hammers the Churches With the Movies

The wide variety of opinion with regard to the propriety of Sunday evening movies in the churches presents an interesting phenomenon at this time. Norwood Disciples church of Cincinnati,

Ohio, Rev. C. R. Stauffer, minister, has positive views on the subject. The front page editorial of the parish paper, written by a laymen of the church, says this: "Big things are ahead for us this year. And there will be no movies on the program either. When it comes to the point where we have lost our religion and prefer the movies in our church to good sermons, you will see a short, stout, good-looking elder put the key in the door and lock it up. Then too you will probably see a sign on the door in red letters, 'Good-bye, C. R. S.'"

British Layman on Methodist Union

WRITING in The British Weekly on the recently held Fifth World Methodist Conference, Sir Robert W. Perks, who is probably the most eminent of British Methodist laymen, and who is one of only three members of the Fifth Conference who were also members of the first Ecumenical Conference in 1881, contrasts the changed situation in the matter of church unity today with that of forty years ago. Though the subject at that time was excluded from formal debate, "there were many utterances," he says, "which gave an impulse towards unity." He mentions particularly the opening sermon by Bishop Matthew Simpson of Philadelphia, described as "the close friend of Abraham Lincoln," and quotes from it a very striking passage: "I was walking, some weeks ago," said the preacher, "in a beautiful grove. The trees were some distance apart and the trunks were straight and rugged. But as they ascended higher the branches came closer together, and still higher the twigs and branches interlaced and formed a canopy. I said to myself, our churches resemble these trees. The trunks near the earth stand stiffly and widely apart. The more nearly toward heaven they ascend the closer and closer they come together."

Sir Robert says that Methodists began to think seriously about union and to pray for its realization. At the second World Conference in 1891 the consummation of Methodist union in Canada was reported without the loss of a single member or church. At the third in 1901 Australian Methodist union was reported, while at the fourth in 1911 the union of three branches of British Methodism was announced. He thinks that at present the cause of Methodist union is advancing "to an even more majestic victory."

Mr. Perks, however, is doubtful about the reunion of Methodism with the church of England, which he thinks "if it meant organic ecclesiastical union would not be conducive to religious liberty and progress." About such a proposed union he asks the following questions: "(1) Is it to be with a state church or a voluntary church? (2) With a Protestant or with a Catholic church? (3) What are you going to do as regards the reordination of our ministers? (4) What are you going to do with the lay preachers? Sixty per cent of our services on any given Sunday are conducted by laymen. Our lay preachers are drawn from all classes of society. A bishop said to me lately, as we were talking over the question of reunion, 'But surely you would like me to come and preach in your pulpits?' 'Well, bishop, I have never heard you preach,' was my answer. 'I should like to hear you before answering your question. But let me ask you in turn, What do you propose to do about our 40,000 Methodist lay preachers? Would you allow them to occupy the pulpits of your parish churches?'" Mr. Perks thinks that the next advance, when Methodist union is achieved, is far more likely to be toward the Presbyterians.

The Call of the Christ

By HERBERT L. WILLETT

SELDOM has the challenge of Jesus to the present century been presented so earnestly, so persuasively. As a vital, living, convincing portrayal of Christ, scholarly yet simple, positive but not dogmatic, spiritual but not pietistic, it is a delight and an inspiration. A few of the eighteen chapter titles are: "The Authority of Christ," "The New Life in Christ," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Uniqueness of Christ," "The Fearlessness of Christ," "The Perennial Christ." "The book," says the Heidelberg Teacher, "is the utterance of a heart that has experienced the might and power of the Christ, and burns with a passion for the needs of the rising generation."

The Outline of History By H. G. WELLS

Now in One Volume at $5.00

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY was unquestionably the best selling and most widely discussed non-fiction publication of the past year. The list price of $10.50 for the two-volume set, however, placed it out of reach of many potential book purchasers. In response to an urgent demand for a cheaper edition there is now published a one-volume edition that will appeal to a much wider market. It represents H. G. Wells' answer to the criticisms, favorable and unfavorable, which the first edition drew from scholars in all fields. Without sacrificing his own original viewpoint, Mr. Wells has taken advantage of constructive suggestions relative to both general emphasis and detailed content. The one-volume edition is printed on thin bible paper, and contains 1272 pages. (Add 15 cents postage).

THE WORLD'S DAWN

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professional monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

MAN'S ADVENT.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

CIVILIZATION'S CRADLE.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so till man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually, over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

A SUGGESTION: Turn back to page 30 and list your Autumn book order—and put "The Outline of History" first in the list. (You may have reasonable time to pay for the books.) Prepare for a great year by reading great books.

HISTORY'S BEGINNINGS

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations wholesale, magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and expressions of today.

IN ANNO DOMINI

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

WHAT OF TOMORROW?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of this work—invaluable as it is in other respects.

Ministers or Salesmen?

By Clyde McGee

Fifteen Cts. a Copy October 13, 1921 Four Dollars a Year

New Books by ROGER W. BABSON

Author of "Religion and Business."

Enduring Investments

Raising the large sums required to finance non-money making organizations like the churches and colleges, which do so much for human welfare, has always been their most difficult task. Perhaps this is because the soliciting has been done by those who were (literally) good at spending other people's money, who had never even tried to make any money themselves. Mr. Babson has been consulted on the making of money by the wealthiest interests of America. When he writes a book to prove that it is the best business wisdom to go into these more enduring investments that never pay back even the principal, and do so on a larger scale than the world has ever seen—well, business men will all want to look at the proof.

"Enduring Investments" is the semi-miracle working opener of blind financial eyes that over-burdened ministers, trustees and administrative Boards have been hoping would come to their rescue. ($1.50).

Making Good in Business

The famous Business Expert here applies a fundamental knowledge of business principles to daily business life. The latest work by the author of "Fundamentals of Prosperity" is crammed with the most valuable sort of hints and suggestions for the attainment of a well-balanced, normal, successful, business career. ($1.25).

The Future of the Churches

Mr. Babson shows in a constructive way how the future prosperity and achievement of the church are dependent on its ability to enter fully into the manifold life of the people, and stand as firmly for social and civic righteousness as for the meeting and supplying distinctly spiritual needs. HASTINGS' ONE-VOLUME Dictionary of the Bible

Cleas, concise, popular and yet scholarly. The skill of its able and experienced editor, Dr. Hastings, is in evidence at every point. Unimportant subjects are treated briefly, making it possible to devote more space to vital themes. Among its contributors are found 100 of the leading Biblical scholars in England and America and each gives the results of his own special knowledge and research. The articles on the different books of the Bible are especially valuable. The point of view is that of progressive, modern Biblical scholarship. Extreme theories are avoided. In general, the conclusions which are destined to be the basis of present-day preaching and teaching, are fairly and convincingly set forth. The historical, geographical, and archæological data are also classified and presented with rare skill and effectiveness.

Emancipation for Spiritual Pursuits

MIRACLES are now being wrought by science in lifting from the back of the human race many an ancient burden. Stones are being made into bread. The sour land of southern Illinois is covered with crushed limestone, turned into clover and later treated with pulverized phosphates, with the result that it raises wheat crops equal to that of central Illinois, and this on land where before were only pastures. The bread problem is being solved by agricultural chemistry. Similar miracles are in a way to bring about an ample supply of clothing. The Germans made clothing out of paper during the war. American scientists have even more clever devices of creative chemistry by which they can produce perfectly good clothes. Slosson in his "Creative Chemistry" has shown the almost limitless possibilities by which at last the food of man may be produced by synthetic chemistry rather than by the tedious processes of agriculture. What is the goal of this and all such wonderful scientific power? Is it to pile up more food for a people already supplied? There is a limit to our consumption of food. Is it to clothe us in finer raiment and to fill our houses with new kinds of bric-a-brac? These things pall at last. There is dawning upon a considerable section of the human race the discernment that the purpose of such physical emancipation is an occasion to the spirit. The pioneer scarcely met his physical wants with twelve hours of hard labor. The modern man sees that an eight hour day is sufficient to meet his physical needs. Meanwhile the reduction of time spent in producing the bare necessities of life should mean more time for educative recreation, for reading and continuous adult education and for the pursuit of an answer to the spiritual riddle of life. This is justly called an age of materialism. So far as materialistic research really emancipates us, it must be motivated by idealistic ends. Let the coming age be the age of the great spiritual revival of mankind.

Methodists and Presbyterians Agree On Lambeth Proposals

TWO great denominational bodies have already spoken with reference to the Lambeth proposals. Worldwide Methodism, represented in a conference in London, listened to a broad interpretation of the Lambeth proposals by the Bishop of Chelmsford. The Lambeth proposals are known to make no provision for the recognition of the ministry of the free churches, but on the contrary would imply that this ministry, while blessed by the Holy Spirit in many ways, is nevertheless not a valid ministry. Such an attitude leaves the Methodists cold. They are neither institutionalists nor intellectualists, being always ready to abandon forms of organization that the Spirit may more freely operate among them. An institutionalism that would shut up the ordinances within a certain church which is itself questioned by other historic churches can never win the assent of free churchmen. The Presbyterians believe that the way to approach union is by uniting at the very place where Christ united his quarreling disciples—at the Lord's table. Until there can be a free intercommunion among Christians the Presbyterians see no prospect of an advance in Christian union. They also demand that their ministry be recognized, for to do otherwise would be to repudiate the work of their fathers. It is to be regretted, however, that there has not been more generous recognition of the spirit of the Anglican bishops in their approach to the nonconformist world. The old-time arrogance of the ecclesiastic has made way for the humble and Christ-like spirit. These bishops honestly believe that they may not sacrifice more than they have now offered to give up for the cause of unity. But they have given way in some things which are very dear to them, albeit not in any matter of principle. The northern Baptists have given the Lambeth proposals and the proposals of the Presbyterians short shrift, explicitly declaring their attachment to denominationalism. The Disciples have maintained a prudent silence for they are not yet prepared to consider in any adequate way these proposals. This work of God seems to go on slowly. Meanwhile may the Anglicans be patient with free churchmen as free churchmen feel they must be patient with Anglicans.

Church Responds to Peace Challenge

EVEN more enthusiastic and earnest than was anticipated has been the response of the moral forces of the nation to the suggestion first made by The Christian Century that November 11 be observed as a high day in the church's calendar. The daily press has joined with the magazines of opinion and the religious press to carry the idea far and wide. It now looks as if the opening of the armament conference will take place in an atmosphere of public feeling and aspiration that will be truly religious. The Christian ministers and churches of the land show signs of more vital interest in the cause of peace than they have ever manifested before. Beginning at Duluth, Minn., in the opening days of September, the church federations in practically all the larger cities have taken action calculated to fix public attention upon the Washington gathering with determined optimism. It is profoundly inspiring to note the eagerness with which ministers are reading the great books to inform and fire their minds for preaching on the theme of international friendship. Many a pulpit is being lifted out of the commonplace level of small parochialisms by the challenge of this unparalleled moral opportunity. It is clearly perceived that the conference can easily enough be a futility, if not a farce; but if it proves to be a farce the feeling is widespread that the blame and the shame will rest squarely upon the church for its complacency and lack of positive responsibility. Only a vivid religious background will secure the conference against failure in such an event. Until the church conceives its mission in terms of direct opposition to war and draws upon all its resources, of prayer, of teaching, of concentrating public opinion, of demanding that its representatives holding public office shall act consistently with their Christian profession, war will always be a menace to mankind.

The Rehearsal for Christmas

HAPPILY the President is making it unexpectedly easy for the church to make armistice day a real religious event. When the delegates from the five countries convene in Washington on November 11, they will find the capital engaged in a solemn recognition of its debt to the common soldier who gave his life for his country. These delegates will be asked to accompany the President to Arlington where burial will be made of an unidentified soldier's body brought back from France.

The burial will be made with all the honors that might be given to a general. The President will follow the casket to its burial place. There Mr. Harding will speak, and sound amid the solemnities of that occasion the keynote of the conference. This keynote can under such circumstances be no mere tax relief argument, but should be a veritable word of God spoken in the presence of a symbol of measureless tragedy. This dead youth and millions like him went forth to fight in the faith that they were fighting to end war. Their leaders told them this was what it was all about. The whole vast welter of blood and mud and hate and sacrifice was translated into this one idealistic aim—to root up militarism and to make the world safe for peaceful democracy. The President specifically asks that the churches of the land join him in holding services on that day, that places of business should generally close, and that public feeling should regard the day with solemn respect. Thus dramatically the President has set the stage for the Christian voice of the nation to speak its message of peace on earth with assurance of an unprecedented hearing. For the church to fail to grasp its unique opportunity is unthinkable. Disarmament day, November 11, is the day of rehearsal for Christmas. The followers of the Prince of Peace will be ill prepared to sing the Christmas carols if they stand idly by in this strategic hour and let Christ be crucified afresh.

Religious Welfare of College Students

THE Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal church has arranged for a series of state conferences on the religious life of students in college and on the recruiting of students for life service. Already these conferences have been set up for Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan and Ohio. The work will include the religious welfare of Methodist colleges and universities as well as the welfare of students in tax-supported institutions. Bishops Stuntz, Nicholson, Leete, Mitchell, Henderson and Anderson will be the conference chairmen. In the Methodist colleges are many young people of various religious denominations, and the pastors of these denominations are being invited to sit in the conferences, indicating that the Methodist bishops have no thought of proselytism in arranging their program. It is a well-known fact that the state universities are now better shepherded in religious matters than are many denominational schools. They have a students' religious council in many instances which meets the year 'round for the study of the religious problems of the university. In the denominational college all too often the question of the religious welfare of the students is left to the pastor of the denominational church which is called "the college church." The result is that the students outside this church are often grossly neglected, and the whole religious situation is bad. Never have students needed guidance in the matter of vocation so much as now. The popular thing among college men is a course in commerce, and this generation of men is headed into business, since the age idolizes money. Meanwhile many of the honorable professions are recruited with inferior men, and not adequately recruited. This is particularly true of the great churchly professions. The bishops in their itinerary and in the working out of their broad and generous program will render a service to every denomination of Christians in the middle-west.

The Church as an Employer of Labor

THE social creed of the churches, officially subscribed to by thirty-two denominations declares for "a living wage as a minimum in every industry, and for the highest wage that each industry can afford." On hundreds of platforms Judge Gary and other employers of labor have been indicted for their sins the past year. Industry has seemed slow to make response to all these preachments. Some venture to suggest that it is because the church is herself the meanest of all employers in the land. This is better understood by the case method, than by generalizations. The Expositor has been investigating a number of cases of terrible want among the ministers of the country. It tells of a Methodist minister with a salary of $500 a year whose work demands that he keep a horse. The magazine makes the suggestion that the children take week about starving, so as to distribute the burden. The magazine tells the story of the cheerfulest minister in America, a man with a defective spine, who can be out of bed only a few hours a day. Yet he goes on with his task and is blessed in his ministry. He carries the burden of invalidism besides his greater burden of poverty, making bricks day by day without straw for that heartless task-master, the ecclesiastical machine. The United Brethren have an average salary of $1,030 per year for 1,868 ministers. For every man who receives $1,500 there is another man who receives $500. They have the device of securing untrained laymen at five dollars a Sunday to serve many of their churches. Under this system of generous support, the denomination lost last year 58 churches and 162 ministers, though the churches are double the number of ministers. This gives something of a line on the current exodus from the ministry of the church.

A Living Tragedy

HERE is a living tragedy: Rev. Basil S. Keusseff, a Bulgarian by birth, expert in all Slavic languages, was trained for the ministry and ordained. For fifteen years he was employed by the Disciples of Christ to work as a missionary, a considerable part of this time in Chicago. Mr. Keusseff would go into a neighborhood where there was no religious grouping of his people and would start a night school. Soon he would have a flourishing church of perhaps fifty members. The war came on, and with it some differences in his membership. The sustaining national society of the Disciples of Christ had been making changes. There came on a Pharaoh who knew not the Bulgarian Joseph. He was dropped from the missionary pay-roll, and for a time found employment as an interpreter. He sought again and again missionary employment, for he was a specialized worker. Fifteen years at one task had unfitted him for certain others. His character and good name were unquestioned. But the church was through with him. For three years he has pegged shoes in a little shop on the west side of Chicago to keep bread in the mouths of six children. As the children have grown older, the missionary family has been anxious for their education. The wife went out nursing to help with the books and the music lessons. The burden was too heavy. She laid down the load the other day and a little procession followed her body to the cemetery. Had he been an Odd Fellow, there would have been relief. But he was only a missionary, and he bears his sorrow alone, forgotten by those whom he served. The church preaches employment insurance for the steel industry, but has no employment insurance for her own men. The church preaches old age pensions for brick-layers and other workmen, but in most denominations has provided only enough pension to slow down the starvation process a little. A living wage ought to mean enough to educate a family of bright children. In many cases the minister's salary does not mean anything but shabby overcoats and barren bookshelves. Rev. Jesse Bader of the Disciples fellowship stated recently that the Christian ministry lost last year 11,000 men. If these figures are anywhere near right they show that we have a ministerial walk-out. It is not organized, or we would call it a strike.

The Colleges and Education

IT USED to be a joke twenty years ago that a college youth "should not let his studies interfere with his college work." That joke has come to be a sober reality in all too many institutions since the war. Young people are not different from the rest of the American public in their fundamental attitudes, and they share, among the other characteristics of the time, a feeling of the irksomeness of work, and the mad pursuit of pleasure. The slacker who cuts down his output on a job of work is matched by the college slackers who have sought the minimum by which they hope to placate unreasonable and old-fashioned professors who still think that education has something to do with books and study. The social side of college life bulks large. The old-time student who used to "buck" wood for his room rent has made way for "tea hounds" who spend a good many nights in every week in full-dress suits. Behind this situation are indulgent parents who put into a boy's hands two thousand dollars a year for college, and tell him to be sure to spend it. Meanwhile college administrators are seriously troubled to produce in their students that attitude toward sound learning and moral ideals which has ever been the glory of a true educational process. It can hardly be expected, however, that professors will be able to make up for the defects of the American home. Our college students are but a small per cent of our total population. A larger per cent than ever before now comes from the homes of profiteers and the new rich. It is not to be expected that such students will come to their task with any large volume of idealism. Meanwhile the churches must reinforce the earnest efforts of college professors in bringing back to the student body the sense of vocation and ambition which we have a right to expect in our most highly trained young people. The world is short of leadership. We must have a leadership that can answer to the call of the heroic.

The Passing of Mr. Bryan

FEW men have been more in the public eye during the past quarter of a century than Mr. William Jennings Bryan. With unusual gifts as a platform orator, he has attracted the attention and enlisted the interest of great numbers of people in all parts of the United States. He has spoken on a great variety of themes, and has never left his hearers in doubt as to his sincerity, even when he failed to convince them of the correctness of his views.

He is the one man in the area of American politics and reforms who has achieved the double success of persuading a great company of his fellow citizens of the soundness of even such fantastic opinions as those which he held on the subject of free silver, and later of making them forget that he ever entertained such dubious political sentiments. With remarkable ability he has kept himself among the leaders of his party in spite of repeated defeats, both at the polls and in the party gatherings. And once his influence has been recognized by the bestowal of a cabinet position.

But Mr. Bryan's larger opportunity came in the field of moral reform. Numbers of people who never took him seriously as a political figure have been attracted to him as an exponent of temperance and world peace. In these causes he employed his abilities with marked success, and assisted to a notable degree in shaping public opinion in behalf of national prohibition and more amicable relations among the peoples of the world. It is for these distinguished services that he will be remembered and approved long after his political successes and failures have been forgotten.

Yet Mr. Bryan is essentially a preacher by disposition, and with strong convictions regarding the Bible and the Christian religion, he has mingled with all his political and social utterances a large volume of religious teaching. It is this fact which has endeared him to many who differed with him on other themes but were won by his constant affirmation of Christian sentiments. He has spoken with reverence and great earnestness regarding the character of Jesus; and the Bible, though regarded by him in a wholly traditional and obsolete manner, has formed the topic of many of his lectures and other public addresses. With the assurance of large experience in public speech, and the certainty of a sympathetic hearing from the great mass of laymen in the churches, he has undertaken more and more of late to speak with confidence on subjects of biblical and scientific nature; subjects on which his training, which is that of the average Christian layman, gave him no warrant to speak.

It is this fact which has disturbed a large company of Mr. Bryan's friends and admirers in recent months, and is deepening in the minds of thoughtful and informed Christian people the conviction that he has left the open road of assured religious and moral leadership, and has set himself to the championing of obscurantism and reaction.

At the present time his chief concern appears to be the combating of the modern historical and literary interpretation of the Bible and the accepted opinions regarding the development of human life from humbler orders in the remote past. Nor is this later interest of his a mere by-product of his lecturing activities. It is at the present time his vocation. He was never busier than now, and with the zeal of a crusader he is campaigning against biblical criticism and evolution. He not only accepts all invitations offered him to speak on these themes but appears to insist that when he does speak these shall be his topics rather than others which are often preferred. And in some cases he has asked with insistence for the opportunity to bring these discussions before audiences assembled for quite other purposes.

One must admire such devotion to a cause. It is only regrettable that the cause is not a better one. With the scantiest possible training for the discussion of either literary or scientific questions, Mr. Bryan charges, like Don Quixote, against the substantial structure of informed Christian teachings on the subjects of biblical writings and world origins. In his statements regarding the Bible and accepted scientific theory there is a mixture of truth and error. No one could be wholly wrong. In speaking on such themes of common intelligence and in his contest with what he regards as the unproved statements of modern scholars, there is the free employment of those gifts of humor and irony which have made Mr. Bryan popular on the lecture platform. In all his audiences there are enough untrained and superficial people to yield the tribute of applause and laughter so dear to the orator, and it is clear that he believes himself to be a convincing and triumphant champion of a faith endangered by current biblical and scientific teachings.

It is this pathetic aspect of Mr. Bryan's undoubtedly forceful and useful career which is bringing regret to a host of his well-wishers, and embarrassment to multitudes of Christian teachers who are dealing at first-hand with the youth of the nation. The great majority of Mr. Bryan's hearers are as untrained as himself in the literature and technique of biblical and scientific studies. Indeed, with something not unlike the method of the demagogue, he sometimes points out that only two per cent of the population are college-bred any way, and he is quite sure the people are with him, for he speaks for the 98 per cent! With people who accept such clever flatteries his diatribes against biblical criticism and evolution are harmless. Such people laugh and applaud and forget. But when in the presence of college and university students he deals in the same reckless manner with the principles of biblical and scientific scholarship, and applies the titles of infidel and atheist to men and women who have devoted their lives to the reverent and constructive training of youth in Christian faith, incalculable damage is done.

Mr. Bryan has the same superficial knowledge of his subject, the same effrontery in his statements and a little of the same persiflage and sarcasm that marked the public utterances of Mr. Ingersoll a quarter of a century ago. If either of them had paid the price of a competent mastery of biblical criticism or scientific theory his occupation would have disappeared—the one engaged in farcical opposition to the Bible and the other in fantastic and futile defense of it. It was the spread of informed opinions of the critical character among Christian leaders and laymen that made Mr. Ingersoll's attacks upon the Bible ridiculous and irrational. It is the increasing acceptance of the historical and literary interpretation of the Bible by informed Christians of all groups that renders Mr. Bryan's utterances on this theme so belated and confusing.

No one need be seriously troubled over this outbreak of revitalized obscurantism on the part of a popular platform orator. It is as futile as it is superficial. It fits in with a passing phase of reaction which talks much of the fundamentals of Christianity, while placing the chief stress on the superficials and accidents. If Mr. Bryan continues this career of fantastic exploitation of discarded medievalisms, he will rapidly complete his eclipse from leadership and guidance in those circles where all true leadership in religious and ethical conviction is shaped.

The Church's Industrial Strategy

WHILE from two to four millions of American working people are out of employment, certain labor unions controlling essential industries are solemnly and with much deliberation voting in a majority of ninety per cent to go on strike, if the attempt is made to force a reduced wage scale upon their industries. Thousands of American laymen, industrial laymen, that is, those of us who are sitting on the industrial side-lines, now ask in amazement, "Are these fellows incorrigibly wicked, or only stark crazy?" The reply to which is that they are neither, but that the time has come for the complacent American "industrial layman" to come in off the "side-lines," and, mixing in with what is actually going on in the industrial world and discovering how minds playing upon its problems actually work, prepare to take a part commensurate with his responsibilities.

A strike in these essential industries at this time would result in frightful suffering. This, laboring men solemnly conducting their plebiscite, know fully as well as any can. They and their families will bear the suffering, a large proportion of it, as they have through many a sharp industrial conflict in the past. But did any general ever send his army into a battle without realizing that much suffering and many tragic deaths would result? When Grant resolved doggedly to "fight it out along this line if it took all summer," he knew that the campaign would involve not only much sweat and rigorous floundering through the "wilderness," but would also cost the lives of many thousands of brave men, and the consequent bereavement and impoverishment of many homes. And did not Lincoln, the tender-hearted Lincoln, honor Grant above all his generals, and even wish he had barrels of Grant's brand of whiskey to pass about among his other generals who showed less determination and fortitude?

Oh, but this case is different! That is precisely where we "industrial laymen" blunder. We show no appreciation of what is going on before our eyes. The industrial conflict is conflict; it is war. It is conducted under the rubric of war, and where the rules are violated in the direction of savagery, the lapse is certainly no more gross than that the world has of late seen on battle-fields where the weapons were guns and swords. The weapons in the industrial conflict are proper to its genius, but nothing can obscure from the discerning its character as warfare.

There are numerous assumptions which the industrial layman has carried over from tradition and outworn social philosophy, but which thoughtful laboring men do not accept for a moment. What is still passing for truism among the readers of our religious journals, and of most of our standard newspapers and magazines as well, has long ago been discarded from the philosophy by which the hosts of organized labor are now guided. We still assume that the law of supply and demand deserves sacred recognition. The price of labor properly goes up with the shortening of the supply and comes down with the shortening of the demand. We are very inconsistent in our practical application of the "law," but we like to think of it as prevailing when it suits us to have it prevail. When the supply of labor fell far short of the demand during the war, we were greatly scandalized that working people appeared to invoke and apply that law for all the advantage which it could vouchsafe them. Now, when that law appears to require a sharp reduction of wage scales, and, we hope, a commensurate lowering of prices, we discover all the time-honored sacredness in the law.

As a matter of fact, the thoughtful workingman, even the marcher in the ranks and files, is fully appreciative of the buncombe in our conventional appeals to this alleged law. No such law is at work. If it were given free and unrestrained operation it would bring to disaster our whole economic system. Only when it can be appealed to in some selfish interest is it paraded anew, a fetish before which it is well known we laymen will promptly fall down and worship. The realms in which it does actually operate are so remote from the practical concerns of our every day economic program, that appeal to it outside of erudite tomes on economic theory are nowadays almost invariably buncombe. Even in the stress of war when laboring people were forcing wages upward as sharply as conditions would permit, the thoughtful labor leaders made no appeal to that law. They were simply taking advantage of a situation where strategy enabled them to establish what they conceived to be something like normal and proper wage standards. No more are they today disposed to yield to the apparent demands of that "law" when events seem forcing them to accept standards below the right and reasonable.

It is not incumbent upon us industrial laymen to agree with these labor leaders and accept this philosophy; the point is that we ought to understand their point of view. It would save us a vast deal of bewilderment.

Another of our pet fallacies is that we are the "public," and that as such we are parties to the industrial process. This is a delightful assumption, and one which is made the basis of certain ready solutions of the industrial problem. Mr. Rockefeller, and an eminent Canadian publicist and industrial leader, and others whose minds have played much upon industrial questions, believe they have found four distinct parties to the industrial process. They are capital, labor, management, and the public. In recent years capital has manifestly more and more drawn away from active participation in industry, and management has assumed certain independent functions. But in the line-up of forces for the warfare, which much bitter experience has convinced labor the industrial program actually is, there is still no essential differentiation between capital and management. Such organizations as the Dennison tag manufacturing establishment has inaugurated, do appear to incorporate this distinction, but these are still so few, and so palpably in the experimental stage, that they are negligible in the workingman's philosophy. As he looks across no-man's land he sees one embattled host: the very livery of management and capital are identical from his point of view. The distinction and its classification are therefore meaningless.

Nor has the hard experience through which organized labor has come, any more convinced it of the independent existence of the fourth party in the catalogue above. For the strategy of the industrial warfare there is no "public." The workingman certainly is not fooled by such demagogic deliverance as that indulged by a United States senator the other day, whom the papers reported as declaring, "Let the people understand once for all what these men mean by threatening to strike; let them understand that it means the stopping of food supplies and other essentials; want and starvation in our cities and towns, and I venture the prediction that the American people will rise in their might and wipe these men from the face of the earth."

The "American people" may well study that deliverance. A hard-pressed host proposes to enlist masses of unorganized reserves, or hitherto indifferent neutrals, and by the surge of their overwhelming numbers and their unappeased and inflamed appetites, "wipe the foe from the face of the earth." In the calm philosophy in which we have enthroned "the public" as a party to the industrial process, the "government" is its assumed spokesman and embodiment. A senator is a sublimated element in that body. Here is a senator manifestly given over to the cause of one of the embattled hosts, and invoking the might of the "public" to "wipe the opposition from the face of the earth." This is belligerency befitting the program which our industrial system is, and under which our production and distribution of commodities is conducted.

Judge Gary offers as the permanent solution of our industrial troubles, government regulation. The welfare of the public is the ultimate good, should be the final concern of all parties to industry, and should be the determining consideration in all policies. After expressing this lofty sentiment, he states it as his clear personal conviction that labor unions should be abolished, and the welfare of working people should presumably be lumped with that of the "public." He has not taken the pains to advocate the abolition of manufacturers' associations or massive organizations of capital. Nor does he and those of whom he is the recognized leader grow enthusiastic over the exercise of governmental functions when congress enacts such legislation as the Adamson law. Government is sacred except when the President calls industrial conferences including gentlemen whom he and his organization do not like. In that event great moral principles intervene to render it impossible for him even so much as to sit at the same council table with these fellow citizens similarly invited by the government.

All these familiar facts and incidents are deployed here only to reveal to us the fallacy which we industrial laymen cherish, that "the public," either through organized government or otherwise, is in any constructive or vital sense a party to our industrial program. Government is something to be captured, and used, by whichever of these two embattled hosts may show the sagacity or boldness to win. Our pacific inclinations strongly move us to cherish this fallacy, and especially to talk big about the majesty of our government when we are ourselves pinched by the violence of the industrial contest, or feel drawn into the partisan imbroglio. But government has not proved a success as an independent and impartial umpire. We, "the public" do not exist as a determining factor, or an independent party to the industrial process. The plain fact is that the battle goes one way or the other according as we join one host or the other. And we should have gumption enough to discover by this time that we are valued, or even considered at all, to just the extent to which we line up with this or that one of the fighting hosts.

This is made apparent in the experience of the church. If any group or institution of society may be considered as identified with "the public," from the point of view of the industrial program, it is the church and church people. What has been our experience? For a quarter of a century the church has been considered by labor, organized labor, more or less officially, and by all class-conscious labor, more or less definitely, as aligned with capital, as the willing and subservient tool of the capitalistic class. It has become a notorious fact that labor, conscious of its mission to win this contest, has been in the mass alienated from the church. The monied classes, and the foremost sponsors of the capitalistic system, have been uniformly cordial to the church, and have supported it lavishly. But within recent years champions of labor have arisen in the churches. Certain movements, of which the Interchurch commission's report on the steel strike was a typical culmination, have greatly altered the attitude of organized working people. This report and the pronouncements of the Social Service commission of the Federal Council, and of corresponding bodies in the several denominations, construed as partisan to the cause of labor, are being widely quoted in the labor press. In exactly corresponding degree, organized capital has become estranged from the church, or has set vehemently, and almost violently, about the task of re-capturing this ally for its own purposes. The Interchurch commission set out with as sincere a desire as mortals are likely to attain, and with as consistent a procedure as would seem possible under present industrial conditions, to survey and report impartially from the point of view of a Christian public the actual facts and the merits of the late industrial battle between our greatest capitalistic corporation and the most determined leadership of organized labor. That report is accepted by both sides in a thoroughly partisan spirit. The Steel Corporation utterly and vindictively repudiates and scorns the findings, and organized labor recognizes in it a vindication of its cause and its methods.

The public is thus not in any recognizable sense of the word a third party in this situation. It is an inert mass, from which either party to the conflict may draw, and to which both parties are, when they find it to their advantage to do so, appealing with great eloquence and seductions in support of their interests.

It will make for our mental and spiritual health, if we get only so far. It will be better still if we press on to more advanced considerations. Ought this condition to be? Can the public become a party, an active party, a determining party? This is an exceedingly important question for the church. Can the church ever hope to function efficiently as an umpire, an adjudicator between these two embittered contestants? So far the church has succeeded in lining up with one host or the other. Just now it looks as though it were succeeding in lining up with both, and suffering a corresponding and inevitable split in its own ranks. The judicial mind can detect partisan tendencies in almost every pronouncement of the churches and church agencies on industrial questions. Is this inevitable? Must we all in the end line up with one or the other of the contending armies, and fight it out until one or the other is "wiped from the face of the earth"?

Or is there another policy possible? Is there a public, at least a potential public, which can be made an active force in the industrial field? On what basis should it function? Is it not absolutely and unconditionally necessary to get industry out of the category of warfare, before there is hope of realizing the higher social aspirations to which the Christian religion is supposed to move us? Can this ever be attained so long as we allow our passing impulses, our appeased or distraught appetites, our investments and social affiliations, any or all of them, to determine which one of these embattled hosts we will favor? Will we not need to base our judgments on entirely different grounds from the assumed moral culpability of either party to the conflict? Does not the fundamental evil inhere in the conflict, the war footing, from which the whole industrial process is conducted? And are not we, this inert, prejudiced, unintelligent, vain, ease-loving, irresponsible public, the culprits before this indictment? We have put or left our industrial scheme on this war footing. We still relegate to this barbaric regimen the most vital and spiritually potent processes of our civilization. Once we allow our minds to become occupied with that fact and our responsibility for it, the rage of alleged statesmen, and the seductions of partisans on either side, will seem only the pitiful outcries of the victims of our own ignorance and remissness.

The Underground River

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I JOURNEYED in the Land of the Big Red Apple, where they raise fruit as delicious as that wherewith Eve tempted Adam. For Eve knew her business, and the Apple is Some Fruit. And I saw the trees laden with fruit, and the ground beneath them growing green with Alfalfa.

And I asked, Whence cometh the water, wherewith these trees are nourished? For the clouds drop not their rain, neither is there melting snow upon the distant hills.

And they showed me a deep well that went down an hundred cubits. And at the bottom I saw an Engine that worked with Electrck Power, and rested not day nor night. And the engine lifted the water in a Mighty Stream so strong that when it reached the surface they had to hurl it against a wall to take away its violence, and divide it into smaller streams lest it tear up the very grounds. And the water flowed unto Many Orchards, and watered the trees.

And they brought forth fruit in their season, neither are there any years when the crop faileth for lack of water. For there is a Mighty River that floweth under the ground, and its flow is perpetual. And everything doth grow, whithersoever the river cometh.

And when I saw these things, I said, Behold there be many men whose lives are Sterile, and Barren of good works, who might Grow and Blossom and Bear Fruit.

For there floweth under the feet of every man streams of Power; and there are in the life of men Hidden Reservoirs whereof they might Drink, and water the ground abundantly.

For there is no need that any life should be barren, or that any man should fail to lift up toward heaven the evidences of a life that is useful and good. The sun is in the sky, and there is a spring of water in the earth, and no man's life should be unfruitful.

The Melting Pot

To sail the shining main, to seek new shores
And unknown countries, bursting golden doors
To fair new realms that basked in summer's smile,
He saw no stranger sights than we today
In these our city streets, where earth has poured
From every farthest land her human horde:
Proud Nipponese, sojourners from Cathay,
Shrewd Greeks, and Turks, and roving Syrians;
Gay Spanish dons and dour Scotch peasantry,
High-hearted French, dark rogues from Barbary;
No race or breed is barred by selfish bans.
Here, where the dream of liberty had birth,
God dreams His dream, democracy for earth.

The Attack On War

By Jane Addams

I AM going to speak for a short time* giving, if I may, an outline of the movement in the United States for disarmament. As you know, during the last few months, a call has been issued by the President of the United States to various other nations, five in all, to take part in a Disarmament Conference, and that has come after a great deal of talking and a great deal of pressure which has been brought to bear upon the members of congress as well as upon the members of the government in power. It comes from various directions, which perhaps makes it all the more hopeful; for we got prohibition in America as a result of movements from many directions; no one alone could have brought it about. The business man saw the condition of many workmen on Monday morning; the man in the south dreaded the power which liquor seemed to be gaining among the colored people; the people in the churches felt it was a moral issue; and a dozen other causes finally converged to bring about prohibition, which of course could only have come about in a time of war. And so we feel that if the disarmament movement comes from many sources and directions it has a certain validity and a certain promise of success.

TAXES AND ARMAMENT

First of all there were the business men who objected to the high taxes. They used to say we were having war taxes without a war and income taxes without an income. Then there was published during the last few months of 1920 a very startling picture or diagram of the expenditures of our federal taxes, and this diagram, which was got out with great care by the bureau of statistical information of the government, divulged that 92 per cent of all the federal taxes were being expended, as they put it, for past wars and future wars. They put into this very large black section of the round wheel, which represented the total expenditure, the money that was paid on war debts, the money that went into all the soldiers' pensions, and the money which was to be expended for the very large naval program which is now being projected in the United States. Education had something like $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and the research departments, the saving of life, both in the agricultural and humanitarian senses, had about 2 per cent, and so forth. This calculation was perhaps not quite fair, because it was based on estimates to carry out a naval program projected in 1916. Before the United States came into the war, and when our shipping was suffering from the ravages of war this naval program was proposed and voted. It was dropped when the United States entered the war, because it was impossible to carry it out with the other huge expenses which the war involved. But after the war was over, to everyone's surprise, it was resuscitated and set into motion. It was the result of what Mr. Wilson said, that unless the United States entered the League of Nations the only logical position was to make full preparations for war; but although that was said we did not believe we should really go to work to build the largest navy in the world. But we are setting to work in that fashion. We are laying down the keels for sixteen battleships, more I believe, than have ever been projected for any one nation at one time. When finished we shall still be less than the British navy, but the British navy has never in its history built so many ships at once. There are many reasons why this program is objectionable at the present moment. In the first place the United States has become the creditor of the nations, and it seems very mean to take advantage of that fact when the other nations at the moment cannot have these navies if they would; it seems very ungenerous and lacking in magnanimity and kindness to take this moment to build a large navy.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Secondly, it uses money which is very much needed for other purposes. At this moment in the United States we are suffering from unemployment. We are suffering from lack of financial and industrial life, largely because there is a lack of credit which might be given to the other nations who are ready to buy from us if they had the money with which to buy. If an international credit, for instance, could be given to certain European nations who are now unable to buy the wheat, wool and cotton we have in the United States, a round of trade might be reinstated and reinvigorated; and at this very moment to say on the one hand that there is no money with which to guarantee these international credits, and on the other hand to spend preposterous sums on a navy without which we have gotten on very well hitherto, is obviously inconsistent.

Then there is the belief that it is a very useless and foolish thing at this moment, for no one knows what the coming methods of warfare are going to be. The use of gases and other new methods of warfare which are being evolved will render useless many of the armaments which are now being projected. Professor Rose, of Cambridge, has lately said that the enormous battleships which were so slow to come to grips even during the late war, because they are so precious and so costly and so cumbersome, are becoming less and less valuable for fighting as time goes on, and as the newer inventions which are to be managed from the air and from the shore by wireless, and all the other new things, are developed.

Thirdly, there is the point of view which is being developed very largely by women. All over the United States there are large organizations of women, some of them mounting up to the millions in their membership, who have taken a very strong stand at last against the increase of armaments so far as the United States is concerned, and they are coming out very strong and without any qualification for the disarmament program. First, the checking of armaments, stopping where we are now. Then, so quickly as may be, a diminution which shall be as well proportioned and as well carried out as between one country and another as can be arranged. Then, we hope, finally, an extinction of the whole wretched business. This problem can be approached from many directions. Personally I believe we will not be able to quench war, the lust of battle, unless or until we arouse other primitive and powerful human motives, which we all possess, but which during the last few years have been more or less inhibited, suppressed as it were, during the very years that the combative side has been so very much stressed.

PRIMITIVE SOCIAL INSTINCTS

After all, mankind did not fight for a great many thousands of years. Man has been on the earth in some shape or another for about a million and a half years, we are told, and the fighting of masses of men against other masses of men is only about twenty thousand years old. For a long time men lived in communities, in a gregarious and friendly fashion, and developed their skill more in the use of the tool than of the weapon; the weapon was only useful when they went out in search of food. During those remote times, two things were developed. One was a great desire for a sense of security, and that is a thing which war stresses; the other was a great desire to be assured against death by starvation. The tribe became responsible, then, for those two things: to guard its members from dangers outside and from other tribes, and also to secure for its members freedom from the fear of at least immediate starvation. They were raided and they did starve. But each member of the tribe was to have an equal share in the sense of security and the sense of preservation. Those two things, then, are very old, the desire for protection which a man has when he comes together with his fellows, and which is very largely at the basis of primitive national life, and the desire for continuation of life, that the single member of the tribe shall share such food and such care as the other members of the tribe are able to secure for him.

During these last years, and the years when war was being waged, we all know the tremendous pressure which was laid upon the sense of security. It is almost impossible to get a modern nation to fight unless it can first be persuaded that it is doing so in the interests of self-preservation, self-defense; and in one sense all wars are wars of defense, because they are so construed, more or less, before you can get the whole nation interested in them. That sense of security is very primitive and very deeply implanted in the human constitution, in human society as such, and it is easy and perhaps it is inevitable that it should be so. But at the same time there is the other desire, to feed the world, to keep alive those people with whom you are associated in a family and a nation and in larger groups. The war itself finally brought that out. Before America came into the war we used to hear a great many accounts of the battles, the engagements which were taking place on the fields of France, and we turned sick of course with apprehension and with fear, as these reports came; but in the midst of them we gradually began to have other reports. There came tales from Belgium and northern France that ten thousand people were being fed through the kindness and help of those from the outside. Right in the midst of the war reports there were being used purely scientific phrases about standards of nutrition and the physiological value of certain foods as against certain other foods; and gradually there came together throughout the world groups of people whose business it was to feed first the soldiers, and later huge civilian populations who would have perished unless the food sources had been organized and placed at their disposal. And right in the midst of this desire for security, which was in a sense responsible for the war, there arose ever stronger this other, this nutritive side, this feeding of the people of Europe, which also began to assert itself and became stronger from day to day.

FEEDING THE CHILDREN

I have just come from the city of Vienna. There I found people from every nation in Europe, with their little groups of workers who are trying to keep alive the children in that desolate city. The children were being brought back from Sweden, where they had spent some weeks or months of vacation—little groups of welfare workers from every nation in Europe, doing what they could to keep alive the children who had been so devastated, and who had been brought to such a low ebb of life through the long war—and if I may be permitted to say so through the terms of the peace.

Another chord had been struck, something as primitive, as normal as war itself had been appealed to in the desire to keep children alive. You know the wonderful organizations for food administration which were formed between the allied nations. You know all the things that happened that seemed as if they never would happen under the pressure of this great desire to feed the world. Personally I believe there is in it a great moral challenge, that it could quench the lust of war at its very source if we simply trusted and realized that it is quite as important as the other thing.

Take the situation in Russia at the present moment. At the Assembly of the League of Nations last week Dr. Nansen pressed his claim. He made a wonderful address, begging that he be given the resources with which to carry out his plans for feeding these millions of people who would otherwise perish off the face of the earth. Quite irrespective of their political affiliations, and of the political difficulties in the way, there was this human appeal, which was more urgent, more penetrating, and more genuine than any of the political difficulties which were raised and brought up against him. I believe it would save not only millions of Russian peasants from dying, but save the League of Nations itself, if it could thus endear itself to thousands of men and women of every nation who as yet understand it so little.

SAVING THE LEAGUE

We have over a hundred millions of people in the United States—it takes a long time to convince them one by one of the value of the League of Nations. We have had some difficulties about the League of Nations, but when you can make the man in the street, the woman whose primitive obligation and whose object of life is to keep her children fed; when you can make such men and women see that the league has done a great piece of humanitarian work which might not have been done by any one nation, that these people would have died had there not been a sort of League of Nations which could come to their assistance, you would get the confidence of the man in the street, you would get it so completely that nothing in the world could keep the United States out of the league. After all, no nation, no government, can stand unless it has the understanding and support of the bulk of the people who compose that nation. Something of that sort must be done with the league. It must get the understanding and affection of the men and women who would be enormously interested in that which would keep alive people who would otherwise die. One nation after another is tormented almost as by an unappeased thirst to come to closer relations with its neighbors. That tendency of man to widen the circle of his interest and sympathy is a normal and natural thing which has been largely responsible for his development.

We must bring into this new relationship the bulk of all the people and all the nations, and it can only be done by appealing to something more primitive than war itself. I think we have a clue in our hands, if we respond to this great desire for feeding the world, for keeping the children alive, for preserving those bases of life without which all other things are valueless. Personally, I think we will quench war and the desire for war, and we will get disarmament, if we arouse other motives and believe in them enough, and fill them with enough courage and sense of validity, so that they will count. There are many ways of approaching disarmament and I have not troubled you with a certain number of facts and figures which I might have quoted, because after all they are going to be published more and more widely and we are all going to become familiar with them. By means of propaganda and the spreading of all the information we can gather together we must get the affection, the goodwill, and the cooperation of all those people who have still the primitive motive to work upon, and who can be best appealed to by addressing ourselves to some such motive.

Salesmen or Ministers?

By Clyde McGee

A COMMUNICATION in The Christian Century of August 25 offers some interesting comments upon the much discussed subject of church advertising. The writer says: "There is no doubt that the churches would be filled if an extensive advertising scheme could be carried on...." Referring to the meeting of the local "Ad Club," where the subject was under discussion, the writer continues: "All seemed agreed that we (the ministers) are salesmen, and that we are salesmen of the greatest product in the world."

Such opinions, apparently, are widely held. May we, however, be permitted to interpose a question or two upon the subject of church advertising, and ministers as salesmen. Are we all certain as to just what is to be advertised? Are we all agreed as to just how it is to be understood that ministers are salesmen? How many ministers, indeed, think of themselves as salesmen? How many of them have gospels, old or new, orthodox or heterodox, to sell?

Every minister, of course, is familiar with testimonies in favor of the contention of this correspondent concerning the fruitful results of advertising. "The church of," so runs one testimony at hand, "after forty years of ups and downs came to the point where they were doing so little that it was apparent that they would have to do something or nothing. They had seating capacity for 700, but their Sunday evening attendance was from 13 to 25, occasionally a little higher. They called a new minister. He advertised. The result? A few weeks ago the church was filled to its capacity—700. Within a few blocks of this church was one of equal size and it had only 30 in attendance; another in the immediate neighborhood has a larger capacity and had only 50 in attendance. Neither of the churches advertise...." So the testimonies run. Evidently the remedy for empty pews is not far to seek.

According to the statement this church had had forty years of "ups" and "downs." It was now getting, or having, another "up." This time at the hands of the publicity man. What had given it its other "ups," and what was the explanation of its recurring "downs?" We are left to conjecture.

REMEDIES TO RESTORE THE CHURCH

It may be well, however, to think back a little. How often have we been told the church is losing ground, it is in a bad way, people do not go to church, etc. Who has not brooded over the problem, how shall the vitality of the church be restored? And the remedies that have been offered! Their name is legion! Some thought the old theology was to blame and young theologues hastened from the seminaries (they were seminaries in those days not yet schools of salesmanship) with the latest results of the higher criticism to purge the patient of his ills. It was not always easy to get the medicine down, and even when taken no marked renewal of strength followed. Thereupon there was a turning back to the old again and saints prayed fervently for a revival to come and for an outpouring of the spirit to be given. The revivalists came, and went—finally. A record-breaking offering—free-will—was made, or more accurately, taken, and yet the last state of those towns was worse than the first according to the reports of the committees appointed to investigate and report upon the results of the meetings.

Others meanwhile were bethinking themselves of entertainment. So churches were equipped with everything from bowling alleys to billiard tables, from swimming pools to moving picture machines. Surely with all these the church might hope to woo the respectable from their Sunday golf or from riding into the country. Still the lonely, cushioned pews remained empty. And then some said it was up to the minister, and the church looking for a new pastor sought out a man who could draw. If they could not find the man who would draw why should they have a man at all? So it came to pass that the church would fain fill its pulpit with an old theology man or a new theology man or a no-theology man if only his preaching would get the crowd.

"THE GOOD MIXER"

Then others turned more to the "good-mixer" type. These churches did not really seek a preacher, a teacher, a pastor, a spiritual guide, a shepherd of souls hungering for a shepherding ministry. They wanted somebody who could boom the church—a handsome hand-shaker, a prince of back-slappers, a junior of lodges, a hale fellow well met, an all-around good fellow, who could drill the scouts, play on the ball team, be the life of the ladies' aid society dinners, whose meat and drink was ringing door-bells, starting new organizations, attending committee meetings, and thus the word would be spread abroad through all the country round about that they had a real live wire at their church.

In all this the two dominating facts are "the church" and "the crowd." Of neither are we to think lightly, but of both sensibly. Yes, sensibly. Here is a newspaper account of a church advertising campaign offering this as the conclusion of the whole matter: "Prayer and Publicity are the greatest two powers in the world." Prayer and publicity! surely it was only modesty that kept the whole truth back—"and the greater of these is publicity." In the name of good sense and ethical propriety what shall we think of such things? A shrewd Yankee, a keeper of a general store in a small country town, was driving through the country with a friend. As they passed a certain farm the store-keeper said: "I reckon Bill Peyton isn't doing so well." "How do you know that?" his friend asked. "His barn," replied the Yankee, laconically, pointing to a barn the side of which blazoned forth an advertisement. And he continued, "Where a man lets another fellow paint his barn for an advertisement we think twice when he comes to the store and wants to buy without money. We are generally out of what he wants." So the church that lives on advertising is on none too good a basis. It is living a strained, unnatural, artificial sort of an existence and thoughtful folk will think twice before they bring to it the allegiance of their wills and the devotion of their souls. They may go once and again and again to find at last that that church is strangely out of what their spiritual hunger craves.

COMPETITIVE ADVERTISING

Then, too, an advertising campaign upon the part of one church has often been an invitation to the other churches of the community to join in a competitive game to attract the crowd. Each church that enters must have its selling talk. The church that is to succeed must put up a better one than its rival in the next block. What this leads to may be judged by looking over the church announcements in the public press. "Give our handshake a trial"; "Hear the big new organ, the largest west of the mountains"; subject for next Sunday, "Who Killed Cock Robin?" In more restive communities fried cakes and coffee are offered as after service rewards, while artistic centers proclaim that the highest priced soprano in the city will sing. Of course Monday's papers ought to carry a write-up of the impressive services, mentioning the packed house, the startling if not sensational utterances of the impassioned preacher, and the general summing up of the results of the day should be such as to leave the people in a state of curious expectancy as to what the enterprising sales-manager is preparing for the next Sabbath. Of course the people will be duly warned to come early next time if they do not want to be given a front seat.

And the goods to be delivered! And the method of delivery! In one of the most widely circulated journals of the country a writer, announced as an expert on this whole question, says "each church should promote its own brand of religion in its neighborhood, and the Universal trademark should be advertised nationally." A kindly old Methodist minister of my boyhood days often told us the story of what the church bells said. The Baptist bell said: "Come and be dipped! Come and be dipped!" The Methodist bell said: "Come and be saved! Come and be saved!" The Presbyterian bell said: "Come and be damned! Come and be damned!" Yes, let each advertise its specialty, but as a growing evidence of church unity all might join in the chorus sure to touch the popular heart—"Come and be entertained!" To all of which we say, Let the old bell be kept ringing in the Presbyterian belfry.

Organizations of all kinds have been quick to act upon the suggestion that the church is a sales organization. The sermon period is the chance for making an effective selling talk. Special Sundays crowd the calendar with special bargains for each day. And what minister is not sought out weekly to yield the service or part of it to this organization or the other to get its proposition before the people, which is really a very attractive offer, a good buy? We suggest therefore that fair consideration be given these questions before final opinions are reached. Are we to be ministers or salesmen? What is it after all that is to be advertised?

WHAT IS CHURCH FOR?

What do people go to church for? Is there no part of our existence that is not to be invaded by the buying and selling spirit? Ought there not to be some place where folks may come together neither to buy nor to sell? And ought not that place be the altar of God? Is the test of the sermon to be, did the preacher make a sale? Or of sermon and service, thought of as an inseparable unit, ought we to ask did it bring back the vision which in life's eager buying and selling was all but lost? Did it exalt the mind in all its thinking upon life and the tasks that are set men here to do? Did it awaken in some heart a new hunger and yearning for a purer and nobler existence? Did it move some one to pray, "Create in me a clean heart O God, and renew a right spirit within me?" We go to church, do we not, to share a fellowship, to join in a common quest, to have a friendship renewed in a friendship of human hearts and of the infinite Spirit whom we seek as Father and Friend.

And we might raise the more searching question concerning the state of religion that is ready for the processes of salesmanship. The standardized article is most easily marketed. Religion standardized for the trade! And the scandal of history repeats itself. Standardized gods and popular deities! This age will not abide this thing, this age that has passed through the fires of death and hell. It has caught a new vision above the graves of its millions slain. It throbs with a new hope and its spirit is answering to a new faith. And those gods must go and that religion must go that stood helpless before the coming of the storm. It will not listen to those whose chief business it is to increase the traffic in gods that embody not that Higher that humanity now is seeking. And it will rid our ecclesiastical shelves of all idols and deities that foster still the war-breeding patriotisms and fear-begetting and destructive nationalisms.

It is the plain lesson of history. The religion of the spirit dies when the gods become marketable. No, we are not salesmen dealing in wares of the faith once delivered to the saints. We are teachers, ourselves ever needing to be taught. We are bold adventurers for God and humanity; we are interpreters of the things of the spirit to the questing spirits of our fellows; we are friends and comrades on a common quest. Our God and our religion are not for sale. They are to be had only as they are freely shared.

BAITING PEOPLE TO CHURCH

Why not end, then, this feverish advertising of the church? We are putting the emphasis in the wrong place. Why talk so much about church attendance? Jesus seemed to say little about these things. The causes for our present situation do not lie upon the surface. It is the claim of religion as a servant of life that we are to bring home to the hearts and minds of men, and we are never going to do this by baiting people to come to our church to hear our preacher or our new soprano. There are scores of people in every community to whom these things are offensive, or at least to whom they make no appeal. They do not need to go to church to be amused or to hear good music. There are people outside of all churches who are thinking about religion. They are interested in those things that seem to them to concern the life of the spirit. They are weary of the ecclesiastical activities that beget narrowness and exclusiveness and self-righteousness and division in the community. These people are closer to us than we think.

It is in the name of religion that the church must reach the community. We must be done with church bidding against church to get a hearing, in which the rivalry is bound to be thrust into the foreground and the answer of the church to the moral and spiritual necessities of men is minimized and obscured. Patronizing the public and apologizing for the church are as undignified as they are disloyal; competition with other churches to get the crowd is as unethical as it is unchristian. The church must first become certain of its high enterprise and give itself to that in full devotion, ready to die if need be that its cause may live. By quiet, constructive ministry the church gives forth light and leading, and will win unto itself, if not the crowds, at least a slowly increasing number of those upon whom life is laying its great constraints, and who will come to it as a city set upon a hill which cannot be hid—will come to it for light and guidance and comfort for themselves and for their children.

Our Health

THE first Napoleon claimed that armies march
Upon their bellies. And the destinies
Of peace and orderly society
Are even more dependent on the health,
The bodily well-being of us all.
The nation's fate hangs on the agreement struck Between you and your breakfast. Stomach-ache
Is treachery, a cough's lese-majeste,
A headache is sedition. You cannot think Or vote aright with a bad stomach. When You feel "just like the devil" then don't love
Your neighbor as yourself. 'T would be a vice.
The silly notion that when one is sick
His friends should pet and fondle him as though
He did them all a favor by his grouch,
Is growing sillier every day. The shoe
Is on the other foot. A sick man ought To go to jail for his deserts. To be
The victim of disease another spreads
Is a calamity, to spread disease
Is nothing short of crime,—or ignorance
Which some day will be catalogued as crime.
To seek health as a fad is not enough;
'T is bounden duty, debt each man must pay
To neighbor, state, his Maker, and himself.

The Living Rule

By Ervin Moore Miller

“ALL things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do also unto them: for this is the law and the prophets.”

This saying has too long and most unfortunately been called “the golden rule”. Just how it came to be thus named I do not know, but I doubt not that it goes back to the days of soft garments, kingly privilege, and royal aristocracy when the chief aim of religion was to get one up golden stairs to heaven to be rewarded with a golden crown, walk golden streets, and hasten to angelic solos played on harps of gold. The high place of gold in the high life of society got a high place in the thinking of religion. However, things of gold have very little real intimacy of contact and reality with the lives of the masses of men. To most of us things of gold are too precious and rare to be handled often or to be used commonly. They are things kept in safety deposit boxes in banks or in some other safe and unseen place.

This saying of Jesus, which is a summary of his teaching, was meant to be a rule for common life, and not something so precious as to be hidden away. It has, however, been an unused and unworked golden rule of our religion. It has been kept in the closet like a sacred relic to be taken out and viewed on occasion that its beauty and preciousness might be seen once more, and then carefully restored to its place of safety.

The world of yesterday may have been sufficient unto itself with this rule as a sacred keepsake. But the world we live in needs it as a rule of life. Let us try then to transform this rule of gold into one of some more common substance which we can stick in our pockets and take with us to measure the deeds of every day.

A RULE OF SALVATION

One wonders what would happen to the evangelistic preaching of today, which is so fond of intellectual correctness, if this rule were to be made the meat and marrow of its message. Suppose we were to tell men for once that it is the will of God that they do unto others as they would have others do unto them, and that only as men try to practice this are they in the way of salvation. Surely a God of love and righteousness will stand behind the preaching of that message. It seems quite possible, too, that the reaction of men to such a message would be less likely to make them feel and say, “I am holier than thou, because I believe what I ought to believe,” and more likely to lead them into the way of righteous living.

Suppose an employer of “labor” should become convinced that labor is “others” and that it is the will of God that he treat them as he would wish to be treated himself, and set out to do it. Would there be anything unchristian about so simple a conversion? Might it not be that such a man instead of becoming interested alone in attending church, reading the Bible and the like, would also try to reorganize his business in such a way as to deal justly with every man in his employ? Might it not be that he would hear in this call the voice of Jesus saying, “Come ye after me and I will make you to become a maker of men.” A response to this message would require all those who have power over and control of human lives to put the making of lives the first thing in their careers.

Would preaching that demanded the acceptance of this rule as the thing to live by be less than Christian? Would it not be a valuable gospel that made men see that it is the will of God that they treat all men as they wish to be treated by other men? Would it not be worthwhile to make men see that this means that they must desire the best things, and opportunities, and privileges of life, not only for themselves and their families but for other men and their loved ones likewise?

CATCHING BIG FISH

Jesus often asked men to follow him. That was because he was always going somewhere! He was always living, moving, and having his being in the conception of the kingdom of God which dominated his life and thought. When we get a definite understanding of that kingdom such as he had our call to men to follow him will mean going somewhere, rather than simply believing something. It will mean a readjustment of the relations of men with other men such as is expressed in this living rule. Perhaps we can use this gospel message in the work of evangelism with some hope of doing good.

Little Zacchaeus shinned up the sycamore tree one day to see the lord go by. The biggest surprise that little man ever got was there on that sycamore limb. For when Jesus got near to him he said, “Zacchaeus, come down, for I am going home with you to dinner!” Remember that Zacchaeus was little only in stature. He had a big “pull” and a good sized “pile”, either one of which would make him a respectable power in the land even unto this day. On his way home to dinner with Jesus as his guest, he decided to confess the conviction that had been growing within him that he had not been doing unto others as he would have others do unto him, and he sought to unprick his conscience by giving half his goods to the poor, and by restoring four times what he had taken unjustly from some of the others with whom he had had dealings. When he finished telling Jesus that he wanted to do the square thing with everybody and start over again, Jesus didn’t ask him to recite an apostle’s creed to show his faith, but told him that he had experienced salvation.

THE WILL OF GOD

In our fishing for men we have nearly lost hope that there is any use to try to catch big ones. But it may be that the gospel we have preached is poor attraction for the biggest fish. It seems quite possible to me that a gospel making such demands of men as this might, even through the foolishness of preaching, save some. Strong men have responded to the call to make themselves safe for another world, and strong men may yet respond to the call which demands that they try to make a heaven out of this world even though to do so means real readjustments of their ways of living.

Is it impossible that some of the powerful and influential members of our society can be made to see the will of God in terms of doing unto others as they would have others do unto them, and that they may desire to do it strongly enough to make as radical readjustments of their relations with others as Zacchaeus did?

We are told that one of the most serious problems of the hour is the growth of loose relations between the sexes of the rising generation. They are said to ignore conventions, and do as they please regardless of place or time of day. It is said that they kiss on the ball-room floor, go for a joy ride in the wee morning hours when the dance is over, chaperoned by a supply of stolen whisky. How would it do to preach to these young people a serious gospel of doing to others what they would that others should do to them?

I remember a serious lad of college days who had been converted under preaching that made card playing, dancing, and the theater the important sins. This lad made no discrimination between the good and bad in any of these things but "chucked" them all as things unworthy of a Christian. One day the circus came to town and he and a classmate got into a heated argument as to why one should or should not go to the circus. Near the end of the battle he asked his opponent how he would like to have his own sister forced to live the kind of life the circus often forced upon its women employes. His opponent foamed at the suggestion. When he calmed down a little he was asked if it were not true that as a Christian every woman young or old was his sister. His failure to reply to this ended the battle.

This young man forced thus to defend his narrow-minded position gave expression to the instinct of a true Christian. In thus expressing himself he made his opponent realize what is too often true of us all; a willingness to do unto others what we do not want done unto ourselves and those we love the best. Or a willingness to see others treated as we do not want to be treated or see our loved ones treated.

THE UNITY OF LIFE

Not many men welcome the thought of having any man take undue liberties with his own sister or mother, however he may feel about taking liberties with the sisters and mothers of men. For this reason it is not impossible to make men see that whatsoever he would have done to his sister and his mother he must do even unto the mothers and sisters of other men. Is it impossible that young women should be made to respect young manhood in the same way?

Whatsoever we would that men should do unto us we must do even also unto them, for whatsoever we do unto others we do even also unto ourselves and God. What men do to other women they do even also unto their own mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters; for womankind is one. They do it even also unto themselves and God; for humanity, God and the deeds of men are inseparable. If a man degrades a woman he degrades himself, and no sanction of society can add one cubit to his stature. The Manhood in men, and Womanhood in women is divine, and what we do to the highest in others we do also to the highest in ourselves.

We need to realize that we are all beasts without souls at all, until we come to recognize the rights, privileges, and legitimate welfare of others, desiring for them the best of what we hold dear unto ourselves. It is indeed by doing unto others as we would have others do unto us that we learn to win in patience our own souls.

Therefore whatsoever things we desire as necessary for our welfare and healthy happiness, let us also desire these things for others. Let us have that high regard for and respect of others that we want others to have for us. Whatsoever we would that men should do to us, let us do even also unto them; for by this rule we enter into life!

VERSE

In the Woods

I HAVE spent the whole day until dusk
In the aisles of the pines, in the forest.
Pines—straight and so tall
Reaching upward with soft lacy fingers
Playfully catching at clouds
And entangling them there in the treetops, Mayhap to talk to
At night,
When the forest is darkened and lonely.
All day I have spent—
And the flowers have softened the pathway before me.
And the wind, having lain long asleep
Rose yawning—stretched lazily outward
Then madly ran down from the mountains
Whipped up my dress
Whisked off my hat
Laughing at my confusion.
Then in a gentler mood
More softened and tender,
Kissed the city dust
Away from my lips and my fingers and cheeks.
All day have I spent until dusk
And lo!
My soul is grown Godward
Straight
And so tall like the pine trees
And I, too, stand there and Reach upward
Catching at clouds that float o'er me.

Disarmament

"PUT up thy sword," he said, and healed the wound
That Peter's love, for Jesus' sake, had made.
He triumphed, for his children stayed their hands
While he stood taken, buffeted, betrayed.

For Jesus' sake, we said, we drew our swords;
We could not hear his voice, such clash we made.
His zealous servants fought and bravely slew
Each other, while he stood indeed betrayed.

BOOKS

THE FRUITS OF VICTORY, by Norman Angell. In opposition to the theory that warfare between nations is an inescapable phenomenon, because, due to economic necessity, they are competing units and the expanding population, industrial development and national prosperity of each necessitates political power and aggressive territorial expansion, which can only be maintained by means of preponderant military power, Norman Angell in 1910 published his book, "The Great Illusion." Its argument is that from an economic standpoint war is utterly futile. Western civilization is such that each nation is dependent upon others for its basic economic needs. England for instance cannot feed her population without importation from abroad. Growth and prosperity depend upon international cooperation which by its very nature cannot be obtained by coercion. A war involving an array of one group of nations against another is in effect civil war and the economic disaster it entails is equally great for each nation.

In his new book "The Fruits of Victory," the author restates this thesis and presents it in the light of conditions in Europe during and subsequent to the world war. The present situation seems to bear out completely Mr. Angell's theory of the futility of war. "The continent as a whole has the same soil and natural resources and technical knowledge as when it fed its populations," but there is suffering and want on every hand. War psychology is fatal to social living. "The ideas which produce war—the fears out of which it grows and the passions which it feeds—produce a state of mind that ultimately renders impossible the cooperation by which alone wealth can be produced and life maintained." The pugnacious instinct for mastery, fostered by a traditional patriotism has engulfed Europe because its true nature and destructive influences are not realized. The statesmen who framed the Treaty of Versailles did not recognize the fact of the interdependence of nations nor the futility of coercion. As a result "Vienna starves largely because the coal needed for its factories is now situated in a foreign State—Czecho-Slovakia—which, partly from political motives perhaps, fails to deliver it."

All of the problems involved in the "Balkanisation" of Europe are directly the concern of America. We are related to it by foreign trade and investments, exchanges, immigration, armaments, taxation, industrial unrest and the effect of these on social and political organization. "If we find certain sovereign ideas determining the course of British or French policy, giving us certain results, we may be sure that the same ideas will in the case of America, give us much the same results."

This again brings us to Mr. Angell's chief contention—the dominant power of current ideas. Change the ideas and a change in conduct will result. That these current ideas can be changed in spite of instincts and emotions is a proposition the author accepts. The task then is to change the ideas and so clear the path for international partnership. "In human society mere instinct has always been modified or directed in some measure by taboos, traditions, conventions, constituting a social discipline. The character of that discipline is largely determined by some sense of social need, developed as the result of the suggestion of transmitted ideas, discussion, intellectual ferment."

The means for bringing about the change of ideas he does not present clearly. It must come about through clear thinking, "discussion, intellectual ferment" and fearless presentation of the facts. His final word is: "There is no refuge but the truth." (Century, $3.)

THE MORALITY OF THE STRIKE. By Rev. Donald Alexander McLean. Written by a Catholic priest and bearing an introduction by Prof. John A. Ryan of the Catholic University of America, this volume, while somewhat overweighted with quotations from Catholic moralists and correspondingly lacking in reference to other ethical points of view, is a highly significant contribution to a challenging theme.

The author holds that since a strike is nowhere declared to be intrinsically immoral by Catholic teachers the question of its morality depends upon the concrete conditions accompanying a given strike. No strike can be morally justified which violates a "just" contract which has been freely entered into by both parties and whose terms have been honestly fulfilled by the employer. If, however, the exigencies of their economic position have forced the workers into a contract which was unjust to themselves, it is not inevitably binding in a moral sense. It is recognized, in other words, that freedom of contract really begins only when there is something like equality of bargaining power. In the case, however, of a strike which violates a contract, the burden of proof is clearly on the workers to show that the contract was either unjust originally, or has become invalid for subsequent reasons.

Concerning the morality of the strike as affected by the objectives sought, it is held that there can be no question about the justice of striking for a living wage. It is also pointed out that a strike may be wholly justified in order to secure a wage above the minimum level, provided it does not demand 100 per cent of the product,—which in the author's opinion would be unjust. As to how the "maximum just wage" is to be determined, the author gives no clue except to say in general terms that a "full interest must be paid to capital," and "a full remuneration to the service rendered by management."

Not only better wages, but also more wholesome working conditions and shorter hours may be a just occasion for a strike. To ask for a shorter day than eight hours, however, would be "unreasonable" under present conditions. A strike for union recognition may be wholly ethical since the union affords the workers the only opportunity of safeguarding their rights, but in any case the strike is so serious a weapon in its consequences to the public that it ought not to be used except when the cause is clearly great enough to be commensurate with the probable ills. The abolition of the institution of private property, or the destruction of the existing authority of the state, are never just grounds for strikes, in the opinion of the author.

The sympathetic strike is shown to have more justification than the public generally accords to it. If there were no bond whatever between two employers, the employes of one would have no valid ground for going on a strike out of sympathy with the employes of another. But as a matter of fact, few of the larger industrial corporations are completely independent, in any true sense, for they are united in combinations or associations of various kinds for the purpose of assisting each other and resisting the demands of labor; so there may be good moral grounds for a sympathetic strike. But to extend it into a general strike is unwarranted because of the tremendous peril for the public which it involves. So also the "political" strike is in general condemned as being subversive of the constitutional provisions for carrying out the will of the people.

For the state to forbid strikes would be clearly unjust unless it were to provide other opportunity by which the rights of the workers could be secured. Compulsory arbitration would be subject to political influence, and there is reason to fear that the point of view of organized labor would not always get impartial consideration. The state should, however, provide tribunals for investigation and conciliation, and might well enact legislation forbidding strikes until after attempts at arbitration had been made. The real solution of the problem of the strike is found in legislation which will protect the rights of the workers, and more especially in a progressive development of democratic relations in industry, with a sharing of control and of profits. Creedal Conformity Nullified

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I was very much interested in reading your editorial review of the Winona convention of Disciples. And there were a number of things in the article that I appreciate very much. There is one statement however that I would like to ask you about. What action of the Winona convention do you refer to when you say that the convention repudiated the resolution passed in haste at the St. Louis convention? I do not remember any such action and would be pleased to have you specify.

Decatur, Ill.

JOHN R. GOLDEN.

[We referred to a resolution "whose effect was to nullify" the creedal action taken by the St. Louis convention. The report of the executive committee of the United Society affirmed its faith in the loyalty of the China missionaries in spite of their refusal to sign the Medbury resolution demanding "open avowal" of conformity to American practice on the matter of membership. The resolution debated in the convention was on the subject of approving the attitude and recommendation of the executive committee. That the demand for a statement of creedal conformity from the missionaries will henceforth be disregarded is the plain implication of the recommendations and the general understanding of those who spoke and voted on them.—THE EDITOR.]

An Unreconstructed Patriot

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It is a little hard to tell which of the one-time City Temple men we Americans like the better, Reginald J. Campbell, or our own Joseph Fort Newton. Their experiences in each others' countries were in some respects so much alike that the rest of us ought to learn a lesson from them.

Mr. Campbell, while in California recently, received a number of insulting and even threatening letters from Americans maligning England in a crude and vulgar manner and insinuating that the "little gray archangel" was here on some underground propaganda. Mr. Campbell thought it very strange that anyone should feel hard toward England and say unkind things for "the English keep no grudges."

How peculiar then to turn to Mr. Newton in the October Atlantic and read: "The new anti-American propaganda is a personal bereavement." And "To read the London papers now, one would think that America, and not Germany, had been the enemy of England in the war. Every kind of gibe, slur, and sneer is used to poison the public mind against America. My mail at the City Temple has become almost unreadable. It takes the familiar forms—among the upper classes an insufferably patronizing and contemptuous attitude toward America and all things American; among the lower classes an ignorant ill will."

Is it possible that Mr. Campbell was not aware of this bit of reciprocity? It seems that after all the English do hold grudges. What they are mad about I can't understand unless we took too much credit for winning the war. Sometimes we did, I am ashamed to have to admit, though I think an impartial observer (from Mars, let us say) would agree that we "saved the day."—"Oh, for night or Blucher" over again.

Mr. Newton goes on further to say that a man who attacked him in the press said "he wished to keep American ministers from coming to England and," Mr. Newton continues, "I dare say it will be many a day before an American accepts an English pastorate. An American preacher may be persona non grata in England, but Mr. Campbell says that some generous proposals were made to him by one deputation and another to remain on the Pacific coast, so it is plain that Americans don't hold grudges either.

However, speaking of grudges, I am holding one against both Mr. Campbell and Owen Wister. Mr. Campbell may be excused for whitewashing the attitude of England at the time of the American Revolution, but Mr. Wister ought to be better informed. Mr. Campbell repudiates, at least a part of, "the 27 facts submitted to a candid world" in our Declaration of Independence.

We, however, stand by our guns now as we did then. Mr. Wister says he was brought up in a prejudice against England, and Mr. Campbell thinks he confused England with her German King George III. Naturally, for England was her German king and did as he told her to do. Why did not the English people insist that he "let my people go?" All our histories tell about the efforts of Pitt and Burke, as well as Lord North, and how finally Pitt deserted us and declared for war. At any rate England fought her young colony for eight long years, bitterly and sometimes cruelly, and we won out. Is that why it is necessary to whitewash the revolution and repudiate the Declaration of Independence? I trow not.

As to England's position at the time of our Civil War, we know that too, and the less said the better. We remember how the English people treated Henry Ward Beecher when he went over to talk to them, and how he won out too.

Whatever may have been the merits of the War of 1812, we won out again, and now why stir up these sleeping dogs? I didn't.

Who Says Sectarianism Is Good?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: With all due appreciation of your good editorial on "The Nobler Heritage of Presbyterians," I should like to enter a protest against these statements in it: "Ecclesiastical Presbyterianism has sought to buy its way into the graces of many American communities. It is a notorious fact that in home mission work no denomination has been so lavish with its subsidies. And, it might be added, no denomination has gained so little in numbers or other results for the expenditure of a given amount of money. . . Half or a third of the money expended by competitors frankly and intelligently designed for sectarian aggression has gone farther and beaten Presbyterianism in the sectarian game."

Admitting that this has happened, I submit that it has happened just because our home mission work is not "designed for sectarian aggression." I have heard more than one presbyterian gathering discuss the wisdom of maintaining work in such regions as the southern mountains, where the bulk of the people belongs by tradition and temperament to other denominations. But whenever the argument is advanced that we ought to withdraw from these fields, since we can never hope to build strong, self-supporting churches there, this answer is always forthcoming: We are not working among these people to establish Presbyterianism, but to render a type of Christian service which their own churches cannot or do not provide.

Goodness knows we realize that our home mission work is very often a poor investment from a sectarian point of view. We try to serve the whole community, regardless of church affiliations, and what reward do we have for our pains? When we provide wholesome recreation for the community, we are at once accused of trying to decoy the young people from the other churches. When we encourage and help the schools, we are given credit for nothing nobler than a scheme to poison the minds of the children with our doctrines. Yet no man knows what these doctrines are, for we are constantly ridiculed as a church without a "distinctive message," because forsooth we decline to be drawn into doctrinal debates. We say to the people, "It does not make so much difference what church you join, but you ought to join some church"; and forthwith they flock into some other church which confidently claims to be the only ark of safety. I speak with feeling because I speak from experience.

To be sure, I have sometimes heard, I must confess, the specious plea which you put in our mouths, that "we must hold our own in the general strife" but I have always heard it, not as an excuse for a prevalent practice, but as a protest against allowing ourselves so often to be run over by other churches. There are narrow-minded Presbyterians, of course, and the Presbyterian church is not without sin. Nevertheless your remarks about the failure of our home mission enterprises from a competitive standpoint are hardly fair. Coming from you, they make us feel like crying, "Et tu, Brute?"

Church Union Or a New Division?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The articles and editorial in the Christian Century on Church Union in Canada, have turned the thoughts of readers once more to the question of church union in the United States. But some of us are wondering whether, long before that fond dream can be attained, we shall not be brought instead to a new division, a transverse division crossing many denominational boundary lines. While no one can foretell what occasion might lead to the break, the line along which it could occur is more or less clearly drawn; and while probably not many would deliberately move to bring it about, it is not in vain to speculate a little on gains and losses resulting from such a division.

But first a word about the prospects for church union in the United States. The obstacles to it are much greater than is sometimes supposed. Our Christendom is divided not over details of doctrine, but over fundamental questions as to the nature of Christianity, and of religion itself. Is Christianity primarily a matter of the direct relation of the soul to God (fostered, to be sure, by the Christian fellowship, and expressing itself in active concern for the establishment of brotherhood upon the earth); or is Christianity primarily an institution, the Church, not genuine without an unbroken historical continuity, and conveying supernatural grace through sacraments valid only when consecrated by validly ordained ministers? While this fundamental difference is unrecognized, it is foolish to complain of the aloofness of Episcopalians. Another fundamental question which will embarrass every attempt at organic union, is this: Is Christianity a religion of external authority (whether Church or Bible), does it involve a system of beliefs once for all given, and so exempt from further inquiry; or is Christianity rather simply free religion infused with the spirit, and acknowledging the leadership, of Jesus? While this question sharply divides us, any attempted United Church would either set up an orthodoxy which would exclude liberals, or be so inclusive as to frighten away the conservatives.

There is indeed some hope of an increasing cooperation for common tasks, though even here there is by no means complete agreement as to what the task of the church properly is. But for organic union it appears that we shall have to wait until a new day brings larger views which will include and harmonize ideas which now seem contradictory.

But meantime, is not the new division drawing near, a division along lines of real difference? For the points at issue between Baptists and Methodists, and between Presbyterians and Lutherans, are as nothing compared to the difference between such Baptists as Shailer Mathews and I. M. Haldeman, or between such Presbyterians as William Adams Brown and Mark Mathews. In general, there runs through several of our great denominations a division between orthodox or traditionalist, and liberals or modernists.

This line, already drawn, might deepen into a cleft in one or all of several ways:

1. Least probably, the liberals, tired of waiting for their conservative brethren, might aim at a wide union of all modern-minded Christians, seeking to join their real comrades at the expense of separation from nominal allies. But it is not in the liberal camp that the spirit of schism is rife. Most liberals would probably do much to avoid any further sectarian division.

2. More probably, the strenuous opposition to all that smacks of modernism might lead to the ousting of liberals from several denominations. Especially if the present wave of premillennialism does not subside, matters may yet come to this pass.

3. The issue is likely to arise in connection with the social question. For those who have seen the vision of a Christian society are sure to advocate radical changes in the present order. As the churches, through the Federal Council and other bodies, are more and more drawn into making pronouncements upon current problems, there will come sharp opposition from the "rulers of this present darkness," many of whom are influential in church circles. Add a touch of persecution, and the issue will be drawn: Shall the church deal with anything beyond individual problems, or no? If the dispute grows hot, a separation is easily possible, either by a coming-out or a putting-out.

Interesting possibilities at once open up, especially for the new liberal church. The conservatives might join together on a platform of "fundamentals," but just as probably their present differences would continue to seem important to them. But the liberal groups would almost leap together; for all of them are now chafing under the, for them, meaningless restrictions of sectarianism.

The new liberal church, when formed, would find unexpected allies, and a new source of membership. Everywhere there are thinking people who would be happy to belong to a really modern church. Moreover, the spectacle of at least one branch of the Christian Church aflame for the righting of society, would refute the accusation made by socialism, that religion is an opiate that hinders man's earthly welfare. Many sincere radicals, under the influence of such a church, would certainly discover that their love of mankind is nothing else than a following of Jesus, and might become proud to bear the name of Christian. Conversely, such a church would have influence in tempering the more unlovely aspects of present-day social radicalism. Might it not perhaps even baptize American socialism, cleansing it of its hate and its materialism?

If this liberal church really built upon so broad a foundation as "the only fundamental thing that Jesus ever proclaimed—the love of God as the power able to save men, to restore harmony in a discordant world, and to purify human relationships" (editorial in Christian Century, Sept. 15, 1921), it would soon find itself in closest fellowship and unity with liberal Judaism. It would not be afraid of this connection, since it would be much more concerned with the following of Jesus than with the mere Christian name. And through this fellowship, liberal Judaism would come into a new appreciation of him who is Judaism's as well as humanity's crown.

The new division we have been imagining would bring its serious losses as well as its gains. Every disruption of fellowship is unfortunate, and we all long, if possible, to bring the whole Christian church forward into such a regeneration. But if events against our will bring this separation upon us, there are compensations. Christendom will still be divided, but at least the division will no longer be artificial. And to be able at once to join with like-minded men, without bringing along the drag-anchor,—who is not sometimes tempted to wish for it? If it is not we who cut the cable, who shall blame us, if our loss is mingled with a sense of relief? Who knows whether the name of the new fellowship might not yet become a prouder badge to wear than the honorable names, Presbyterian, Methodist, and the rest? For these, too, are but sects.

British Table Talk

London, September 20, 1921.

IT IS curious to note the attitude of our journals to the Dante sexcentenary. Some paid no attention to it, being convinced no doubt that their readers were more interested in Charlie Chaplin or Warwick Armstrong than in a poet who died six hundred years ago. Others, on the contrary, treated this memorial with reverence, and provided for their readers the noblest tributes to the Florentine seer. They believed that there are still readers who care for the enduring things. But which diagnosis is right? Of those who provided for the more serious readers, there must be special honor to The Times. It belongs to the Englishman's privileges to criticise The Times; but in our heart of hearts we know that this paper can rise to a great occasion with dignity and can speak for the better mind of England. Its special Dante number on Wednesday, September 14, was a remarkable piece of journalism and in itself an admirable introduction to the study of the poet. Here is but one among many fine sayings, entitled "the Character of Dante," which I quote from this number:

"All is true and human, but truest and most human of all is the self-revelation of the poet, now intentional and again inadvertent, which runs through his work. It tells of a soul rich in all best gifts of intellect and of character, fully conscious of its greatness and the greatness of its achievement; convinced, too, of its integrity and of its hunger and thirst after justice; but craving with a consuming passion for the earthly fame which wisdom and faith bid it despise, and secure that this fame has been won; trembling at the dread responsibility of so high a genius, fearful lest it abuse its gifts, and yet constantly falling from its lofty ideals of humility, forgiveness, charity, and peace, poisoned by the mortal hate of faction, by the gnawing sense of wrong, by the bitterness of poverty and of dependence; saddened by the memory of past frailties, yet clinging to the sacred recollection of the first pure love of youth; humbly confessing, struggling, relapsing, repenting; full of faith and hope in the divine mercy, full of love for the divine goodness, of wonder at the divine infinite, of awe at the divine majesty, to which, however imperfectly, it is striving to subdue the heritage of the sons of Adam, its weak and rebellious will. "Beatrice gazed on high, and I gazed upon her." That was the gaze which raised him to heaven. At the end of the Vita Nuova, dedicated to her dear memory after her early death, he declares that he will write of her no further, until he can write of her more worthily. If it be the pleasure of Him by whom all things live, he goes on, that my life shall last for some years, "I hope to speak of her that which never was spoken of any woman." Thirty years later, on the eve of his death, he finished the Divine Comedy. That is the memorial he raised to his love."

More Live Wires in the Church

This week in the quiet district where I live, we are holding a Teacher's Training Course of an intensive character. The whole week is given up to definite and continuous study of the various problems and methods of Sunday School work and indeed of religious education as a whole. There are sectional conferences for primary, junior, intermediate and senior services. There are also demonstrations and lectures, all of them in the hands of capable and trained leaders. The course is arranged by "West-hill" which is our Sunday School Training College with its center at Birmingham but its circumference everywhere. It is significant that in a small district like ours there are 150 students enrolled for this busy week of training. The younger teachers in our schools are live wires and it is a joyful thing for those who are entering middle life to discern this spirit of eager enthusiasm among the younger members of the churches. Let them go in and conquer!

The Bible in Colloquial English

Much has been done by scholars to interpret the New Testament into modern speech. At the present moment brave attempts are being made to turn the Old Testament into the language of the people. Amos has been out some time and Genesis should be published before long. The translators know as well as their critics that they are sacrificing literary grace. It seems almost impertinent for a casual reader to tell such men that they are leaving out the sonorous and beautiful cadences of the authorized version. As if they did not know that! But presumably it is important to know what a sacred book really means. Here, for example, is the rendering of Amos, chapter 4.

"Bring your morning sacrifices—do! Take three days over offering your tithes—by all means! Burn your sweet sacrifices in praise—yes, and keep them pure of leaven! Call out the amount of your subscriptions—shout it out loud so that everybody can hear you! That is the kind of religion you Israelites really like!"

Or take this from chapter 5, verse 18: "You people who want the millennium so badly, what good will the millennium do you?" Or this in chapter 9, verse 7: "Do you realize that I think of you Israelites just as I think of African Negroes?"

One thing is clear; such renderings would make some hearers prick up their ears. And as a wise teacher has pointed out, since the day when Eutychus fell asleep under the preaching of the Apostle Paul, there has always been a difficulty in keeping hearers awake. Even Paul could not always do this. Very well then!

The Ecumenical Conference of Methodists

Many from America have been with us in London so that the readers of The Christian Century will not fail to hear of the Ecumenical Conference. It must be confessed that we have not been given by our press the opportunity to know what the conference has been doing. A few startling sayings have survived the shears of the sub-editors, but for the most part the average Englishman, if he is not a Methodist, can scarcely be aware that representatives of more than thirty millions of Christians have been together in fellowship and have talked much upon the work of the kingdom of God. The Methodist papers have reported the meetings fully, but the general public has not been admitted to the wisdom of the great Methodist churches assembled in solemn council.

A Great Purpose

In one of my favorite papers, "Country Life," a journal with a remarkably sure judgment on literature, I came across the following passage. It seems rather out of my range to quote it to American readers, but sometimes a nation does not know all its own good things. Nothing has moved more than this at least one hardened reader:

"In this connection it may be asked whether there is any English organization that supplies its members with so fine and moving an introduction to literature as that quoted from America, where a girl who wishes to become a 'Camp Fire' member must first be able to repeat from memory the Fire Maker's desire:

'As fuel is brought to the fire
So I purpose to bring
My strength
My ambition
My heart's desire
My joy
And my sorrow
To the fire
Of humankind
For I will tend
As my fathers have tended
And my father's fathers
Since time began
The fire that is called
The love of man for man
The love of man for God.'

That is a great vow, greatly expressed. Whoever wrote it has the heart and the pen of a poet. There is the spirit which is in the heart of all who are Scouts, or Girl guides or any of the others of the same kind whatever their name may be. And while such a purpose is rising in countless lives, who can despair?

Two Questions

Here are two questions asked in The Challenge by that admirable writer who signs herself, "E. H." "The problem of the colored races and of the alienated masses is one and the same at bottom. It is the problem of an imperfectly Christianized Church. There are two questions of the deepest concern for every churchman. The first is, Does the church win men today? and the second, What does the church make of the men it has won? And it is upon the answer to the second question that the future, both of the church and the world, most crucially depends."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A Glimpse Into a Strong Man's Heart

WHAT a picture of Paul—what an X-ray picture—this story gives us. If we have ever marveled at his extraordinary power, we need do so no longer. Here is a man so humble, so true, so democratic, so loving, so sacrificing, so above money, so loyal that he could say without egotism: "Imitate me as I imitate Christ." Who of us would dare to say that? Not I. Let us devote this morning to a study of these words seeking for some explanation of Paul's masterly power. We shall soon discover his influence over men and why he had it. He served the Lord with "lowliness of mind." Truly great men are humble. When you see a great scholar, a great statesman or a truly great preacher you see one who is humble. Every now and then I go and sit at the feet of one of the greatest scholars I know. He is an old man, he has traveled widely, he has read almost everything, he quotes poetry, he is at home with the philosophers, he has suffered, he has enjoyed; life is a rich experience to him all the time; he possesses the over-soul; personality is the plus-element with him, he always has time for me, he is never flustered, he is humble as a little child. Wandering along the shore of the ocean of truth he finds the pebble and the shell and he is never unconscious that the whole ocean of truth lies all undiscovered before him. How different from the upstarts who think they have the ocean in their little pint cups! This is a good start—this humility; it indicates that we are going to deal with a big man, and we are. Paul, like his master, was made perfect through suffering. "With tears and trials." He was a man of sorrow, too. I sometimes ask myself why Paul had to suffer so much. It seems to be human life. We all suffer and the sooner we learn to sympathize with each other the lighter will our burdens be. There are only a few sheltered individuals and they are worthless. No man is valuable until he has been tried in the fire. He has to be misunderstood, he has to fight, he has to suffer, he has to meet disappointment, he has to face loss, he has to endure persecution before he becomes really tempered. Paul suffered—and it sweetened and mellowed him. We are unfit for association with our fellows until we have suffered. We are incapable of sympathy until we have had "tears and trials." Paul was fearless. "I shrank not from declaring unto you anything that was profitable." O, for such preachers! When I see men giving the people not what they need but what they want; when I see men trimming their sails to suit the breeze and often furling them until they rot in stagnant water; when I see men balance their statements until all the point is gone, I think of the noble hero Paul. Can you imagine Jesus standing up and saying:—"Now there are many good points about the Pharisees. There are some things which I would like to see corrected, such as tithing the wheat crop and certain other things, but I can see much good in the Pharisees. They are careful about church attendance and I commend that to your attention. They look about to secure new converts to our faith and that is good. I could wish that they honored modern prophets as well as the ancient ones but all told they are not so bad." Would he have gotten anywhere by such methods? No. He got up and said: "You generation of snakes, who will save you from the damnation of hell?" (Matt. 23:33) Pretty strong!! These place-hunting preachers who are afraid of offending somebody who has money; these preachers who take such good care of themselves that although they believe in their hearts in liberal things they still mouth the old shibboleths—I hate them. Have we lost confidence in ourselves? What if we are thrown out—we can still make our way and tell the truth. Will we sell our souls for comfort and fat position? I glory in Harry Emerson Fosdick's statement: "We are not for sale," and let me tell you there is not money enough in the banks to buy some of us. We will have our say though we have to work on the roads and live in a hut. Paul had no big salary to seal his lips. He held up his hands and said, "Yourselves know that these hands have ministered to my necessities and to them that were with me." A man is a coward and a weakling if he lets his salary influence his declaration of the whole truth. There is one more secret of power, "faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ"—a vast, simple, whole-hearted trust. A confidence that drew up every energy unto itself. "To live is Christ, to die is gain," "Christ liveth in me." There is faith for you. Every bit of life gathered up into this perfect trust and devoted service. In proportion as we pay the price will we attain unto the place and power of Paul. There's a reason—we have seen part of it.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Large Turn-out at Evangelistic Conferences

Dr. Goodell and his team of evangelistic secretaries of the various denominations has been touring the country, and in the various cities has been greeted by large companies of ministers and zealous laymen. At Chicago the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. was well filled. Following the general meeting, the various denominational groups lunched at the Morrison hotel in separate rooms. In the Disciples group, Rev. Jesse N. Bader spoke of his plans for the coming winter's campaign. He has been made secretary of the association formed by the professional evangelists of the church and serves in this capacity as well as in that of secretary of evangelism of the United Christian Missionary Society. Hence he is using some of these evangelists to tell the pastors how to do their work. Rev. Charles Reign Scoville has been employed to conduct an evangelistic training school in Chicago. Mr. Bader proposes to use Christmas and Easter as Decision Days to be preceded by a month of pastoral instruction of Sunday school children of proper age. Study groups will be formed in the local churches to study manuals of the older type on winning people for church membership.

Dramatic Institute for Church Workers

The New York Community Service is putting on a course of instruction for church workers who wish to employ drama in the parish program. The prospective pupils of the new school met on the evening of September 28 and were addressed by Rev. Phillips E. Osgood on "The Need of the Revival of Religious Drama" and by Mr. Percy Jewett Burrell of the Methodist church on "The Widening Influence of Community Drama."

Kansas City Churches on the Move

As every city grows, there are inevitable changes in the location of the churches. Kansas City is witnessing a removal of one after another of the historical churches of the city from the downtown section to some location south or east. Recently the Calvary Baptist church moved from Ninth and Harrison streets to share a home with the Westport Baptist church at Thirty-ninth and Baltimore avenues. This kind of thing has been paralleled by the action of many other denominations. These moves often occasion the feeling that good opportunities of religious service are being neglected in the downtown sections. They often are. Yet it is quite possible to over-estimate these opportunities in a neighborhood which becomes increasingly industrial and commercial.

French Use Pulpit Dialogue

The Catholics of France have planned a new and interesting device for the carrying on of Christian propaganda. By pre-arrangement a priest takes the position of advocatus diaboli and urges objection to a sermon. If the subject be divorce, he will bring forward the common presentation of public opinion on the matter, to be successfully controverted by the priest who speaks in behalf of the church. The method is being introduced into Protestant pulpits in England. It is different from the forum method with which America is familiar, for the people, though greatly interested, do not participate in the discussion.

Bible Sunday on November 27

The American Bible Society has prepared an elaborate exercise for use in evangelical churches in celebration of Bible Sunday. It is called "The Only Way Out of the Dark." The society has the support of practically all the evangelical churches of America, and November 27 will this year assume large importance in the ecclesiastical calendar. In cooperation with the British organization, the American Bible Society does a large work in providing the scriptures in the native tongue for missionary use in foreign fields.

Presbyterians Have Many Large Churches

Presbyterianism favors strong churches rather than many small and struggling ones. The recent reports of the denomination indicate that 150 churches are this year above the thousand mark in their membership. Last year there were only 131. In these 150 churches are 218,059 members, or about one-eighth of the total. The largest is First of Seattle, with 6,800 members. The five next largest are Central of Brooklyn, Immanuel of Los Angeles, First of Pittsburgh, Central of Denver and Brick of Rochester. The changes in rank in denomination are also given. It is noteworthy that First of Pittsburgh has during the year come up from sixth to fourth place.

Order Your White Robe

It is time to secure your white robes, for Wilbur Glenn Voliva has decreed that the world shall come to an end in 1923. This seems bad strategy. The prophet has set the date too near, for he is likely to live that long. Pastor Russell found to his sorrow that the prophet who is obliged to move his dates forward is apt to lose something in prestige in the minds of those who are believers in this kind of prediction.

Report of Dr. McElveen's Resignation Erroneous

Dr. William T. McElveen has not resigned his ministry at First Congregational church, Portland, Oregon, in spite of reports to that effect that were given wide circulation in the secular press. That he has some people who do not see eye to eye with him is not surprising when one knows his aggressive personality. He has spoken boldly on many civic questions in the community life, and will continue his ministry supported by a large constituency that believes in his usefulness in Portland.

John Calvin's Grave Located

The news has been cabled across the Atlantic recently that the grave of John Calvin has been located. For prudential reasons the family of the great reformer had kept the place of his interment a secret. It is only recently that they have divulged their secret. Up to this time a small white stone in a secluded cemetery was supposed to mark his grave, but it was never positively asserted that the location was known. John Calvin is known not only as the theologian who wrote the Institutes and consented to the burning of Servetus, but as the man who gave Geneva a republican government and a free school system. He was the brains of the Reformation as Martin Luther was its will.

Episcopal Brotherhood Will Meet at Norfolk

The Episcopal Brotherhood will meet this year at Norfolk. These meetings are well planned, this being one of the oldest and most successful of the denominational brotherhoods. Two topics of surpassing interest will be the Christian Ministry and Christian Unity. Many of the young clergy of the church have great enthusiasm on the latter subject, and in order to establish friendly relations with free churches are breaking over Episcopal prohibitions to preach among their brethren of other denominational families.

Bishop Gailor Opposes Eighteenth Amendment

Good friends of temperance and prohibition in the Episcopal church are gravely embarrassed over a recent address of Bishop Gailor who is next to Bishop Tuttle, the leading bishop of his denomination in America. He said: "The saloons were going. The church was making headway whatever evil there was in liquor. To my mind it was nothing short of hysteria that put over a restriction that could not hope to suppress the evil."

Church Women Send Protest to Movie Managers

The movie managers of St. Louis have heard from the Board of Religious Organizations, representing the religious women of St. Louis. Mrs. Louis J. Brooks, president of the board, made public the following protest: "At a meeting Friday the amusements department voted to communicate with movie managers of the city in reference to a serious affront to the religious sentiment of our constituency. Very frequently in movie comedy and often in drama the clergy is represented in a manner reflecting on the dignity and sanctity of the ministry. We strongly condemn this and urge you to refuse to show films calculated to undermine the respect and influence of the churches and their ordained representatives. Assuring you of our keen interest and support in your efforts to provide educational and recreational features, we trust that the matter to which we now call your attention will receive consideration and prompt action." In discussing the letter, Mrs. Brooks said: "How can we expect our children to respect the clergy and the cause for which it stands, if they constantly see ministers caricatured on the screen? It is our duty to show in no uncertain terms that we disapprove the presentation of such films, and we are ready to refuse to patronize theaters where such films are shown." The amusements department of the board also adopted a resolution commending motion picture managers for refusing to show films in which Roscoe (Fatty) Arbuckle appears.

Gains and Losses in Seminary Attendance

The enrollment at the theological seminaries this fall is being watched with great interest. There are gains and losses, and so far as these may be tabulated this early it would seem that the big advance of liberal seminaries of recent years is checked and that students are headed back to conservative institutions. At Boston School of Theology and at Union Theological Seminary small losses are reported. Princeton, however, reports a gain of twenty per cent. Chicago shows a gain. Transylvania and Drake, Disciples institutions, report a gain of twenty-five per cent. A study of theological students shows that in recent years twenty-two thousand men have taken part of a theological course and then have decided to go into business. Some of these continue to preach in a desultory fashion. Especially among Disciples, Methodists and Baptists these lay preachers play a large part. The Episcopalians are using large numbers of lay readers in order to supply the vacancies in their churches.

Episcopalians Go to West Point

Though the Episcopalians are out-ranked by more than a half dozen other denominations in their general strength in the United States, they lead all denominations in the number of students which they have at West Point. The Roman Catholics and the Methodists tie for the second place. It is an astonishing fact that more of the students of this institution are members of the church than any other non-sectarian institution in the country.

Minister Makes Demands Upon Movie Barons

"What is Home without an Affinity" is the title Rev. Edgar De Witt Jones proposes for a large percentage of the movie films being shown at this time. He deplored especially the influence of rotten films upon the child life of the nation. "A child satiated with a certain kind of moving picture is a more pitiful sight than a drunken man, and possibly a greater menace to society." Dr. Jones thinks the home should take greater interest in this matter. He says in this connection: "Censorship of moving pictures by law may accomplish some good, but such a method has not yet commended itself widely. The best place to censor the movies is in the homes by those who are best fitted to influence the lives of those who are committed to their care. Parents who permit their children to choose the pictures they wish to see are either stupidly ignorant or pathetically careless."

Wakes Up the Sleepers in the Congregation

It is reported that a Methodist church at Holland, Mich., has installed a bell on the pulpit so that when the saints go to sleep during divine worship the minister may strike the bell. A second stroke turns the attention of the entire congregation to the offender. The remedy used in this church is different from that of the early New England churches which used to send the usher around with a pole. Henry Ward Beecher had the best remedy for this trouble. He directed that the ushers on observing anyone in the congregation asleep should go around and wake up the preacher.

Wallace Tuttle

BASS-BARITONE
SINGING EVANGELIST

"Wallace Tuttle handles the choir splendidly. He has poise and dignity. He does not think it necessary to dust the carpet and liberate all the germs, in physical exertion of feet stamping, to keep his singers on the qui vive and foster a proper morale. During the invitation, one would not have his attention taken from the earnest words of the preacher in those solemn moments when the destiny of a soul is in the balance. The music comes in perfect blend, supplementing the appeal, without wait or pause, but in perfect consonance with the exhortation. Tuttle's directing of music gives a sense of reserve and quiet power, shot through and through with reverence and consecration."—Rev. Charles A. Finch, Central Christian Church, Texarkana, Ark.-Tex.

tarian organization, went over to the Fundamentalist Congress for a definition of what a modernist is. It comes to the following conclusions: "The picture which they give shows it to be a system of thought exhibited in denials of a personal God, of revelation, of Christ, of the Bible, of the atonement, of salvation by faith, and of practically the entire range of Christian truth which is involved in these central conceptions. Its essential notion is that modern rational and scientific investigation has superseded and invalidated any revealed religion. Modernism, therefore, is a system of philosophy which, in the name of modern reason and science, denies the essential truth of the Christian religion." If the editor of the Baptist will continue his investigations he will get an interesting definition of Protestantism from the pope. The way to find out what the neighboring minister is like is to ask one of our ex-saloonkeepers!

English Catholics Want Other Version

The Roman Catholics of England have held a Bible Congress recently at which the matter of varying English versions of the Bible were discussed. The congress favored the adoption by the Roman church of the St. James version of the Bible as a concession to the Protestants who were thought to be on the road toward Rome. It was also pointed out that the Douay version of the Bible has some rather absurd translations, among those quoted being a passage from Revelation, "He that sat on the throne was in the face like to the sardine."

Will Exhibit Ecclesiastical Art Treasures

The Anglican church will hold a congress early in October, and at this congress art treasures will be exhibited from churches all over England. From one church will come a brass cross that was made in the twelfth century. There are a number of illuminated manuscripts and very ancient books which will be exhibited at the meeting. One of the strongest assets of the Anglican church is the wealth of its history, and this exhibition will bring into vivid consciousness this great asset.

Tainted Money of Tobacco Raisers

The discipline of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, since 1914 has required of candidates for the ministry that they be total abstainers from tobacco. It is charged that there are many infractions of the rule against the ministerial use of the weed south of the Mason and Dixon line. Rev. James R. Laughton demands with regard to this section of the discipline "Enforce or Remove." He seems to prefer the latter. He also holds it to be an inconsistency for the church to put a ban on tobacco and yet receive the money earned by tobacco raisers. Rev. R. C. Griffith silences the objector with these strong words: "Who can picture our Lord participating in such a thing? Think of the apostle Paul knocking the ashes from his cob pipe before talking to the Athenians about the unknown God. Think of John, the beloved, walking on the isle of Patmos with a pack of Chesterfields in his pocket. Think of this wonderful man of visions trying to see the seventh heaven through the smoke produced by a Cinco or a Franklin."

Enemies of "My Lady Nicotine"

The foes of the weed are now well organized in the No-Tobacco League of America. Rev. Charles M. Fillmore of Indianapolis is the general secretary. The annual convention recently held at Winona Lake, Ind., was reported as successful in the enrollment of new members and in the establishment of state organizations. The organization will emphasize the prevention of cigaret smoking among school boys and will have a secretary to devote all his time to the work in the colleges. A press bureau will be established to carry the warfare out to the larger public. A literature is being created and this will be given wider circulation. The movement already has a journal which is called the No-Tobacco Journal, published at Butler, Ind. An advisory council is being formed of persons who cannot attend board meetings but who are willing to assist in the work by giving advice to the movement through letters.

Presbyterian Magazine Makes Its Bow

The New Era Magazine of the Presbyterian church is being continued as the Presbyterian Magazine. With Dr. J. H. Snowden as editor and with the General Assembly supporting the journal its future should be full of good things. The New Era Magazine was originated as the organ of the New Era Movement. The new magazine will not undertake in any way to compete with the privately owned weeklies, nor will it carry the more general religious articles which one finds in such weeklies. The Presbyterian Magazine is to be the house organ of the Presbyterian church. Each month some special interest of the church will receive emphasis. Dr. Snowden, the new editor, is one of the prominent theologians of the church, being connected with the seminary at Pittsburgh. He is the author of a number of books and his editorial management guarantees the literary character of the journal which he will edit.

Must Settle Organ Question First

Churchmen do not always see things in perspective, and this is the reason why men of the world smile or laugh right out when observing the saints. At the recent session of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance in Pittsburgh a member of the Reformed Presbyterian church with a hypertrophied conscience on the music of the church insisted on interrupting the discussions on Christian unity to demand a settlement of the question of the organ in the church and the use of hymns instead of Bible psalms. In his mind no such trivialities as the Lambeth proposals should interrupt the consideration of the supreme religious issue of the age, the use of instrumental music in the house of God. While members of other communiions smile at this logically consistent brother, they might well ask whether in their own attitude toward the unity question there may not be a similarly ludicrous disproportion of ideas.

Prize Fight Minister Once More Elected

Following the war a number of chaplains of the army came home determined to introduce overseas methods in the home churches. The saints are still gasping at the innovations, and not all of these chaplains have been allowed to remain. One of the most interesting of these cases is that of Rev. Earl L. Blackman, pastor of the Disciples church of Chanute, Kas. He has refereed a number of prize fights, being paid for this service. His presence at a mill is taken by the fans in his section of the world as the guarantee of a clean fight. He has favored dancing and pool as recreations for his young people, though both are tabu in the average Disciples church. Once a year he insists that the congregation vote whether they wish to retain him with these rather unique conceptions of a ministerial program. He has just been re-elected by a heavy majority as pastor of his church, though there is also an insistent minority who do not favor the innovations.

Bishop Cranston Would Brush Away Technicalities

Southern bishops have announced that Methodist unification in America is postponed indefinitely owing to the lack of action on the part of the last conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. Bishop Earl Cranston of the northern fellowship writing in a southern paper says: "No human document or covenant assuming to ordain rights, institutional, official, or personal, which even constructively conflict with this fundamental order can create or guide a true church of Jesus Christ. In such a time as this we must perceive that all the ecclesiastical, vested rights, and points of precedence and prerogative now at issue in the unification procedure are mere baubles. So long as we are kept apart by these minor, if not irrelevant, claims why ridicule the papacy for making such assumptions the cornerstone of its system?"

Editor Proposes Conference Between Two Denominations

The Disciples of Christ and the religious organization known as the "Christian Denomination" arose about the same time in American church history and profess in many ways the same ideals. The Disciples are the larger body, with 1,300,000 members, while the "Christian Denomination" numbers about 100,000. The Herald of Gospel Liberty, the organ of the latter denomination makes editorial comment on the contact of the two organizations at Winona Lake in August. He feels that two religious organizations who preach union should seek fellowship with each other. "Surely these two bodies owe it to each other and to the rest of Christendom to make their agreements and to justify, if they can, their differences. So far as we know they are the only two churches in the world which

Prof. HARRY F. WARD asks:

What is to be the Christian teaching concerning war? Is it going to declare judgment on the basis of the principles set forth in the gospels or will it be only the expedient servant of nationalism and continue to exhort its followers to internecine slaughter?

Is the American pulpit going to continue denouncing war in general and supporting wars in particular?

Kirby Page, in his new book,

THE SWORD OR THE CROSS

endeavors to meet these questions frankly and fairly. From his extended experience as an associate of Mr. Sherwood Eddy in his religious campaigns in Europe and around the world, Mr. Page is led to believe that the present attitude of so-called religious nations is driving the world on to certain war. But he still has hope that the church will awake in time to save the world from a repetition of the great debacle of 1914.

OPINIONS OF THE BOOK:

Harry Emerson Fosdick, Union Theological Seminary:

Let me congratulate you upon a very sincere and impressive piece of work. As you know, I do not completely agree with all your conclusions but your presentation of your point of view seems to me the best statement which I have yet read of it. Even though my method of attack on war may not be identical with yours, I am so sure that the presence of war is the greatest standing challenge to Christianity, that I sincerely trust that your book may have a wide circulation and an earnest reading.

The Presbyterian Advance, Nashville:

In six clear, strong, concise chapters the author presents a terrible condemnation of war and a strong argument for its complete abandonment by those who would act fully in accordance with the mind and spirit of Jesus. In fact, we are dared to act upon the very obvious teachings of the Master and to risk all in the determination to be true idealists, as he was. With the war spirit still upon us and our familiarity with the excuses which are given for war, the author will be deemed a most pronounced pacifist, and so he is, because he understands that nothing less is demanded of the follower of Christ. Even many who are fully satisfied that war is sometimes justifiable would do well to read this straightforward little book and get the other point of view, for it reveals a kind of heroism in the pacifist which is sometimes mistaken for cowardice.

deliberately undertake to bring about the union of all the followers of Jesus Christ and to furnish a church in which all can unite. "Why, then, if this is your object," the other churches have a right to ask, "are your two churches separate?" If you who, as your one distinctive excuse for existence, propose to bring about the union of Christ's followers, can not yourselves unite, how can you expect the rest of us to do so?" It is a legitimate question that ought to cause the Christian church and the Disciples of Christ to re-examine very thoroughly their own position and their attitude towards each other."

Brooklyn Minister Announces His Resignation

Dr. Richard Roberts has resigned as pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims of Brooklyn after five years of service. His ministry there has brought a once famous church into a revived prominence throughout the city. Dr. Roberts plans to take a period of rest after which he will devote his talents to the students of the nation in leading them in Bible study and the religious life. He will remain in his pulpit until November 13.

Gospel Team Idea Emphasized

Among Disciples churches there is a fresh emphasis upon lay participation in the work of evangelism. Gospel teams of men who sing are organized and these on occasion make set addresses on the subject of religion. During the past summer the church at Bedford, Iowa, of which E. E. Lowe is minister, took a team of this kind out every Sunday evening to visit weaker churches that were without a regular ministry. The gospel team was greeted by large audiences and in a number of cases fresh religious interest was aroused.

Central Church of Chicago Observes Feast of Ingathering

Central church of Chicago, an undenominational congregation of which Rev. Frederick F. Shannon is the minister, opened the fall work by observing the Feast of the Ingathering. The platform of Orchestra Hall was covered with shocks of corn, pumpkins, hawthorn with berries, and other decorative devices. The minister preached on "The Basket of Summer Fruit." It is announced that Dr. Shannon will soon publish three books: "The Economic Eden" and "The Land of Beginning Again," to bear the imprint of Fleming H. Revell, and "The Infinite Artist," to be published by Macmillan.

Significant Meeting at Lake Mohonk

The World Missionary Conference held at Edinburgh, Scotland, arranged for an International Missionary Committee representing the missionary boards and societies of all home base lands, together with representatives from those mission lands which now have a federation of churches and a native organization. This International Missionary Committee met recently at Lake Mohonk September 30 to October 6. The meeting was presided over by John R. Mott of New York City. Among the topics considered at this conference were the following: "The Relations of Foreign Missionary Organizations with the Church in the Mission Field; the Relations of Mission Boards and Missionaries to Public Questions; the Present Crises in Christian Education in the Mission Field; the Present Situation in regard to Christian Literature in the Mission Field; International Missionary Cooperation: Its Possibilities, Limitations and Problems; the Call and Preparation of Missionaries in the Light of the Present Situation; Missionary Freedom and Government Regulation of Missionary Work; the Present Position of German Missions; Communications from Mission Boards with Reference to (a) the Missionary Situation in the Far East, (b) Conditions in Portuguese Africa."

Man of Financial Methods Is Busy

Dr. Frederick A. Agar, the church efficiency expert of the Baptist denomination, is busier than ever this year. It is said that his time is all booked up now until next June. Dr. Agar's contribution to the churches consists in showing them orderly methods of getting parish work done. He holds meetings with church officers and manages financial campaigns. His books on financial methods have come to be widely circulated. On a recent day in Chicago he received eleven invitations to participate in parish programs, which he has been compelled to decline.

University of Chicago Provides Church Workers' Institute

The University of Chicago again this year will endeavor to extend its religious training into the city beyond the limits of the student population. Religious workers from many churches will gather on Monday evenings to hear lectures by the divinity professors on themes that will be profitable for lay workers of the church. Prof. J. M. P. Smith will deliver lectures on "The Old Testament Prophets"; Dr. Shailer Mathews will lecture on the "Life of St. Paul"; Prof. J. M. Artman speaks on "The Religious Development of the Child." Besides these a number of others will give courses adapted to the various departments of Sunday school work. The sessions are held in Harper Memorial Library.

Federal Council Comes West for Meeting

The meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches will be held in Chicago, Dec. 14-16. This is the first meeting held here since the opening of the western office with Dr. H. L. Willett in charge. Federal Council leaders recognize increasingly that the federation idea must not be provincialized on the Atlantic coast, but be made the organizing idea for the churches of the whole nation. Bishop Lambuth, who should have presided over the coming meeting, died in Japan recently, and the first vice chairman of the committee, Rev. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society of the Disciples, will preside.

Congregations are Sending in Resolutions

The need of speaking right out on the subject of armaments has become apparent to forward-looking ministers all over the country. On a recent Sunday evening, Rev. M. Howard Fagan, pastor of Wilshire Boulevard Church of Los Angeles, gave a review of Will Irwin's "Next War," and at the close of the

Illinois Disciples Convention

NO religious communion loves a convention more than the Disciples.

County, district, state and national conventions bring them together for the discussion of church problems once a year, for the warm fellowship which is one of the characteristics of their denomination. This is the season for state conventions in various parts of the nation, and the Illinois convention may be taken as typical of these gatherings. The sessions were held in Decatur, October 3-5. Six hundred people from outside Decatur registered, which with the Decatur people who attended, quite filled to the capacity Central church of that city. Rev. J. P. Givens was president of the convention this year.

The daily Bible studies given by Prof. George E. Moore of Eureka College revived an old custom of Illinois conventions. The dominant notes in the program were education and stewardship. Rev. Garry L. Cook spoke in behalf of an extension of Bible study beyond the Sunday school hour through Daily Vacation Bible Schools and schools for week-day instruction in religion. In a men's banquet, Prof. R. E. Hieronymus of the University of Illinois, who acts in the capacity of community advisor for the state, declared that no community program was adequate which did not have religion at its center. At the women's banquet a significant address was given by Mrs. D. N. Wetzel of Bloomington, who with pathos, humor and touches of sarcasm, told the assembled deacons' wives just how it feels to be a minister's wife. Henceforth it will not be easy for some churches to lay out the day's program for the minister's wife instead of letting her lay it out herself.

A large number of resolutions were passed, among them some very drastic ones on the labor question. The Disciples of Illinois were also urged to be more circumspect with regard to dress and amusements that the unbelievers should not be led to blaspheme. Rev. C. C. Carpenter of Peoria was elected to preside over the next convention, which will be held in Rock Island. The Woman's Missionary Society accepted the resignation of Miss Jennie Call as secretary and elected Mrs. Austin Hunter of Chicago, widow of the late Dr. Hunter of Jackson Boulevard church, as her successor. Rev. Harry Peters continues as secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. The sessions were carried through with hearty good will.

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The Continent says of this work:

"It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples' church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that 'the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.' Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity."

The Christian Advocate (New York) says:

"This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his 'Baptismal Regeneration' in 1856."

The Congregationalist says of it:

"A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus 'had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.'"

"OUR BIBLE"

By Herbert L. Willett

One of the most popular volumes ever published by The Christian Century Press. This recent book by Dr. Willett has been received with real enthusiasm by the religious and educational press of the country. The following are a few of the estimates passed upon the volume:

"Just the book that has been needed for a long time for thoughtful adults and senior students, a plain statement of the sources and making of the books of the Bible, of their history, of methods of criticism and interpretation and of the place of the Bible in the life of today."—Religious Education.

"Every Sunday school teacher and religious worker should read this book as a beginning in the important task of becoming intelligently religious."—Biblical World.

"The book will do good service in the movement which is now rapidly discrediting the aristocratic theology of the past."—The Public.

"The man who by long study and wide investigation, aided by the requisite scholarship and prompted by the right motive—the love of truth, not only for truth's sake but for humanity's sake—can help us to a better understanding of the origin, history and value of the Bible, has earned the gratitude of his fellow-men. This we believe is what Dr. Willett has done in this volume."—Dr. J. H. Garrison in The Christian-Evangelist.

"Professor Willett has here told in a simple, graphic way what everybody ought to know about our Bible."—Jenkin Lloyd Jones in Unity.

"Dr. Willett has the rare gift of disclosing the mind of the scholar in the speech of the people."—North-western Christian Advocate.

"Interesting and illuminating, calculated to stimulate and satisfy the mind and to advance the devotional as well as the historical appreciation of the Bible."—Homiletic Review.

"One can recall a half-dozen volumes having to do with the origin and the formation of the Scriptures, all of them valuable, but not one so practical and usable as this book."—Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones.

"This readable work distinctly illuminates both background and foreground of the most wonderful of books."—Chicago Herald.

"The book evinces an evangelical spirit, intellectual honesty and ripe scholarship."—Augsburg Teacher.

"Scholarly but thoroughly simple."—Presbyterian Advance.

"A brilliant and most interesting book."—Christian Endeavor World.

A new edition of this book, Dr. Willett's finest contribution toward a thoroughly reasonable study of the Bible, is just from the press.

service Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor-emeritus of the Christian Evangelist, offered a series of resolutions designed to strengthen the hand of the President at the approaching Conference. The evening congregation of the Disciples' church at Evanston, Ill., recently signed a resolution pledging their support to the President in every effort to reduce armaments and to bring about the settlement of international questions through arbitration rather than an appeal to arms.

Turns Down Proposed Changes

A strong current of conservatism seems to be running through Presbyterianism in this country for the moment, as revealed in the utterances at the Alliance in Pittsburgh and other places. The presbytery of Wheeling recently considered the proposal to permit the election of women as deacons in the churches and vetoed the suggestion. They also opposed the election of commissioners to General Assembly for two years. This presbytery will henceforth compel absentees from presbytery meetings to give reason for their absence.

Federal Council Provides Program for Important Peace Week

The Federal Council of Churches is calling upon its constituency to observe the week Nov. 6-11 sacredly for the interests of World Peace. Sunday, Nov. 6, will be observed as a day of intercessory prayer and as a time for preaching sermons boldly proclaiming that it is possible to have a warless world. The churches are also called upon to respond to President Harding's appeal to have special services on Nov. 11. Special services should be arranged for Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings.

Is This an Age of Doubt?

Rev. L. M. Birkhead, of Kansas City, in discussing the life of Dante recently characterized his age as an age of faith in contrast with our own as an age of doubt. Any age may be seen from the angle one is interested in, for every age has had both faith and doubt. Characteristic of the attitude of this Unitarian minister are these words: "The interests of the human race have shifted from another world to this world, and the whole face of the world intellectual life has been changed in the past six hundred years," Mr. Birkhead said. "Dante's age was an age of faith. Faith was the outstanding virtue. Ours is an age of the interrogation point and doubt is a virtue. Dante and the Middle Ages emphasized authority and submission to the powers that be. Ours is an age of freedom and revolt."

Religious Idealism in Politics

Mr. Fred B. Smith visited Chicago recently and spoke on the same platform with Senator Medill McCormick on the ideals of our political life. Mr. Smith said in part: "But a new hour is here. A new type of patriotism is needed. One high enough to think and work for all mankind, rather than the weal of a little segregated spot of a privileged few. One which does not shriek hysterical platitudes with one ear on the ground to hear what the 'home voter' thinks. Just national patriotism is a doubtful virtue now. Some whole nation will one day grasp that conception of life and duty. It ought to be America." Senator McCormick spoke in part as follows: "While greater savings by the national government may be made possible through the success of the disarmament conference, its success depends on the collective judgment of the citizenry of the nations represented. We cannot disarm alone, nor will any other power alone disarm. The drastic limitation of the hosts of men under the command of the general staff of France and other European continental powers, the limitation of the battle fleets of Japan, Britain and America depend upon the collective action of the conferees who are to assemble in Washington responsive to the collective judgment of the peoples whom they represent."

Bishop Opposed to Christian Union

Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell of the Methodist persuasion said recently at the St. Louis Conference: "The popular craze for church organic union is a menace to Protestant Christianity." He defended the present denominational order, and especially deprecated the consideration of the Lambeth proposals. He admitted, however, that the union of certain of the denominational families might be a good thing. Opposition to church union is quite frequently found among secretaries, presidents of small denominational colleges and other church functionaries whose position in a united church might be altered.

Centennial of Y. M. C. A. Founder

The birth of Sir George Williams, founder of the Y. M. C. A., will be celebrated by Y. M. C. A. College of Chicago with appropriate services. October 11 is the day of the birth of the great evangelical leader. The celebration will be both national and international in character. The trustees of the college have created a commemoration committee which is representative of the United States and Canada, and this committee is in charge of the program for October 11 which will do honor to the man who started the Y. M. C. A. movement. Included on this committee are Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace, John Wanamaker of Philadelphia, Hon. Thomas R. Marshall of Indiana, President Walter Dill Scott of Northwestern University and scores of business men throughout the United States and Canada. At this celebration the story of George Williams and the early days of the movement will be told. It is a story which reads like fiction, a story of a poor, unknown farmer boy who came to London in order to get into business. He worked incessantly for the good of men, founded a religious movement for young men and in a few years had become a world figure through the simple device of love for his fellowmen. The program of the celebration includes the dedication of the George Williams room at the college. This room is an exact reproduction of the room in London in which the association had its birth. The furnishing of the room has been made possible by the cooperation of Howard Williams, son of the founder, who is expected to come from England to assist in the celebration.

Violent Attack on Man Elected Bishop

Ecclesiastical politics can be at least as bitter as any other kind, and at the present time the various parties of the Protestant Episcopal church are engaged in controversy over Rev. Herbert Shipman, recently elected suffragan bishop of New York as an assistant to Bishop Burch. Bishop Burch was known to belong to the "high church" contingent, and to even things up the diocese voted to make Rev. Mr. Shipman, the suffragan. His election must be approved by the house of bishops. Soon after the election of the new suffragan a violent campaign was opened to prevent his consecration. It was charged that he had married a divorced woman, and that he had a wife unfit for the position she would occupy. The latter attack has reacted to the disadvantage of Mr. Shipman's antagonists. With regard to another charge, it develops that instead of having married a divorced person in his church, he had secured the permission of Bishop Burch to allow a clergyman of the Reformed Episcopal church to officiate. The controversy has been a scandal in the public prints for some time.

Discouraged Over the "Wesleyan Dance"

Hoping to win the Methodists over from their official opposition to the dance, the American Dancing Masters' Association gave the world a new dance recently called "the Wesleyan dance." The posture of the dancers was to be very correct. The proposal has been met with ridicule in the Methodist weeklies and the Association has withdrawn its new dance in umbrage, being unable to understand the coldness of the Methodist leaders. Whether the Methodists and the Association leaders are both devoid of humor or whether they are both smiling, one may not know.

Dean Announces New Plans for Cambridge

Important changes in the curriculum of the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge under which students are permitted to elect a majority of their courses were announced by the Dean, the Rev. Henry Bradford Washburn, in connection with the opening of the fifty-fifth academic year. Registrations indicate that there will be more than twenty students in residence at the school this year, a resident enrollment twice as large as that of last year. The new curriculum makes possible greater use of the facilities of Harvard University with which the Episcopal School is affiliated.

Looking Toward The Disarmament Congress

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS says: "In looking forward to the great gathering of representatives of the nations that is to meet in Washington November 11, it is the duty of Americans to cultivate a peaceful spirit, and to recognize the fact that peace can be won and enjoyed only by those who earnestly desire it, are dominated by a passion for it, and are willing to work and make sacrifices for it. A good deal more than diplomacy is needed to bring it to pass. Probably not since the beginning of the Christian era has there been a more moving call to the Christian church. Does it believe in the possibility of the fulfillment of the angelic prophecy of 'peace on earth' or is the church itself infected with the foul disease of cynicism and 'practicality?'"

It would perhaps not be too much to say that the fruitage of the coming Congress will be according to the active will and working of the Churches of Christ. If their effort results in a general and persistent demand for disarmament—or approximate disarmament—that wished-for goal will probably be attained. If the Churches are lukewarm in their attitude, the advocates of "practicality" will no doubt win the day. Ten thousand American ministers thoroughly alive and alert to this great opportunity would perhaps bring to pass the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy of perpetual peace. Every minister should have at hand the following books, as aids in a campaign for the making of sentiment for disarmament.

The Next War. By Will Irwin. By no means a war book; rather one which points out the course leading to world peace. A book, which by its general tone and by the wealth of facts and statistics that it presents, leads to comment and discussion. ($1.50.)

Economic Causes of Modern Wars. By John Bakeless. A prize essay of William College, setting forth all the economic factors which have played an important part in bringing about modern warfare. The period covered is from 1878 to 1918. ($4.)

The Sword or the Cross. By Kirby Page. Prof. Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, says: "Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war." ($1.20.)

The Untried Door. By Richard Roberts. The author, who is pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, holds that the world has run into a blind alley, while all the time the "untried door"—Jesus' teaching—offers a way out. He maintains that Jesus' teachings are practicable today. ($1.50.)

The Proposal of Jesus. A bold challenge to the Church to show that it accepts Christ by applying his ideals to the solution of modern problems. ($2.00.)

A New Mind for the New Age. By Henry Churchill King. ($1.50.)

The New Horizon in Church and State. By W. H. P. Faunce. (.80.)

Some Aspects of International Christianity. By John Kelman. ($1.00.)

The Fruits of Victory. By Norman Angell. A sequel to "The Great Illusion," containing in as clear and vigorous a style as before, his economic arguments for internationalism. ($3.)

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Note the beautiful typography of this hymn: large notes, bold legible words, and all the stanzas inside the staves.

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

Note: Add 10 cents for postage on each book ordered.

Here is a fine library of books on the greatest possible theme. Their possession and study will insure a fruitful year for any churchman or churchwoman.

Each One Win--Two!

Christian Century readers this season

YOU have at least two friends---and more likely a dozen---who would become regular readers of The Christian Century if you would tell them about it. There are thousands of men and women in the churches whose view of the future of religion is colored with pessimism. There are thousands more outside the churches whose alienation or indifference is due to fundamental misunderstandings. When The Christian Century falls into the hands of persons belonging to either of these classes they are amazed at the new vision it opens up to them. Our present readers are the best people in the world to widen the circle of The Christian Century's helpfulness. As a believer in and upholder of progressive ideals in religion, you are deeply concerned in the development of a compact body of progressive thought in the churches. If each reader will add only two new readers, the power of progressive ideals will be trebled! What an achievement, and yet how simple in the doing! We make the following proposition to our present subscribers:

PREMIUMS BOTH FOR YOURSELF AND YOUR SUBSCRIBING FRIENDS

Secure two new annual subscriptions to The Christian Century at $4.00 (ministers $3.00) and send their remittance to us. To each of these new subscribers we will mail without charge one of the books listed on the next page. In addition we will send you, as a token of our appreciation of this good service, your choice of one of these books.

EDITORIAL

The International Struggle in China

THE conservatives who now control the government of China realize how hostile to their ambitions the educational process is. At the moment they have closed up the University of Peking and refused grants to colleges and universities all over the land. Naturally, they feel that education makes impossible the kind of government they now conduct. Meanwhile these oppressive measures have been met with determination by Chinese student bodies. The teachers are organized into what is known as the New Thought Movement. It is this organization that has invited Professor John Dewey and Mr. Bertrand Russell to visit China and lecture at the great centers. At the present time there is a strong tendency for the movement to be anti-religious, although not a few Christians are numbered among the great teachers. It cannot be doubted that the pedagogues will prove once more that the pen is mightier than the sword, and that by their writings and the use of the new journalistic literature that is being produced they can bring about the downfall of the reactionary government. Meanwhile those who are interested in making China Christian watch such struggles as this with the keenest interest. Missionaries may not, of course, engage definitely in political propaganda, but it is their privilege to teach the underlying principles which have created all the free governments of the western world. The hope of China lies in the adoption of these principles. The lack of missionary leadership may mean that the largest nation of earth will undergo an intellectual experience whose end is a sort of social blind alley—like, say, that into which Latin American lands have been misled. Western materialism makes a strong appeal at the present time in many intellectual centers. Should

China adopt the philosophy and spiritual attitude that brought Germany to sorrow and defeat, and that dominates Japanese thought today, she might become the world's greatest menace. Only a China Christianized offers the hope of ending the "yellow peril," for the only "yellow peril" there is lies in the adoption of that view of life which brought into the world a "white peril."

Starting With the Child

THE church discourages itself by trying to enlist the enthusiasm of adults for its reforms. Most minds more than fifty years of age are impervious to new ideas, or at least they take on new ideas with great difficulty. The hope of the world lies in the education of the child. So long as the temperance movement depended upon the efforts of John B. Gough and others in signing up drunkards to abstain from liquor, the saloon men had no need to fear the temperance movement. The deadly thing was the instruction of the young. In one generation after we began having temperance lessons in the Sunday school and scientific temperance instruction in the public schools, the great reform was accomplished. Yet the lesson of all this seems to have been lost on the church. We are now at grips with new enemies and seeking to invest with authority certain great new ideals. And once more we are trying to inaugurate the new day through the inert mass of adult mentality instead of going to the impressionable minds of the children. Germany reared a generation of citizens imbued with the war idea. The Fatherland was surrounded by enemies. The great war came from this deadly teaching. Were the nations to bring up a single generation of children imbued with the concept of world brotherhood quite an opposite effect might be produced.

In the matter of missionary and ministerial volunteers, the church begins too late. After the boy or girl has lived through the dreams of the junior period and come on over into adolescence, it is often too late to present the claims of the Christian professions. The pedagogy of the church needs a complete revision, not simply from the standpoint of teaching the Bible, but from the more important standpoint of carrying the purposes and goals of the church to the minds that are ready to receive them. A great deal of Sunday school instruction is only pious sentimentalizing. It needs to be shot through with Christian statesmanship.

The Mother Confessor

WITH the father confessor the church has long been familiar. The minister of religion has for centuries received the confidences of his people and defended this sacred trust against the demands of a curious world. Young and old have come with the story of their mistakes, their love affairs, their ambitions, and their sorrows to find in the man of God a sympathetic and wise helper. It is significant of the new day that the minister's wife in the evangelical church is coming to share in this responsibility. She is now an educated person, and, like the wife of Martin Luther, usually a person of character and discretion. If she is not, she does not last long—and probably her husband does not last long either. It is natural that women should seek out a woman from whom they may seek counsel on life's difficulties. This places upon the woman of the manse responsibilities rather too hard to be borne in most situations. She must mother her own children, keep her own house, and yet carry on as the mother confessor for a whole parish. It grows upon thoughtful observers that the parish must some day take definite account of the possibilities of an educated woman in the manse, and set her free from much of the household labor to engage in activities more fruitful to the community. Only as ministerial salaries increase to the point of providing help in the home will the church be able to utilize to the full this great latent power. The minister's wife emancipated from other duties might well accompany her husband on parish visits, where so often only women are found at home. Her leadership and helpful influence would guarantee that the women of the parish had a confidant and an adviser as well as the men.

The Family in Soviet Russia

THAT the Russian government contemplated changes in the organization of the people's home life was at first denied by many as being hostile propaganda. A number of very crude stories in this connection to the detriment of the bolshevik chiefs were shown to be canards. However, the facts about Russia are gradually reaching the outside world in spite of censorship. So reputable and unbiased a journal as the Survey has an article recently from the pen of Dr. Hans Niedermair on the subject, "Marriage and Maternity in the New Russia."

Under the new laws trial marriage, he says, is in full force. The marriage contract may be entered into for two months. Students going into a town do not hesitate to take up the status of householders, for the obligations they assume are of a very brief character. Any man with a wife who is beginning to show age may apply for a divorce and in a few weeks be legally married to another woman. It is not to be wondered at that the Russian church has opposed these new laws bitterly. In general, the communist seems to regard the family as his chief enemy. He has hoped to put a solid foundation under his communistic state only by the reconstruction of the family, if not its abolishment. The church, on the other hand, has spent more effort in building up the monogamous family than upon any other social labor, believing that only in a civilization resting upon such families could Christianity find adequate expression. Because the marriage of convenience has been denounced from Christian pulpits in Russia, there are today many brave priests who rot in prison to the glory of the Christian profession. To offset the social effects of loose marriage the soviet government has provided state care for mothers. Free medical attention and nursing are provided, and for a period of six months before the birth of the child each mother draws her salary without work. It is declared that the government hopes that eventually these children will be turned over to state nurseries for rearing. No social or economic theory that depends upon or allies itself with a latitudinarian theory of the home can hope to gain the suffrage of the world's Christian public opinion.

Sunday School Notes Denounced by Tract Society

ANOTHER phase of the effort of reactionaries and literalists to hamper the work of Christian scholars in the interpretation of the gospel has been disclosed in connection with work of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, of which committee Dr. Robert E. Speer is chairman, Samuel G. Inman, secretary and a score of the foremost leaders in missionary service are members. For the years 1920 and 1921 the American Tract Society published a volume of Notes on the Sunday School Lessons in the Spanish language, edited under the direction of this committee. In February of 1921 the secretaries of the tract society agreed to issue a similar volume for 1922. Accordingly the editors of this committee were instructed to go forward with its preparation. The manuscript was delivered to the tract society, but rejected on the ground that it contained teaching contrary to the evangelical Christian belief, and that the society had been misled in this matter. Furthermore, the statement was made that the society denounces the aforesaid teachings, and has ceased the publication and distribution of these Notes. Their criticisms run counter to the practically unanimous testimony of the missionaries of the thirty boards and societies connected with the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, constituting an overwhelming majority of the evangelical workers in these western lands. From all sides there have come emphatic commendations of the work done by the authors of the Notes, and expressions of rejoicing that help of that kind for Sunday-school workers has at last been made available in the Spanish language. It is not to be presumed that every statement in a work of this character can escape criticism from every shade of opinion. A certain degree of liberty must be allowed for personal views. But it is pathetic that a service so admirably rendered by constructive and consecrated Christian scholars should meet the opposition of extreme literalists in their attempt to stay the tide of Christian work in one of its most vital and impressive manifestations. It hardly need be said that the arrangement with the American Tract Society having been repudiated in this ungracious fashion by that organization, the Notes will be published by the Committee on Cooperation with the hearty approval of the leaders in missionary work representing the Protestant evangelical churches.

The One Remedy For Unemployment

THE National Conference on Unemployment held in Washington recently adopted some findings which should be given wide circulation throughout the country. In the opinion of the leaders of the conference the unemployed of the country make a total of 3,500,000, or possibly 5,000,000. Many others are dependent upon these for daily support. The conference took the position that the employment situation is first of all to be met by municipal action. In every city the mayor should create an emergency committee. This committee should coordinate the now separated activities. Employment agencies, public and private, should pool information so that all relief work might be coordinated under a single head. The conference recommended that priority be given to residents of the city in the matter of employment. If this is done, the migration of large sections of the community will be prevented. It also recommended action to prevent begging and irregular solicitation of funds. How much needed this advice is, one can ascertain on the streets of any large city. Many men in soldier's uniform are begging, and it is to be gravely suspected that the uniform is being used by many who never saw service at all. At any rate, no soldier should be subjected to the ignominy of public begging; public agencies exist which will take care of all soldiers who have legitimate needs. The only true remedy for unemployment is employment, the conference declared. There should be no raiding of the public treasuries. Employment may be made possible by the voluntary action of public-spirited citizens, in many ways. For example, householders could have done in winter much of the cleaning and decorating that usually waits until spring. Very properly the road situation comes in for treatment in the report. Millions of dollars of public funds are locked up in the banks on the pretense of politicians that they are waiting for better prices. In Illinois the citizens have another theory to account for the delay. If the municipality is slow in acting in any city, it should be reminded of its duty by the Christian pulpit.

In such a cause, there is no question of economic radicalism or conservatism but only of Christian sympathy and humanity.

The Wood-Forbes Commission In the Philippine Islands

CAREFUL investigation of conditions prevailing in the Philippines appear to have convinced the members of the commission sent out by the United States government under General Wood, that the people of the islands are not yet in suitable condition to assume the responsibilities of self-government. It has been the hope and expectation of all Americans, save those commercially interested in the islands, that the Philippines might soon be permitted to try the experiment of independence, which has proved measurably successful in the case of Cuba. With that in view the islands were originally purchased from Spain for some twenty millions of dollars, after being taken by force of arms in the battle of Manila harbor; and for that purpose the United States has poured its millions of money and its hundreds of school teachers into the area in promotion of missionary and educational enterprises. Eloquent representations have been made by some of the Filipinos, especially those of the Manila group, that the time has come for independence, and that the natives have attained the abilities of self-government. It was to determine this vexed question that the Wood-Forbes Commission was sent out some months since. Naturally the Filipino press has been full of utterances on the question, and much has appeared on both sides of the issue.

Are Filipinos Ready For Independence?

AMONG the various races inhabiting the islands it is apparent that there is by no means an agreement that independence is desirable. Particularly among the mountain peoples the sentiment seems to be decidedly adverse. Missionaries who visit in those regions report the general desire for American rather than Filipino officials. Claim is made that the roads and trails are in a state of disrepair, and that since the appointment of the Ilocano governor, affairs have deteriorated. Indolence, speculation and inefficiency are among the charges made against native officials. In the courts, both those of first instance and those of justices of the peace, delays are common and exasperating. The justices will not devote sufficient time to their work to prevent unjust and inexcusable postponements of hearings, during which people, often quite innocent as later proven, are kept for long periods in jail. It is competently reported that in the various courts in the islands there are more than twenty-seven thousand cases awaiting hearing, and in many instances great hardship is wrought by delays. Self-government is the right of every competent people, and must be the goal of Philippine progress. But only injustice and suffering would be wrought by premature transfer of authority to native and inefficient officials. It is a satisfaction that General Wood has been made governor general of the islands for a year at least.

The report of the commission will be read with deep interest by all public spirited Americans as soon as it is given out.

An Editorial Letter to President Harding, Christian

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT:

Your courteous letter to Miss Freed, in which you endeavor to correct what you call a "misapprehension of the aims of the conference on limitation of armaments," has just been read in the daily newspapers. Your words will be received with deep disappointment by a multitude of your fellow citizens in whose hearts the great gathering at Washington has been through recent months defining itself in terms of ardent expectancy and hope. This hopefulness has been encouraged not alone by the fact of your having called the nations into such a conference, nor even by the peculiarly fine choice of words in which you phrased your invitation to them, but by the belief that, as the day of the gathering approached, your own purpose would be enlarged and stiffened as you came increasingly to feel the determined response of the public will of America and the wistful applause of helpless peoples all over the world. That your conception of the conference should, instead, now appear to be shrinking and your purpose to be appreciably relaxing, is cause for apprehension and anxiety.

Particularly does this anxiety obtain in the hearts of a great host of your fellow churchfolk, men and women who like yourself profess the name of Christ and hold that the mind of Christ is the very wisdom of God for the conduct of all human affairs. We think of you, Mr. President, as a Christian. You are a life-long member of the very honorable Baptist denomination of Christians, trained from your youth in the teachings of the New Testament and professedly committed to the carrying out of the will of Christ in all that you say and do. Yet when you tell your correspondent that the idea of disarmament is "visionary," that such an accomplishment is not only "beyond hope of realization" but that "even its desirability at this time might well be questioned," you do not seem to your fellow Christians to be speaking the language of that faith which both you and we profess. And when you call to witness the "thousands of years of history recording wars and controversies of mankind," and state that "human nature would require revolutionary reorganization to make universal disarmament possible," you seem to mobilize against our Christian hopes the inexorable forces of fate, which not only makes our faith a silly dream but makes our common Master, yours and ours, a foolish Dreamer. Your conclusion that "this is not a hopeful time to undertake that kind of a revolution" seems to put a categorical negation upon the faith which has been inculcated in our hearts through the years of our discipleship at the feet of Christ.

Your fellow Christians cannot help wondering when the time will ever come to undertake such a "revolutionary reorganization" of mankind as will push war into the obscure limbo of improbabilities, if not just now. Must we wait another nineteen centuries? Or another century? Or even another generation? Must we pass through another hell like that which the world entered in 1914 and is not yet emerged from? Will more wars educate us to hate war more than we hate it now? Will "the next war" bring peace closer within our grasp and reach? Surely your Christian principles, Mr. President, do not allow you to cherish such an illusion. That was the illusion under which we fought the late war. The mothers of our soldiers believed they were giving their sons to make a last great sacrifice to end war. Was it a foolish dream? Was it a lie told them by their statesmen? It is an awful descent from the glorious idealism of our fighting days to the cynical fatalism which we sense in your present interpretation of the armament conference. When you do honor to the unknown soldier whose body you are to bury on Armistice day in Arlington, will you tell his unknown mother and other thousands of mothers that the war in which their sons died not only failed to establish peace but created a "present state of the world" which makes this "not a hopeful time to undertake" to disarm the nations? And will you add that in your belief the "present state of the world" makes such an undertaking "undesirable"? That would be an awful confession of the magnificent deceit that was practiced upon our citizenship in the name of patriotism and humanity!

But this is somewhat aside from our present purpose in addressing you. You were not our President during the war. But you are our President now. And you are a Christian. We, your fellow Christians, feel that as a Christian we have a right to expect you to carry the Christian faith and the Christian ideal with you in the administration of this nation's affairs. It is not as a Republican that we are thinking of you, but as a Christian. A Christian Republican is a Christian first and a Republican afterward. Nor yet is it simply as our President that we are thinking of you, but again as a Christian. A Christian President is a Christian first and a President afterward. Christ's will is sovereign over a Christian President just as over rank and file Christian citizens. He is King of kings and Lord of lords. With the utmost respect for your great office as President, we, your fellow Christians, are constrained to approach you not by way of political considerations but in your capacity as a disciple of Christ and a believer in his way of life.

We reproach ourselves that we have expected too little of our Christian statesmen, that we have fallen into the habit of conceiving them in their political character rather than in their Christian character, and have therefore almost forced them to project their policies in terms of the existing political order rather than in terms of the great ideals and goals which they and we hold in common as disciples of the one great Teacher. It is into this pit of secular reasoning that, in all respect, we believe you, our Christian President, have fallen in your attempt to correct the "widespread misapprehension as to the aims of the conference on limitation of armaments." Great as we know the difficulties are that stand in the way of disarmament, patiently as we know the task of their removal must be worked out, yet we feel that your appeal to the "thousands of years of history" in which men have fought does but magnify the difficulties and eclipse their solution. No Christian, if he is an intelligent Christian, treats history with contempt. But no Christian, Mr. President, finds in history a reason for calling any good thing impossible. It is the very genius of our Christian faith to act as if so high a goal as a warless world is, under the power of God, possible.

And, moreover, it is the very genius of our Christian faith to hold ourselves responsible, in whatever place of power we may stand, to hold that ideal aloft, to vote for it, to urge it, to open the way for its realization by all practical means, and to invest our character and personality with a significance which our devotion to such a Christian ideal betokens. It seems to your fellow Christians that your address to the war college some weeks since, and now your present letter, disclose an opportunism in their President that is unworthy of his Christian discipleship. Opportunism as means is not reprehensible. But opportunism as end is simply paganism. Our political progress is slow, your fellow Christians believe, because our Christian statesmen are not expected by their Christian brethren to undertake specifically Christian enterprises in the faith that the resources for their accomplishment, albeit invisible and incalculable, are nevertheless truly at hand.

On reading your letter, Mr. President, one wonders how deeply your own mind has been impressed, if at all, with the conception of Christianity that is coming to dominate our modern Christian thought. A more clear idea of what it is to be a Christian is emerging in our time. It is a very radical idea—terribly radical. One trembles to write it out, and one can not offer it to another, least of all to a Christian President, save with a consciousness shot through with humility and self reproach. To be a Christian cannot any longer be defined in terms of mere personal respectability, or in terms of churchly conformity, or in terms of doctrinal orthodoxy. To be a Christian is, in its deepest essence, to believe, and to act as if one believes, that the mind of Christ is God's revelation of the way this world is to organize itself; and that the mind of Christ takes in the whole of our life—our industry, our politics, our family relations, our culture, our international relations. To be a Christian is to believe that the brotherhood of man is realizable, that a world without war is no "visionary" illusion, but a practicable possibility. History's "thousands of years" and the "present state of the world" afford no reason why the kingdom of God should not be ushered in quickly if Christian men in positions of vast power like your own, Mr. President, and in humbler positions like those where we stand who now address you, confess our faith in the kingdom and give to its realization all the vigor and intelligence that are within us.

We believe that Christian America ought to appear Christian at the Washington conference. It will not appear Christian if the words in which you are now interpreting the aims of the conference are definitive. Pagan Japan could say as much. Indeed, this appeal to history's "thousands of years" and the reference to the "present state of the world" are just such utterances as Japan, saturated with our western scientific ideas but untouched by our Christian faith, might be expected to make. Cannot a Christian President of Christian America say more? Cannot he thrill mankind with a great ideal, and make such a mighty moral demand upon the governments of the world as will compel attention and action? No leading Christian statesman has ever yet put into his efforts on behalf of peace the originality and inventiveness that his Christian profession calls for. Your great predecessor did much for peace before we entered the war. But his efforts were timidly restricted to the conventional channels of diplomacy. Does not your Christian heart tell you, Mr. President, that the hour has struck for a Christian President to undertake in the spirit of his Master a great work involving nothing less than the "revolutionary reorganization" of mankind?

Back to the Community

LETTING George do it is the favorite sport of the indolent and bewildered in every department. Just now "George" is the community, and among the most bewildered of the sputtering, hurrying, scurrying multitudes are those who flee before the gathering floods of unemployment. The great conference in Washington, the massed light and leading of the nation, has sagely and anxiously decided that finding jobs for the jobless is up to the communities.

Their conclusions sound sensible, and they sound the more so because their findings are simply a new strain in the chorus swelling from every quarter this long time. The war taught us how necessary is concerted action on the part of those who live near each other, and, with all of its weaknesses, the community demonstrated its enormous capacity to discharge the responsibility. The bonds of neighborliness held the nation together against the severest wrenchings of war. The discovery of the community spirit, and the tested strength of the community bond, are the most precious legacy from a cataclysm which requires all this rich benison to redeem its countless inherent malignities.

The new confidence imposed in the community since the war is further demonstration that common sense and statesmanship are at last joined in recognizing fundamental realities. As the slogan of one of our most progressive and successful communities declares, "For the efficient nation, for the efficient state, there must first be the efficient community." Now that necessity and common sense have gone so far in demonstrating this essential truth, it is proper that all the American people should take account anew of the forces playing upon the village, the town, the city, to strengthen or weaken its social solidarity. Now that the community is to carry the burden of the most serious problems of our social order, how loyally is it being supported?

First, in the industrial and commercial field. The task which the Washington conference puts up lies immediately here. It requires fundamental sympathies and common understandings wrought into the fiber of the community life. Unemployment must be assumed as a common burden. How sincerely and disinterestedly are the national commercial agencies seeking to cultivate the spirit equal to the task, and to back the community which takes its task sincerely and disinterestedly? At the latest announcement, 1665 chambers of commerce, in as many different communities, are boldly out under the leadership of the chamber of commerce of the United States in a drive for the so-called "open shop." This movement is an often evasive but not less real announcement to organized labor that the aims and ideals for which it has been contending through all its history must be surrendered. It is a declaration of war, a war which many manufacturers and large employers of labor have determined to make a war to the death of labor unions if they can contrive it. The slogan under which the movement is gaining such large momentum deceives the uninitiated. It appeals in words to the innate and ineradicable sense of fairness in every American. It plays upon American traditions of liberty, and heralds the return of that inalienable freedom to sell his labor in whatever market he may choose, and at whatever price he may elect, which is clarioned as the inheritance of every American workingman. But the workingman himself is not deceived by these declamations. Self-conscious labor was never more alarmed for its rights and its real liberties. Certain employers themselves join in recognizing and deploring the peril to the principle of collective bargaining which this concerted movement among employers involves.

Not for a generation have the two complementary forces of organized industry been locked in such deadly conflict as today. And the enormously powerful chamber of commerce is challenging its affiliated community agencies to join the battle to the fatal finish of what organized labor has lived and struggled for throughout its history. Only a particular type of chamber of commerce responds to this leadership. Unhappily it is the traditional and still dominant type which is thus appealed to. During the past decade numerous new chambers of a radically different type have been organized, and certain of the older organizations have transformed themselves to express the new ideals and aims. This new type includes representatives of labor as of capital in its membership. It embraces the doctrine that the economic concerns of a community are a partnership. They are not the private property, and may not properly be subject to the domination of any one group. Membership in these chambers is open to all, and all classes and orders of the citizenship are urged to join. The enrolled and active members often run into hundreds and even thousands, over against those close corporations of five or fifteen or twenty-five select capitalists who have from time out of memory dominated the commercial life of many communities.

It is needless to point out the fact that these 1665 chambers officially committed to this renewal of the old savage battle against organized labor are none of them of the new type. Communities whose economic life is dominated by the old "chamber" are hopelessly divided so long as these battle lines are maintained. Unemployment will disappear in them not in common councils and through the recognition of a community of economic interests, but in just the degree that free-born and heretofore self-respecting American workingmen will take what their economic overlords offer them, or pack up and move on.

Nor in their ranks are merchants and manufacturers striving to preserve the seamless robe which the community's material as well as its spiritual interests should be. Such commercial-civic organizations as the Rotary clubs have proved a boon to many a stagnant community. Their ideals and good-fellowship, and the progressive spirit which they have infused, have stirred and purified many a town beyond the hopes even of their own members. But these achievements are of relative value at the largest and the best. In their very nature they are not community builders. The exclusiveness of the original Rotary club has precipitated the Kiwanis clubs, and the Lion clubs, and the Civitan clubs, all of them embodying some of the same aims, and duplicating the factionalism which was already gone to seed in the lodges and "fraternities" and mutual benefit organizations without number which under "national" promotion had already riddled and shredded the social life of every village and town and city from coast to coast. All of the old remain, and these numerous new are now being imposed with all of their proclamations of devotion to the common good, and their practice of excluding all but the elect from their fellowship.

If any are blind to the religious rivalries and divisions precipitated by competitive national agencies in all our communities, they are certainly not the readers of The Christian Century. Before this exploitation the standard American community is most helpless of all. It is the common experience of all disinterested inquirers to find the lay majority eager to gain some basis of community in the social ministries of religion, but before this concerted and incessant assault of competing and lavishly financed denominational agencies the most are altogether without recourse. Citizens simply cannot get together in a community of religion, nor can they even make advanced approaches in this direction without open or insidious interference by these national divisive forces.

These are but samples of the positive and all but overwhelming forces of opposition which every community must face as it seeks to discharge the momentous new responsibility imposed by such recommendations as the recent Washington conference. The tendencies to faction are sufficiently strong in elemental human nature, but when powerful agencies with national prestige are thus preying upon them in every department of the social life, it is a marvel that they preserve a vestige of the community spirit. It renews faith in the inexpugnable vigor of this spirit, and the capacity of human beings to hold to their common loyalties, when one sees our towns and cities resistant to all this divisive propaganda and triumphant in spite of all in the common task.

Alarm for our social integrity, the imminent peril of our civilization, is driving us in almost a frenzy back to the community. If the sense of neighborhood will not save us we are doomed. It will save us, truly enough. It will triumph in the end. But is it not scandalous that in addition to all of the inherent difficulties of the task, the community should thus be imposed upon by agencies assuming to represent "national" forces and ideals? Under such conditions we can be but barely saved. Thoroughgoing community efficiency is out of the question so long as these sinister forces are given free rein. They are absorbing larger and larger shares of the common wealth. Their enormous endowments give them a power which makes their fell divisive purpose almost invincible. Under appearances of a division of labor they are creating deep-cut divisions of interest, and making social cleavages which only such extreme strain and peril as the war and the after-war alarms have been able to overcome. They have not taken the alarm to themselves. The very peril of the times appears to redouble their divisive energies. Religious sectarianism, commercial warfare, race and group separatism have all been more feverishly fomented during the very period when each social unit required above all things the consciousness and the power of a community of interests.

We must come to our senses, our full senses. We are conscious that the community alone can meet the issues of these momentous times. But a community is no community which must yield to our seductions and threats of denominational religion, and of nationally promoted special interests, social and economic, all making for the division of the community life, all breeding faction as the carrion the maggot. Load upon the community every legitimate burden. Make it big. Pile it on high. But let us have done with these factional policies which under the potent arts of national promoting agencies are binding and crippling our communities almost to their despair!

The Indolent Barber

A Parable of Safed the Sage

OF BARBERS there are as many kinds as there are men in other vocations. For even yet are there a Very Few who can trim a Beard, and there be some who know how to Strop a Razor. But there are more who only know how to use the Electrck Clippers, and to ask if thou hast with thee the price of a Tonick, and to remind thee that it groweth a Little Thin on top, and who expect a Tip in addition to the price of the service they render, and that is a Plenty.

Now there was once a Barber who was Very Economical in his expenditure of Labor in the Stropping of his Razor. For he counted that whatever energy he saved in that way he could devote to Informing Conversation.

And his Customers suffered, but were helpless. For he stood firmly upon both feet, and Hoed them Off.

Now there came unto him a man who had been Experimenting with the Eighteenth Amendment. And he had not shaven for Four Days. And his Beard was Hard, but his Skin was Tender.

And the Razor of the Barber upon that day would have borne more Labor than usual, but he spent not that Labor upon it. But he used his Razor as if it had been a Cross-Cut Saw.

And by the time the Barber had finished his task, his Customer was Thoroughly Sober.

And the Customer looked at his face in the glass, and it resembled a War Map.

And he spake unto the Barbar, saying, Thou has deprived me of a considerable part of the legitimate result of my Jag, and the method of thy sobering-up process is all one with that of the Painless Dentists. Behold, it cost me Thirty-Five Dollars to acquire that Stew, and only Thirty-Five Cents to recover from it; and that is Cheap Enough so far as the Money goeth. But I will advise thee for thine own good. Be not so economical of the Labor which thou dost expend upon the Stropping of the Cheese Knife, nor so extravagant in that which thou dost expend in the Subsequent Process, for this exercise is insufficient to prepare thee for the day that shall yet surely come to thee. For had I been as Sober when thou beganest as I am at the ending of thy performance, then had I taken from thee as much blood as I have lost through thy barbarism.

And it would be pleasant to record that the Barber learned his Lesson, but I am not wholly convinced that that statement would be true.

To the Singer

POET, sing thy song!
What though none heed thy lyre?
Let heaven still inspire
Lyrics both sweet and strong.
Poet, sing.

Poet, why now grieve?
Though men may turn away
At the high noon of day,
They will return at eve.
Poet, cheer.

Poet, dream thy dream.
Long years may come and go;
Old age may bring its snow;
Yet, though all seem in vain,
Cease not thy heavenly strain!
Earth still shall catch the gleam.
Poet, dream.

Poet, lose not heart.
What though men nurse the wrong,
And scorn thy loving song?
What though the nations hate?
What though war devastate?
Earth yet shall learn thy art.
Poet, sing!

A Woman's View of the Virgin Birth

A Sermon—By Maude Royden

"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth."—John i., 14.

I AM going to preach tonight what some of you may think a very unsatisfactory sermon, because, to be honest with you, I have not entirely made up my own mind on this extraordinarily difficult question; and if you can see—indeed I do not desire to conceal it from you—which way my thoughts tend, I desire to say beforehand that I do not feel that we have yet grasped all the meaning of the doctrine of the Virgin Birth of our Lord. And if, nevertheless, I try to tackle it in public, it is because I think theology has suffered too much from theologians refusing to discuss in public what they believe to be true. If you are going to defer discussion of a subject until everybody is perfectly clear about it, you will never discuss anything at all, least of all will you discuss anything that involves a difficult theological problem. If theologians sit in their studies and work out their own theories without ever bringing them to the test of the judgment of humanity, they get, I think, very much aloof from humanity and, as Bacon said of the mediæval scholastic theologians, become almost like spiders spinning webs out of their own insides. I am not a theologian, except in the sense that I am persuaded that theology is the business of every man and woman, and that we shall not get a really orthodox theology until every man and woman tries to see their clearest, to think their hardest, to think also their noblest, about all the doctrines that are the foundation of our religion. So, although I do not feel I have got the whole answer, I do want to try to state for you the case on both sides of this thorny question, and to suggest the direction in which it seems to me modern thought is moving.

NO TROUBLE WITH MIRACLES

Now, first of all, those of you who know my line of teaching at all will know that it is not the "miraculous" element in the Virgin Birth that would give me any trouble. I believe that what we call "miracles" are simply the operation of forces that we do not understand; and any miracle that has sufficient evidence for it I will believe to be, not a breaking of law, but the operation of some great force in nature whose nature and whose laws we have not yet understood. Therefore, when I am told that Christ healed the sick, or walked on the sea, or raised the dead, I am persuaded—and it is on his own teaching that my persuasion rests—that here are great forces operating under law, and that no breach in nature has taken place, only there has come into operation a force whose laws we have not yet formulated or understood. Now does the Virgin Birth come into this kind of category? It is true that it is claimed to be a unique event; it is not suggested that it could ever happen again. But then, the Incarnation is also a unique event. And therefore such an event as the Virgin Birth might, even though it remains unique, be the natural way of our Lord's coming into the world, because his coming was also unique. A certain set of circumstances might lead in the world of nature to some event perfectly in accordance with natural law, although it might never happen again. Therefore to me, neither the fact that it is what we call a "miracle," nor the fact that it is unique, seems conclusive evidence against the Virgin Birth.

Just let me state for a moment the sort of evidence that is brought, as a matter of historical enquiry, for and against this great event. First of all, you know that the record of it exists only in two of the Gospels, those of St. Matthew and St. Luke. On the other hand it is also in these Gospels that the genealogical tree of our Lord's descent from David is given, and in both cases that genealogical tree shows the descent, not of our Lord's mother, but of Joseph, his alleged father. Now if our Lord was not the son of Joseph, why did these two evangelists give a genealogy which is the genealogy of Joseph? Theologians reply, "Because it was not possible under Roman or Jewish law to assign any child except to his father's family; and therefore if these evangelists knew that our Lord had no human father, they were nevertheless compelled by the exigencies of the case, which did not conceive of the possibility of a child that had no father, to put him into the descent of Joseph, and that not to have done so would have been to suggest that He was illegitimate." I confess that that answer seems to me very inconclusive. These Gospels were not written for lawyers, for scholars, for historians. They were an evangel to be given to the world in order to preach Christianity. These are among the earlier documents—not so early as St. Paul's Epistles, not quite so early as St. Mark's Gospel; but still among the earlier documents which record the great truths of Christianity to the world. Now if the Virgin Birth be a cardinal doctrine of Christianity, if our Lord, in order to be God at all, must have been born of a virgin, as theologians now tell us, to what purpose do these Evangelists give us the genealogical tree of Joseph? If they were trying to secure for Christ some possession that had to be proved in a court of law—why, yes! If they were simply writing a family history—why, yes! But if they were trying to convert the world to the worship of God as incarnate in Christ, and the Virgin Birth is part of that Gospel, then surely to give the genealogy of Joseph was quite extraordinarily irrelevant.

A SENSIBLE NARRATIVE

Then I ought in fairness to point out—though I cannot go into details—that the actual verses which I read to you as the lesson, the record of the birth of Christ given by St. Luke, can be read in consecutive and rational order with the omission of that part which states that our Lord was born of a virgin. If any of you are sufficiently interested, you will find when you go home that you can take out these verses and yet leave a completely sensible and reasonable narrative. It is, in short, possible that they were interpolated later.

Then you have to notice that St. Mark, who is the earliest writer of a gospel, does not mention this doctrine at all. And St. Paul, whose Epistles were written earlier still, does not even seem to know that there was such a doctrine as the Virgin Birth. Neither does the author of the fourth Gospel. Now, it is always extremely dangerous to base an argument on silence—to say, "Because so-and-so does not refer to this, therefore he did not know of it." So much depends, of course, on what you are trying to prove. For instance, St. Matthew was writing to prove to the Jews that our Lord was their Messiah. Therefore he emphasizes points which he felt would appeal to the Jewish expectation of a Messiah. St. Luke omits some of this, because he was not writing for that particular purpose; and it would be a mistake to say that what he leaves out was not true, or that he did not know of it. It is, as I have said; always dangerous to argue from silence.

And yet I confess that I find the fact that St. John never mentions the Virgin Birth rather staggering, because what he set out to prove in his Gospel was precisely the divinity of our Lord; and this, we are told, rests on, and is implied in, His Virgin Birth. We are assured that if we disbelieve the Virgin Birth we shall, we must, disbelieve the Divinity of our Lord. Now St. John's whole Gospel is addressed to that point. He does not tell us how a little baby was born in a manger, in a shed. He does not tell us the early history of Joseph and Mary, or of our Lord's childhood, or the little homely details of his human life. He begins: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same in the beginning was with God. . . . And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth." Now, to leave out an argument which was designed to prove the divinity of our Lord a circumstance so relevant as the Virgin Birth does seem very extraordinary indeed. And it seems all the more extraordinary since this Gospel was written so late. The Gospel called that of St. John was probably written between eighty and one hundred years after the birth of our Lord; our Lady can hardly have been living, yet this Gospel, whose object was to prove the Godhead of Christ has no mention anywhere of the Virgin Birth! If St. John were trying to prove the divinity of Christ today and believed in the Virgin Birth, is it conceivable that he would never mention it? Could an argument so relevant to the case be omitted?

WOMAN'S POINT OF VIEW

Well, we are told, in turn, that the reason why there is no mention of the Virgin Birth in the early years—that is to say, in the years recorded in St. Paul's Epistle—is because it was not possible for such a thing to be known or discussed during the lifetime of our Lord's mother. That is a point at which I feel that theology has required the point of view of women. Just conceive what you are really implying about our Lady when you say that. Here is a doctrine which, if it is true, must be profoundly significant; a doctrine on which we are told today, our whole belief in the divinity of Christ rests; and our Lady, while Christianity was being preached, during the first, crucial years of evangelism, being the only person who knew this vitally important fact, did not say anything about it, out of what is called "feminine modesty!" There are limits, I believe, to the follies into which "feminine modesty" will carry the silliest of women, let alone the greatest and best who ever breathed, the mother of our Lord. And if we are to believe that she thought this thing so unimportant that she never mentioned it to any person until she was just about to die, so unimportant that she allowed the world to be evangelized without any reference to it whatever (she left the disciples of our Lord in complete ignorance during the first forty or fifty years—or even more, if we are to judge by the fourth Gospel) we must either assume that the matter really was unimportant, or that our Lady was not the wise, noble, and courageous woman we have always believed her to be, but one in whom self-regarding delicacy was carried to such an extreme as to leave in the deepest doubt and confusion a doctrine which, we are told today, is of supreme importance.

THE ENTAIL OF SIN

And on another point I think the help of women has been needed. We are told that our Lord had to be born of a virgin because, had he been born in the ordinary way, he would have inherited the entail of sin which comes down to us from our first forefathers. Is there any mother in this congregation who dreams that if, by a miracle, her child had been born without a father, it would, by that fact alone, have been exempted from human frailty? Is there any mother here who dreams that children are only the children of their fathers? This legal fiction on which our laws of succession have been made to rest, this mistaken physiology which regards man alone as the creator of life, has adduced in the service of a very important Christian doctrine a testimony which is absolutely without value. If our Lord had to be born outside the common lot of human beings he would have to be born without any parents, father or mother. And the Roman Catholic Church, recognizing the necessary consequence of its own teaching, has been forced in the end to proclaim the Immaculate Conception of our Lord's mother. It is a logical necessity; yet it does not really help very much, because it only pushes the matter back another generation. And our theology as it stands, demanding the absence of a human father in order to break the entail, while there is still a human mother carrying it on, has produced an argument which—whether the doctrine it is designed to support be true or not—has no validity whatever. I repeat, I wish women had had more to do with the building up of our theology. They would never have fallen into so extravagant an error as to suppose a child's mother had no part in the nature of her child.

Now let us go a little deeper. We are told that our Lord cannot have been the Son of God if he was born in the ordinary way. Do not some of you feel with me that, if it is difficult to believe in our Lord's divinity if he was born in the ordinary way, it is not less difficult to believe in his humanity if he was not born in the ordinary way? We desire to feel—and I think this generation more than any other—that this Leader and Captain of ours did know all our human limitations, that he lived and worked in time and space, in a human body, subject to human limitations like our own. That he was tempted in all points like as we are is half the value of Christ to us; that if he worked mighty works, he did them under laws which we also can obey, using forces which are also at our command.

If he did these things not as man but as God, what are they to us? Why, it was nineteen hundred years ago! Can we do these things? Can we heal the sick or raise the dead? Why should we expect to? This God who did it, did it because he was God, and not because he was man. Now, to me the content of the Gospel is just this: that God came to us to show us what man ought to be like, what man can do, how man should live. If he called us to follow his example, knowing that he used other powers and had a different kind of body from ours, is it not a mockery to speak of his example to us? Is it not just because he lived here subject, while a child, to his parents, subject throughout his life to human limitations—is it not just for that reason that we can follow him, that when we fall behind him we can believe that others may yet follow him, that his life is to us not a distant, far-off thing that happened nineteen hundred years ago, but the life every man and woman is called upon to lead today? If we are to think of him as something outside the limits of humanity, do we not, in grasping at his divinity, lose something of our sense of his humanity?

THE MORAL CONTENT

And again, there is a still more difficult question involved in this doctrine of the Virgin Birth. One cannot resist an uneasy suspicion that it arose in the minds of men out of a sense that there is something fundamentally base about sex, that for God to be born of the ordinary love of an ordinary man and woman—ordinary, I mean, in the sense of normal—was impossible, because the human desire of men and women for each other is ignoble, is even base. It is, I believe, to many of us, this moral content of the doctrine of the Virgin Birth that is most troubling—not the evidence for or against a certain passage in St. Matthew or St. Luke, not the difficulty of believing a "miracle," but the sense that human sex relations are regarded as being on a lower plane than the life of virginity; and that to assume that God could not come to his people through the love of a man and woman is to assume that in love, when it is expressed in sex, there is something that is degrading and that cannot therefore partake of the divine. "The satisfaction of the sex-instinct is a concession to our lower nature," a correspondent wrote to me the other day; "not the preparation one would desire before Holy Communion." Nor before the Incarnation, men have argued. And so the Virgin Birth becomes necessary, for reasons which many of us reject as mistaken, and even ignoble, today.

You may say, perhaps, that I have made out my case against the Virgin Birth, but have not given you any idea why I still probe into this question and trouble myself and you about it. I will tell you. It is not because there are passages about it in St. Matthew and St. Luke. It is because all Christian people for centuries believed it. It is even more because you will find this doctrine in so many of the great spiritual religions of the world. Now, I have—I don't know if you have; some of you have, I know—a deep respect for a great human instinct like that. The fact that one religion after another has preached the incarnation of God in a human form is to me one of the most conclusive reasons for believing in the Incarnation. The fact that men have everywhere believed in the existence of a God is to me a very convincing reason for believing that God exists. That men have believed in their own immortal spirits predisposes me to believe in immortality. Securus judicat orbis terrarum.

DOCTRINE AND INSTINCT

Is there not in this insurgent belief in a great mysterious doctrine—such as that of the Virgin Birth—something which should prevent us from lightly throwing it aside, or saying, "This is something our foolish forefathers may have believed, but we do not?" Does it not at least compel us to consider very, very carefully indeed, before we cast aside a tradition so old and so humane? And so, because the evidence of this particular fact seems to me so weak, yet the belief in it so old and so wide-spread, I begin to ask myself, "What was it that human judgment was feeling after when it conceived this doctrine of the Virgin Birth?" A doctrine which you find in other religions than Christianity, which you find Christians instinctively formulating themselves? What instinct of human nature is it that has brought them to express themselves in this strange mystical doctrine? I believe it is this: there is deep in the hearts of most of us a revolt against the idea that men are essentially sinful, against that old, old feeling that sex is shameful, and that man is "born in sin," which is expressed in such moving terms in the 51st Psalm: "Behold I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin hath my mother conceived me;" that sense that there is in our own flesh an enemy that destroys us, that there is in consequence something shameful in the very birth of human beings, so that the Jewish mother needed purification when she had accomplished her miracle of childbirth, and even the Christian mother, in the Roman Catholic Church, goes through a ceremony which suggests purification. And, although in my own church, the Church of England, the service known as the "Churching of Women" does not suggest the need of purification, yet I find that in the minds of a very large number of people—women as well as men—the idea persists that this service is to "purify" after childbirth.

BEGOTTEN IN SIN

And against that—which I believe to be a profoundly mistaken doctrine—against that, there is a continual desire in the hearts of men to find a birth which shall not be shameful, to conceive a new humanity which was not "begotten in sin." And so, when they find some man who is more like God than anyone they have known, they say, "This man was born indeed; but his birth was pure and lovely; he was born without any taint or stain of sin." And because we always tend to materialize our most spiritual conceptions, the very revolt against the idea that human birth is shameful has crystallized itself into the material doctrine that this man, that man, the other man, was born of a virgin.

In just the same way, the truth that there is a great power in chastity has often crystallized in the superstition that there is some strange magical power in physical virginity. The true spiritual conception has expressed itself haltingly, even misleadingly, in material terms. Even so has it been with the doctrine of the Virgin Birth. Here is enshrined at one and the same time man's tragic knowledge of his own sin—his almost despairing consciousness of the degradation of humanity, which makes it seem impossible for the divine to become incarnate through human passion; and the great resurgent hope that humanity is nobler than it supposed, that it is capable of redemption, that birth itself may become wholly pure, and God himself be born into the world.

How could this Lord and Saviour of ours be born, we ask ourselves, in anything but perfect purity? And if belief in the absolute purity of the birth of Jesus Christ has expressed itself to a world unready—tragically unready—to think of purity except in material terms, in the form of the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, is not that a very understandable symbol of a great and lovely faith?

THE WORD MADE FLESH

That, as least, is as far as I am able to go. I cannot throw aside easily a doctrine that has appeared and re-appeared in human history, in one religion after another, and those the noblest and the most spiritual. If I cannot feel that the evidence for the historical fact is sufficient, I am forced at least to treat the belief with reverence, to try to understand why it is and what it is that men seek to express in this way. And I believe that this is what lies behind the doctrine of the Virgin Birth. If I am right, perhaps in the future this very doctrine which today seems to set a kind of stigma on the birth which comes from the love of a man and woman will at last consecrate it. There is a mighty virtue in purity. There is something divine in every human birth. Every baby that is born into the world has in him something that is of God, and every birth is a unique event. How pure and lovely should be the love which calls him into the world, this little child of God! The Word is made flesh and dwells among us every day, and we behold its glory, but still understand it not. If we could, would it not at last settle these vexed and troubled questions of sex relations, which have been so infinitely more troubled and vexed because of our shameful feeling that they are shameful? When we learn that indeed human birth can take place in perfect purity, shall we not have a new conception of those sons of God who are also sons of men, a new and nobler conception of humanity itself, born of love and born in perfect purity? Is it not possible that if some other "unknown disciple," like that unknown disciple who interpreted to us with such a flesh of genius the other day the miracle of the Gadarene swine, could write for us what the mother of our Lord tried to tell St. Luke, something of the sort I have suggested would be set down? "My child," she would say, "is indeed born in perfect purity. The spirit of God came upon me, the spirit of God overshadowed me." Therefore that holy Thing which was born of her was called the Son of God. Does it make it any less wonderful, does it not make it more like Christ, if it should be said in reference to the mother of every child, "The Spirit of God overshadowed her," and therefore that holy thing which is born of human parents today must be called a child of God?

On Verbal Love Affairs

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

"OUR dominie has a brand new word," announced my host, the Professor, after I had offered grace and dinner had begun; "yes, sir, a new word, a good one too, but I hope he doesn't fall to loving it over much."

"Just what do you mean by that observation?" I enquired, preparing to take a sip of my iced tea. I was interested, for my professorial friend is a brilliant scholar, a prodigious reader, and a host in a thousand.

"Just this: our dominie is the best fellow in the world, and one of the ablest preachers in any man's town, but he carries on shockingly with words that please him. He actually makes love to them in public and exhibits them in the pulpit shamelessly. Up to today he had eleven favorites in his verbal harem. This new one makes an even dozen, for alas! I can tell by his caressing inflection that he has lost his heart to it utterly." The professor sighed and buttered a piece of corn-bread.

"Most interesting," I rejoined, keen to continue the subject but the exigencies of courtesy and deference to our fellow-diners necessitated a topic of more general interest.

An hour later, however, when the professor and I had comfortably seated ourselves in his upstairs "den," he himself reverted to the topic. "Every public speaker," said he, "and the more facile and fluent he is, the more dangerous his case, is tempted by the sirens that inhabit the dictionary. Old Ulysses himself was not more subtly lured by the voices of the island ladies than many a popular speaker is by the thrill of a new, unusual, or impressive word. The temptation to over-use such words is too strong for most orators; they go down before it like Democrats went down before Republicans in the last election." A whimsical smile lit up the professor's rather lean face. He continued: "I number among my friends a noted editor-preacher whose vocabulary is as rich and extensive as his thought content, and that is saying a good deal. Yet withal, this scintillating speaker and writer has a weakness for a small group of words which amounts almost to an infatuation. For instance, he carries on shockingly with the word 'inhibition' or some form of it. Now 'inhibition' is an excellent word I readily admit, and all word fanciers will agree, but my friend loves the word with an undying affection. He can not bear 'to lose it and let it go' even for a brief season. In his finest editorials 'inhibition' or 'inhibit' is certain to pop up lusty as ever. I observe in his letters—and as a correspondent he is a delight—'inhibit' is certain to pop up as lusty as ever. I observe too that in a devotional volume from his pen, his beloved 'inhibition' is 'among those present.' I have remonstrated with him; I chided him; I have warned him because of his passion for this word, time and time again, but in vain, he only laughs and continues to worship 'inhibition' with all of his ripe and robust affection. I have come to the conclusion, have been driven to it in fact, that my editor-friend is married to 'inhibition' and that he is not a believer in divorce."

The professor chuckled. I did more than chuckle; I laughed immoderately. "You put me in mind of another case somewhat similar," I began. "Some years ago it was my good fortune to have one of the most eloquent and able preachers in America conduct a ten days' series of special meetings in the church of which I was then minister. He preached with power and great dramatic effect. His diction is attractive as it is unusual. He never lapses into careless speech. There is distinction in every utterance, even when speaking informally or casually. Yet this genius, for such he is, was then desperately in love with a half dozen words, words, too, that are so striking that to repeat them often is to invite attention to them and rivet it there. I can recall three darlings of his diction, to wit, 'worthwhileness,' 'bottomed' and 'full-throatedly.' Now, two of these words, the second and third particularly, are strong and forcible, moreover they were used always at the right place and with consummate skill. The trouble was they were used too often. Their reappearance from time to time suggests the story that Lincoln loved to tell of the boy who was obliged to read at family worship the account of the three Hebrew children, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. After stumbling over the names twice he quite lost control of himself as he saw them approaching for the third time and blurted out: 'Here comes them there darn fellows again.'"

The professor leaned far back in his easy chair and guffawed. "A good use of an old story that," he commented, still laughing. "Speaking of Lincoln I do not recall his over-devotion to any one word or set of words. In this he was exceptional for the greatest are seldom free from this fault or foible. Take Woodrow Wilson for example. He is the greatest stylist we have had in the White House. His literary charm pervades his writings and speeches like some rare old perfume, but withal he loved not wisely but too well his 'May I not.' A few of these go a long ways. To some I fancy, the Washington correspondents especially, I suspect those pedantic peccadillos were the forget-me-nots of the Wilson administration."

The professor adjusted his batwing tie, kicked off his slippers and went on. "It is not wrong to favor good words, but it is poor taste to show so much favoritism to a few. I myself prefer some words above others. I could for instance be perfectly foolish over 'puissant.' There is a word for you, dominie—a Miltonic word, strong and impressive, in fine, a word with a personality. I acknowledge, too, a strong liking for 'evanescent,' and I love, particularly in the good old summer time, to think of the word 'swish' and as I pronounce it I imagine I see as well as hear the sounds that belong to the world of water. I say it is all right to love good words, beautiful words, stately words, but be proper! take no liberties with them."

"You have been talking about words that are as maple sugar to the tongue. What of the other kind? Aren't there words that you dislike, or worse?" I queried, the while thinking of several against which I own a strong prejudice.

"Decidedly," quoth the professor quickly. "I hate the word 'trenchant,' just why I cannot say, though for one thing it makes me think of a fish-hook. I abjure 'normalcy,' made in Marion even though it be. I detest 'slogan,' and 'motivate,' a word that has been much in the mouths of public speakers since 1919 exasperates me. As for 'enthuse' . . . Confidently, dominie, and straight to your face if I were a preacher there are half a dozen or so words that I would banish, expel, or castigate out of my vocabulary. One such word is 'efficiency.' Cast it off, jilt it, or better still jolt it good and hard. And 'challenge.' Ye gods and tin flivvers, that word belongs in the sporting columns of the newspaper, suffer it to return home and bid it stay there. As for 'psychological,' Good Lord deliver us! And may 'camouflage' R. I. P. for ever and ever! There are others, but these are the most blatantly bad ones I can now recall. What have you to say?" The professor surveyed me blandly.

"I have a confession to make," I rejoined. "After the fashion of Pharaoh's infamous butler, I do this day remember my verbal sins, both of omission and commission. The first ten years of my ministry I don't believe I had any favorite words. I was too hard driven to marshall my thoughts. I had no time for searching out new and pleasing words. But of late, while I still am obliged to dig for all I get, I have become conscious of some decided preferences and even affection for certain words. For instance I am so fond of 'rich,' 'enriched' and 'enrichment' that I am likely to use them in every sermon if I do not have a care. Then there are several others that I fear I favor over-much, such as 'never-to-be-forgotten,' 'memorable,' 'rainbowed,' 'ineffable,' 'buttress,' 'marvelous,' 'fellowship,' 'purgatorial,' 'unforgettable,' and possibly 'vibrant,' but I am resolved—"

"'Resolved' is a good word; I never hear it too often," gently interrupted the professor. "When a public speaker observes a tendency of this kind and 'resolves,' there is hope for his vocabulary's redemption. This I have learned in my own rather slender speaking experience. I give it to you for what it may be worth. The surest safeguard against pet words and phrases is much writing. So, were I addressing a neophyte, which I am not, I would say: "Write your speeches for the most part, be they sermons, addresses or after-dinner toasts and you will reduce to a minimum the tyranny of a set of words that clamor for use continually. Extempore language when one is in first-class condition may be and is very good, but if one be below par or under any kind of nervous strain he is apt to revert to the words and phrases he especially likes, for such words lie close to the surface and are ever eager to be unleashed. Exceptional men may not need to write much and often in order to preserve a choice and well-balanced vocabulary, but most of us who take some pride in good English must write often and painstakingly.

"Good! I agree with you," I replied. "Bacon said—well, you know what Bacon said. While you were speaking it occurred to me that another way to avoid the over-use of unusual words is not to use them at all. Really they aren't necessary. I think I have heard Mr. Bryan speak thirty-six times"; (here the professor gave a start and shivered) "in all thirty-six speeches varying from an after-dinner address to a lecture two hours long, I do not recall hearing him use a new or unusual word. His vocabulary is singularly simple and pure. In words of Anglo-Saxon derivation it is notably extensive. Mr. Bryan is an orator, not a rhetorician. Then there is Bishop Quayle. I have heard him several times and every time I was amazed at his skillful use of unusual, even bizarre words. He employs to advantage picturesque phrases absolutely unique. I should call Bishop Quayle both an orator and a rhetorician with the latter predominating. Moreover the bishop is a genius. Perhaps Mr. Bryan is not a genius but he is unquestionably the greatest popular orator in America."

The professor changed his position and yawned softly. Then: "Thirty-six times did you say? I'm getting a trifle hard of hearing I fear. Thirty-six—Oh yes, Bryan, eh, Bryan to be sure! Words! Words! Words!"

A Cowboy's Prayer

(Written for Mother)

O H, Lord, I've never lived where churches grow.
I love creation better as it stood
That day you finished it so long ago

And looked upon your work and called it good.
I know that others find you in the light
That's sifted down through tinted window panes,
And yet I seem to feel you near tonight
In this dim, quiet starlight on the plains.

I thank you, Lord, that I am placed so well,
That you have made my freedom so complete;
That I'm no slave of whistle, clock, or bell,
Nor weak-eyed prisoner of wall and street.
Just let me live my life as I've begun
And give me work that's open to the sky;
Make me a pardner of the wind and sun,
And I won't ask a life that's soft or high.

Let me be easy on the man that's down;
Let me be square and generous with all.
I'm careless sometimes, Lord, when I'm in town,
But never let 'em say I'm mean or small!
Make me as big and open as the plains,
As honest as the hawse between my knees,
Clean as the wind that blows behind the rains,
Free as the hawk that circles down the breeze!

Forgive me, Lord, if sometimes I forget.
You know about the reasons that are hid.
You understand the things that gall and fret;
You know me better than my mother did.
Just keep an eye on all that's done and said
And right me sometimes, when I turn aside,
And guide me on the long, dim trail ahead
That stretches upward toward the Great Divide.

BADGER CLARK.

Travel

THE railroad track is miles away,
And the day is loud with voices speaking.
Yet there isn't a train goes by all day
But I hear its whistle shrieking.

All night there isn't a train goes by,
Though the night is still for sleep and dreaming,
But I see its cinders red on the sky,
And hear its engines steaming.

My heart is warm with the friends I make,
And better friends I'll not be knowing;
Yet there isn't a train I wouldn't take,
No matter where it's going.

Voice

YOU in whose veins runs the fire of loving,
For people, for plants, for little animals,
For rocks and earth, stars and the elements,
You have a secret Voice, always singing.
It is never still. It runs with your haste
And idles in your silence. It is everywhere.
O you, for whom this passionate Voice sings
And will not be silent, think now of those
For whom no voice sounds. Of those who toil
Without the singing voice,
And live in a world which has not yet come through Into your world.
O—can you not hear that the song your Voice is singing
Is the song which is to bring that world of theirs
Into the light which must light all men?

Why else do you imagine that this Voice is singing?
Why else do you imagine that the fire of love
Runs in your veins?

Thirteenth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

THOSE who have read "Old Delabole," by Eden Phillpotts, will not soon forget the little Cornish village—so near to the "sounding shores of Boss and Bude"—where men win with patient toil, and not without peril, the famous dark grey slate that is the delight of every good builder. But even to the dwellers of that "City of Slate," the religious activities of the village, divided between "Wesleyans" and "Uniteds," take rank with the affairs of the great quarry in interest and importance. It is worth while to know Granfer Nute, the village philosopher, who comes aptly to the rescue of every perplexing situation with his shrewd humor and his quaint estimates of men and things. Foregathered one day with his special crony, they discuss the aims and actions of certain young people, as old folk are wont to do:

"Pity your grandson hedn't more like his brother Pooley, and not so fond of dolly-mopping with the girls," said the friend of the philosopher.

"Pooley has the Methodist mind," Granfer replied. "Ned hedn't. He's feeling out for the joy of life, while Pooley wants the joy of truth."

Not all may be willing to agree that there is a Methodist mind, as a thing distinct and set apart, on the ground that others have an equal right to Granfer's highly honorable phrase. However that may be, there is a Methodist genius, unique, particular, precious—joining mind and heart, uniting the joy of truth with the joy of life—and there has never been a more perfect incarnation of it than Bishop Quayle; in whom humor, pathos, literature, life, faith, philosophy and poetry are made incandescent by a spiritual genius who is also an unveneered human being. What he may be as an executive I know not—though it is reported that a great layman once thanked God "for one Bishop Quayle, and no more"—but as a preacher there is not another like him in Methodism, or anywhere else. In a church so rich in great preachers—the church of Simpson and Fowler, of Price Hughes and W. L. Watkinson—no one may be supreme; but Bishop Quayle is one of the princes of that realm, a peer in a shining company of those whose hearts God has touched with light and power and loveliness. No wonder he confirms some of us in the conviction, long held as an article of faith, that when God made the Methodist church he did not do anything else that whole day; and behold it was good!

HUMOR WITHOUT ACID

Many times I have heard Bishop Quayle preach, before he was elevated to the episcopate and after, but one day stands out in my memory as showing the many-sidedness of the man. It was at a conference over which he presided in Iowa, and I can still see him as he stood transfigured by the autumn sunlight falling through a lovely window—tall, stockily built, stooped, his massive head crowned with reddish hair tinged with grey, his great blue eyes the homes of laughter and of tears, his face as mutable as the sea. As I entered the church, I heard first ripples and then roars of laughter, for no great preacher of our time makes so liberal a use of wit and humor in his work; bright wit in which there is no sting, sweet humor without any acid. The bishop was receiving a group of young men into the ministry, to an accompaniment of a running commentary on the requirements and duties of a minister as laid down in the Discipline. Nothing was omitted, not even "the expectorations subject of tobacco," and neither before nor since have I heard so much common sense taught in the guise of nonsense. Among other things he advised each minister to have a patch of ground—large or small—all his own, where he could take refuge from obstinate bishops and obstreperous elders, and assert his rights. We laughed until we cried as he described the foibles of the minister, and the difficulties and trivialities of his work; then we cried in earnest as he spoke of the meaning of the ministry, its dignity, its pathos, and its sacred service amid the lights and shadows of life.

A SHUDDERING BOYHOOD EXPERIENCE

After the singing of a hymn, the bishop read the account of the raising of Dorcas and preached a sermon, which might have had for its title the Wordsworth phrase, "The Deep Power of Joy"—always a keynote in his preaching, and one too seldom heard in our anxious modern days. It was a charge to the church in behalf of the young men whom he had welcomed into the ministry; a study of the atmosphere which the gospel of Christ should create—a happy, healing, redeeming atmosphere in which evil will be overcome as seeds of good grow into golden harvest. Since Christianity is a gospel of joy—no vague, mystical ecstasy, but a real, human-hearted joy—its messengers should be bringers of joy, changing the human climate from winter to summer. The sermon was an illustration of its subject. Serious but in nowise solemn, it created the very atmosphere it described—"almost a picnic spirit," as one listener called it—reminding me of the saying of Hermas, that the Holy Spirit is a hilarious spirit. For an hour the preacher made us glad about God—glad about life and the world—showing us that there is healing for all the hates and hurts of life, if we use the gospel with strategy and skill. As a feat of homiletics it was a work of art, albeit, like a vine-covered church, its solid structure was hidden by every kind of beauty both of imagery and of phrase. It was not rhetoric but poetry; and the manner of its delivery had all the freedom, directness and charm of a stump speech.

As if all that were not enough for one day, in the evening the bishop gave a lecture on "The Tale of Two Cities," the like of which I have never heard from anyone else. It would have delighted Dickens, both for its vivid portraiture and its dramatic power, being a series of sketches of the characters in the story seen against the stupendous background of the Revolution. In speaking of Sidney Carton and his fight with the demon of drink, he let fall a page from his own life, telling how when only a lad of ten he lay drunk on the floor of a saloon. His mother was dead, his father was a miner at his work, and the rough men thought it a great joke to make the boy drunk. It made the heart shudder, and in his dealing with Carton one felt that he was aware of his own escape from a tragic fate. There was no need to point the moral, save in one swift sentence which flashed like a silver arrow as it hit the mark. Surely no one ever forgot that day of wonder, so fruitful in inspiration for the heart and in "pollen for the mind," to use one of its happy phrases. It was like an apocalypse in which the preacher stood revealed, equally in his homely counsel to his young brethren and in his high command of great assemblies; his tender humanity, his witchery of personality, his knowledge of life from bottom to top, his magic of speech, his love of the out of doors—a mind as full of color as a painter's shop, a heart lyrically confident of God and joyously loyal to the Master.

A PREACHER IN THE MAKING

A child of the Isle of Man, brought up in the large and liberal air of the middle west of America, the life of Bishop Quayle, as one day it will be told, shows us the growth of a great preacher and the process of his making. How interesting it is to compare the earliest volume of his sermons, "Eternity in the Heart," a fruit of his Kansas City ministry—happily left as they came from the heart and lips of the preacher on his feet—with his latest volume, entitled "The Dynamite of God," and note the deeper insight and the greater wealth of beauty and suggestiveness. In the first volume there is hardly a literary allusion; in the second there are almost too many. If only we had a volume between them, a trophy of his pastorate at St. James Church, Chicago, we might the better study the stages of the rapid unfolding of his vision and power; how he took all life and all literature as his province, levying tribute in the name of his Master. Yet it would be hard to name anything more brilliant than his fraternal address to the British Wesleyan Conference in 1902, though what I best remember about it is his unforgettable tribute to his father. Every man has his own idiom, which is the accent of his heart, the native gesture of his mind; but of late years Bishop Quayle has fallen into certain mannerisms of style which mar his work, giving at times almost an impression of artificiality—a thing utterly alien to his nature. In these despites, not since Joseph Parker went away have we had a preacher so epigrammatic, so quotable, so happy in his power to startle and sting the mind with the sudden surprise of beauty and of truth. His fertility of thought is matched by an exceeding aptness of imagery, as of one who thinks in pictures and talks in lyrics. His illustrations are both illuminative and instructive, as in a passage in his sermon on "Life's Criminal Agnosticism"—a title too harsh for the setting of the text—which tells what many have felt:

Do you read John Burroughs? You ought to. He likes dirt. He says dirt is good enough to eat in the spring. All told, as nature writers go, I think John Burroughs the best of all the sweet chorus. I have all his books except the one on Whitman. I have asked to be excused on that for a time. But do you read Burroughs' books? What is the lack of them? I will tell you. He has missed the Gardener. Burroughs is apparently an agnostic. I have gone through all his books, seen him walk on his dirt, gone down among the water lilies with him, stopped on the Hudson banks with him, heard the water brooks bubbling strangely intelligible speech with him, have been all wheres with him, but never saw a hint about the Gardener. If he only once had looked into the Gardener's face and said, "I bless thee, Gardener, that the garden is so sweet," Burroughs would have had no fellow in the earth as an interpreter of the out-of-doors. But in the garden he has missed the Gardener. We must not miss the Gardener. Is He at home? I call you to mark that you are out in God's flower garden, all a-bloom and all a-perfume, and all a-rapture of green. Do not miss the Gardener.

AN OUT OF DOORS PREACHER

In all the preaching of Bishop Quayle, at least in his later period—over it, through it—there is the breath and beauty of the out-of-doors; singing birds, growing flowers, drifting seas, and rustling woods, and the wandering brotherhood of the winds. No preacher of our out-door age—not one—approaches him in his love of nature and his vision of its meaning to the spiritual life of man. He is a radiant prophet of the everywhere-ness of God, a "priest to us all of the wonder and bloom of the world." As a naturalist, and still more as a poet, he walks the earth with reverent, happy feet, revealing to men the beauty at their doors, no less than on far away hills, chanting the eternal loveliness of earth and sky. He reads "God's Calendar" so lovingly that if he were to fall asleep and wake up, like Rip Van Winkle, he would know the time of year by the flowers in bloom and the notes of bird-song in the woodland. He knows the sea and its moods, the far-stretching mystery of the prairies; the mountains, the desert, the haunts of the birds and the dells where the violets hide. All seasons are his, summer with its splendor, and the winter days when the north wind tumbles out of his bed and goes romping over the hills, sending the clouds scudding, and building the snow into every form of frolic architecture. To him trees are a means of grace, the fragrance of a rose is like a kiss of God, and the sunlight falling on flowing waters is like the memory of one who has been dead. Like his Master, who taught us to love the Father and the world, he, too, reflects the glory of God in his song.

abounding humanity, no less than by his knowledge and experience of "preacher-craft." No one can talk to preachers as he can, unless it be Dr. Jefferson, and Quayle is more of a poet, more of a mystic. It would be hard to name anyone else who could have written the chapter on "The Preacher a Mystic," in which we see that window in his heart open toward the City of God, through which falls a "light that never was on sea or land." Seldom has genius been more communicative. The very informality of the book is half its charm, dealing, as it does, both with the trivialities and the sublimities of our holy art. Never was there a more responsive listener or a more gentle-hearted critic. From Spurgeon he derived little, Brooks he knows only by report, but his tribute to Beecher is memorable:

Since the apostolic days preaching, as preaching, has never soared so high as in Henry Ward Beecher. There were in him an exhaustiveness and an exuberance, an insight deep as the soul, a power to turn a light like sunlight for strength on the sore weaknesses of humanity, a bewilderment of approach to the heart to tempt it from itself to God that I find nowhere else; and it has been my privilege to be a wide reader of the sermonic literature of the world. Compared to him, Berry, the English preacher, whom Beecher thought most apt to be his successor in the Plymouth pulpit, was an instrument of a couple of strings matched with Beecher's harp of gold. Phillips Brooks cannot in any just sense be put alongside him; and Simpson in his genius was essentially extemporaneous and insular. Beecher was perpetual, like the eternal springs. In Robertson of Brighton are some symptoms of Beecher, but they are cameo not building stone resemblances. Beecher was the past master of our preaching art. Storrs and Beecher were contemporaries in the same city. Storrs was a field of cloth of gold. Gorgeous he was, and a man of might. But you cannot get from the thought of effort in him and in his effects. In Beecher is no sense of effort, any more than in a sea bird keeping pace with a rushing ship. In him are effortless music and might of a vast power of reserve. This estimate of Beecher may be right or wrong. I give it as my estimate of him. He has no successor, as Samson had no son.

A DIARY OF THE SOUL

Some of us love Bishop Quayle best in his little books of prayer, and we find "The Climb to God" less to our need than "The Throne of Grace." They are years apart, and life has taught him much betimes. The last named rosary is deeper and more revealing.

of diary of the soul written for sons of what for a boy in of seat; ster. duty under we mpe-news and on is n, he thinks of God, of Christ, and of the life of man. In him the poet is supreme:

A man of sorrows He, and guest of grief,
Who walked in quiet on life's humble ways
And suffered all the slurs and dull dismays
Which crush on mighty souls. His days were brief—
A sudden splendor cleft with storm. Belief
On Him grew dim, though great hearts walked through haze
Of doubt and fogs of death with shouts of praise,
And knew Him glorious and acclaimed Him Chief.
And now He stands strange, unaccompanied, vast,
Tall as all solemn, purpling mountains are—
Stands, while majestic, crumbling centuries waste.
The moaning travail of His soul is past.
He hath throned Love and wrought redemption far;
And who believeth on Him shall not haste.

The Lion In His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

"SPEAKING of Dante—" began the Lion.
I leaned back in my chair and waited in quiet expectancy. My friend was very much at home in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. And I knew that the six hundredth anniversary of the death of the great Florentine poet had found him renewing many an intimate contact with the period and writings of Dante.

"A man of our time ought really to begin with De Monarchia," said the Lion.

"What about all the curious top-heavy arguments and all the involved unrealities of dialectic?" I asked.

"I'm not thinking of them," replied the Lion. "I am thinking of the commanding ideas of this Latin work of Dante's. I am thinking of his passionate conviction that the world must be one world. I am thinking of his clear vision of the ugly futility of endless wars fought about meaningless issues. I am thinking of his hope for a world held in stable peace, by a unity which embraced all mankind."

"But was not his unified world an autocracy?" I asked.

"I'm not claiming that he had a formula for the bringing in of the new day," retorted my friend. "It was the Holy Roman Empire first and last with Dante. But I am claiming that in the terms of the political world view possible to a man of his time he saw and expressed things of permanent significance and value. We will not use his methods. But we do need his passionate insight into the meaning of a stable peace. And we do need his unhesitating devotion to the struggle for the unity of the world."

"You prize him more as a political philosopher than as a poet," I remarked, making my sentence half a statement, half a question.

"You can't make that sharp contrast," replied the Lion. "The man who wrote De Monarchia also wrote the Divina Comedia. One had to do with a unified world. The other had to do with a unified universe. One saw peace triumphant on this planet. The other saw peace triumphant among all the stars. There is exhaustless music in Dante. But it is the sweetest of thought turned into a song. The thinker and the singer are joined in holy wedlock in the writings of the great Florentine."

"Do you think it is possible to get a sharp sense of reality from writing which is so completely saturated with the superstition of the Middle Ages as the Divine Comedy?" I asked.

My friend mused a moment.

"After all," he said, "the things of which you are thinking only belong to the wrappings of the poem. The essential matters are eternal in their significance and in their appeal. Perhaps I can put it in this way. A modern man will understand Dante's poem best if he forgets about the literal hell and purgatory and paradise and thinks of three characteristics of the life of the soul as it is found in this world. For that is the endless appeal of the poem. Everything Dante found in hell you can find in London and New York. The same inevitable punishments are working themselves out in human lives in all our towns. And everything which Dante found in purgatory you can find in your own city. Whenever a man takes pain as discipline he enters into that realm of creative suffering which is the real meaning of purgatory. For be sure of it, my friend, purgatory is all about you. It is the secret of those who take every terrible experience as a method by which they are being prepared for some great and noble thing which is to follow. There was awful suffering in Dante's Purgatory. But there was no unhappiness. You cannot be unhappy when your heart is alive with hope."

I looked at the bed upon which my friend was lying and thought of all his helpless years. I knew that he was talking of the Italian poet. I knew also that his own experience and his own victory were unconsciously becoming articulate in his speech. But he was going on.

"And strange as it seems to say it, what Dante found in heaven may be found right in this life. Gleams of it come to all of us in our best moments. And it is the light which shines from the rarest and brightest spirits in the world. For even here the rose of love and fire has bloomed."

As I walked away I was repeating the last words my friend spoke that day: "As long as men have hell in their hearts, as long as they wrest character from bitter pain, and as long as a deathless ideal haunts their noblest hours, they will go back to Dante. It was after all his chief glory that he saw eternity in the human spirit."

British Table Talk

Buckhurst Hill, Essex, England, September 27, 1921

THE Federal Council of the Free Churches is now in session in London. Its meetings are deliberative and not open to the public. However, it is announced that its new president in place of Dr. Shakespeare is to be Dr. J. D. Jones, and it has appointed representatives to talk with the representatives of the church of England upon the Lambeth report. It is hoped that some obscurities may be removed by such conversations. But in view of the resolutions passed by the Free churches in their separate assemblies, there is no immediate prospect of reunion. But there is fellowship and that is great gain. Dr. J. D. Jones has held every position of honor which his brethren can bestow. He has an unrivaled influence among the Congregationalist churches and to their service he has given an unusual combination of gifts. He is an attractive and powerful preacher and at the same time a statesman with the gift of making things move. Not the least is he beloved because of his chivalrous devotion to the smaller churches and his championship of their ministers. As an ecclesiastical statesman he has not advanced, if it is an advance, so far along the road to reunion as Dr. Shakespeare.

A Beacon Light At the Center

Passing by St. Martin's-in-the-Fields yesterday, I noticed that in November the church is to celebrate in joyful worship and in pageant and song its 200th anniversary. This is the church which looks upon the Nelson monument and the National Gallery—in the very heart of London. It might easily have become a derelict sanctuary, but at the present moment it is a great church throbbing with faith and with humanity. It runs a journal of its own which is sold in large numbers. It is a harbor of refuge for a host of wayfaring men, and if any visitors to the city wish to see a church which will revive hope within them they should go to St. Martin's. This is written by a free churchman and there are multitudes like him who would shout "Amen!" In a beautiful little volume of poems by Mr. Thomas Sharp there is a sonnet on St. Martin's. I should like to copy out the last six lines:

"St. Martin's in the Fields! That beacon light
Over the surging of a human sea
Shines now where pitiful homes of healing be,
And where sin's charnel-houses shrink from sight.
Gone are the fields: God-man of Galilee,
O for Thy vision of fields to harvest white!"

The Church In the Autumn

With the beginning of October our clocks will change; we shall recover the hour we lost in the Spring and the evenings will be dark when the city man returns home. It is the fashion of some preachers to reproach such men because they are not always prepared to leave their firesides. It would be fairer to recognize how much is expected from such men after a tiring day and how much is given by them. Busy workers in churches lay upon its altars no nobler gift than the evening hours spent in committees or clubs. They have indeed a recompense, but that should not be allowed to hide the sacrifice which is freely made. Whether churches should concentrate more is an open question. To start new enterprises which must be carried through by the same faithful band may not be either just or wise. There are churches in which the same workers reappear in every society like an untiring stage army. It is magnificent, but is it war?

The Weekly Tonic

Every week the Dean of St. Paul's writes in The Evening Standard and probably no preacher's words are so eagerly looked for and discussed. Sometimes readers who bless him one week curse him the next. The dean is an excellent tonic. There was a society devised by a popular novelist in one of his books; it bore the name, "The Society for the Suppression of Tommy-Rot." If there was such a society, the dean would be a first rate president. The week before last, under the caption, "Another Worldly Religion," he wrote words which deserve to be recorded:

"Traditional Christianity must be simplified and spiritualized.

It is at present encumbered by bad science and caricatured by bad economics, both of them the result of latent materialism. Real Christianity is 'another-worldly religion,' inasmuch as it 'looks not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen.' But the things that are not seen are the strongest things in the world. We have tried in vain to transform society by trying experiments with the machinery of a secularist civilization. We might as well try to lift ourselves by our bootlaces, as an American said."

A Promising Program

Many cities are getting forward with their plans for a campaign of intensive work. One such program is before me; it is bold and comprehensive, and if the needful spade work is done, it should be a great time for the churches.

Tea and conference in each of the twenty-one groups of churches, when the secretaries will lay before the officers of the churches and special delegates (approximately 4,000) the full details of program, September to December, 1921.

Conference of all the Sunday school officers early in 1922.

Conference of organists and choir masters, early in 1922.

Two mass meetings of all the Sunday school teachers (approximately 5,000).

First week in October, 1922, visitation of the whole city and district with specially prepared message and program of services. (Approximately 250,000 homes to be visited.)

January to August. Weekly prayer meeting in the city.

Sept. 1 to Oct. 14. Daily prayer meeting in the city (Saturdays excepted).

October 14. United Communion service prior to the commencement of the services.

Other Things

The second woman-member to take her seat in the House of Commons, Mrs. Wintringham, belongs to a well-known and greatly honored Free church family. It is believed by those who know her best that she will add greatly to the wisdom of the house and everyone admires the noble spirit in which she has taken up her husband's task.—There are many rumors abroad about the new daily paper which, it is said, will be issued soon in London. It will represent, according to rumor, the position of the Independent Liberals, much in the same way as the Westminster Gazette represents that cause in the evening. Perhaps by the time this arrives in America the mystery may be lifted.—The theme of "Revival" is still very much in the minds of the church. On Saturday The Times published an article from a correspondent dealing with the wisdom of history upon this matter. The main point of the article was that the church should be ready for the unexpected. "Of any such day of quickening knoweth no man. Around the future as around all past, there is wonder. That which was never expected came to pass; the weak were chosen to confound the strong; things that were not were called into being; unknown allies were summoned to the service; the humble were exalted and the mighty cast down. So it has often been; so, we conjecture, it will be again."

The Present Status of the Liquor Business*

"ETERNAL vigilance" is the price we must pay for prohibition. Is it human nature or is it the American temperament which jumps from one interest to another? For a while it was all war—now we are "fed-up" on the war and we want to hear nothing about it. We got into the temperance fight while state after state lined up for total prohibition, we stayed with it until the thing was written duly into the constitution. That settled it. I recall one pompous orator getting up and telling us how the whole thing was over now, it could never be undone for it was inconceivable that two-thirds of the states would ever vote to return John Barleycorn and that we might rest on our achievements. That was mostly swagger. What good is a law unless you get it enforced? To be brutally frank, we have to admit that we legislated a bit ahead of the popular voice. We are lacking just a little bit right now in popular enthusiasm for enforcement. It might have been better to have gone a little slower. However, nothing could hold it back; it had to come. Business men demanded it; women demanded it; the majorities demanded it; commonwealth after commonwealth swept into line; so it came. It is nonsense to say that a minority voted in that amendment. Not a few cranks, not a few W. C. T. U.'s, but millions of votes brought the thing to a climax. It was fair and square. The liquor crowd was beaten, but there were a good many thousands of unconvinced and bitter people left in this U. S. A. There are a good many yet. Therefore we face a situation today where the law is on the books and the whiskey is in the country! We are weak on enforcement. We have decided to take it easy now that the battle has been won. This is fatal. Slowly and surely booze will creep back unless there is a great awakening demanding enforcement rigidly.

You will hear "wet" sympathizers saying: "I see more drunks than ever before;" or "the present situation is the worst we ever had." These statements simply are not true. Things are infinitely better. Thousands of saloons have closed for good. Thousands of saloon-keepers and bar-tenders are happily engaged in legitimate jobs enjoying, what they never had before, the respect and good-will of those about them. Old soaks are drinking wood-alcohol, which is a fine business . . . its the best way to get rid of them!! A few people, very few, are making "Hooch" at home. It is such a rotten mess that usually one attempt is enough, although the price of raisins still stays up!! Moonshiners and boot-leggers are doing a right good business, I am told, and some men seem to be getting rich very quickly, we hear. But millions of boys and young men are not tempted by a legalized saloon. The stuff is outlawed! This is a big gain. If now we will only "follow through" and demand enforcement we shall have cleaned up the country. No one expects that the hour will come soon when there will be no whiskey at all. We have a law against murder—but murders occur every day. We have a law against adultery—but homes are ruined constantly. We have a law against slander—but people go right on lying about their neighbors. Here again the big factor is enforcement. Men laugh at the laws. They say they can "get away with it." Many people seem to pride themselves on the evasion of the law. The crying need is for an enlightened public opinion that will demand enforcement. Murderers must hang, thieves must go to the penitentiary, those who wantonly destroy fair reputations must suffer for it, those who wreck homes must pay the penalties. The disregard of law is perhaps the most dangerous thing in American life today. Rules and regulations, made for life and happiness, are recklessly disregarded—(look at your traffic regulations.)

Recently I heard a lecture contrasting Jonathan Edwards and

*Oct. 30. "Strong Drink in a Nation's Life." Isa. 28:1-13.

Benjamin Franklin. Jonathan Edwards was a puritan. He stood for law. He believed in self-restraint. Enjoyment was not in his vocabulary. Stern, repressive, cold and forbidding was this marvelous preacher—an intellectual prodigy. On the other hand was Franklin—a humanist. He stood for freedom. He believed in culture and following your natural bent. Not self-restraint but self-development was his watchword. Happiness was right. Winsome, expressive, warm and attractive was the printer of Poor Richard's Almanac. His intellect ranged far. He brought the lightning home. He adorned the seat of power at Paris. These men were opposites. Law has its place. You can't run the government without law. On the other hand, you can't make people good by law, alone. Roosevelt was right: "Laws are to be enforced." Let the Edwards spirit write the laws, but let the Franklin spirit lead us to love the right.

CORRESPONDENCE

Five Famous Preachers

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Greater New York has always been blessed with great preachers, and is today. A brief vacation recently spent in and near New York City enabled me to hear five of the most distinguished ministers of the Empire metropolis. Were they the greatest? Let him say who can, but let me say that there are few if any greater within or without New York City. Who were they? Joseph Fort Newton, Charles E. Jefferson, S. Parkes Cadman, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, and Newell Dwight Hillis; naming them in the order in which I heard them. Each had an individuality all his own, and all had inspiring messages of hope and optimism. One is a Universalist, three are Congregationalists, and one is a liberal Jew. But all preached the religion of the Kingdom. I had previously met all five at some time, was personally acquainted with two, but had heard none of the five in his own pulpit.

Joseph Fort Newton is the youngest of the five, and he is a great preacher. Each year sees a cubit added to the stature of his intellectual endowment. He is growing. City Temple, London, took him from a little church of the middle west, after he twice declined the call, and put him in its famous pulpit, where he most acceptably filled the place made notable by some of the world's best. Back in this country again, Dr. Newton now serves the Church of the Divine Paternity, opposite Central Park. The sermon I heard was on, "All Souls and All Saints." The pastoral prayer was as impressive as the sermon and both were delivered quietly, in a conversational tone for the most part, and in the simplest and richest diction. At times in his sermon he reached some striking climaxes, following which were his impressive pauses, for which he is noted. At such times his dark, piercing eyes seem to search his hearer's soul. He works with ease, and brings to his aid the thought of the best minds of history and literature. One by one came the great saints, though just a word told us their contribution. His soft, musical voice, impressive cadences, dramatic touches, and fine literary style conveying a deep, soul-gripping message held the closest attention during the thirty minutes' discourse. One feels as he leaves such a temple, after hearing that message of idealism, that the mystics lead the world.

That evening I heard Dr. Jefferson in Broadway Tabernacle. "Organization" is the word writ large everywhere in Broadway Tabernacle. The ministers are ushered into the pulpit, as the congregation are ushered to the pews. The assistant carried the service through as far as the sermon. Dr. Jefferson began by announcing a brief reception at the close of the service, when a committee would greet all who would remain for a moment. Then there was to be a devotional service for those who desired it in the chapel, while in another part of the building was to be a service of song for those who preferred that service. The preacher then answered a question that had been placed in the question box, and suggested that other questions be handed in. Then he began his sermon, which was one in the series on "Building a Happier World." He spoke simply. He was as conversational as if he were talking to friends in his study. His illustrations were very practical. He spoke almost entirely in monosyllables. His sentences were short. But his sermonizing went on step by step. It was hardly more than twenty minutes long, and promptly at the end of the hour the service, exactly sixty minutes in length, closed.

Rabbi Wise I was glad to hear in Carnegie Hall, where his congregation, of the Free Synagogue, worship. It is one of the largest congregations of the city, and its leader is one of the most eloquent of speakers and one of the staunchest of Americans. His devotional service was very uplifting. His remarkable voice—deep, powerful, and resonant—was an invaluable asset, and is a matter of comment by all who have heard him. His announcements were many, showing the many activities of the synagogue. Among the notices was that of a union public meeting to be held that week when a prominent Protestant minister would speak on "The Christian and the Jew in America." And the Rabbi announced that he would follow with an address on "The Jew and the Christian in America." The sermon, or address, that followed was on the subject, "What the Jew Believes About the Bible." It was a most scholarly interpretation, free from bigotry or intolerance, and marked by greatest catholicity, with emphasis on those portions which most appeal to those of the Hebrew faith. His closing sentences contained an appeal for his hearers to find out what God's will for them was, whatever chapters of the Bible they might accept or reject. The one hour message was an intellectual and spiritual treat.

Dr. Cadman in his own pulpit preached a twenty-five minute sermon in a series on "Immortality." It was a beautiful morning. The immense choir was an inspiration. The preacher was at his best. The boldness and certitude of his utterances; the extensiveness of his vocabulary; his strong, logical climaxes, and his cyclonic appeals—all of this arrested the attention of his hearers, and held them closely as the preacher unfolded his truths. It was easy to see how Dr. Cadman's influence in Brooklyn has grown in his twenty years there, and why it is that he is in such demand as a preacher and lecturer in this country and England.

Dr. Hillis I heard in the First Methodist Church in Brooklyn; for it was just after the fire which partly destroyed the interior of his church. He preached on reasons for national gratitude. He has a very unusual mind, in the way in which it visualizes. For nearly an hour he spoke, at times very rapidly, at times very deliberately. The manner in which he marshaled figures and statistics, in his own way, was fascinating. His word pictures were models of rhetorical beauty. His appeal for international goodwill was fervent. His exposition of democracy was original and unique.

These five preachers are famous. They command the attention of the thinking world. In a very large way are they ministering to the higher life of greater New York. They are true forces for righteousness.

A Discussion Where Minds Do Not Meet

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: First of all permit me to say that your paper is ably edited. It promotes thought. It seems to be fair and not afraid to "launch out into the deep." I admire a game man, right or wrong. Some things that appear in The Christian Century I am yet unable to endorse. I presume that will not entirely kill it.

Two articles in your last issue impress me. One is from Judge Sandusky of Liberty, Mo. The other is from the pen of Edward Scribner Ames. Each seems to favor "Open Membership," a question greatly disturbing the brotherhood just now. They declare that immersion, as a barrier, must be gotten out of the way. To this end the judge quotes Mr. Lhamon's recent article and infallibly pronounces it sound. Several of our small papers hastened to copy Mr. Lhamon's article. I wondered why they were not fair enough to print the reply by J. H. Garrison that completely demolished the Lhamon position. The judge speaks of baptism as a mere "shadow" of some great "substance" that may be reached through different "modes." If baptism is a shadow, what is it a shadow of? I lift my hand and I see a shadow on the wall. There is a wonderful resemblance between the substance and the shadow. Of what is baptism a shadow? Paul tells us that it is the shadow of the burial of Jesus. Immersion is the only "shadow" that corresponds with this "substance."

John says that "water" is one of the "three witnesses on earth" ordained and sent of God, to prove the fact that Jesus is the son of God. Water has no place in the scheme of redemption except in baptism. As a witness it testifies to the burial and resurrection of Christ. But for these two facts this witness would have been an impossibility. I stand amazed to see a great jurist take this witness by the ear and lead him out of court and silence him forever. Yes, we need a "profounder study of the Bible" but in that study let us not forget the bottomless depths of Christian baptism. Strange "modern scholarship" don't give some thought to this wonderful theme.

The baptism of John, whence was it? From heaven or of men? The good judge seems to think it a mere "rite" that John found in a mudhole. Jesus thought it was from heaven. Was it? Better let it alone lest we "reject the counsel of God against ourselves." Where did Christian baptism come from? Is it not one of the things the Master commanded "in the day in which He was taken up?"

G. W. TERRELL.

Hope, Ark.

[Our correspondent has entirely missed Judge Sandusky's point. The judge does not "speak of baptism as a mere 'shadow' of some great 'substance'." On the contrary he expressly defines it as "the substantive fact of separation from the world and entrance into a new society." He refers to immersion, a physical act, as the "shadow" of this substantive spiritual fact. All that our correspondent says about baptism Judge Sandusky would no doubt say. Intelligible discussion of the baptism problem seems to be impossible so long as one party to the discussion falls into the unscholarly assumption that immersion and baptism are synonymous terms.—THE EDITOR.]

BOOKS

THE MANHOOD OF HUMANITY, by Alfred Korzybski. Count Korzybski, a mathematician and formerly an officer in the Polish army, has developed in this volume a concept, which apparently originated with himself, of man as a "time-binder." By this the author means that man differs from every other animal species in his capacity for utilizing the past and the future in his present life. It is a well recognized element, in the criteria by which animal life is distinguished from plant life, that the dividing line between the two is close to the point where the power of motion begins. In general, the vegetable world lives an attached life and the animal world a life of free motion. The development of what we know as "consciousness" in the animal world has a close relation to the growth of motive power. Count Korzybski would say this differently: to him the animal differs from the plant in its ability to bind space, that is, to avail himself at any time of the advantage of being elsewhere than he now is. The existence of the plant, in other words, is punctiliar whereas the animal lives in two dimensions being able to move in space as defined by length and breadth. Or, as the author rather curiously expresses it, plants are "chemistry-binding," while animals are "space-binding."

Man as a physical animal has this space-binding power, limited in the main, as is the case with all animals, to two dimensions. Man, however, has the power of binding time as well as space. In other words, he may not only avail himself of the advantage which his neighbor has by way of position, by displacing him, but he may avail himself also of the advantages in knowledge and achievement of all who have gone before. Man has memory and the sense of passing time. With this goes the power to store tradition, to utilize every discovery and invention of the past and by this means to anticipate the happenings of the future. Herein man is distinct from all other beings.

But in general man has been content to exploit the space binding functions which he shares with animals rather than to rise to the possibilities of his time-binding functions which distinguishes him from them. Instead of using the combined wisdom of the past to meet his wants and multiply his creative powers, he competes in animal fashion with his neighbors. This is the cause of most of the ills of humanity. It occasions wars where the happiness and well-being of the aggressor would better be served by the application of science to the development of his own resources. We exploit the resources of others instead of developing our own. The wars and revolutions and serious industrial controversies which punctuate progress are the result of a disparity between the development of what are known as the natural and technological sciences on the one hand and of the social sciences on the other.

Furthermore, Count Korzybski maintains that the norm of human progress is expressed by a geometrical progression. That is to say, if the present generation progresses twice as far as the preceding generation, normally the rate of progress in the coming generation will be twice as great as in the present. The mathematicians way of saying this is that the curve of progress is a logarithmic curve. We never attain this rate of development for any considerable length of time because we are still in the "childhood of humanity," as distinguished from the "manhood of humanity." The attainment of this manhood, which defines man's proper destiny, is to be brought about by "human engineering."

The concept of the author as thus outlined is perfectly intelligent even to a layman. It is more difficult to follow him in the definition of a "class of life" to which mankind belongs, the time-binding class, which carries with it the possibilities of continuously accelerated progress in a definite ratio. This norm of human development the reader inevitably feels to be hypothetical and not demonstrable. Nevertheless, Count Korzybski's thesis is one of great interest and of manifest importance. His book has attracted the favorable attention of a number of American engineers, including such men as Polakov, Wolf and Steinmetz and has won the hearty commendation of the eminent mathematician, Professor Keyser of Columbia University. It is a stimulating contribution by a mathematician to our understanding of the spiritual possibilities of mankind, carrying a message very vital to this period of feverish preparation for another war. (Dutton, $3.)

LONDON OF THE FUTURE, edited by Sir Aston Webb. This large and beautifully executed volume is entirely the result of the labors of the various members of the London Society. Each chapter deals with a special problem regarding the beautifying and improving of Europe's greatest metropolis, and is written by some member who is a specialist in the lines dealt with. Of particular interest are those chapters which deal with housing, city government, parks and open places, the smoke plague, other problems that have very direct connection with the daily lives of the majority of London's citizens. The views expressed are, in the main, very progressive, and the solutions offered have the appearance of being thoroughly rational. The volume is one that will afford much valuable material for the sociologist as well as the city-planner. (Dutton, $15.00).

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Echoes of Union Seminary Trouble

The old-time controversy over Union Seminary of New York still has its echoes. The Brooklyn Nassau recently met to ordain a young student from the seminary. Dr. Joseph G. Snyder, for ten years stated clerk of the Brooklyn-Nassau presbytery, strongly objected to the ordination, and when he was overruled by the vote of the presbytery, he resigned. This dividing line in the east has in many instances interfered with the efficiency of the Presbyterian church. It is noteworthy, however, that in almost every test vote in recent years the church has aligned itself with progress.

Dr. Guy Lectures on Japan

Dr. Harvey Hugo Guy, for many years a teacher in the Pacific School of Religion at Berkeley, has accepted an appointment for a special series of lectures at the College of Missions in Indianapolis, beginning Oct. 9. His themes for the series are suggestive. They are: The Challenge of the New Far East, Japan in Revolution and Evolution, International Conflicts and Adjustments, Japan at Work, Japan at Worship, Tendencies in Modern Japanese Thought, and The Christian Approach to Modern Japanese Thought. Dr. Guy served many years in Japan under the Disciples board, and is recognized as one of the very foremost authorities in America on things Japanese.

Continuous Growth in the Y. M. C. A.

Along with the religious denominations of America, the Young Men's Christian Association is experiencing a period of growth. Membership in 2,120 associations in this country and Canada totaled 935,581 on April 30, against 868,892 in 1920 and 720,468 in 1919. In the whole world the figures show about 9,000 associations and a membership of a million and a half. There was a determined effort during the war to turn the heart of American young manhood away from the Y. M. C. A., but these figures will indicate how futile that effort has been. The service of the association in every community gives it an abiding place in the affections of the community.

Changes in New York Menace the Churches

The metropolitan city is ever in the making, and often a big public improvement may result in the death of a group of churches. Ecclesiastical New York is at this time deeply agitated over impending changes there. It is said that a new harbor at Jamaica Bay may change all Brooklyn into a business district. Brooklyn has in the past been the stronghold of religion about the nation's metropolis. Several new bridges across the Hudson river may be built in the near future and that would also make important population changes affecting the churches. A tunnel to New Jersey would make it likely that more people would live in that state and do business in New York. The ecclesiastical property affected by these suggestions is valued at a half billion dollars. While changes of this sort create problems, they sometimes solve problems as well. In a new community religious institutions have an opportunity to take on a second lease of life.

Saint's Blood Liquifies

In a country like the United States the difference between Protestantism and Catholicism is not so apparent as it would be if one lived in a genuinely catholic country. Recently the annual miracle of St. Januarius has been re-enacted at the Cathedral of Naples, the blood of the saint becoming liquid once more. This is the miracle which was used on John Henry Newman to test his faith, and which he nevertheless asserted he believed. It is not so much with essential Catholicism that Protestantism differs as with its actual practice in Latin countries.

Labor Body Protests Ridicule of Clergy

The ridicule of the clergy by moving picture barons, cartoonists, vaudeville actors and others has come to be regarded universally as a public scandal. The Jasper Council of the Junior Order United American Mechanics of Charleston, S. C., recently passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, The practice of cartoonists, makers of stage plays, and producers of moving pictures in casting ridicule on the clergy, wherein the average clergymen is represented to be a silly ass, a species of clown, who draws down upon his hypocritical head the scorn and contempt of the multitude, has reached such a stage that it is obnoxious to all good citizens. This holding up to public ridicule of an estimable body of hard-working, self-sacrificing, and poorly paid men is most offensive to all decent people, whether they be church members or not. A man who enters the ministry does so at a great personal sacrifice. In an age given over largely to "chasing the elusive dollar," when Mammon sits enthroned in high places, it is natural that sacred things should be reviled by irresponsible materialists and agnostics, and that the arrows of ridicule and sarcasm should be aimed at the ministers of religion. But the time has come to call a halt."

Presbyterian Moderator Watches Coming Armament Congress

Dr. Henry Chapman Swearingen is moderator of the Presbyterian church in the United States of America this year, and has been spending a good deal of time recently visiting the various synods of the church. He appeared at the Minnesota synod, held this year at Luverne, on Oct. 10. His address had continual reference to international affairs and in connection with the coming armament conference he said: "The Church has a new call to define the relation of Christianity to international affairs. The ruling principles of diplomacy have been pagan, and into this field the Church has never entered with

DUTY TO CIVILIZATION

A Pamphlet answering many questions as to the causes of the Great War, written by FRANCIS NEILSON, author of "How Diplomats Make War," etc., Editor of THE FREEMAN and Associate Editor of UNITY.

This pamphlet will appeal to all those who believe the true history of the war and its causes is yet to be written, and that it is essential to the best development of our civilization.

the message of Christ. The fruit of the application of wrong principles is now seen in the distress of civilization. The coming conference on reduction of armament renders this issue acute, and convicts the church of guilty remissness if it does not take advantage of the occasion when all men are thinking about this matter, to define and apply the law of Christ with respect to national ideals, the moral accountability of governments, and the way in which differing peoples regard each other, as well as the methods they employ to promote their own interests."

Interdenominational Cooperation the Theme

So keenly is the divided church aware of its need for unity that unity organizations multiply. A projected Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work headed by Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden is getting well underway. It differs radically from the projected World Conference on Faith and Order in that it treats the problems of the church as practical rather than theoretical. The American section of the committee will meet in New York on Nov. 2. This committee has forty-nine members representing seventeen denominations.

Junior Church in Cleveland

Franklin Circle Church of Disciples in Cleveland, O., has established the junior church. This makes it easier for the minister, who must otherwise address himself both to the child mind and the adult mind. The junior service of Franklin Circle church is in the charge of two ladies. They have a varied program from Sunday to Sunday, sometimes employing the stereopticon in order to illustrate some point. The children of the congregation who are under sixteen years of age are invited to attend the junior church. In this way there is room in the main auditorium for the morning congregation.

Consolidated Sunday Schools by Means of Bus

Twenty years ago a humble pedagogue of northern Illinois was able to secure a change of state law that would permit the consolidation of the rural schools of a township into one school with grades. His big idea was the use of a public bus for the transportation of the children. With the coming of good roads his idea has constant extension throughout the state. Is the Sunday school to have a similar transformation? Euclid Heights Presbyterian church of Los Angeles has recently put on a Sunday school bus to haul children from a distance. As result one hundred children have been added to the school. The cost has been $15.50 per week. As the good roads movement goes forward, there may be a consolidation of Sunday schools in rural sections, with a big increase in the efficiency of rural churches.

Ministers Not Well Distributed

While there are considerable sections of the country which are not in easy reach of protestant worship, yet one learns that there is one protestant minister to every 594 people in the United States. How this compares with the great mission fields may be seen from the following facts: There is one protestant missionary to every 2,125 people in Africa; one to every 172,538 in Japan; one to every 231,448 in India; and one to every 476,482 in China. It would seem that the distribution of the protestant ministers under a denominational system has not been wisely planned.

Southern Methodist Church Raises Salaries

The treatment of the Christian ministry is in some places improving. Though the improvement may be in the leading churches rather than in the small and weak ones, they help to erect standards. The southern Methodists during the year 1919-1920 increased salaries for ministers and presiding elders 36 per cent. Twenty-eight churches and districts in that community pay five thousand dollars or more, First church of Birmingham giving a salary of nine thousand dollars a year. Three hundred and twenty-nine churches pay above $3,200. The bishops are given five thousand dollars a year with an allowance for travel and office expenses of $1,800. The average salary for ministers in this communion is $1,630 per year. This will indicate that many are getting a very small salary to bring about this average.

American Church in Berlin

It is a long time since there has been a service at the American church in Berlin. It was closed by Ambassador Gerard during the war because of his feeling that it was being used for propaganda purposes. It is to be reopened now for the benefit of those Americans who have gone on to Berlin to share in the economic revival of the German empire.

Fundamentalists Make Trouble in Local Church

The premillennial controversy in the Baptist churches makes itself felt in local congregations as well as in the conventions. The Fundamentalists finding themselves for the moment in a majority at a prayer meeting in First Baptist Church of Topeka, Kansas, recently voted that the church should adopt the Fundamentalist creed. The vote was twenty-two to eleven. When the congregation learned what had happened it turned out a crowd of two hundred people to the next prayer meeting and rescinded the action, at the same time instructing delegates to the state convention to vote in accordance with the majority opinion of the church. This church insists that it has no creed but the Bible.

Twenty Lay Readers Are Set Apart

The Protestant Episcopal church is meeting the problem of ministerial supply by increasing the number of lay readers. In St. Paul's cathedral in Detroit recently twenty men were set apart by Bishop Williams for this service. Several months ago a Layreaders' League was formed under the auspices of the church club, and a course of reading laid out. The Episcopal church has many missions in out-of-the-way places which will be served by the laymen until such time as the church may educate and ordain enough priests to supply the need. Every communion in America has been compelled to make some provision for this urgent need, the Methodist church being compelled to open the ranks for a considerable number of women preachers.

Methodists Want Ten Thousand Salaried Workers

With the millions of the Centenary fund the Methodists find that the tasks of the kingdom in many departments are marking time for lack of the workers. In a public appeal that is being sent broadcast the bishops are asking for the recruitment of ten thousand young people in the near future. The positions to be filled include the pastorate of local churches, secretaryships, nurses, assistant pastors, religious education experts and many other kinds of specialized religious workers. The church has 16,000 pastorates, and 1,200 men are required at once to fill these.

First Woman Speaker at Divinity Chapel

Dr. Rowena Morse Mann, pastor of Third Unitarian Church of Chicago, is the first woman preacher to speak before the Harvard Divinity School. She appeared there in August. Her address was on "The Modern Sanctions of Piety." She has a way of breaking precedents wherever she goes. In Jena, Germany, she was the first woman to secure a Ph.D. degree. She lectures widely through the country on social and ethical themes.

Buddhists Are Training Their Priests

The effect of Christianity on Japanese Buddhism is very marked. The leaders of the latter religion are taking over many methods employed by the Christian missionaries. Bishop Tucker of Kyoto says the Buddhists are giving their candidate priests a much more thorough scholastic training than the Episcopal church is giving to its ministerial candidates. Not only are the Buddhist priests studying in the Buddhist institutions, they are to be found in the imperial universities as well. Particularly it is said that the young priests are getting splendid training in philosophical, psychological and oriental disciplines. From these facts it will be understood that the orient will not turn from Buddhism to Christianity in a day. Buddhism will contest the field, and the struggle will be a long one.

Disciples Hold Metropolitan Convention

The Disciples of Chicago have enlarged, and this year took in the whole metropolitan area from Waukegan to Gary in a metropolitan convention. More than 350 church workers were enrolled at this convention. Prominent Disciples from the outside speaking at the convention were Rev. F. W. Burnham, Secretary Mrs. J. M. Stearns, Rev. H. H. Peters, and Rev. R. H. Crossfield. Rev. O. F. Jordan retired from office in the city organization after six years spent as secretary, and four as president. Mr.

Now in One Volume at $5.00

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY was unquestionably the best selling and most widely discussed non-fiction publication of the past year. The list price of $10.50 for the two-volume set, however, placed it out of reach of many potential book purchasers. In response to an urgent demand for a cheaper edition there is now published a one-volume edition that will appeal to a much wider market. It represents H. G. Wells' answer to the criticisms, favorable and unfavorable, which the first edition drew from scholars in all fields. Without sacrificing his own original viewpoint, Mr. Wells has taken advantage of constructive suggestions relative to both general emphasis and detailed content. The one-volume edition is printed on thin bible paper, and contains 1272 pages. (Add 15 cents postage).

THE WORLD'S DAWN

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professional monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

MAN'S ADVENT.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

CIVILIZATION'S CRADLE.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so till man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually, over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

A SUGGESTION: Turn back to page 30 and list your Autumn book order—and put "The Outline of History" first in the list. (You may have reasonable time to pay for the books.) Prepare for a great year by reading great books.

HISTORY'S BEGINNINGS

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations wholesale, magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and expressions of today.

IN ANNO DOMINI

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

WHAT OF TOMORROW?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of this work—invaluable as it is in other respects.

E. J. Davis, secretary of the Anti-Saloon League, was made president of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, and Rev. Perry J. Rice is continued as secretary. All the Disciples churches in the area are now cooperating with the society, and the plans for church extension in the near future are ambitious.

Congregationalists Experiment with Untrained Workers

No more violent reversal of Congregational tradition could be imagined than the employment last summer of a considerable number of untrained young men and young women of the college as workers in home mission fields. They were sent to Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, the Dakotas and many other states. Other home mission societies were critical of the method but the Congregational secretary finds that the young people have been able to do a lot of good work and on their return many of them are making definite plans to take up religious work as their life work. In this way the problem of ministerial supply may find a double solution.

Disciples Will Hold Evangelistic Conference

Many professional evangelists among the Disciples who have been felt in recent years to be indifferent to the organized work of the denomination have seen a great light during the past year and have asked to link up their organization with that of the evangelistic department of the United Christian Missionary Society. During the Christmas week there will be held in Jackson Boulevard Church of Chicago a national conference on evangelistic methods under the direction of Rev. Jesse M. Bader, national secretary of evangelism of the United Christian Missionary Society. Pastors and church workers from all over the country will participate as well as many professional evangelists.

Eminent Clergymen at the University of Chicago.

The University of Chicago continues to command the talent of some of the strongest preachers of the country to serve as university preachers. Professor Francis G. Peabody of the Harvard Divinity School, was university preacher October 16. On October 23, Rev. Vincent E. Tomlinson, of the Universalist Church, Worcester, Mass., will preach, and on October 30, Bishop Francis J. McConnell of Pittsburgh. Bishop McConnell will also be the first preacher in November and will be followed by Bishop Charles D. Williams of Michigan, and President Charles F. Wishart of the College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

Volunteers Take Place of Paid Workers

The industrial depression in Pittsburgh has made itself felt in church budgets, and in many churches there are retrenchments. East End Church, of which John Ray Ewers is secretary, has organized the young people for church work. A young woman volunteer is on duty at the church office every forenoon calling up absentees on the phone and getting out letters. Central Christian Church of Indianapolis has one hundred such volunteers this year which accounts for the success of that institution. The Indianapolis church has followed the volunteer plan for a number of years. Parish administration is not one whit behind business in the matter of system these days.

Denominational Journal Wants Wealth Better Divided

The Missionary Voice, organ of the southern Methodists, is responsible for a statement with regard to the wealth of this country. It says: "In 1915 the Senate Committee on Industrial Relations, after careful investigation, reported that two per cent of the population of the United States owned sixty per cent of the wealth, 33 per cent owned 35 per cent of the wealth, and the remaining 65 per cent owned but five per cent of the wealth. One hundred dollars divided in this proportion among a hundred people would give two of them thirty dollars each, thirty-three $1.06 each and sixty-five only eight cents each. The Christian ideal of brotherhood demands a more equitable division of the fruits of industry."

Federal Council Active on Armament Conference

The Federal Council of Churches is active in the matter of the Armament conference and has cabled the church federations in England, France and Japan asking them to observe Nov. 6 as special days of prayer. A committee has asked President Harding that the daily sessions of the conference be opened with prayer. It is said that the president is considering this suggestion seriously. One of the criticisms of the Versailles conference was its lack of religious spirit. Churchmen are seeking to remedy this defect in the new conference.

Advertising for Missionaries

Boards of missions do not usually advertise for missionaries, but at present the Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, is seeking 144 new ones. Capable, well-trained men and women are needed for all sorts of work, and in each of seven foreign fields, China is calling for seven evangelistic missionaries, two teachers, four physicians, a nurse and an industrial man. The missionaries of this denomination are required to have a college degree representing four years beyond the standard high school and in addition such professional training as the particular task demands.

Unitarian Editor Takes Preachers to Task

Unitarian preaching lacks something these days, and there is a reason why, for many years it has found a smaller audience. The Christian Register, leading journal of the denomination, takes the Unitarian ministers to task in these words: "Now, however, it is bruited even among the 'orthodox' that theologically we have fallen back, and that there are teachers of doctrine in evangelical Christendom who make us look like time-markers. It is not that there is anything so wondrously new in the attainment of these other schools, though both philosophically and theologically there are some brilliant and extraordinary fruits of scholarship. The point is, they are alive. There is an eager and inquiring mind in other communions today, while in many instances our men seem to have no more questions to press upon the universe, no zeal in the source and destiny of it. This manifests itself in the comparative triviality of much Unitarian sermonic material. It is transient, newspaperish, thin, sometimes freakish, with no great principle, no profound issue at its heart, for it has no heart, no grip upon the thing called cosmic, universal, divine. Sincere enough, yes; but sincerity while necessary is not a cardinal virtue in preaching. Another quality comes first."

State Convention Talks About Disarmament

The foremost topic at the state convention of West Virginia Disciples was disarmament. Rev. E. P. Wise, pastor of Bethany church, spoke eloquently on the need of taking a definite stand in favor of peace. He said: "The church has come to the kingdom for such a time. Certain great perils confront us, perils of disillusionment and reaction, the peril of intoxication of power, perils to the inner life of our people. But the greatest of our perils is the peril of letting slip what is perhaps the world's greatest opportunity for a great moral advance. Certain great values have come to us also—a spirit of increased solidarity, the spread of democracy, the increased spirit of co-operation, and certain great moral demonstrations—if we let these slip and fail to fulfill them, we are recreant to our high trust. The greatest sin is the sin of failure to do our utmost for a better world."

Blasphemy Is Not Free Speech in Maine

While the American government guarantees free speech there are some criminal misuses of speech which do not come under this head. Michael Mockus, a Lithuanian, showed some pictures in the state of Maine recently in ridicule of God, Christ and the Virgin Mary. His language was filthy and insulting to those holding to the Christian faith. Such a case is covered by the law in the state of Maine which provides a penalty for blasphemy against any person of the Christian trinity. The socialist orator was convicted, and henceforth will be compelled to set his views forth without outraging those in his audience who are Christians. In many sections of the country the Christian press is discussing the decision of the judge, with a wide variety of opinion.

New Congregational Secretary Formulates Program

The new secretary of the National Council of Congregational Churches has issued a manifesto recently in which he sets forth facts and a program for the congregational churches of the land. He declares that the salaries of congregational ministers have been increased in four years by forty-five per cent, which is probably the best record of any communion in America. There is now an endowment of five million dollars behind the ministerial pensions. He is authority for the astonishing statement that half of the congregational ministers of the country are in other work than the pastorate, many of them being editors, secretaries and business men. The loss from the ministry last year was 139 and the ordinations were 93. The conclusion he draws is that the denomination must push the recruiting of the ministry. Secretary Burton favors the more general observance of Lent. He recommends the preparation and use of prayers in printed form. Congregational pastors should aid in evangelistic work in neighboring parishes, is his idea. He recommends this plan rather than the use of professional evangelists. The endowment of the colleges, the more economical administration of the missionary work and other matters of practical importance are taken up in the report of the secretary. Congregationalism grows continually more evangelical in its spirit, and this along with its splendid traditions in the educational phases of the church's ministry makes it well fitted to cope with the problems of the new age.

Synod Meetings Bring Encouraging Results

A number of synod meetings of the Presbyterian church have been held recently, and at all of these sessions the statistics have been of the most encouraging sort. In the matter of increase of membership the percentage for the past year in Michigan was 7 per cent, and in Wisconsin a 15 per cent over normal. The Sunday school increase in Michigan was 8 per cent and in Wisconsin 19 per cent. In Michigan the per capita giving of Presbyterians is $29.07, while in New Jersey it is $30.13. In the three synods the statistics were all through of an encouraging sort and it seems certain that next May the Presbyterians at General Assembly will report the greatest year of their history.

Quarter of a Century in One Pulpit

Rev. George W. Truett, pastor of the largest Baptist church in America, First Baptist church of Dallas, Tex., recently celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the present pastorate. The building was packed to overflowing at both services and hundreds turned away. An old-time hearer who had never joined the church united that day, and with his son were baptized at the evening service.

Bachelor Preacher Adopts an Orphan

Rev. C. H. Wilhelm, pastor of Disciples church of Pontiac, Ill., has been preaching to his people that every bachelor in the congregation should adopt an orphan in Armenia. Since he is himself a bachelor, he has adopted his orphan, to be cared for in an orphanage in Armenia. Mr. Wilhelm insists that in the state of Illinois there are ten thousand bachelors who should follow his example. There are now 229 orphanages in various parts of Armenia that are maintained by Americans. The care of an orphan requires five dollars a month.

Swiss Churchman Hopes Much from Armament Congress

The interest in the coming Armament Congress is not confined to America. Intelligent leaders of public opinion in Europe are equally interested. Pastor Adolph Keller, secretary of the Swiss Federation of Churches, says: "America is the hope of the world in this crisis. The people of Europe look to her to exercise her leadership unselfishly. To the old nations a reduction in armament is a vital necessity. If the Conference on Disarmament will not give to the world what is expected by the nations there will be a general burial of ideals, of constructive effort and of confidence and the peoples will sink back into deep hopelessness. The way will be prepared for the destructive forces of anarchy and bolshevism. Still, hope prevails and the people of Europe believe that the Conference will achieve definite results in reducing armaments and in restoring international goodwill and faith."

Big Gains in Presbyterian Colleges

Thirty-two of the leading Presbyterian colleges of the land have already made reports on their enrolment this year. This totals 11,886, a gain over last year of 1,245. The largest of these is Coe with enrolment of 1,150; James Millikin, 818, and Lafayette, 806. This experience of Presbyterian institutions seems to tally with that of other denominations. The Methodists are particularly gratified that the entering class of Boston University this year includes 1632 regular day students working for a degree. The school of theology had in July a total enrolment of 340.

New Books by ROGER W. BABSON

Enduring Investments

Raising the large sums required to finance non-money making organizations like the churches and colleges, which do so much for human welfare, has always been their most difficult task. Perhaps this is because the soliciting has been done by those who were (literally) good at spending other people's money, who had never even tried to make any money themselves. Mr. Babson has been consulted on the making of money by the wealthiest interests of America. When he writes a book to prove that it is the best business wisdom to go into these more enduring investments that never pay back even the principal, and do so on a larger scale than the world has ever seen—well, business men will all want to look at the proof.

"Enduring Investments" is the semi-miracle working opener of blind financial eyes that over-burdened ministers, trustees and administrative Boards have been hoping would come to their rescue. ($1.50).

Making Good in Business

The famous Business Expert here applies a fundamental knowledge of business principles to daily business life. The latest work by the author of "Fundamentals of Prosperity" is crammed with the most valuable sort of hints and suggestions for the attainment of a well-balanced, normal, successful, business career. ($1.25).

The Future of the Churches

Mr. Babson shows in a constructive way how the future prosperity and achievement of the church are dependent on its ability to enter fully into the manifold life of the people, and stand as firmly for social and civic righteousness as for the meeting and supplying distinctly spiritual needs. ($1.00).

The Infinite Artist

By Frederick F. Shannon

Minister Central Church, Chicago

CENTRAL CHURCH is a Chicago institution. It has been more fortunate than most other similarly distinguished pulpits in great cities in securing, when a change has been required, a man who could succeed under the peculiar conditions of an independent church worshipping in a rented down-town auditorium. This volume takes title from the opening sermon. "An Abounding Personality" is Dr. Shannon's tribute to his predecessor, Frank W. Gunsaulus. Other sermons included are: The Infinite Artist; the Larger Freedom; Christ's Judgment of the Universe; The Iron Gate; The Supreme Originality; To Athens—and Beyond; Housekeeping and Soulkeeping; New and Old; The Dreamer.

The Church in America

A Study of the Present Condition and Future Prospects of American Protestantism.

By Prof. William Adams Brown

AS A RESULT of his varied experience in the theological class room; in the Union Settlement, Good Government Club A, Chairman of the Committee of New York Presbytery; member of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, trips to the Foreign Mission field; Secretary of the War Time Commission of the Churches and Chairman of the Committee of the War and the Religious Outlook, Dr. Brown has come increasingly to realize that the movements now going on in the American Churches are significant not only for the immediate practical issues at stake but also because of their bearing upon the larger theoretical principles with which religion is at heart concerned. He believes that in the American Church an experiment is being tried which will have a far-reaching influence on the future of democracy and which in the last analysis will help to determine whether Christian faith shall be easier or harder for men. To give the reasons for this conviction and to develop the conclusions to which it points is the object of this volume.

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

EDITORIAL

Turkey An Affront To Civilization

IN the long list of disappointments issuing from the world war not the least tragic is the fact that the age-long scandal of Turkey has not been dealt with vigorously. The Turk's outrages on the Armenian population would never have been permitted had not political considerations outweighed moral convictions in the counsels of the diplomats. Even though an allied force is now in control of Constantinople, Turkey is not at all intimidated, and the most recent advices from Armenia tell the story of another massacre. The entire population of the village of Zeitun was driven out into the wilderness, and has not been heard from since, save as two stragglers have worked their way back to the allied camps and told the stories we are accustomed to hear in connection with such expeditions. Men have been shot down in cold blood, women massacred and sold into moral slavery. The Turks in Constantinople are constantly conspiring to start a revolution there to eject the allied troops. The interests of civilization demand that these allied troops be strengthened so that they may extend police protection throughout Armenia. The most ancient of Christian nations, now a nation of orphans and outcasts, has surely a right to her place in the sun. If the Christian world continues to hear her cry of distress and do nothing about it, there will rest upon Christian honor a stain that history will never wipe out. There is less moral reason for patrolling Palestine than for protecting that people which has suffered most from the hatred of the Turk. Doubtless in the plans of rulers there is some hesitation about offending further the Mohammedan consciousness. It is to be remembered, however, that the Mohammedan world has cast off much of the Turkish leadership and that it has no ground to ask more than the same sort of religious toleration which must be demanded by the Christian conscience of the world for the heroic people of Armenia.

Lord Northcliffe and Prohibition

HAVING made a flying tour of the United States during the summer, Lord Northcliffe has been telling his millions of English readers of the failure of prohibition in America. From his remarkable statement we learn many things that are not so, for example that prohibition "began with the southern white folk's fear of the Negro, whom drink makes mad"; and, as there are no Negroes in England, there need be no such fear. This is news indeed—news from nowhere—since prohibition began in Oregon in 1843. We also learn that prohibition "spread because of the fear of the saloon and drinking den, whose enormous political power was ever a greater danger than the bad spirits they sold." Bad politics and bad rum did hasten the downfall of the traffic, for the saloon was a moral and political pest-house; but it is curious to hear his lordship say that England has no saloons. The English "public house" is the American saloon, and worse, because it is kept by women, and more women frequent it than ever entered the saloons of America. Having had dinner on the roof garden of a New York hotel, where champagne flowed freely, his lordship tells his readers that drinking and drunkenness are "universal" in America, and that crime is "increasing by leaps and bounds." Fortunately, such stupidities did not go unrebuked, for the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, then sitting in London, appointed a committee to draft a reply to the Northcliffe article; which thing they also did, and never was any reply more complete and crushing. The reply is specific, detailed, documented, and it would make an impression but for the fact that men believe what they want to believe, and see what they want to see. The Northcliffe article is a sign of panic in England, as the hard economic facts begin to tell a tale to which even the slow-moving Britisher must listen, if he is to compete with a sober America.

What Is the Great American Sin?

WHAT is the great American sin, that is a reproach to this nation and a stumbling block to its moral advance? Is it extravagance, graft, vice? No, our great sin is good nature, a kind of half-humorous, brutal indifference, what an Englishman called a lack of "concentrated indignation." Trace our ills to their source, and you will find that they exist and flourish by virtue of an easy-going indifference which dislikes to have its comfort disturbed, and which says let well enough alone. For years a tide of undesirable immigration has poured in upon us, threatening our institutions, but America did not care, certain that it would all come out right and that we would muddle through. Obedience to law, Lincoln said, should be our political religion; but a good natured public does not care, and its indifference is responsible for criminal lawlessness. Then there is militarism, and how easily, how quickly, a good natured public forgets the horrors of war. The most shameless greed, the most sickening industrial atrocities, the most appalling public scandals are exposed—but a half-cynical, half-humorous, and wholly indifferent public passes them by with hardly a shrug of the shoulders. Now and then, when some moving-picture hero misbehaves, there is a brief flareup and anger, but it is soon forgotten in the medley of events. Herd-mindedness rules, and it is easier, and less inconvenient, to let the good-natured crowd decide the issue. This is the great American sin, inviting the thunder and lightning of the wrath of God!

The Newspaper Conscience

WHEN one talks about a newspaper conscience, it is usually supposed one refers to the conscience of the editor. The sins of newspaper men have been denounced roundly by platformists in recent years, but there has not been sufficient recognition of the fact that the sort of newspaper conscience most needed and most effective is the conscience of the reader. Modern newspapers have been accused of sensationalism, suppression of the news and even the manufacture of stories out of whole cloth when the ordinary news sources ran dry, and without great difficulty one can find examples of these and other sins in the journalism of most large cities. The remedy, however, does not lie in drastic preachments to the editors. These preachments should be directed to the newspaper readers. It is not too much to say that a half million determined readers could clean up the journalism of the country in a relatively short time. If they would rigorously tabu the dirty sheet and the sheet which was manifestly sold out to special interests, in favor of the paper with higher ideals, their influence would be felt at once.

Should they add to this action a daily expression of opinion among their friends favorable to the journal worthy of their approval, their action would be still more potent. If these determined half million readers were so much convinced of the importance of a clean and competent journalism that they would purchase extra copies of the better papers and give them circulation, this would make assurance doubly sure. To continue to patronize papers of doubtful morals is to vote for their continuance in the only way that a subscriber has to vote. This principle is also of importance in the matter of religious journalism. If a man believes that a belated and obscurantist journal does harm to the cause of religion, he votes to continue the kind of thing that he deprecates by subscribing. If he admires another type of journal, but enjoys it secretly without bearing testimony, he withholds the only kind of action which is effective in the support of that kind of religious journalism.

Dean Inge's Plea For "Other-worldliness"

AT a time when so many avoid the suggestion of "other-worldliness," as a thing dreamy and unreal, it is like a tonic to have Dean Inge, of St. Paul's, assert that "it is other-worldliness which alone can transform the world," and that this is "the secret and method of Christ." The trouble is not that the church is too much aloof from the world, but that it is too much in it, of it, and conformed to it. The cause of religion, says the dean, writing in the London Evening Standard, must be won on its own field—that of the devout life. It can neither be proved nor disproved by anything outside itself. The more convinced we are of this, the less disposed we shall be to stake the existence of our faith on superstitions which are the religion of the irreligious and the science of the unscientific. The enemy of religion in our day, the one heresy, is secularism—that false standard of values which takes the life of the senses as the ultimate reality. Over against this practical atheism we must set a practical moral idealism, and put the truth fairly and simply before our generation. To that end, traditional Christianity must be simplified and spiritualized. At present it is encumbered by bad science and caricatured by bad economics, both the result of latent materialism. Real Christianity is an other-worldly religion, in as much as it looks not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen.

The English Message of "La Nueva Democracia"

A MONTHLY journal is published in Spanish by the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, for circulation in all the regions where Protestant missionary boards have schools and missions. This journal is produced under the editorial supervision of Dr. Orts and Dr. Inman. The fact that many of the friends of missionary progress are unable to read Spanish has led the editors to supply a page of English material, called "The Message of the Magazine." Here in compact form is provided a digest of the contents of the magazine for the current month. This feature first appears in connection with the October number of the journal. The principal theme, as in most issues of the publication, is the movement toward democracy throughout the world, particularly as interpreted in the light of Christian teachings. Among the special themes dealt with are the democratization of industry, the progress of sentiment favorable to the limitation of armament, General Pershing's commendation of the Young Men's Christian Association, the movement for the enlargement of women's opportunities for education and social uplift, an interpretation of the prohibition situation in the United States, and a comment on the industrial message of the Federal Council of Churches. To these admirable materials are added some stimulating essays by Spanish writers, and the discussion of significant recent world happenings. It is a satisfaction to all friends of missionary and educational work in Latin America that a journal of this scope and spirit is making its way month by month into the areas where Protestant voices have been few and feeble in the past.

The Well-read Church

THE modern church comes increasingly to conceive itself as fundamentally a school. Every department of its activities has some educational significance. For this reason the circulation of good books and helpful journals is of the very greatest importance in the lives of the people. A book-table at the church, not merely in a secluded room but near the entrance where everyone coming in and going out may see and examine the very latest religious books, is becoming an established feature in many churches. The reason that family libraries are cluttered up with cheap fiction is that so often the people see and know only books of this sort, making their purchases in department stores. It is really pathetic how little knowledge of books dealing earnestly with religion our church people actually possess. They will buy the better books on religion once they know about them. It is much the same with journals. The magazine list of the American family could easily be influenced in favor of better periodicals if the people were instructed by their minister in the current literature that is worth while. A reading table in the church is an inexpensive and simple device for bringing the use of the best periodicals to a large number of people. Meanwhile the people should remember the needs of the minister. In these days of financial stringency in the manse a set of books costing eight or ten dollars is often out of the reach of the minister. The Christmas time furnishes a most excellent occasion for filling up the minister's book-shelves, just as the people used to fill up his larder by pound parties. The books given favorable review by leading journals are always safe purchases. Nor should the needs of the missionaries be forgotten. Even more than ministers they are limited by small salaries and they have far less resources in the way of public libraries. The progress of the church will be in direct ratio to its intelligence. So long as radicals and "bolsheviki" stay at home evenings to read while church people spend their time in movie shows, the church will be unable to exercise its rightful influence in the world.

Church Attendance and Other Kinds of Attendance

A CERTAIN type of magazine writer has been convinced for a long time that the church is dying. Yet the church has strangely delayed her departure. Amid symptoms of senility there have been astonishing evidences of strength. A man in a medium-sized city who had been hearing a great deal about the small attendance at the churches recently went out to count audiences at other kinds of meetings. He found at a Masonic lodge of 700 members an average attendance of 35. The Odd Fellows lodge with 500 members usually mustered 30 at the weekly meeting. The American Legion has 1,100 members but the meetings of this organization are attended by about 60 men. Then he began counting audiences in his church. It has 1,200 members. At the morning service the attendance averaged 445, while the evening congregation averaged 206. Besides these two main services, the church had many other meetings including Sunday-school, women's meetings, young people's meetings and other gatherings. Even the despised prayermeeting, which is supposed to be passing, had a larger attendance than the ordinary meetings of strong lodges. Which goes to show that there is no organization in the community making a bid for regular attendance that does better than the church. When one compares the church attendance with that at high school commencement, or with the attendance at the big football game of the season, he may grow discouraged, but if one takes into account the facts above enumerated, he will be far less pessimistic. Meanwhile it is to be admitted that many shortcomings of the ordinary church service cut down the attendance. The poorly prepared sermon, the low grade music, the ugly church interiors and the lack of a social cordiality are all facts that tend to limit audiences. People still go to church more than they go anywhere else, even though there be many who, like the late David Harum, go only every Thanksgiving.

Dr. Robertson Nicoll's Seventieth Birthday

FROM afar we send greetings to Dr. Robertson Nicoll, editor of the Bookman and the British Weekly, on his seventieth birthday which is celebrated this month. The Bookman, which is marking its thirtieth anniversary under his editorship, contains a fine portrait of Dr. Nicoll, and an appreciation of his genius as a journalist. It is a notable career, the more because its success began in the midst of failure—failure of health which put an end to his life as a minister, but which opened to him a door into journalism where he has labored for thirty years. In 1886 he went to London, and persuaded Hodder and Stoughton, the Paternoster Row publishers, to start the British Weekly. His rare blend of literary and commercial gifts made it a journal of nation-wide influence and appeal. His astonishing knowledge of books and his mastery of a graceful literary style are only equaled by his

"nose for news," and his insight in discovering new writers of talent and promise—such as James Barrie and John Watson, both of whom he introduced and encouraged to write. As a critic he is generous, appreciative, human-hearted, not dry or bookish, and nothing human is alien to his interest, as his "Claudius Clear" letters attest. Dr. Nicoll is a very delicate man—always fighting for health, and actually living with only one lung—but he has found a way to do an incredible amount of work. Every week he spends some days in bed, where he works surrounded by newspapers, books, and his beloved cats. Having a genius for gossip, and many mysterious sources of information, though seemingly shut off from the world, he keeps closely in touch with it, knowing not only its outward events but much of what goes on behind the scenes. He has an amazing memory. It is almost uncanny how, when writing an article, he can recall an article on the same subject, say, in the Spectator of 1867. When the reference is looked up, it is quite certain to be found correct. One thing only is to be regretted in Dr. Nicoll's long and splendidly useful career—that is, that he has devoted most of his time to ephemeral journalism, and that he has not written the great books he should have written. It is a part of the penalty of being a journalist; but it is sad to think that his rare and fruitful genius has not been enshrined in some work of enduring worth worthy of his name. Many books bear his name, but they are over-modest expressions of his genius, or are works wherein his function has been that of editor rather than author. He has spent his time opening windows to the light, popularizing fine books written by others, as a teacher both of literature and religion, and perhaps it ill becomes us to ask more of one who has given us so much. Again, we send greetings and goodwill, wishing Dr. Nicoll every blessing, not least of which is the honor and high regard of his brother editors the world over, the while we look forward to his forthcoming book on "The Princes of the Church."

The Church and the Student Body

TOWN and gown have been at outs for a long time. This antagonism has expressed itself in many ways through the centuries past, sometimes resulting in clashes between students and local authorities. This misunderstanding shows itself in the work of the churches adjacent to the campus. While the modern church has recognized its duty to minister to the spiritual welfare of the students, there still persists a type of church which is convinced that working among students does not build up the local institution, and therefore does not pay. In a certain town where there is a college of engineering, the students are definitely hostile to the whole group of churches in the town. In another situation where it is said that more than half the girls of the college smoke cigarettes in their rooms, to the horror of the town matrons, it is easy for the church to adopt in its public utterances an attitude of censoriousness. The wise church leaders of our time are recognizing the importance of setting the students at work to the task of their own redemption. No one knows the student viewpoint like the student himself. The Methodist bishops who are touring the colleges of the country at this time adopt the policy of seeking out the most consecrated Christian young people in each school, and these are trained for Christian work among their fellows. The students of this generation are peculiarly tempted to waste time in an excess of social engagements and to break down the standards of decency in their pursuit of pleasures. Their greater danger, however, is that with four years of training they may after all fail to catch the world view which is so essential to educated folk in these days. The world is crying for leadership. The youth of many other lands have been decimated by war. The United States is destined to furnish the leadership for innumerable world enterprises in the coming generation. Through its impact upon college student bodies the church must create a generation of young men and women of idealism who regard their life work as a contribution to the progress of civilization.

Two Diaries of Faith

THREE kinds of people may be found in almost any group, taking sides and sharply dividing it, whether it be a club or a church. There are those who have made up their minds that nothing shall change, not even their minds. There are those who think that nothing is right, and that everything must change. Between the two there is a group who seek to know the facts, who accept them when found, and modify their thinking and acting accordingly. In business, in education, in politics, in religion one finds these three classes, and the clash of their differing attitudes makes much of the friction of society. It is refreshing, then, to find a man of open mind and understanding heart calmly taking stock of his religious beliefs, in the light of ancient faith and the new knowledge, and setting down his conclusions for our inspiration and guidance.

Twelve years ago, Mr. W. S. Palmer—whose little book on "Providence and Faith" was such a blessing during the war—found it necessary to take stock of his beliefs in view of the critical study of New Testament documents then in vogue. The result was a diary of faith, intimate, revealing, suggestive. Once again he has examined the foundations of faith in the light of the tragedy of world war, recording his findings in a diary which he calls "Christianity and Christ." It is a book of beauty, reminding one of "The Diary of a Church-goer," by the late Lord Courtney; as full of religious as literary charm. It is a gracious book, candid, searching, reverent; the thoughts of a man who has come to see as never before the mission of Christ, and his power as life-giver to the world. How far he has journeyed from his scientific agnosticism, by way of pantheism, may be seen, and felt, in these words about the simple symbols of the Lord's Supper:

The greatest of Christian symbols is only a piece of bread. Has ever a more perplexing paradox been set before the world? No crown, no glory of jewels and gold, no sword of judgment, no symbol of the lightnings of a throne; nothing hierophantic, imperial, conquering or condemning; nothing rare, or precious, or imperishable; no adamant or deathless asphodel; only the common food that must be renewed from day to day, is grown in any field, ground in any mill, baked and eaten in every cottage and palace by the men and women and children of all nations. This is the sacred universal symbol in Christendom of the King of kings and Lord of lords, the only Ruler of princes. It is incredible, yet it continues to be true.

Alas, Lord Courteney was never able to make up his mind about Christ. Early in his diary we read: "I have for some time been drawing to a resolution to undertake a particular task. I want to force my mind to answer the question, What have I come to think about Christ?" He touches upon many questions—providence, fate, prayer—but he always comes back to the question of Christ. He takes it up, lays it down, and takes it up again. But he never quite decides; for when he concludes that Jesus was only a man, he is haunted by misgivings, because, if so much is true, more would seem to be certain. He, too, like Mr. Palmer, is held by a certain nameless and ineffable beauty, a grace not of earth, a loveliness so unutterable that it breaks his heart—and mends it. Suddenly, unawares, it falls upon him, even when old familiar words are read in the service.

Something in the air, something in ourselves, something, it may be, in the voice of the reader, in sunny mornings in country churches, when the scents and sounds of summer come through open windows, in the equable atmosphere of some vast minister, when the words spoken at the lectern are accompanied with stillness—under all varying circumstances, defying explanation—the new comes out of the old, the passion out of the commonplace, and we say within ourselves, This thing is of God.

Here are two laymen, each telling in a diary the story of his heart, each keenly aware of the difficulties of faith—each avoiding sectarian issues—both seeking a deeper, more revealing, more satisfying knowledge of God in Christ. They are typical of multitudes in our time—many more than the preacher realizes—and their diaries will help the man in the pulpit to know what is going on in the minds of many who listen, and who want to believe, but who find the path to faith steep, often difficult, and hard to climb.

Ireland's Crisis Hour

IN a measure not equalled in years the attention of the world is fixed during these days upon the parley in London between the representatives of the British government and the Irish nationalists. Seven hundred years of misunderstanding and friction are at the moment of decision, either for good or evil. Before this comment appears that decision may have been reached. And no section of civilized humanity is unaffected by it.

It is not easy to form an unbiased judgment regarding the issues involved in the Irish question. On both sides there are violent prejudices and tense emotions. On the part of those immediately composing the conference group there are passionate and pent-up antagonisms, the result of many years of bitterness and growing traditions of hatred. For every hour of calm debate the utmost credit must be accorded both the governmental and the Irish sections of the gathering. If an explosion should occur in the hair-trigger intensity of feeling that undoubtedly prevails, it will not be altogether surprising. If a just and satisfactory result is reached, it will be a triumph of constructive statesmanship that will be a monument to the participants, and will go far to strengthen faith in the capacity of the human race to talk through its quarrels to conciliatory ends.

The world that looks on is also inclined to one side or the other in this great debate. It is difficult to keep the mood of detachment when such a question is under discussion. All men are likely to take sides. And each side is able to summon a great array of facts to weight its argument. Never did the righteousness of either contention seem more convincing to its partisans. And yet never was there a great national issue that presented more difficult and debatable details to the judicial observer.

The Irish are a likable people. Their wit and joviality are racial traits. Their industrious habits have made them valuable economic factors on their native soil and in the lands to which they have emigrated. They possess a language and literature, an art and traditions, which go back into the shadow of the centuries. They have long asked for independence from Great Britain, and the sympathy of the modern world is increasingly on the side of peoples, however small in group numbers, who wish to live their own life and realize their national aspirations. On the surface of things therefore it would seem that Ireland ought to be accorded self-determination and independence.

On the other hand it must be conceded that on many careful observers the Irish people make a wholly different impression. Illustrations are plentiful of their irascible nature, their inability to live among themselves without constant and belligerent outbreaks of temper and violence, the indolence, ignorance and backwardness of considerable proportions of the southern section of the Irish people, and particularly the fact that one entire and considerable portion of the population of the island is as determinedly set against separation from Great Britain as their antagonists are in favor of it. Strong arguments can be marshalled on both sides of this inquiry, and an unprejudiced opinion is difficult to reach. Racial differences, not only between the island people and those of the rest of Britain, but between different sections of the Irish themselves, religious prejudices, traditions of violence, outrage, bad government and oppression, asserted or denied, form a complex of opinion and emotion that has seethed through generations of suspicion and hatred.

Why not give Ireland her complete independence and finish at once the interminable quarrel? This is a natural inquiry, and the number of those in other nations who are partisans of Irish aspirations, together with the great host of Irish people in the United States, to whom must also be added those who for many reasons are prejudiced against England and the English on all sorts of grounds, make up a formidable body of opinion in favor of an immediate and decisive granting of Irish self-government.

But it is impossible to ignore the very strong array of facts on the other side. Great Britain has offered to Ireland a status of complete self-determination within the great imperial family. She is to be permitted her own form of representative government, her own financial, industrial and educational system, and complete freedom in political and religious affairs. This is precisely the status of the great dominions of the British Empire—Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa—a status toward which India and Egypt are making rapid approaches out of their present provincial relationship. It would seem that such freedom as these great dominions enjoy would afford Ireland every opportunity for the realization of her national aspirations.

Furthermore it is manifest past all misunderstanding that one portion of the Irish people, the population of the Ulster counties, will never consent to separation from Great Britain and domination by an Irish parliament, the majority of whose members would bring to the task of government the characteristics and prejudices of the Roman Catholic portions of the island. Again it is evident that a great company of the Irish people, even of the southern group, would be quite satisfied with the concessions made to Ireland by the British government, and are not at all convinced that the extreme claims for separation insisted upon by Mr. de Valera and his adherents are essential to a satisfactory solution of the controversy. Some of the most conspicuous Irish leaders have registered their opinion that the very generous terms of settlement offered by Mr. Lloyd George's cabinet should be accepted, and the danger of a desolating and exterminating war avoided. It is clear past all misreading that a tremendous responsibility will rest upon the men who reject terms so liberal and honorable as those that have been presented to the Sinn Fein party.

At bottom there are two questions that overlap all others in the minds of unprejudiced students of the problem of Irish separation. One is this: Is Ireland as yet capable of such self-government as shall insure to its people a reasonable measure of harmony and prosperity? There will be two opposite sorts of answers, both very convincing and insistent. But it must be confessed that in the light of Ireland's numberless and futile efforts to formulate a political program acceptable to her own people, and the bitterness of the present controversies among various sections of the Irish, the prospect is not assuring. In fact the British government in offering to Ireland a form of complete autonomy within the imperial household, and on a par with the great dominions of the empire, has confessed to a faith in Irish capacity for self-government that is by no means shared by all the Irish people, nor all the friends of Ireland in other lands.

The second question is of even greater moment. It is this: Is the continuance of the British empire essential to the realization of world hopes for civilization and progress? There are great numbers of people in the United States and in other lands who dislike the English intensely. They profess to feel a certain stodginess, immobility, imperturbability about the traditional Englishman that exasperates them. On first acquaintance Americans usually dislike the English. How much more likely will the same sentiment prevail among races further removed from the Anglo-Saxon traditions? Nevertheless the student of modern history is compelled to stand with uncovered head in the presence of British achievements in behalf of civilization, democracy, education, morality and world progress. In spite of British mistakes, follies and sins, a list that is unforgettable and appalling, and that true Britons are the first to confess, the British nation has stood on all the continents as the promoter of world ideals; and on all the seven seas its ships have been the harbingers of justice and liberty. A part of this idealism the American people taught Britain in the Revolutionary War, in which the best of Great Britain was on our side; and a larger portion has been wrought out of the struggles of her colonies and provinces rising gradually to the free status of dominions, yet loyal to the mother land and its great traditions. Up that ascending highway of national aspiration India and Egypt are pressing to complete self-government. And why should not Ireland, strategically placed at the gateway of the Atlantic—too strategically ever to be permitted capricious and dangerous separation—why should not Ireland enter with full accord into this high covenant of free peoples, for the realization of her own ideals and the peace of the world? It is her day of opportunity and crisis.

The Pine Tree and the Matches

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I JOURNEYED, and I came into a great Forest of Tall Pine Trees. And men were at work cutting them down. And not far away was a Sawmill that sawed them into Lumber.

And they sawed down a Great Pine, and it fell with a mighty Shout that woke the echoes of the Forest.

And I said, I am a lover of trees, and I could almost as easily murder my father as cut down a tree so fine and tall as that. Yet I know that it must be done; and it may be that yonder tree will be cut into lumber for a Temple of Worship, or a Hall of Justice, or an Happy Home.

And the Foreman spake unto me, saying, This tree will be cut up for the making of Matches.

And I said, Thou mightest make Matches out of the chips and splinters of it, but the tree itself would make matches enough to set the world on fire.

And he said, All the Lumber which thou seest at the mill, and all the saw-logs that are beside the mill, and all the trees that these men are cutting, yea, and every tree in this vast Forest is for the making of Matches.

Then was I sad to think of those monarchs of the Forest casting down their crowns and tumbling from their thrones to light the cigarettes of fools.

But I considered that there be other and more honorable uses of Matches, and that so great a tree would not give its life without serving many noble purposes. For it would light the evening lamp in many a home, and kindle a glow on many an hearthstone, and set ablaze the fires of Industry and Productive Toil.

And I began to think less unkindly of this match business.

And I thought of my own life and of the lives of other men, into how many splinters they are divided. And I said within myself that I had never been able to make of my life one single, solid, undivided contribution to any heroic achievement, but that it had been cut up into match-wood and kindling by the exigencies of the daily demands.

Yea, what is this Parable but a Splinter, with the end dipped a little space into the Personality of him who writeth it, that peradventure it may kindle a Kindred glow in the heart of some one else who hath seemed to himself to fritter away his life in trivial duties, with no opportunity for Conspicuous and Heroic Deeds?

Now this is my message unto all such:

If thou hast lighted the lamp of hope in the humblest life; if thou hast put a torch into the hand of a child that he might walk aright down the path of temptation; if thou hast set in the window of thine own soul where it is visible unto men a candle lighted by a spark of thine own conviction or experience so that thereby any life hath been guided aright; if thou hast kindled anew the flame of love upon the hearth of any cold and troubled home; if thou hast warmed the milk of human kindness in the cup of any human being, then thank God that He hath permitted thee and thy life to be cut up into Matches.

TIMELY VERSE

By Thomas Curtis Clark

"The Happy Warrior"

(Theodore Roosevelt, born October 27, 1858)

IN EARLY years your valiant fight began,
When in the wilds you sought the boon of health;
Your spirit then revealed a brimming wealth
Of faith and force, which told the coming man.
In later days, more confident and strong,
You chose to serve where public storms were rife.
You strove with zeal to free the nation's life
From lust of office, greed and vested wrong.
When flames of war enveloped half the world,
When truth was throttled by a crazy king,
You seized the lash and whipped us, loitering,
And roused our might, till hell was backward hurled.
You proved a victor till your last life breath;
You could not stay the subtle warrior, Death.

The New Song

POET, take up your lyre;
No more shall warlike fire
Inflame the earth and sea;
Cease from your martial strain,
Sing songs of peace again,
Sing of a world set free.

No more sing fear and hate
While armies devastate,
Nor boast of foes withstood;
Let mercy be your theme,
Renew the old, fair dream
Of human brotherhood.

No more the trumpet blast
Shall call to conflict fast,
The flame of war grows pale;
Sing, Poet, God-inspired,
Till all the world is fired
With love that shall not fail.

October

WHEN Summer bids at last a fond adieu
And southward flees to greet her oldtime friends,
She takes the roses and the azure blue
And all the singing birds. October sends Abroad his warning of the coming snow
And bids us heap again the corded wood.
The frost arrives and makes the forest glow
With phantom fires. But these portend no good,
For from the sea there rises now a blast
That soon shall paint with white the wood and hill.
Then everywhere, beneath skies overcast,
Shall all prepare for winter, stark and chill.
But why be sad! For fires shall then be bright,
And joyous songs shall scatter far the night.

Song

THE day is brief, from dawn to dusk,
The night is briefer still,
And life is just a going up,
And going down, a hill.

But Oh, what dreams we dream at dawn!
And rest, how sweet, at night!
And going down a hill is good—
With other hills in sight.

Humdrum

ARE they worthwhile, these tasteless everydays,
Replete with tasks that warp the very soul?
For all this toil is there some splendid goal?
Do they speak true who have but words of praise
For those who drudge, nor lift their heads to sing,
For those who meekly yield and ask not why,
Who, tombed in walls of greed, know not the sky,
Know not the spell of dawn, the thrill of spring?
Heaven forbid! All things in earth are wrong
If toil is blest that stills the voice of song!

Some Unchristian Aspects of Christian Missions

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

ONE of the benignities of Christianity is the right of each sincere and loyal disciple to formulate his own definition of it. One of the malignities the disciple finds it hardest to bear is the assumption of that same right on the part of the insincere and disloyal. Agreement upon what Christianity is is hopeless. It is not, therefore, sensible to attempt a definition which all may accept. This may seem to render futile the discussion proposed by the assigned title. And it would be futile, as it would be wicked, to formulate an arbitrary definition, lay alongside of that measuring-stick the personalities and practices of Christian missionaries and missionary organizations, and then, in true Procrustean fashion, chop off those which stick out beyond the line, and put to the stretching-rack those which do not reach out to the line.

The wording of the title carries with it the implication that Christian missions do not measure to their ideals. Which requires no great acumen to discover, nor large wisdom to declare. That is a delightful and altogether beautiful truism of the Christian order. Ideals always run on before. Else they fail of their office as ideals. The blessed paradox holds, that to be Christian is to fall short of being Christian. Aspirations must continue ever to outrun achievement. But falling short is different from making in the wrong direction. Advancing towards goals not yet attained is the habitual and altogether wholesome estate of truly Christian enterprises. Movement away from goals which the Christian purpose sets is an entirely different matter.

It is possible, even amidst the apparently hopeless confusion respecting the content of Christianity, to scrutinize the tendencies of Christian enterprise, and for those willing to face all the facts to reach a kind of agreement as to whether those tendencies are making in the direction along which the Christian purpose impels.

VIRTUES OF MISSIONS

To fail to recognize that Christian missions are "doing a lot of good in the world," in spite of all the human frailties which the most censorious might point out, would be monstrous. Missionary biography is now writ so large and so clear that he who runs away may read the demonstration of Christian power in the work missionaries have done and are doing. It should be observed that our title does not set us upon the task of appraising the virtues of individual men and women. Happily social systems, however depraved, never entirely lack the beautiful graces of individual character and service. This has been true of the most corrupt society and institutions of any age. We are set to discuss a program, a system of far-reaching social significance, a scheme so big and of such long standing, that no individuals or groups of individuals, good or bad, make it what it is, or, single-handed, can make it essentially different from what it is.

Under these safeguards of our discussion let us bravely face the fact that our current program of Christian missions in some of its fundamental aspects and tendencies is flagrantly un-Christian. The enterprise is not incidentally defective, merely. It is not afflicted only with the frailties to which humanity at its best subjects human enterprises. Strong and inherent tendencies of the present missionary order make against, not for the Christian purpose in the world. That purpose is too precious, carries too much significance in the human scheme of things, to admit of this condition of affairs being allowed to pass as a matter of little moment by any well-wisher of his kind.

The un-Christian character of sectarianism is no longer a matter of debate among intelligent people. Anybody who so much as calls himself by the name of Christian deplores and cries out against it more or less uncompromisingly. This is true of the most ardent sectarian, scarcely less than of the most latitudinarian Christian. For the sectary is vehement to declare that those who disagree with him are in gross error; they cannot be properly allowed to use the name Christian. The sectarian spirit and the sectarian program are, on the other hand, the overwhelming grief, and stamp the deepest shame upon the soul of the broad-minded Christian.

DOMINATED BY SECTARIANISM

Those who advance any palliation for the sectarian order find it in considerations of expediency, not in any inherent merits of the sectarian spirit or the program it projects. Yet the program of Christian missions is dominated by this inherently evil thing. To eradicate the spirit would require remaking the entire structure, would redirect the purpose and give new aim to the self-conscious organism. There is no more pathetic delusion than that "inter-denominational cooperation" is curing the root evil of sectarianism. It is not doing so, as a matter of sad experience, and it does not lie within the capacity of denominational boards, now administering the missionary enterprise, to eradicate the evil.

There is not one instance of "cooperation" in the home mission field large enough and tested by sufficient time to be of real significance. Utterly sincere men and women have talked much about the need of cooperation, and conscientious groups have projected concrete plans for positive and constructive measures on the cooperative basis. But these measures come to nothing. Not one clear-cut demonstration, after long and strenuous endeavor, can be pointed to. Not one continues to hold promise after the first spurt of enthusiasm is exhausted. It is dismally safe to say that so long as denominational missionary agencies are in control there never will be one. Though from less intimate knowledge of the field the writer is prepared, at least until evidence is available to the contrary, to make the same statement about foreign lands. The Christian intelligence of America is longer in discovering the ineptitude of so-called cooperative methods in foreign parts than it is at home. There is still widespread belief that foreign missions are teaching the "home church" the lessons of "Christian unity" which will pull it out of our sectarian slough.

A PATHETIC DELUSION

As remarked, no delusion is more pathetic. As a matter of fact, the arbitrary imposition of sectarian crochets has gone farther in distant mission fields than it would be possible to go in the typical American community. Cases of broad-minded missionary propaganda in foreign parts are not lacking and are properly pointed to with satisfaction. But to believe this tendency universal or even dominant in the foreign missionary enterprise is to be very much deceived. A stream does not rise above its source. This stream, with its source in the spiritual enthusiasms of the American churches, has all too rapidly run down hill, even from that low level. The sectarian propaganda goes to lengths on distant mission fields which would call forth a storm of protest from even the sect-bound churches of American communities, if the practices were attempted in typical regions of this country.

Doctrines are exploited which ministers do not think of promulgating among our communities and which they dare not promulgate before intelligent congregations, though they might desire to do so. As one intelligent citizen of a Latin American country remarked, "We do not wish your discarded theological dogmas, any more than we like your patent medicines, which, banished by law from your markets, are so freely vended among us by American enterprise. We who know the tendencies of thought in your country and have listened to the preaching of your leading divines know thoroughly well that the doctrines commonly proclaimed by your missionaries among us are not those now prevailing among intelligent, university-trained, religious-minded people in the United States."

STATESMANSHIP OF "ZONES"

Much store has been laid by the zoning system on foreign mission fields and the farthest advances of "interdenominational cooperation" have been made through this method. Zones or regions are marked off by agreement among the denominational boards and each is assigned as the charge of a particular board and its denomination. More or less definite assurance is given that others will not permit their missionary operations to extend into the territory thus assigned to a "cooperating" agency. This is esteemed by some to be the latest word in Christian statesmanship. A closer scrutiny must show that the program belies both terms. It is in fact a weak concession to petty ecclesiastical politics, and its implications bring a flush of shame to the face, rather than send a thrill through the Christian soul.

This zoning system is undoubtedly better than the old disgraceful scramble for the "strategic centers." But it is a makeshift sufficiently disgraceful still. Is it permissible to doom whole populations, whole races, to the horrors of doing without our own particular precious -ism? If any are to be permitted to learn the Christian truth, to function the Christian life in the estate which now is, and to pass into eternity without the possibility of discovering the sublime Methodist way, or the Baptist way, or the Presbyterian way, or the Disciples way,—if any may be thus arbitrarily deprived, what possible justification can a loyal Christian brotherhood find for maintaining these various "ways" anywhere, with all their consequent confusion and heart-burning and waste of energy, money and good-will? This zoning system is a confession of the spiritual bankruptcy of the whole denominational order.

Furthermore, it leaves the way open, aye, it invites and encourages the infliction of the narrowest denominational tenets upon whole populations, with no hope of their being given the opportunity to test them by comparison with the teachings of other sects. To expect that each denomination will forget its own peculiar crotchets and present in its zone only the "simple gospel," the universally received elements of the Christian faith, is surely too great a strain upon the credulity even of this "Christian statesmanship." Of course a denomination, guaranteed immunity from competition with rival bodies, does not and will not refrain from using the opportunity to thrust forward its "essential" peculiarities. The zoning system thus forces a narrow cult upon the "heathen" populations which they speedily become enlightened enough to resent, when they venture to change residence from one "zone" to another, and find out what is going on.

PATRONAGE AND CHRISTIAN PURPOSE

Even the limited space of this article must make room for reference to another dominant unchristian feature of our missionary program, one which grows partially out of the prevailing sectarianism and is partly caused otherwise. It is the spirit of patronage which has the official program in a firm grip. We properly give Christianity large credit for the advance in democracy. The religious impulse which has thus wrought so beneficently must repudiate the condescending patronage, the lack of even-handed brotherhood, the superior pity, which so generally actuates missionary endeavor, and especially missionary propaganda. There is scarcely a glimmer of democracy in the atmosphere of the typical women's missionary society. The poor heathen are magnanimously patronized from most of our pulpits. We discuss and plan for missionary ministries in much the same temper of mind in which boxes and barrels of cast-off wearing apparel are packed for the west, or the south, or other "remote" regions.

This attitude is not at all inconsistent with a poignant pity, a compassion for those who suffer from spiritual ills, real and imaginary, genuine enough to wring real tears from real eyes. These emotions are sincere—as pity and compassion. But they are the strainings of the heart strings of the "superior" at the spectacle of the sufferings of the "inferior." They are not the passionate outpouring of brotherhood. They are not the brave and unaffected comradeship of democracy.

Such emotions are the pride of aristocracy and autocracy. They are scorned by self-respecting and aggressive democracy. We, and the whole world, are passing through events which bring these tests to the front. An enterprise which lavishes patronage and is not athrob with the heart beats of an unaffected sense of brotherhood, will not be allowed to claim the name of Christian, or else that kind of Christianity will be cordially and unequivocally repudiated along with its propagandists.

TWO EVIL SPIRITS

These two evil spirits, sometimes so merged as to seem one, sometimes apparently working singly, but whether singly or in partnership dominating our present missionary program, have already left a trail of blight at home and abroad. In the west, and elsewhere only less, the subsidy system whereby groups of sectarians are backed by mission funds in perpetuating two, five, seven, competing church organizations in the same community, has surely been widely enough reprobated to reveal its inherent character. But the program continues and from two to five millions of missionary money are expended each year in imposing this system, openly or covertly, upon long-suffering communities.

Tons upon tons of cast-off clothing, and other patronage, have rolled down upon the southern mountains until the moral fibre of most communities has been sadly weakened. Where twenty-five or forty years ago there was rampant, fierce, yet upstanding and heroic wickedness, there are now communities whose strongest individuals have been enticed away to distant regions in search of a "higher" education which thoroughly alienates them from their former homes, and where the weaker elements left behind have been for so long the object of pitiful appeal in missionary meetings far and wide, that they have themselves become constitutionally pitiful. They pride themselves upon their pitiful condition. They make solemn capital of it, except where they retain a sense of humor, when they practice upon the credulity of their patrons and rightly enjoy the joke among themselves after having won the alms.

I am not here referring to isolated instances, but am picturing a system. And if you do not recognize the outlines of the picture, carry with you the brave heart of a democrat, learn to look from level stand into the eyes of your brother men, and then travel back and forth over these regions in a close study of the missionary enterprise there laid out. Do not say that my picture is overdrawn until you have done something like that.

THE TRAIL ABROAD

In Latin America these evil spirits have perhaps done their worst. The barren dogmatism which has there been exploited in the name of American Christianity cannot be intelligently conceived by the average church member in our typical American community, though bound by sectarian traditions as he is likely to be.

In western equatorial Africa, up to about fifteen years ago, the moral enervation of missionary patronage extended from the ordained leaders down to the humblest convert. When, about that time, a veritable spiritual and administrative revolution occurred, many of the very foundations of the former system must be torn up. Unfortunately the causes of this revolution are not inherent in the established administrative system, and there is no guarantee that the same insidious evils will not recur.

In China the missionary force has always included outstanding individuals than whom no broader-minded statesmen have lived. Christian missions have been properly given large credit for infusing the spirit which has broken up the old stagnation of Chinese society. But the democratic movement of today in China is fast leaving the missionary leadership behind. And from the first the strongest Christian leadership has been in more or less conscious rebellion against denominational control. When such deliberate decisions of missionary policy are possible as that reported and much discussed in recent numbers of The Christian Century, in the case of the Disciples administration in China, the incapacity of the official missionary enterprise to guide an enlarging democratic and scientific civilization is lamentably revealed.

KOREA AND JAPAN

In Korea the political stagnation and corruption of ages is breaking away. Here also the quickening inspired by Christian missions is apparent. But not less apparent is the incapacity of the type of Christianity officially imposed upon Korea to meet the issues which that unhappy land and people have before them already—not to speak of events soon to follow. The doctrines there taught, and received by the Koreans with the most docile confidence, are inhospitable to many even of the elementary teachings of modern science, and defy the conclusions of enlightened Christian theology and the accepted philosophy of Christian civilization. The shock to the Korean mind, as it realizes Korea's need of the varied modern sciences and as it comes into contact with the intellectual currents of Christian society is bound to be staggering.

How far an intellectually quickened Korea will or can retain its Christian faith is a very serious question. Certainly the doctrines promulgated by the missionary policy so far pursued must be in large part discarded, just as they have been discarded by Christian civilizations which have utilized the findings of modern science and its principles of social organization. The transition in Korea will prove the more tragic since the discovery must be made by the people sooner or later that the Christian teaching first given them deliberately turned them away from light which was already abroad, and that their missions promulgated doctrines as fixed and final which were already generally repudiated by the civilization the missionaries were credited with representing.

Even one who feels himself not qualified to pass upon the merits of the case must still be forced to discover something serious the matter with Christian missions in the orient when he sits as a listener to a conversation between the typical American missionary to Korea and one to Japan. He will rise from the experience much sadder than when he sat down, whether wiser or not. Between these two branches of the one Christian missionary enterprise there is often what seems as deep an antagonism and as bitter misunderstandings as prevail between the Korean and Japanese nationals. May be all this is "natural," but few unprejudiced persons will believe it Christian.

HOWARD BLISS AND OFFICIAL MISSIONS

The progressive thought of the United States was electrified by an article in the Atlantic Monthly some time ago, whose author was Howard Bliss, then president of the Christian college at Beirut, in Syria. Thousands who had wished to believe unreservedly in missions and had found it difficult rose from reading the article to exclaim, "If that is Christian missions I am for them heart and soul!" It is tragic that these should need to be so rudely undeceived. But they must discover sooner or later that Howard Bliss did not speak for Christian missions, as they are administered by our denominational boards. Howard Bliss was not a representative of any of these boards. His great institution, whose ideals and practice he set forth in the article, is happily not administered or controlled by a denominational board. Such ideals and programs as he elaborated have not been promulgated by denominational boards, and they never will be so long as denominational boards are denominational boards.

Higher education in the near east is already largely emancipated from the cramping, stifling influence of denominational control. The same process is also well advanced in the far east. In one or two regions the same has occurred in Latin America. American medical ministry in the orient is rapidly passing under other control.

DEMOCRATIC EXPECTATIONS

Herein lies the hope of Christian missions. Whatever positive reordering the enterprise requires, its health and its faithfulness to the Christian purpose demand that the denominational administration be abolished. It is clear that American Christianity must send out educators who shall educate, not conduct schools as "feeders" to churches; who shall educate, that is, draw out and train for free and efficient service the latent powers of the young, not warp and twist those natures into conformance with certain preconceived and rigidly prescribed formulas, supposed to insure soundness in the faith;

That physicians must be sent out to convey to needy populations the best medical and sanitary science discovered, with the untrammelled purpose of increasing the sum of human healthfulness and joy and social serviceableness, not to use each dose of medicine as a wash to carry down an unrelated and arbitrary theological formula; not to justify a propaganda in America which interprets therapeutics as a cunning device for curing "sin-sick souls;"

That preachers must be sent out with open mind and open heart to discover and interpret spiritual reality in the actual experience of those to whom they minister, and that they do not go out under vows which commit them to preconceived theological systems plastered over with sectarian and guild labels, obliged to propagate a cult conceived in alien minds and enforced by requirements of an alien propaganda;

That social workers must be sent out to bring to bear upon backward communities the best science and the fullest inspirations of modern democracy, to develop agriculture for the sake of the legitimate benefits of agriculture, scientific industry for the sake of the benefits of an improved economic order, practical methods of social organization for the sake of the human values in community efficiency; and that not any of these shall be used as a bait to entice the undiscerning under the spell of arbitrary theological formulas, in the fulfillment of an alleged "spiritual" mission.

THE WAY OUT

Something like this will be the increasingly emphatic demand of a quickened American democracy as it reaches out to the needy far and wide. Such a mission it will call Christian, little mindful of its conformity with the prescriptions of ecclesiastical propaganda. This expectation will never be met in an enterprise conducted by our denominational boards, by one of them, nor by a few of the choicest, nor by many reputed to be acting in concert. The evil spirits mentioned are active in these sectarian agencies and they will not be exorcised by incantations conceived and conducted by the evil spirits themselves. The system must be set aside. It is incapable of expressing what the democratic Christian consciousness must conceive to be Christian.

This is no longer merely a dream or a theory. The forces are at work which must ere long bring this about, which will set aside the denominational board and put the program of Christian missions on a different basis, insuring its faithfulness to the Christian purpose—at least affording it a chance to be faithful.

Again it must be pointed out that no word here is a reflection upon particular individuals or groups of missionaries or mission administrators. It would be wicked to charge any one, or any single group, with being bad enough deliberately to create this thing. This system is the accumulation of the neglects and spiritual cowardice and structural abortions and false guild courtesies and ecclesiastical trumpery of two or more generations. Courage and thorough-going methods will be required to clear away the enormous pile. But the end is worth the effort. For the democratic passion and the Christian purpose are the converging, merging force which must take this world into control, and lead humanity on in the fulfillment of its ever-enlarging destiny.

The Four-square Far Eastern Issue

By Harvey Hugo Guy

WE are approaching one of history's most significant conferences, on whose outcome hangs the peace of the world. Should the conference fail it would mean that all the terrors of the war, all the atrocities, all the hatreds, all the sacrifices—and these multiplied and made more terrible—would be repeated. The world is drifting unconsciously, but surely and quickly, back into war. Extreme nationalism, capitalism, organized greed and a perverted press are determined that the disarmament parley shall not succeed. We want this conference to succeed; we want the world to ground arms. Our hearts are sad. We want peace. And yet the outlook is not bright. The world's organization is so complicated, nationalistic fears and suspicions so uncontrollable, entrenched wrong so strong, hatred so deep, class antagonism so bitter that a complete victory for peace seems hardly possible.

Before we can intelligently discuss disarmament, or even the limitation of armament, we must face and face squarely the reasons for armament. There are some questions, serious and urgent, which must first be answered. These were hinted at in the call of the President. The purpose of the conference is, according to this call, to take up the matter of limitation of armament and "other far eastern questions." Of course these far eastern questions are not the only ones which demand consideration. There are many others—but these are most serious and menacing.

For the situation which the mere statement of these problems reveals no single nation, no one race is responsible. It is the "system" that is at fault. The world is in a rut—we are all together caught in the mesh of entangling errors. If we ever get out it will be because we are willing to admit not only that there is something wrong with the world, but that there is something wrong with us. Only when we are willing to cast aside selfish ambitions and break with absurd customs, and with one mind work together, will it be rational to dream of the time when the nations will "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks."

There are in round numbers 900,000,000 orientals in the far east: 400,000,000 Chinese, 315,000,000 Hindus, 70,000,000 Japanese. The balance are the dwellers in the straits settlements, Siam and the islands of the Asiatic seas. These peoples are increasing at an alarming rate. They have physical demands which increase as they become acquainted with the civilization which we are pleased to call modern. For her tillable soil Japan has 1,500 persons to the square mile, China probably half that number. India is densely peopled. The population of Japan, the only country in the far east concerning which statistical information is entirely trustworthy, is increasing at an annual net gain of not less than 800,000. The population of China, multiplying at a similar rate, would net that republic an annual augment of over 3,000,000, while India's yearly increase is 2,500,000. Now, if it is true, as economists maintain, that one-tenth of the human race owns or controls four-fifths of the earth's surface and refuses the nine-tenths any interest in, or profit from, this vast holding, is it any wonder we have here a serious and threatening condition?

The natural resources of Japan are either exhausted or their end is in sight. With the possible exception of the development of hydro-electric energy and the expansion of her fisheries, there are no new fields to exploit. The natural resources of China and India are largely in the hands of alien owners and will be developed and utilized by others besides the people to whom they should belong.

What are we going to do with these 900,000,000 million hungry, restless, milling people? I am not answering the question. I am asking it. What is the world going to do with these people? They are knocking at the world's gates, they are demanding a "place in the sun." The gates are closed and we are asleep. Why waken us? "Let us sleep," say some; but let us remember they are not asleep, they are not filled, they are not satisfied. This is the first great question. We need to study it. We must get the facts. We must adjust the world's territory to the needs of the humanity that lives upon it, else we hope in vain for peace.

NATIONALISM

Rabindranath Tagore says the curse of the world is "nationalism." Without qualification I cannot agree with that statement. However the appearance of new nations in the far east has greatly multiplied difficulties. Of all these nations Japan alone has achieved true, stable nationalism. She is a nation, united, strong, commanding. China has long been "race conscious" and is now setting her feet strongly and surely in the way to achieve nationalism. We shall not have to wait long to see that republic a united and irresistible unit. The people of India, too, are dreaming of self-determination and the realization of national ambitions. Not more surely did the colonies of the American republic long for independence and freedom in the days of '76, than do the Hindus aspire to self-government. The day is not at hand—they will have to wait. If they can wait in patience it will be better.

Now the corollary of nationalism is militarism—and therein lies the danger. Every nation conceives its privilege and duty to be "prepared," i. e., to build navies and to organize armies to defend and to advance these national ambitions and purposes. Militarism is founded on two great and fundamental principles: first, that all friends and allies are potential enemies and should be so conceived and so treated at all times; and second, that true defensive warfare is to strike the enemy first. These principles are not always apparent; they are seldom stated with such candor.

Moved by these motives and following the examples of the west the nations of the orient are creating expensive, mighty machines of war. China has the largest "standing" army in the world. She will doubtless train that army, and in a short time bring it up to an efficient and dependable standard. The navy will follow. Japan has the third largest navy in the world and an army which has demonstrated its power and effectiveness in three victorious wars. As these new eastern nations grow and become well organized they will, each one, repeat the history of Japan. No other way under the present world system is possible, no other scheme feasible. Is this to go on forever? Is there no better way? Is not patriotism possible without hate, loyalty without selfish greed? Is the sisterhood of nations to be forever an impossible dream? What are we to do with these new nations? They are the children born of our international contacts. I am not answering the question. I am asking it.

RACIAL CONTACTS

"This is the world's most menacing problem." With that statement I agree. I do not admit for a moment that it should be so; yet it is a fact, a stubborn and threatening fact. What is this problem of race contacts? There are two aspects of it which form the heart of the matter. Every man is naturally conscious that he belongs to some race, be it Anglo-Saxon, Latin, Indo-Germanic, oriental. From that consciousness there is no escape; in it per se there is no danger. But when that consciousness is perverted by false social standards, when it grows into "race prejudice," the feeling of race superiority, accompanied by a haughty condescension towards all other races,—then it becomes a serious menace. When that feeling is organized, when it becomes the spirit which fills the whole race as a body, when it becomes race ambition, it is a menace to the peace of the world. This notion of a super-race with a mission to command and rule—a "Deutschland uber alles," an "Anglo-Saxon supremacy," a "Yamato expansion," has always been and will ever be a curse to the world wherever it exists. An efficient control must be found—some supra-race power which shall be able to hold us all in check and curb the dangerous tendency to look upon our race as commissioned by heaven, not only to lead the world but to command it for its own racial interests.

But there is yet another aspect of this problem of race contacts; it is the problem of how to preserve the distinctive contributions each race makes to the world's life. Everyone knows, in general, what they are. The Hebrew gave us religion, the Greeks philosophy, the Romans organization and law, and the orientals the mystery of meditation, a new interpretation of religion. The loss of any of these, some realized, others in the making, would leave our human life poorer and would mar the perfect structure the future bids us build. How may we conserve and keep them all? How may we encourage the races to go on creating, reflecting, weaving on the loom of time the pattern of a better world—each working at his task in conscious brotherhood with all his fellows and in the joy of peace? I am not answering this question. I am asking it.

It is not easy to separate the problems here discussed. I am doing so merely for convenience: after all they overlap and intertwine. At bottom they are all religious, as a closer view will reveal. But there is, in a peculiar sense, a religious problem, and I shall endeavor to state it. The far easterners are religious; they dwell in mystery and love to seek out the ends rather than the means of life. They are pantheistic. They think of God either as the "all soul" or the "no soul." In practical life they are worshippers at many shrines and venerate many deities. To us their religion is not convincing; to them it is the only way to peace of mind. They are lovers of nature and delight to see the mystery of the gods in every passing phase of the world about them. The thunder, the fire, the wind, the rain, the terror-breeding earthquake—what are these? They are the gods at work. God is speaking or smiling, or he is angry. He laughs in the glorious flowers and weeps in the falling rain. Now our western science came explaining mysteries. Earthquakes are not gods, winds are not gods—there are no gods. There is law, and power and sequence. Hence the feet that once went willing to the temple gate are turned away, prayer is silent, singing ceases, hearts are sad, for the gods are gone—gone! for we destroyed them and gave no substitutes. Agnosticism as a theory can satisfy the intellect—it can never wipe the tears from weeping eyes! It fails to sustain the moral life or restrain the wayward soul. The result is an awful moral sag, a despair and hopelessness, an abandon to passions and fears. Who gave us the right to kill these gods? Who commissioned us to corrupt the youth and rob the aged of peace? We have taken their gods away. We must give them our God.

THE PASSING OF FAITH

This iconoclastic process had even more dreadful results. It not only destroyed faith in the gods; it destroyed faith in men. Social and political infidelity are rife. Nations are not trusted, treaties are not kept, races are suspected. Agreements and contracts and understandings are made and entered into with doubt and questioning. What are we going to do with this world-wide propaganda of suspicion? If it can it will nullify all the good results which may come from the disarmament conference. It is poisoning the minds of Englishmen against Frenchmen, of American against Englishmen, of Japanese against Americans. What are the problems of Shantung and Siberia, of Mesopotamia and Yap and all the rest, including disarmament itself, as compared to this loss of faith? It is more important to restore faith than it is to quibble over these results of the loss of faith. Self determination, justice for small nations, national integrity, what are these but the "children of faith"? What are we going to do about this religious problem? Its solution is fundamental and urgent. It is the task of the church and the state and its solution demands haste.

Upon a fair adjustment of these four great matters depends the peace of the world and the prosperity of humanity. To fail would mean to blot with surly clouds the future's gleaming hopes and plunge the world again into cruel and despairing war. That must not be. There is a better way—and that is the way of sympathy and mutual respect, the way of peace.

The Price of the Ministry

By John R. Scotford

THE STATUS of the Protestant ministry is up for discussion. Neither the ministers nor the churches are satisfied with things as they are. Wherever ministers foregather there is bound to be discussion of their brothers who have left the ministry for other callings, and of others who are contemplating a similar step. Rare indeed is the minister who is satisfied with his present income. The churches are not so audible in their complaints, but great is their difficulty in filling their pulpits with the sort of men they want. Ministers are loud in their cries for more money, and the denominational factotums are equally noisy in their demands for more men. Yet the problem is not fundamentally one of money raising, on the one hand, or of the recruiting of men on the other. The real problem is that of the adjustment of the minister to his job.

I do not believe that the price of success in the ministry is any different from the price of success in any other calling. That price is unremitting labor. As I study the lives of the successful business men whom I meet, I am constantly impressed with the tremendous energy which they have put into their work. The study of biography reveals the same truth. Those who make their mark in the world, those who win the large material rewards of life, do so because of their willingness to pay the price in application and effort. The study of those who have made a large success in the ministry reveals the same truth. The men at the top have gotten there because they were not afraid of work. The man who gets ten thousand dollars a year in the ministry works about twelve times as hard as the man whose stipend is one thousand dollars per annum. I have a suspicious feeling that many of the ministers who envy the larger material rewards to be had in secular callings would not be willing to undergo the discipline which those callings require. That is, they would be just as unwilling to pay the price of success in business as they are in the ministry. Apparently few of those who have deserted the ministry have made a tremendous success in the other callings which they entered, financially or otherwise. One cannot get rid of the devil by crossing the creek, nor can one dispose of personal problems by changing one's vocation.

DRIFTING WITH THE CURRENT

But the minister is not wholly to blame in this matter. He has been the victim of circumstances in no small measure. In so far as any fault can be assessed against him, it is that of drifting with the current. Also, these circumstances are changing, and there is every reason to anticipate a brighter day for the ministry of our Protestant churches. First let us trace some of the causes of ministerial indolence, and then let us see some of the grounds of hope for a better day.

Preaching is a work which appears harder than it is. Most folks are afraid to stand up in front of an audience and talk. Few persons have the literary training necessary to the ordered presentation of thought. For them, to preach a sermon would be a horrible ordeal. But for the preacher, talking to a crowd is easy, and if the actual facts in regard to the time spent on sermon preparation were made known some good people might be shocked. The peculiar nature of his calling has excused the minister from some of the common standards of judgment. But the rising generation is being trained by our public schools to stand up and talk, and in consequence they will not admire the nerve of the preacher as much as did their fathers. Instead of being satisfied with a minister who merely talks, they will demand that he say something.

PREACHING AND HOUSEKEEPING

The minister is excused from the necessity of punching the time clock. Oftentimes he does not even own an alarm clock. His time is his own. His home usually being his workshop, there is no visible line of demarcation between the time which he gives to the church and the time given to his private affairs. Now the minister usually has a wife with her hands full rearing a number of children. With cooking and cleaning and other activities the kitchen is a busy place, while the housewife can rarely discover that anything in particular is happening in the study. In consequence, the minister is drafted into service in the place of greatest urgency. Studying can be postponed, but it is now or never with housecleaning and cooking. The minister loves his wife. If he is not good to her, he is eternally damned in the eyes of his parish. The man who told his bride that he was not called to dry dishes has not had many imitators. It is exceedingly easy to turn aside from the ministry to the serving of tables, and to degenerate into a sort of assistant house-keeper. The minister with an invalid wife is usually doomed to failure on this account. The providing of a study in the church is a wise step both for the church and the minister. A man can be an exceedingly industrious house-keeper and also be an exceedingly inefficient preacher.

THINKING IS A HARD JOB

The same temptation presents itself in a minister's church work. He is called to a life of study, meditation, and prayer, but he is set in the midst of a world where men are valued by the productiveness of their hands. Now thinking is about the hardest job we ever tackle. There is a great temptation for the minister to substitute the work of his hands for the product of his brain. A man with an aptitude for tinkering can find unlimited work around any church edifice. If he likes boys, they will keep him so well occupied that his mind will be little troubled by the burden of prolonged thought. It is easier to go calling than it is to study. Greasing the cogs of the ecclesiastical machine is a more enticing job than burnishing the lamp of one's own soul. Further, there is an urgency about church work which is wholly lacking in regard to study. Lack of study will not make any difference this week or next. A man can even run for months on his barrel or on his momentum without any apparent difference in the result. On the other hand, he can study his head off and prepare the finest sermon he ever dreamed of, only to have the usual number of empty benches on hand to listen to him. The immediate rewards of church work are much greater than the immediate rewards of study. But in the end there comes a day of judgment, when the things which are not seen stand a man in better stead than the things which are seen.

THE EIGHT HOUR DAY

Then there is the fallacy of the eight hour day. Some years ago a minister advertised for a church, stating that as he believed in the eight hour day, it was his custom to preach only one sermon a Sunday. The eight hour day is a good thing in mechanical employments, but it is not a good thing for the minister. In mechanical employments, the work is exceedingly monotonous and also physically exhausting. The minister's work is varied and refreshing. Much of it could hardly be called work at all in the accepted sense of that term. Also, he has a long vacation and the privilege of going fishing whenever the spirit moves him. In the light of these circumstances there is no good reason why a minister should not work twelve hours a day or longer during the winter season without pitying himself, or allowing his wife to think that he is an abused slave of the church. If he keeps a due proportion between his intellectual, administrative, and pastoral work he will grow fat on the combination and live to an astounding old age. In particular, the time after supper is the most valuable and fruitful of all the minister's day, for then he can sally forth and become really acquainted with his men. When it comes to hours of labor, the minister should not pattern after the bricklayer, but after the busy physician.

Another cause for ministerial indolence has been the size and type of church which a minister is oftentimes called to serve. The majority of the organizations listed in our denominational year books do not provide a full time job for a real man. Tending one hundred souls is not a task which will bring out the best in a man. Usually the denominational lines are so drawn that if a man tried to reach out vigorously for the unchurched—who abound in every community—he would lay himself open to the charge of proselyting, and become anathema to his fellow-pastors. For a young man fresh from the seminary, with regular habits of study, and venturing upon the great adventure of raising the first baby, a small church may be a good thing. But a succession of such pastorates benumbs a man's powers and inevitably leads him into indolent habits. About the only way to stir up any excitement in a small church is to pick a row with somebody, or else move. When we study the churches which they serve, the wonder is that ministers are as industrious and wide-awake as they are.

LAZY CHURCHES

But perhaps the greatest of all causes for ministerial laziness is the inertia of the churches. "Please go 'way and let me sleep," is the motto of most churches. They do not want to be stirred up. They do not want anything very tremendous to happen. There is a very direct ratio between the activity of a church and the friction which is developed within its membership. On the other hand, the ambition of the average minister is to remain a long time in a given pastorate. This is a respectable and comfortable thing to do. The ideal of a long pastorate is continually dangled before his eyes by both his own church and the ecclesiastics of his own denomination. About the only way a Protestant pastor can get himself canonized as a saint is to stay a long time with the church. Now there are just two ways of having a long pastorate. One is to put on an aggressive program and steam-roll opposition by overwhelming success. It takes a strong and resourceful man to do this. The other way is to avoid friction by taking things easy. Most long pastorates are harmless. Sometimes continued tenure of position is gained at the price of convictions. More often it is the reward of an oleaginous temperament which refuses either to take or create offense. That is, the churches actually reserve their highest honors for the man who is somewhat indolent and decidedly easy-going!

CHURCHES GET WHAT THEY WANT

The final responsibility for the character of the minister rests with the church. In the long run, the churches get just about the sort of pastors they want. They certainly get what they pay for and very little more. Indolent churches will have indolent pastors.

The hopeful phase of the situation is that the number of churches demanding an active program is increasing, especially in the cities. As a matter of fact, only an active, aggressive church can maintain itself amid the shifting currents of city life. It takes a live fish to swim upstream, and it takes a live church with a live pastor to stem the tides of urban activity. Also the various movements of the past few years have focused the thought of the church upon the task which is before it. The financial campaigns have taxed the churches into activity. The city and state federations are continually gearing the local churches more closely into their tasks. The day of the church small in vision or in numbers is limited. The pace is quickening, and the unfit are going into the discard.

For the man who wants to make a real investment of his life, there is no better calling than the Christian ministry. It is no longer a life of idle respectability such as we read in Anthony Trollope's novels, but one of intense activity. The man who is willing to pay the price of success will reap the rewards of success. His will be a life of multitudinous interests, of rewarding contacts, and of very definite goals. He may not accumulate a fortune, but the man who succeeds in the ministry will know some at least of the material rewards of success. The opportunity for the man who is not afraid of real work grows larger with every passing year. And after all, genius in the ministry analyzes itself out about the same as genius anywhere else—about ninety per cent hard work. The other ten per cent might be defined as gumption.

Supply and Demand

By William H. Leach

THE dominie was in a brown study. So when his parishioner and intimate friend came into the room he plunged at once into his philosophizings.

"Here is a letter I received this morning from one of the boards," he began as he handed it to the caller. "They suggest that we have a vocational day and that I preach on the call of the ministry to young men."

"It's a splendid idea," said Mr. Dean. "I have wondered why it hasn't been done. I have had such a thing in mind myself. It seems to me that every church ought to send some young men into the ministry. Now there's—"

"I have thought so at times, also," interrupted the preacher. "But last night cured me. You see I acted as moderator at the congregational meeting of Christ church. You have doubtless heard that they have called a pastor."

"No. Is that so? It took them a long time, but then we all know that ministers are scarce in these days. That is one reason why this vocational day should be observed."

"Yes, the dearth is very serious," continued the minister dryly. "There were just seventy-four candidates for the pulpit of Christ church. Some of them literally begged for a hearing. Well, there are seventy-three disappointed ones today."

"Does that mean that these seventy-four men were dissatisfied with their present pastorates?"

"It means that they were open to offers to improve their situations. About the only way to do that in the average free denomination is to make application such as they did. They might give as their reason the desire to try a more difficult or more attractive field. But it all means the same thing in the end."

"I suppose most of these men are failures in their pastorates. You know a great deal depends upon the man."

"On the contrary, most of them proved upon investigation to have been very successful. But it is well known that the only way a successful minister can receive promotion is by changing fields. The church is an exception which recognizes conscientious service on the part of a minister by an increase in salary or the hiring of an assistant. It is a short-sighted policy on the part of the church, but it is the actual situation."

"Then I take it Christ church pays a very good salary."

"The minister they have called will receive considerably less than his predecessor. His salary was not large compared with the income of the men of the church. I tried to induce the congregation to keep the salary at the old figure. But the chairman of the finance committee interrupted me."

"'A minister's salary is determined solely by the law of supply and demand,' he insisted. 'And you can see by the number of applicants we have that the logical thing to do is to reduce the salary.'"

"But a young college man deciding upon his life work would never go into the ministry if he looked at it like that. He would sell his services somewhere else for a higher figure. Now there's—"

"Precisely. But the church judges its salaries on that basis. The minister doesn't know it until he has had experience. That is just the difficulty with this letter. Vocational day will increase the supply but not the demand. The next time Christ church has a vacant pulpit there will be a hundred candidates, perhaps, and then the salary will go still lower. But I believe that I will preach that sermon. And I am going to show the facts in the case. Any young man who goes into the ministry from this church is going with his eyes open."

Dean moved toward the door.

"Why must you go so soon? I have been so discourteous that I haven't even asked you your errand. You had something on your mind when you came in."

"Oh, it is nothing much," said the visitor. "It can wait. You see, it is about my boy Harley. You know he graduates from Yale next week. And he has about decided to study for the ministry. But we will talk it over some other time."

And the door closed.

The Divine Adventurer

A CARPENTER of Nazareth
Went forth to save the world from sin;
But had he waited to begin
His ministry divine
Until he found a perfect few
To trumpet in his Kingdom new,
Still would be mellowing in the skin
His sacramental wine.

Along the road his Father trod,
Undaunted went the Son of God,
Plucking the tares and wheat,
Remembering the days that were
Of David the adulterer
And Israel the cheat.
Poor passionate hearts that soared and fell,
Hands that wrought evil, meaning well,
He took to serve his need,
Because from failure and despair
They rose, for him again to dare
The all but hopeless deed.
Today, to stained and broken men
He trusts his holiest work again—
Again his healing touch,
Braving the pure and pitiless,
Is bold to pardon and to bless
A sinner who loved much.

Divine Adventurer, today
Quicken our courage! You who trust
Your Justice to the less than just
That seedling souls may grow,
Knowing God's purposes are sure,
Help us to dare and to endure—
To climb the stars through bloody dust
Along the road you go!

AMELIA JOSEPHINE BURR.

The Threatened Railway Strike

THE almost universal reaction of the public mind will be one of opposition to the proposed railway strike. With millions out of work and business involved in all sorts of ill adjustments the public is in no mood to accept deliberate and organized obstruction of readjustment processes. Unfortunately for the railroad unions the mood is one of mass prejudice against interference with the general desire to bring down the cost of living, and no one's case receives a very discriminating consideration. The farmer has hit the bottom with a thud which has sickened him, but the general public is wasting no tears on him—their only anxiety is to get a share in his misfortunes in the shape of reduced cost of food and clothing. The public mind reacts with a high degree of fairness when it is adequately informed, but the sources of information in regard to any labor cause are colored at this time by a daily press that responds to the universal demand for deflation, reduction of costs, and the resumption of business. It hardly matters on what basis the resumption takes place.

Labor is notoriously careless of public opinion in preparing for strikes. The English public always furnishes a large volume of public opinion favorable to a just labor cause simply because the British unions carefully prepare the public mind by giving publicity to their side of the case. They spent a cool half million dollars in making their case with the public in the recent great railway strike, and but for post-war conditions would have won much more than they did. Even the best of causes may fail if justice to the few involves hardship upon the many. And when justice is mixed with partisan pleading and the times are more or less chaotic the public is in no state of mind to act as judge.

At the present writing the railroad unions have not made their case clear to the public. The strike vote was taken, it seems, to put into the hands of the leaders a weapon with which to resist the determination of the railway executives to carry out a further drastic reduction in wages. If this purpose could be kept in control against the fiery action of the less responsible union leaders and against the inclination of many in the rank and file to charge forward blindly, it might work as a piece of war strategy. It would be bluff, of course, but bluff is a major element in war strategy. But there is grave danger that a resolution once made will run away with the strategic reasons that led to its making. Men love action and get impatient of waiting for the bluff to work.

The Railway Labor Board ordered a wage reduction last July which netted the employers a saving of $400,000,000. They also ordered changes in the working rules which netted them a very large sum in wage savings. There is no evidence patent to either the public or the wage earners on the roads that this great sum has been passed on to the public. Now come the owners with a demand that another large reduction be granted. But no assurance is offered that it will be passed on to the public nor is any proof that the cost of living has been reduced in a corresponding ratio. Some executives say that the reduction will be passed on, and others say no such promise can be made until railway stock is paying normal dividends and large sums are collected for use in reconstruction work. To this partisan demand they add another asking for the abolition of the Railway Labor Board. One of the largest systems in the country makes a peremptory move to break up the brotherhoods. In these things there is a manifest attempt to "bull" the situation and "teach labor its lesson" by taking advantage of present unemployment, of the public reaction against labor unions and of the general economic disability. It cannot be expected that powerful organizations will sit supinely by and accept that sort of thing. Hard-headed partisan obstinacy will be met with hard-headed partisan obstinacy and we, the public, will have our glassware and our heads broken, while they fight it out—an entirely foolish thing for us to endure but one we deserve if we allow it to come to pass.

Some Railway History

What the public wants is a deflation in prices and a readjustment in business that will bring us back to normal. That cannot be accomplished without friction, any more than fetid air can be cleared without lightning or a windstorm, and both involve a good deal of thunder. Besides, when the prevailing economic philosophy is that absurd doctrine that when every man acts for his own selfish interest the result will somehow be beneficial to all, we may expect the process of deflation and readjustment to be accompanied with a maximum of selfish obstructionism and an effort by everyone to profit to the utmost from the misadjustments inevitable to a process of readjustment. Thus labor fights reduction in wages, and capital keeps the price up as long as the public will pay it. The "rent hog" keeps rent for homes high, because families must have a place to live; the retailer stubbornly drops a penny at a time, because "the public is used to high prices and will pay them for a while yet," and everyone conspires with his fellows in the same line of business to make the process of deflation as slow as possible so that he may get the advantage of a few more profits.

The railroad business is a natural monopoly. It is absurd to talk of applying the ordinary laws of competitive business to it. Before there was public control the roads grew enormously rich from their ability to charge all the "traffic would bear." The writer has sat many a day in his youth on the prairies and seen his father fight twenty-three degree winter weather by feeding great yellow ears of corn into the fire bushel after bushel because corn was worth only twelve cents a bushel and coal was seven dollars a ton, both conditions due to the unconscionable railway rates. The result was the Farmers' Alliance, the railway commissions and the "pinching" of the railroads. In those days of millionaire-making the roads watered stock, manipulated bond deals, formed pyramidal holding corporations and governed legislatures until they had both begotten public enmity and worked vastly inflated values off onto the "innocent purchaser." The public at large still believes that, under normal prices, the railways of the country could be rebuilt for billions of dollars less than present capitalization, and that they are now asked to pay rates and give guaranties on billions of "water" in railway valuation.

The Public's Strike in the Situation

Labor cannot resist the demand for wages to come down, and it greatly injures unionism if the unions do not accept the necessity. Their fight must be made on the solid ground of accepting reductions only as the cost of living comes down. It is unfair to ask that wages come down before the cost of living does, and there is neither justice nor fairness in the blanket demand that labor accept huge cuts and bear the brunt of first line losses in the retreat. Employers and investors would commend both their sense of fairness and their humanity more if they always qualified the demand with an advocacy of small profits or none until readjustments are made. The farmers are not only without profits—they are working for nothing and accepting huge losses with large impairments of capital. Why must the farmer who produces the food and raw material dig further into his lank purse to insure railway investors a normal dividend? Why not ask railways to work for less until we can all share in a recovered prosperity? The greatest single need in the land today is a reduction in railway rates that will start goods across the country, lift the farmer's grain into the world's markets, reduce retail profits, and start the sluiceways of trade working so the millions of unemployed can have an honest wage at normal employment. The demand that wages be reduced so railway dividends can be paid, and that exorbitant rates be maintained so dividends can be paid, does not sound well either to the producer who produces at a loss at one end, or to the consumer who has trouble in finding a way to pay his bills at the other. If the water was stagnating at one end and the valleys drying up at the other we would open the sluiceways and turn the stagnating water into life-giving streams on the thirsty soil. And we would probably make those sluiceways common property just because they so largely held safety and prosperity for us all in their keeping, and because as natural monopolies they have no natural laws to govern them and therefore must be governed by civil law. Some day we will learn that the outcry against government management during the war was so much propaganda bunk.

The Railway Labor Board is the nation's hope in this crisis. It is our only assurance of a judicial consideration of what is just and right between the two warring factions each harshly partisan to its own interest. If it can get correlative action from the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass wage reductions on into reduced rates, and then reduce wages only as the cost of living comes down, meanwhile readjusting rules to insure equitable working conditions on the one hand and a maximum of efficiency on the other, justice will be done to all. Positive assurance that this would be done would no doubt make a quick end of strike preparations.

British Table Talk

London, October 4, 1921.

THERE is one society which has mastered the art of preparing courses of study. That society is the National Audit School Union. Each year the union issues an outline for the Sundays of the year. Preachers and others who are at times hard pressed for material find these outlines fresh and unconventional and enriched with a large number of references to literature. The new book for 1922 has for its central theme "Personality." As an example of a section of these studies the provision for August 1922 may be quoted:

BROWNING: A POET OF PERSONALITY

- Aug. 6. The Divided Aim: A Foe to Personality.
- " 13. Personality through Effort.
- " 20. Personality through Accepting a Trust.
- " 27. Personality through Love.
- Sept. 3. Personality through the Vision of God.

It is sometimes urged with justice that these admirable outlines are too full and are too exacting for any but the "highbrow" members of adult schools. None the less they are the best things in this kind known to me. The new volume will be called "Personality and Power," and will be ready in November. It is only one shilling three pence in paper and two shillings six pence in cloth.

The Congregational Union in Session

It is too early to recount the full tale of this week's meeting at Bristol. But everything promises well. The chairman, Mr. Viner, chose for his subject "The Congregational Witness for Liberty in the Sphere of Religion." He obtained a large share for the Congregationalists in the witness for liberty. And in his own eloquent and forcible way he sets forth the Congregational principle. One characteristic passage will show the chairman in action: Speaking on "The Challenge of Reason and Conscience," he said:

"We believe that liberty in religion is an inalienable right of the human spirit, and we have come to recognize that as the gospel claims the loyalty of a man's whole nature, it lies open to the challenge of his reason and conscience. We therefore claim the right, reverently and earnestly, in the interests of true religion, to investigate the springs from whence the waters of life flow. We hold ourselves free to welcome all the light that physical science, history, and philosophy can bring to bear on the sacred book. We hold that God is pleased to realize himself among men in many ways and through many types of character. We are not dismayed when Christian men investigating their religious experience discover different and even diverse explanations. As the great life of the world throws itself up in multitudinous forms of strength and beauty, so it seems natural to us that the energy of faith and love will express itself in forms as varied as are the elements in the human soul."

The Finality of Christ

It is hard to classify Dr. Orchard. His last volume of sermons makes this clear. Even his Protestant readers will cry out, "Amen!" freely at certain places, while Rome will think at others that she has won another convert. Yet the preacher, catholic as he is, and even scornful of Protestantism, is not in "Rome," and until Rome changes, is not likely to be. His program for Rome includes the organization of the True International. It must become once again the center of inspiration for a free industrialism, "organizing the trades guilds and the village communes and by the re-establishing of the monastic life in the country on an agricultural and labor basis, decentralizing these hideous cities and leaving them to rot away; above all, by taking over the judicature of international quarrels and excommunicating any nation which, within the Christian pact, makes war." The volume will make plain to every reader what a strong and fearless preacher London has in Dr. Orchard. Lest his readers should mistake him he has included in one volume sermons of widely different themes. The hearer who welcomes the mystic in him and begs him to keep silent upon pacificism will have no encouragement here, and the labor man who would skip the catholicism is not allowed to skip. He must take the bitter with the sweet. It is one of the secrets of this preacher that no one can tell whether he is going to hear one or all the Orchards. Father Dolling called himself a salvationist, a socialist, and a sacramentarian. Dr. Orchard also is all three by turns and not seldom all together, and he would himself say that this only meant that he was trying to be an apostolic Christian.

A Prophetic Voice

The following appeal was not written for the League of Nations. Its date is 1848 and the author Victor Hugo. But it remains a noble prophecy:

"The day will dawn when your arms will fall from your hands. The day will come when war will seem as absurd between parts of London or Petersburg or Berlin as between Rouen and Amiens, or Boston and Philadelphia. The day will come when you nations of the continent of Europe, without losing your glorious individuality, will fuse into a superior unity and constitute a European brotherhood, as Normandy, Brittany, Alsace and Lorraine, join hands in France. The day will come when our battlefields shall be markets open to all products, and minds open to all ideas. The day will come when your bullets and your bombs shall be replaced by votes, by the universal suffrage of the nations, or by the venerable arbitration of a great sovereign state. The day will come when we shall exhibit a cannon in our museums as now we show an instrument of torture, and wonder how men could ever use such things."

With this introduction Dr. Gore has been speaking of Christian Internationalism. It is one of the happiest facts in the present church situation in this country that Dr. Gore is released from episcopal duties. He is too much on the prophetic side of the church to be a bishop. Now he lectures and teaches and writes. I sometimes wonder whether there is any living man to whom so many owe their souls as to Dr. Gore.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Howling Legalists*

ONE who reads the New Testament for the first time, keen to the vivid impressions that come, must feel strong resentment at the legalistic Jews who always dogged Paul's footsteps. These Jews had none of the spirit of Christianity; they simply tried to annex a denatured type of Christianity to their old Judaism. Christ was merely another prophet but the old rites must go on unhampered. Because Paul had Christ's spirit of freedom, because he carried the gospel out to the Gentiles, because he relegated the rites and ceremonies to the background, they did their best to wreck him. They tried to overturn his new churches, sending delegations to do that dastardly business and at length they even banded themselves together to murder him. There they showed their hand—they were a murderous gang all the time—there they proved it. Think how annoying it must have been, after Paul had gone to Asia Minor and had founded a church with infinite difficulty, to have the legalists come along and insist upon the right of circumcision. What had a Christian to do with a poor, miserable rite like that! Think of the mental calibre of a man who would leave home and run around over the country to get people circumcized—a marvelous religion—a grand contribution to the uplift of the race—this circumcision business! Paul was tormented almost to desperation and time and again he pays his tribute to these disturbers. Never does he come closer to the truth than when he says, "Neither does circumcision amount to anything or uncircumcision—but a new creature." There you have it—what Christ wants is not the petty form—not the outward rite—but the renewed spirit—the mind of Christ. "If any man have not the mind of Christ he is none of his."

Again and again the modern church has had to face the annoyance caused by the legalist. He is a tough customer to deal with, for he has only one idea and he puts his finger on that text and yells until you are mad. "This is my body"—therefore the bread of the communion is Christ's very body. There is no use for Zwingli to say, kindly, to Luther that the text is only figurative, for Luther gets red in the face and fairly shrieks: "Hic meus corpus est." "This is my body,"—well, you can't argue with that kind of a man. Have it your own way—but you are dead wrong—the bread is not Christ's body! Then here are your faith healers. "The prayer of faith shall heal the sick." Is it not written there? Yes. "Don't you believe it?" Yes. "Didn't Christ and his apostles do it?" Yes. "Well, why don't you preach on that more?" And they camp on your trail. Then along come the "Premils"—it is laughable! They only see one thing—the second coming of Christ—to them that is the big thing. They have a dismal tale to tell about the world growing constantly worse. But it seems that when a certain number have joined the church the signal will be given and the whole works will come to an end. It is a dreary, impracticable doctrine but thousands of people are obsessed with it. We get many magazines,

HASTINGS' ONE-VOLUME Dictionary of the Bible

Cleas, concise, popular and yet scholarly. The skill of its able and experienced editor, Dr. Hastings, is in evidence at every point. Unimportant subjects are treated briefly, making it possible to devote more space to vital themes. Among its contributors are found 100 of the leading Biblical scholars in England and America and each gives the results of his own special knowledge and research. The articles on the different books of the Bible are especially valuable. The point of view is that of progressive, modern Biblical scholarship. Extreme theories are avoided. In general, the conclusions which are destined to be the basis of present-day preaching and teaching, are fairly and convincingly set forth. The historical, geographical, and archaeological data are also classified and presented with rare skill and effectiveness.

That the Ministry Be Not Blamed

By John A. Hutton

Author of "The Proposal of Jesus."

THESE "Warrack Lectures on Preaching" should be read by all ministers seeking assurance and consolation after battling with a hard and oftentimes unresponsive world. Dr. Hutton has brought forth treasures of wisdom not only for the beginner but for the hardened campaigner as well. Rare commonsense and practical helpfulness characterize the book.

pamphlets and books sent to us about this—to them—most important doctrine. They keep right after you. They want you to preach it. They are frightfully sensitive and are going to leave your church right away if you say anything against it. (Better say it soon and allow them to get out—the whole church will be happier!!) What of it anyway—is it so vital? What effect does it have on daily life? Does it make a man kinder to his neighbor? Does it help settle the labor troubles? Does it help to bring about disarmament? Has it any social value? If it has, it has failed to impress me. Then once there was the man who was opposed to the organ. He had a “conviction” on it. He had to be heard. He, too, would leave the church if you put an organ in. Is it possible? How inexpressibly silly this all seems today. And yet only a few years ago “the organ controversy” was a very warm affair. Did Jesus say anything about an organ? No. Are we not in for “restoration?” Yes. Quod erat demonstrandum!! They have the book, the text and the argument every time—and the wrong side in the end—queer, isn’t it? I am gun-shy of the man who comes running around with his finger on a text. As a rule he is a nuisance. He lacks balance. He fails to have perspective. But he will stick to you like a fly before a rain-storm and he will bite twenty times in a minute. There is one test—Paul gave it—“A new creature.” The spirit of the man tells the whole story. If he has the “mind of Christ”—that is the test. They are very annoying, but they will not stop the procession—those howling legalists. JOHN R. EWERS.

CORRESPONDENCE

“Benefits,” Pound Parties or Shooting At Sunrise

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: What shall be done for our older ministers, whether in active service or laid aside by age or illness? The old-fashioned “pound” parties seem to have gone out of date. Alleged “benefits” are not very permanent in their results. Shooting at sunrise has been proposed by the godless!

The time is upon us when the churches of all denominations must see to it that the wage of the lower two-thirds of its ministry is raised to a level commensurate with the high cost of living. In that connection may I pass on to you and to your readers, the following “poem” which recently appeared in one of our metropolitan dailies? Is it true?

The Reverend Henry Dowson Dodd,
Of Little Pompton-on-the-Hill,
Long in the service of his God,
Is out of luck and old and ill.
His figure will be seen no more
Where people pass and children play;
The long and rusty coat he wore
Is useless now and hung away.

Three weeks ago Josephus Hall
Announced that he possessed a plan
Whereby the people, each and all,
Might help to cheer the good old man.
“Let’s have a benefit,” he said,
“And raise a fund and make him glad;
Think, friends! He’s lying there in bed,
Uncared for, penniless and sad.

“His life has not been lived in vain,
His work and teachings have been good,
And ours, indeed, has been the gain;
Let’s now reward him as we should.
We have not waited, God be praised,
Too long to give him his reward;
Let cheer prevail and much be raised Within this vineyard of the Lord.”

They opened up the church wherein
The Reverend Henry Dowson Dodd
Had warned against the price of sin,
And prayed and preached the word of God.
The benefit, last Thursday night,
Came off according to the plan;
Yip, Yip! Hurrah! They raised not quite Nine dollars for the good old man.

Questioningly yours,

Ireland and R. J. Campbell

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Rev. R. J. Campbell’s address to his people on his recent visit to America published in your paper of September 29 reminds me of the time my father and I heard him preach in the City Temple some years ago. It was when this noted preacher was in his prime and inspired with the viewpoint of the new theology. My father, Rev. Dr. J. J. Summerbell, one of the most noted men in his denomination, was a conservative and had criticized severely the higher criticism of Campbell. But when we heard him face to face, his sweet reasonableness, his spiritual accent, his fundamental message, caused my father to say to me: “He is a Christian and he understands Christianity.”

And so it is with timidity I venture to suggest something to Mr. Campbell in his report to his people on the Irish question, and of the activities of the people who sympathize with the republicans of Ireland. It was surely the worst thing possible for anyone to send threatening letters to Mr. Campbell and he can rightly complain of this insult, not only to his intelligence but his manhood. But can this noted divine realize that he may be just a trifle unfair when he assumes that the people who desire independence of the British empire in India and China are more bloodthirsty when they appeal to the use of force, than England is when she uses force to keep them in the empire?

Can Mr. Campbell realize that while England has built up civilizations in the past, that does not permit her to stand in the way of the just aspiration of servient people today? Mr. Campbell once preached evolution; and this applies to morals as well as material development. What was once accepted by Mr. John D. Rockefeller in the way of rebates to crush a rival, would not be tolerated by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr. The march of history is on the whole forward. And an association of free nations, not dominated by navies or black and tans or crack British regiments, but chosen by the associated peoples, can be welcomed by Americans of the new vision. But they cannot conceive, as evidently Mr. Campbell does, that the status quo is right, or righteous.

If the state church of England teaches directly or indirectly that it is right to use bloodshed to keep down the freedom of Ireland and India, why is it wrong for the sympathizers with Ireland and India to preach force to throw off the rule of the British Tories?

Mr. Bryan’s Back-wash Speech

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The October 13 copy of The Christian Century came to my desk this morning. I wish to commend you for the editorial entitled, “The Passing of Mr. Bryan.” It seems to me that you have been very fair in this article. And I also think that you have made sharp criticism where criticism honestly is due.

While attending the Ohio Wesleyan University last year as a senior, I heard Mr. Bryan speak at Marion, Ohio, the home of President Harding. The audience consisted of about five hundred Presbyterian laymen who had been called together for some sort of a district session. President Harding, in his usual impressive manner, welcomed the laymen to the city and concluded by assuring them that he was one man who was entering upon his political duty firmly grounded in the faith of almighty God. The President then withdrew from the meeting under the stress of other duties. Mr. Bryan was introduced. For a half hour he entertained the audience with his rare wit. Then for nearly an hour he labored to show that practically all of our present ills of the social order are due to the general acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis. After listening to the speech, one arrives at two conclusions. In the first place, what Mr. Bryan does not know about zoology would fill a whole set of encyclopedias. In the second place, Mr. Bryan's speech represents the back-wash of the big fight on biblical criticism which most people regard as having been settled about a generation ago.

Let us hope that your good editorial will relieve the minds of those who may have been temporarily disturbed by the ill-timed outburst of Mr. Bryan. Hundreds and thousands of us honor him for what he has done to bring about national prohibition and world peace, but we must deny him the voice of authority when he attempts to deal with science and biblical criticism fields in which he manifestly is not expert.

The Apportionment System

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Like many of the highly appreciative readers of your vital and courageous magazine, I delay writing my appreciation until

I have something to kick about. Your editorial on the subject of church apportionments is the stimulus to this somewhat cross-wise appreciation. Your paper is great, but what is the basis for your verdict on the Congregational apportionment system? In the first place the system is not a tax—first because there is no such word as "tax" in the Congregational vocabulary, and second because the denomination nationally and locally has repeatedly insisted that the apportionment is an "appeal." In the second place the apportionment in practice has been the means of indicating to thousands of churches just about what their minimum responsibility is, not to the denomination as a governing body, but through the denomination to that portion of the Lord's work, which depends for its accomplishment upon the denominational machine.

There isn't a sane man in a hundred who has understood the thing in any other light. As a matter of practical common sense we know that the whole matter of giving is a matter of information plus conscience. Some of the best consciences in the country felt their duty was measured by dimes and quarters, until the tangible figures of an apportionment brought home to them the actual cost of missions, as Sears-Roebuck catalogue brings home the actual cost of merchandise. I never heard of a man getting or losing a job because of his rating as a money getter in Congregational churches. I know many men who have killed the churches, by preaching sweet sermons about the spirit of giving, without ever getting down to the painful business of persuading folks to let go of actual dollars. The apportionment is saving the soul of many a Congregational church, by appealing to the persistent human instincts to respond to a goal that has been visualized. Trusting that you will continue to make your readers mad, I remain, sincerely yours,

Terre Haute, Indiana.

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Protestant Movement in Czecho-Slovakia Grows

Dr. Samuel Zane Batten, prominent social worker of the Baptist denomination, has recently returned from Europe where he attended the World Brotherhood Congress that was held in Prague. In the new republic of Czecho-Slovakia, he found an astonishing increase of the Protestant movement which has already been commented on by other religious leaders. He says: "It is not strange that the people of Czecho-Slovakia, by hundreds and thousands, should be leaving the Roman Church. In fact, the movement away from Rome has almost become a national movement. People by the thousands are renouncing the Roman church and whole towns are going almost en masse. In the city of Prague one Protestant church has received over six thousand converts this year, and another has gained twenty-five hundred additions."

"Fill a Ship in Fellowship"

The Northern Baptist Convention provides auspices for a movement which has as its slogan, "Fill a ship in Fellowship." A ship load of clothing and supplies will be sent by the denomination to the war-ridden countries. The Rock Island railroad is transporting supplies from Denver to Chicago free of charge. In New York a group of Polish Catholics have asked permission to put some supplies on board the ship. The Chicago Baptists shipped a car-load of supplies to New York on October 18. They secured from the railroad company a gift of the freight charges.

Hero Returns From Siberia

Among the stories of persecutions of religious leaders by the Bolsheviks few are more dramatic than that of Rev. John Alexander Frey, a Baptist worker of Russia. In 1915 on 24 hours' notice he was sent to Siberia by the government of the czar. When the revolution came, no money could reach him from America for a long time, his first check coming to him through China. The family were reduced to the straits of living on bread filled with worms. During his stay in Siberia he saw terrible sights under the Bolshevik rule. Men were compelled to dig their own graves and were then shot on the edge of the grave so they would drop in. He was a publisher in Russia and his entire earthly possessions have been confiscated by the government. Mr. Frey spoke before the Northern Baptist Convention in June and was given a great ovation. Since then he has appeared in a great many churches.

Puts Magazine Boxes Around Town

Down in Electra, Tex., not every home is completely supplied with good reading matter. Rev. Byron Hester is the minister of the Disciples' church, and he has put into operation a system of magazine distribution. The members of the church keep him supplied with the back numbers and these are put into use through magazine boxes in the various places about town where people must kill time. Not only are such religious papers as The Christian Century to be found in the magazine boxes, but other journals like the Atlantic Monthly and the American Magazine. By this means the minister and his church hope to bring the best thoughts of the new age to the people.

New Medium of Advertising Church Activities

A great many people think the churches are not doing things and they have a picture of church buildings most of the time. Rev. Floyd Poe, pastor of First Presbyterian church of El Paso, Tex., decided to remove from his church this reproach. He prepared a hundred stereopticon slides showing the activities of his church. A boy scout hike, a dramatic entertainment or a Sunday school picnic furnished a very good text on which to discuss the human problems around the modern church. By means of this type of publicity he has made a great many people understand as never before that the open church is not at all ideal, but is actually operating in his community.

Bishop Gore Favors Social Progress

Though a conservative in theology and favoring the interpretations of religion common to the high church party, former Bishop Gore of Oxford tends to take advanced views on industrial themes. On Labor Sunday he was heckled by an audience in a hall, but carried himself well. In discussing the slow progress of the church he declared that this was due to the squirearchy quite as much as to the hierarchy. He insisted that church membership today was far too cheap. Only when religion costs a great deal, as in Russia today, does it tend to purify itself and become a great power in the national life. Freed from administrative duties, Bishop Gore is a great intellectual force in Great Britain today.

Survey of St. Louis is Interesting Reading

The recently completed survey of St. Louis, under the auspices of the St. Louis Church Federation, and conducted by the aid of the National Committee on Social and Religious Surveys has gathered facts about 188,668 persons, all adults above 18 years of age. The survey makes apparent the great shift in the location of the churches. Since 1870 forty-two churches have removed from the business district and nearly all of them have gone to the residential district north of Forest Park in spite of the fact that the population growth has been in every direction. Only one of the churches changing location was a Roman Catholic church. The latter communion has a mode of operation by which churches are maintained even in those districts which might seem least able to maintain them.

Bishop Endorses Plan to Send Fish to Russia

Two places in the world have been scenes of hunger and destitution this year. The fishermen of Newfoundland have had an excess of salt fish but no market for them, and they are not able to live on fish alone or to supply their other wants. In Russia millions are in a starving condition. It was the work of Christian political economy to suggest that the surplus food of Newfoundland be sent to Russia, and that the American dollar affect the exchange. The result is food for Russia. The work was recently endorsed by Bishop Manning of the New York diocese of the Episcopal church. It is a task quite beyond denominationalism in which all Christian people will engage during this coming winter.

Protestantism in France is Vigorous

A recent French publication called the Agenda-Annuaire contains the facts with regard to French Protestantism. Outside of Alsace-Lorraine there are 776 churches and to supply these churches there are 840 ordained ministers. Two-thirds of the churches belong to the two branches of the Reformed faith, and all but 42 are evangelical. In Alsace-Lorraine the Protestants are of the Lutheran faith. Two hundred and sixty-seven churches are served by two hundred and six ministers. The University of Strasbourg comes to be of great significance to the cause of French protestantism under these conditions.

Baptists Overcome Difficulties

Rev. L. S. Cole, a Baptist minister, has been evangelizing in a section of Texas where water is a very scarce article. He made a lot of converts but facilities were lacking for administering the ordinance of baptism according to the custom of the denomination. A special train was arranged and five coaches were filled with people. The infant church went to Livingston where nature has provided a creek for the use of Baptist missionaries. A little church with 69 members has been organized in a lumber camp as a result of these activities.

Baptists Establish Summer Place at Lake Delavan

The various denominational organizations in Chicago are establishing summer headquarters where the less fortunate members of their communions may have out-door privileges. The most recent of these plans is that developed by the Baptists. They have secured property at Lake Delavan, Wis., which is less than a hundred miles from Chicago. At this lake, a large building is being erected which will serve as dining room and in inclement weather as dormitory. A tent colony will surround the building. The structure is located on the crest of a hill in a grove and has adequate shelter from the hot sun, as well as a beautiful view.

Baptists Are Making Large Use of Pictures

Baptist missionary enterprises are being explained by means of slides this winter, and it is an interesting fact that all the motion picture films are now booked up ahead until the first of January. The stereopticon slides are also going well, 150 lectures being booked for the remainder of the year. The Methodists have set the pace in the development of missionary pictures, but they are being closely followed by many of the other evangelical communions. The Disciples organization announces that they are producing a complete set of lantern slides to illustrate the work of their fields.

Federated Church Meets Need in Waco, Kans.

The village of Waco, Kans., had been over-churched. With a population of three hundred, it seemed to the citizens who belonged to neither church that two churches were too many. So firmly were they of this opinion that they would not join either until something was done about it. Various plans for union or federation failed to materialize until fire wiped out the United Brethren church one day. Then the federation question came to life again, and it was voted to try the plan a year. The Presbyterian minister was invited to remain with the federated congregation. At the end of the year the congregation voted to go on with the plan. There has been growth both in church and Sunday school since the federated church was inaugurated, and once more religion is influential in Waco.

What the Church is Doing About the Armament Congress

The Versailles peace meeting was held apart from religious influences and its documents and decisions reflect the shallow wisdom of those who are cynical about the spiritual forces of the world. It has been hoped that the armament conference to be held in Washington might be made to feel more definitely the demands of the Christian church for a state of peace that will rest upon justice. The New York Bible Society has provided a beautiful copy of the Holy Scriptures for the council room. The churches are asking that a chaplain be appointed for the meetings who will offer daily intercession. In addition to this all over the nation and in many other nations frequent community meetings will be held which will consider the questions at issue before the congress. Meanwhile, churches are passing resolutions and sending them to the President that he may be aware of the earnestness of the Christian constituency of the nation. November 6 will be observed in every church as a day for special prayer, and it is hoped that every city and town will hold a community meeting on November 11.

Dr. Fosdick Disarms Criticism

On his tour of the mission fields of the orient, Dr. Harry E. Fosdick gave a series of addresses in August to the missionaries gathered at their annual summer resort meeting at Karuizawa. He spent five days with them in the beautiful mountain country. Before his coming a few "fundamentalists" who are to be found in Japan as well as in other mission fields, circulated reports that Dr. Fosdick was not sound in the faith. The New York preacher soon disarmed all criticism, however, and the meetings were full of spiritual power. He convinced the missionaries that there is no victory in Japan for Christianity without unity in the Christian group.

Dr. McGarrah Presents Story of Actual Achievements

Dr. A. F. McGarrah, who held a Church Efficiency Institute under the auspices of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches in Boston recently, has studied his theme from the practical rather than the theoretical standpoint, and brought to his audiences the actual achievements of great churches. In his addresses he mentioned the plan of Dr. Taylor, pastor of Brick Presbyterian church in Rochester, in carrying on for thirty Sundays a year a picked class of twenty-five young men who studied a three-year course in church management. This great church of two thousand members is now supplied with leadership for some time to come. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of Madison Avenue church of New York was reported as having an even more fruitful idea. His people in addition to pledging money, pledge a given amount of time to the church, two hours a week being considered the minimum. These two hours are to be spent in calling, teaching and other labors.

World Brotherhood Continues to Grow

The world brotherhood movement is a big and growing thing as may be seen by the fact that the Baptists have organized a new brotherhood every day during the past year. Each country organizes its brotherhood movement as its will, but the aims are everywhere the same. It is proposed to end the various kinds of strife that separate men, having particular reference to industrial peace and world peace. At the World Congress in Prague in August, the closing address was given by President Masaryk. Throughout the world men long more and more for that Christian good-will which is the peculiar gift of Jesus Christ to the race.

Substitute for the Old-Fashioned Prayermeeting

The churches are not unanimous in giving up their conventional mid-week meeting, though in a great number of parishes the character of this mid-week meeting has completely changed. In many churches, as in First Christian church of Springfield, Ill., the mid-week meeting is held around the dinner table, and organizational questions are discussed. At First Congregational church of Oak Park, Ill., Dr. W. E. Barton is giving a series of lectures in the field of religious history. Each evening he will deal with the leading characteristics of

Five Facts about HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, Editors

1. It is thoroughly evangelical in character.
2. It sings, as no other hymnal sings, the social gospel.
3. It includes all the great hymns of the church and also many new ones of genuine merit.
4. It has no padding. Not a single hymn is included that has not real value.
5. It is the most beautiful hymnal published by the American church.

a century, and for each of the centuries there is a brief and descriptive title. These lecture meetings of the congregation all follow the dinner. The title for the whole series of lectures is "Twenty Centuries and Men who have made them Significant."

Marion Lawrance Retires from Leadership

On account of declining years and feeble health, Mr. Marion Lawrance, a great Sunday-school leader, is retiring from the secretaryship of the World Sunday School Association. He has served in many capacities, beginning his work in the Sunday-school organization as a superintendent of a Congregational school in the state of Ohio. His administration has been characterized by vigor and dignity blended into a program of constant progress. During his leadership in the International Association the old uniform lessons were displaced, and the graded system definitely established.

Church Holds an Agricultural Fair

The church in New York that was founded by Jonathan Edwards no longer hears sermons on "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," but has moved along with the advance of time. This church at Paris Hill is now shepherded by Rev. E. A. Northrop, and belongs to the Congregational fold. It recently held an agricultural fair modeled after the state agricultural fair except for side-shows and horse races. The idea was to make the church contribute to the advance of agricultural knowledge in the community. This is in line with the program for rural churches which is approved by various experts in methods for churches in villages and in the open country.

Evangelical Progress in South America

Evangelical work in South America has been forging forward since the Panama Congress. With all denominational rivalry eliminated on the various fields, every ounce of energy now goes into constructive work. Brazil has a Sunday-school union with a secretary and headquarters in Rio de Janeiro. A convention was held in that city recently with 138 delegates from eight provinces present. In seven years the attendance at the schools has increased 250 per cent, a very noteworthy progress. The first national Sunday-school convention was held in Argentina the third week in October. A teacher training institute has been organized in Buenos Aires.

Morality Play for Mission Centennial

It is just a hundred years since the work of foreign missions was inaugurated by the Protestant Episcopal church of America. In recognition of the centennial the Foreign Mission Board has prepared a morality play which will be given in most Episcopal parishes on October 30. This play will set forth many characteristic incidents in the progress of the foreign mission board. The work of foreign missions has often been subjected to criticism on the part of high church leaders on account of the adjustments necessary on the mission field, but these criticisms seem for the time to have abated. Intercommunion in mission lands and the opening of mission work in Roman Catholic lands have been fruitful topics of discussion from time to time.

Big Centenary Celebration in Chicago

The centennial of the birthday of George Williams, founder of the Y. M. C. A., was held in the Y. M. C. A. college on Oct. 11. A number of representative men of the nation were present and spoke. A part of the ceremonial of the day was the dedication of a George Williams room which was an exact reproduction of the room in London where the association was organized. Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture was present, and made an address.

Interchurch Body Finds Spy System in Vogue

The Interchurch World Movement's commission of inquiry into the steel strike has issued a supplementary report in which with considerable detail the charge is fastened upon this corporation that it has used the spy system. Corporation agents have joined labor unions and even become officials in the unions in order to break the morale of the men. The corporation was able to learn the inner secrets of the unions from these traitors who were secured from two detective agencies. One of these spies followed the Interchurch investigators, and was responsible for the report that these investigators were revolutionists. The recent Interchurch report alleges that federal investigations on the state of civil liberty in Pennsylvania are now buried in government files.

Christian Missionaries Much Concerned About India

The movement in India for independence headed by Ghandi with his program of non-cooperation with the government, has important bearings on the missionary situation. Ghandi has undertaken to bring the leaders of the Hindus and of the Mohammedans into accord. In spite of his efforts the Mohammedans of Malabar have declared a religious war against the Hindus. Many wise leaders in India see that the withdrawal of the British government would mean the beginning of disastrous civil war, and the probability of Japanese intervention. Most of the missionaries, while not committed to a blanket approval of the British government, have seen it as a beneficent force in the life of India.

Harvard Instructors Account for Small Number of Divinity Men

Reports continue to come in indicating that large numbers of ministers are giving up their life work, and that the schools which train ministers are for the most part enrolling a smaller number of students. Recently the faculty of Harvard Divinity school which enrolls less than a score of students, gave out a statement of the causes of a meager supply of divinity men. The reasons given were: "Decline of the religious life in the home," "the attraction of more remunerative fields of service," "the changes in religious emphasis that have come from changing theological thought," "the small financial remuneration and the reduced social influence of the ministry."

Ministers Live a Long Time

Life insurance companies know the average death rate of every vocational group in the country. They rate the ministers ahead of any other profession or calling for longevity. They even exceed the farmer. Unquestionably the moral element is a factor. In conformation of these facts the Princeton Theological Seminary recently published the statistics with regard to a number of former students. Seventy-one of these had lived to an average of 67 years, 1 month and 24 days. One attained the age of 97 years and the other 90. In the figures is the interesting fact that the average age of uniting with the church for these men was at 16.

Newspapermen Deal Kindly with Gypsy Smith

During the course of the Gypsy Smith meetings in Pittsburgh, Mr. Smith had frequent occasion to compliment the press of the city for their generous treatment of him. That this was not undeserved one may note from an editorial published in one of the city papers. It said: "If you should see Gypsy Smith on the street, stop him and shake his hand. He will like it. No matter how crowded his hour, he always has time to greet one more. He will gain something from knowing you, for because he is a great minister to humanity his ministrations are based upon the intimate knowledge of his fellows that comes from first-hand contacts." It is said that 110,000 attended the Gypsy Smith meetings during his three weeks stay.

The Missionary Who is Farthest North

Dr. Grenfell lives in a tropical climate as compared with that in which Rev. Frank Spence does his work. Mr. Spence is the Presbyterian missionary at Point Barrow, Alaska, which is 1,000 miles north of Newfoundland. He conducts a hospital and other forms of mission work among the Esquimaux. His constituency is only thirty years out of heathenism, and knows but little of the arts of civilization. Mr. Spence is touring the United States at the present time giving addresses in Presbyterian churches on the Alaska mission.

What of the People Leaving Roman Catholicism in Bohemia?

The ecclesiastical world is deeply interested in the future religious alignment of the hundreds of thousands of people who are leaving the Roman Catholic church in Czecho-Slovakia. It is said by competent observers that three characteristic things are taking place. About a million people have declared themselves without creed altogether. Large numbers are continuing the Latin ritual in the Czecho-Slovak language and are professing the creed of the Orthodox church. A temporary bishop presides over these churches who will act until the native church can elect its own bishops. It seems certain that a considerable part of Czecho-Slovakia will join the group of Orthodox communions of eastern Europe. Many thousands have accepted the Reformed faith of John Huss and Presbyterian missionaries from the United States will assist these in working out the organization of their churches according to Reformed models.

Stewardship Rallies Throughout the United States

Most of the Disciples missionary and benevolent secretaries are now on the road giving addresses on stewardship. A big campaign is on to induce members of the communion to become tithers. Where this cannot be done, they are urged to adopt some other percentage and develop a treasury for religious work. Dr. Royal J. Dye is speaking in Texas, and each of the secretaries is in some different section of the country. The Layman Publishing Company is providing a considerable portion of the literature that is being used.

Illinois Disciples Will Send Steamer to Africa

Rev. A. F. Hensey of the Congo country spoke at the Illinois Disciples convention at Decatur recently on the need of a vessel with which to navigate the Congo. He revived the memory of the drowning of Rev. Ray Eldred, a leading missionary of the Congo, a few years ago. Though it is not the custom in these conventions to raise money, Rev. H. H. Peters called for pledges to provide a modern and well-equipped wood-burning steamer. Five thousand dollars of the ten thousand needed were quickly subscribed, and the remainder of the money will be provided by the missionary societies throughout the state. On the strength of the pledge of five thousand dollars an order has been placed for the steamer so that by the time the money is raised, the boat will be ready for shipment. The new vessel will be called "Illinois," and will be

Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook says of Lloyd C. Douglas'

Wanted—A Congregation

"Mr. Douglas's volume is not a story with a moral, but a moral in a story. A minister who is preaching to a small and eminently respectable congregation in a large church is invited to a birthday dinner with a college classmate; meets there three successful men—a manufacturer, a doctor, and an editor; is inspired with a new spirit of energy, enterprise and initiative, and goes home to put into his business the spirit which they put into theirs and to employ much the same sort of methods. It is a good book for ministers to read, because a spirit of energy, enterprise, and initiative is a good spirit for ministers to acquire. But to imitate the Rev. Dr. Preston Blue's methods and expect from the methods the Rev. Preston Blue's success would be a great mistake. Mere imitation rarely achieves a great success, and never in any form of industry which requires spiritual power. And methods which are employed by one minister in one community with good results may, when employed by a minister of a different temperament and in a different community, be fatal to results. I commend the book for inspiration but not for imitation."

Protestant Churches Invited to Remember Dante

The National Dante Committee recently asked the Federal Council to join in the celebration of the six hundredth anniversary of the death of Dante, the great Christian poet. The Federal Council has not acceded to this request officially, but a number of prominent members of the council have endorsed the movement that the Protestants should celebrate the achievements of the great Italian poet who when properly understood teaches many lessons in religion which are quite modern. Those endorsing the appeal are Charles A. Dinsmore of Yale University; Oscar Kuhns of Wesleyan University; John A. Raven of Rutgers College; John H. Moore of Marcy Avenue Baptist church; Ernest N. Stires of St. Thomas' church, and Finis S. Idleman of Central Church of Disciples. The ministers in the list are of New York.

Apostle of Christian Unity Travels

Rev. Peter Ainslie, advocate of Christian unity not only among the Disciples where his convictions and faith in this cause were first formed but also among many other communions of Christians, has a sabbatical year during which he will not be on duty at the Christian Temple in Baltimore. He is devoting the year to special addresses on Christian unity and international friendship. During November he will be in Ohio and Michigan. December will be spent in Kentucky and Missouri. January, February and March he will speak on the Pacific coast. Dr. Ainslie is president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity.

Congregationalists Want Newspaper Aid in Evangelism

At the various denominational rallies held recently in connection with the evangelistic conference of the Chicago Church Federation, the Congregationalists discussed the use of the newspapers in preparing the way for the evangelistic message. They urged that space be purchased in leading Chicago papers during Lent which should carry a strong religious message. It was believed that the newspapers would reach many who are not ordinarily touched by the churches.

Church Workers Told How to Work

Many local churches, especially those that hold to the congregational order, have never been educated in proper church methods. The Missouri Christian Missionary Society headed by Rev. C. C. Garrigues, executive secretary, are mailing out to church workers leaflets in which the church program is skeletonized. By means of the condensed leaflet of suggestions the various officers and departments of church work are brought to a conception of their function in the total organization. A significant feature of the program for the coming year is that every church, whether it has a pastor or not, is to hold the communion service every Sunday under the leadership of a local elder.

Dr. McGarrah Popular in Boston

Dr. Albert F. McGarrah, the church efficiency man, has spent two days in Boston recently. At the ministers' meeting four hundred men were in attendance. A noon meeting of laymen brought out 350, and these remained to hear Mr. McGarrah through. The women leaders of Boston also held a meeting and have decided to accept plans furnished by the efficiency lecturer for the reorganization of their work in Boston.

Federal Council Puts Out New Creed

Doctrinal statements are never issued from the offices of the Federal Council of Churches, but this organization does not hesitate to make pronouncements upon questions of practical importance. The Social Creed of a few years ago is now followed by "A Creed for Believers in a Warless World." There are ten articles in the creed which are as follows: "(1) We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments. (2) We believe in international laws, courts of justice and boards of arbitration. (3) We believe in a world-wide association of nations for world peace. (4) We believe in equality of race treatment. (5) We believe that Christian patriotism demands the practice of good-will between nations. (6) We believe that nations no less than individuals are subject to God's immutable moral laws. (7) We believe that peoples achieve true welfare, greatness and honor through just dealing and unselfish service. (8) We believe that nations that are Christians have special international obligations. (9) We believe that the spirit of Christian brotherhood can conquer every barrier of trade, color, creed and race. (10) We believe in a warless world, and dedicate ourselves to its achievement."

The International Missionary Council

THE World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh in 1910 brought missionary cooperation up to the highest level that it had ever reached. One of its great creative acts was to provide for a Continuation Committee charged with carrying on the spirit and investigations of the conference. This committee brought together at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., Sept. 30-Oct. 5, the International Missionary Council. Representatives from fourteen nations met and adopted a constitution and elected officers. The personalities in the meeting were of the most diverse sort. A Church of England bishop from Madagascar looked into the eyes of a Japanese bishop of the Methodist persuasion from Japan. An English baronet looked into the eyes of a West African chieftain. Representatives came from Australia and South Africa as well as from Norway, Sweden and Finland. John R. Mott of New York presided over the meetings. Prominent among the personalities was Mr. J. H. Oldham of the International Review of Missions.

The council quickly decided that it did not wish to assume any administrative responsibilities or to constitute itself into any kind of super-church organization. The lessons of the Interchurch Movement are not forgotten among religious leaders today. The functions of the organization have been officially defined as follows: "(1) To stimulate thinking and investigation on missionary questions, to enlist in the solution of these questions the best knowledge and experience to be found in all countries and to make results available for all missionary societies and missions. (2) To help to coordinate the activities of the national missionary organizations of the different countries, and of the societies which they represent, and to bring about united action where necessary in missionary matters. (3) Through common consultation to help unite Christian public opinion in support of freedom of conscience and religion and of missionary liberty. (4) To help unite the Christian forces of the world in seeking justice in international and interracial relations, especially where politically weaker people are involved. (5) To be responsible for the publication of the International Review of Missions and such other publications as in the judgment of the committee may contribute to the study of missionary questions. (6) To call another world missionary conference if desirable."

One of the disappointments of the meeting was that no German leaders were present. These were not yet ready to accept repeated and urgent invitations to attend. The case of the German missionaries was considered and it was the deliberate judgment of the conference that they had seldom if ever involved themselves in political matters. The conference said by resolution: "The wounds of the war cannot be fully healed until the way is opened for German missionaries to resume foreign missionary work." It was the expressed judgment that Germany needed to share the spiritual uplift that comes from engaging in missionary work.

Representatives from mission lands voiced no demands for autonomous native churches, but in a series of questions they brought the fundamental issues to the attention of the conference. The conference took the position that this was one of the questions which should be dealt with by the various mission boards. Japan already has in a large measure an autonomous church, and Africa is clearly not ready for one. Nevertheless, it was the opinion of the leaders that progress in this direction should be made as rapidly as possible.

It is expected that the next meeting of the council will be upon the Continent of Europe some time in 1923. Dr. John R. Mott was elected president, and J. H. Oldham and Dr. A. L. Warnshuis secretaries. Mr. Oldham and Miss G. A. Gollock were elected joint editors of the International Review of Missions.

Announcement

The demand for Dr. John A. Hutton's great book, "The Proposal of Jesus," has been so large the publishers suddenly find themselves without copies to meet the calls for the book. Another edition—to sell at $1.50—is being put through the presses and copies will be at hand about November 10.

The editor of The Christian Century says of this book:

"The Proposal of Jesus" opens up a new pathway to the mind of Jesus and suggests a fresh apologetic for the social gospel, putting Jesus fairly behind the social ideals of modern Christianity.

This stimulating book will be read by thousands of alert Christian leaders during this season. Send in your order now and the book will be mailed to you immediately upon receipt of our shipment of the new edition.

Each One Win--Two!

Christian Century readers this season

YOU have at least two friends---and more likely a dozen---who would become regular readers of The Christian Century if you would tell them about it. There are thousands of men and women in the churches whose view of the future of religion is colored with pessimism. There are thousands more outside the churches whose alienation or indifference is due to fundamental misunderstandings. When The Christian Century falls into the hands of persons belonging to either of these classes they are amazed at the new vision it opens up to them. Our present readers are the best people in the world to widen the circle of The Christian Century's helpfulness. As a believer in and upholder of progressive ideals in religion, you are deeply concerned in the development of a compact body of progressive thought in the churches. If each reader will add only two new readers, the power of progressive ideals will be trebled! What an achievement, and yet how simple in the doing! We make the following proposition to our present subscribers:

Looking Toward The Armament Conference

THE INDIANAPOLIS NEWS says: "In looking forward to the great gathering of representatives of the nations that is to meet in Washington November 11, it is the duty of Americans to cultivate a peaceful spirit, and to recognize the fact that peace can be won and enjoyed only by those who earnestly desire it, are dominated by a passion for it, and are willing to work and make sacrifices for it. A good deal more than diplomacy is needed to bring it to pass. Probably not since the beginning of the Christian era has there been a more moving call to the Christian church. Does it believe in the possibility of the fulfillment of the angelic prophecy of 'peace on earth' or is the church itself infected with the foul disease of cynicism and 'practicality?'"

It would perhaps not be too much to say that the fruitage of the coming Congress will be according to the active will and working of the Churches of Christ. If their effort results in a general and persistent demand for disarmament—or approximate disarmament—that wished-for goal will probably be attained. If the Churches are lukewarm in their attitude, the advocates of "practicality" will no doubt win the day. Ten thousand American ministers thoroughly alive and alert to this great opportunity would perhaps bring to pass the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy of perpetual peace. Every minister should have at hand the following books, as aids in a campaign for the making of sentiment for disarmament.

The Next War. By Will Irwin. By no means a war book; rather one which points out the course leading to world peace. A book, which by its general tone and by the wealth of facts and statistics that it presents, leads to comment and discussion. ($1.50.)

Economic Causes of Modern Wars. By John Bakeless. A prize essay of William College, setting forth all the economic factors which have played an important part in bringing about modern warfare. The period covered is from 1878 to 1918. ($4.)

The Sword or the Cross. By Kirby Page. Prof. Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, says: "Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war." ($1.20.)

The Untried Door. By Richard Roberts. The author, who is pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, holds that the world has run into a blind alley, while all the time the "untried door"—Jesus' teaching—offers a way out. He maintains that Jesus' teachings are practicable today. ($1.50.)

The Proposal of Jesus. A bold challenge to the Church to show that it accepts Christ by applying his ideals to the solution of modern problems. ($1.50.)

A New Mind for the New Age. By Henry Churchill King. ($1.50.)

The Religious Basis of a Better World Order. By Joseph Fort Newton. ($1.25.)

The New Horizon in Church and State. By W. H. P. Faunce. (.80.)

Some Aspects of International Christianity. By John Kelman. ($1.00.)

The Fruits of Victory. By Norman Angell. A sequel to "The Great Illusion," containing in as clear and vigorous a style as before, his economic arguments for internationalism. ($3.)

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church.
All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

The Education of the International Mind

WHATEVER else comes of the Armament Conference the American people are going to receive a liberal education in world politics as a result of it. Already the Washington gathering overtops every other event, current or future, in public interest. The daily press is rightly sensing its unique importance as news, and both newspapers and magazines are entering upon a discussion of international questions with such vigor and research as our isolated national consciousness has never experienced before. By looking back to pre-war days one can measure the great change that has been brought about in our way of thinking of world affairs. The war compelled the rank and file of us to take an interest in aspects of the world situation which only specialists among us had cared about before. But the psychology of a war time is not conducive to real understanding. With the war past, the Washington conference is now compelling the man in the street to face thoughtfully and objectively the concrete facts as to the policies and interests and rights of all the nations in the complex relationships which weave them inextricably together. We are about to be truly emancipated from the provincialism of mind in which state the war found us. We have already learned much. And the conference should give us something worthy to be called an international mind. However the "little Americans" in our political offices may try to keep America from bearing her share of common world responsibility, they cannot repress the enlargement of our intellectual understanding of world affairs. And with that understanding once achieved no power can keep the United States from action in harmony with our vision and intelligent conviction. These days are thrilling with tokens of a new era. It is a moment when the church's message for peace, uttered with intelligence and prophetic passion, will be given such consideration by mankind as never before. Future anniversaries of November 6 and November 11 will bring haunting memories to the Christian minister who fails to use the great opportunities which those dates afford in this year of our Lord, 1921.

Shall Sixty Millions Be Wasted?

THE waste of sixty million dollars by the Christians of America would be a very serious thing. Probably no single sum of money has ever been raised for philanthropic work which matches this amount. For the starving orphans of Armenia this money has been expended in recent years, and as a result two million people are alive who would not otherwise be alive. To stop at this time would be to waste the sixty millions that have already been spent. If the massacre of Armenia has been the master crime of Christian history, the saving of the Armenian orphans is the outstanding philanthropy of modern times, for there is nothing to match it in magnitude. For this great philanthropy to fail after its splendid beginnings would be to write a strange and disgusting finish to what might otherwise be a glorious romance. It is within the power of any average American family to feed another child this year. Sixty dollars a year will accomplish the result, a much less sum than it costs to feed the children in our own homes, owing to the application of scientific method and wholesale buying. Five dollars a month, a little over a dollar a week, adds to humanity a child of a race that deserves to survive. The annual call for this great enterprise is now before the American people. It is a call that has attached to it nothing that is sectarian. In the spirit of the good Samaritan the American people are asked to minister to those who have literally fallen into the hands of thieves, and have been left by the wayside to perish of their wounds. To such an appeal there can be but one reply. This year the campaign is being most vividly presented by the use of a moving picture called "Alice in Hungerland." The picture is being reproduced by the Pathescope people on non-inflammable film for use in churches and schools. When the picture was first shown in Chicago the other day the strongest men were glad of the semi-darkness in which to wipe away their tears. But along with the horrors of famine, the picture showed the wonders of the reconstruction program including industrial education for the children, work mingled with a proper amount of play, so that the orphans of today may at the earliest possible moment take up the burden of their own support.

Catholic Spirit In Protestant Churches

CHRISTIAN unity halts because it has never been made popular. The program of the ordinary denominational church emphasizes denominationalism, even though the minister may be of the larger spirit. Just as the cause of social uplift halts because it has so far found expression chiefly in resolutions which are locked up in secretarial files without putting forth adequate effort to make the average layman understand the social creed of the churches, so in a less degree, perhaps, the cause of Christian union has been kept a sort of esoteric thing. A Methodist church in California observed its good literature day not long since. Two good Methodist papers were on the literature table, but in addition there were copies of the Continent, the Congregationalist and The Christian Century. The pastor of that church wants his congregation to know about Methodism of course, but he feels the need of introducing his people to the larger Christian world. Were his example followed in all denominations, the cause of unity would be enormously aided. In the preaching of the ministers there is a vast amount of illustrative material which should be drawn from interdenominational sources. Time was when any reference to another denomination beside one's own had to be critical in tone. When this time passed there came the present period in which preaching has but little reference to neighboring denominational families. The isolation of the formal friendship involved in this attitude may be even more harmful socially than the attitude of hostile criticism. What is needed in the preaching of today is a frank recognition of the successes and virtues of Christian men in all communions. To admit that the Congregationalists can teach us something about education, or that the Methodists are successful money-raisers or that the Presbyterians build great loyalties or that the Baptists are strongly evangelistic is not to hurt one's own communion, but rather to enrich it. The ecclesiastical personalities known to the average laymen are usually those of his own household of faith. Before the church can be one, interdenominational acquaintance must spread to the rank and file of the various constituent churches.

Chicago Politicians Would Rule Illinois

THE Illinois constitutional convention is not in session at the present time, but one of its last acts previous to an adjournment until Christmas was the passage of a resolution re-making the Illinois legislature. The senate by this scheme would be limited in such a way that Chicago could never control it, but the house of representatives would become immediately the possession of whatever band of politicians happened to be in control in the Chicago city hall. This would mean the defeat of every piece of reform legislation that might ever be introduced in the legislature and would give to Illinois the distinction of being the worst governed state in the union. At first blush it looks to the layman in law as if the majority should rule, even though that involved the domination of a whole state by a single city. However, other states in the union have not settled the question in this way. There are balances and checks in the system of American government which make it a republic rather than a town meeting democracy. For this reason it is impossible for New York City to control the state government, no matter how large the city may become. The same provision holds in Pennsylvania. The power of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh in the state government is limited power. The Anti-Saloon League of Illinois and many other organizations devoted to good government are committed to the idea that there should be a system of county representation in Illinois which would indeed give Cook county far larger representation than less populous counties, but which would forever debar this county from securing the control and making the laws for the rest of the state. In one way it is fortunate that Chicago's city government appears in its true light just now. The citizens of the rest of Illinois and those citizens of Chicago who are interested in the triumph of ethical principle in government have a good chance to appreciate the calamity that would befall the state if Illinois should be governed by the spoilsmen who are in control of the city hall.

The Recruiting of the Ministry

POPULAR magazines have taken up the topic of the recruitment of the ministry as one of the outstanding national questions. The editor of the Century Magazine recently gave his leading editorial to its consideration. In the Independent, Dr. Franklin H. Giddings declares that the ministry has been losing influence because of "bad theology, bad Christianity and bad Protestantism." Among the causes assigned by the many writers who have treated the subject, the war ranks first. The decline in purchasing power of salary, and the decline of social influence are other factors. It is also alleged that young men fail to enter the ministry because of the limitation of the freedom of speech. The Council of the Church Boards of Education has been gathering statistics from the seminaries this fall with regard to ministerial students. The findings indicate that fifty institutions have a gain. How significant this gain is in some schools is shown by the reports from Boston University, a Methodist institution. This school has grown from 1500 in 1911 to 10,000 students in all departments this year. There are four hundred students of religious education, large numbers of whom will professionalize the knowledge they are gaining. This university has the largest graduate school of theology in the country, and the entering class this year numbers 115, the largest entering class in the history of the school. The Council of Church Boards of Education is taking up the incomplete survey made by the Interchurch World Movement and will push it to a conclusion so that the facts may be in the hands of the churches. It is believed by the leaders of the Council that there are many erroneous impressions abroad with regard to the preparation of young men for the ministry. Bible institutes, and short course institutions, as well as the regular divinity schools, will be included in the survey. Meanwhile many great laymen are expressing the opinion that it is their duty to see that the Christian ministry is not allowed to disappear from our American society. The religious leader may have suffered an eclipse in popularity, and he surely has been the victim of harsh and often insupportable economic conditions, but in the language of the street he is "going to come back."

Another Religious Encyclopedia Being Projected

OF religious encyclopedias there is no end. First came the great Biblical encyclopedias by Hastings and Cheyne. The Jewish Encyclopedia gave an authoritative source of information for things Jewish. The Catholics produced the Catholic Encyclopedia which is a thesaurus of knowledge about this ancient church. The Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics is a monumental work covering the whole field of religion, philosophy and ethics, and is filled with information of the most authoritative sort. It is now proposed to bring out an American Encyclopedia of Christianity. The Appleton publishing firm is behind the project, and "founders" are being sought who will start the enterprise by subscribing five hundred dollars each. The new encyclopedia would do for Protestantism what the Catholic Encyclopedia has done for Catholicism. While Protestant history stretches over few centuries as compared to the history of the other organizations noted, there is room nevertheless for a work of merit in this field. It is most difficult to secure reliable information with regard to many of the Protestant sects, their beliefs, organization and program. To secure this information in an easily available form would tend to bring into being that wider fellowship which many Christians covet. It is hard to hate any man when once we know him, and interdenominational acquaintance is one of the great needs of the hour. There is danger, however, that the new work may fall into hands which might make it a kind of conservative protest against the scholarly work that has gone into the great biblical and religious encyclopedias that preceded it. If the work were undertaken in this spirit it would fail to command the best talent, and would therefore be of no significance to the church at large. Religious scholarship has made some definite progress which cannot be ignored in any future enterprises of the church. Turning back the hands on the clock of history is impossible.

Why Not Denominational Disarmament Also?

ONE of our most brilliant magazine writers, and many thoughtful statesmen as well, remind us that at the finish of the next great war, for which there seems to be such strenuous preparation in so many quarters, it will make no difference who may have won or lost. All will lose, as a matter of stubborn reality. The victor no more than the vanquished can survive such an ordeal. When the small boy ties together the tails of two cats, and slings them over the clothes-line, it is idle to speculate either before or after the denouement which is the better cat, or which showed the more malicious nature in striking out first with his claw. The sweepings from the melee are indistinguishable tufts of fur, and the gory and shredded corpses leave no choice of beauty or of ghastliness. When two or ten churches indulge in a free-for-all in the same community, such questions as which comes nearer expressing the everlasting truth of God, or which started the row, or which "does more for the community," have no significance worth taking account of. It is impossible that the truth of God and the gospel of Christ shall be presented by any under such conditions. It cannot weigh an ounce weight who was or is the aggressor in such a controversy. A community which has religion mediated to it by a circle of competing, irreconcilable sectarian groups is being done to its death, and after it has reached its estate of confirmed spiritual despair, it is a gratuity, not to say an impudence, for one or another to lift a voice declaiming its fame of having driven in deepest the knife of faction and division.

Federal Government Stops Sale of Fake Degrees

RECENTLY the postal department of the federal government put an end to a diploma mill located in Colorado. In some weeks as much as $1,200 was secured from a gullible public. The concern was called "Centennial State University." With no buildings, no professors, and no classes, the "Centennial State University" consisted of a single man who knew human weakness well enough to prey upon it for money. Among his dupes were large numbers of ministers who wanted the D. D. degree. The significance of this degree has been greatly discounted in the academic world because it has been granted so frequently by unworthy institutions, but the federal government thought that it should not be sold for so much per. The incident reveals clearly the shallow thinking of large numbers of people. They easily assume that success is something associated with titles and degrees. Perhaps these do have some influence in certain sections of the world, but it is much more true that the chief element in success is personal worth, not names and titles. The church in the past ten years has driven out of her service large numbers of highly trained and competent men. In their places have come partly trained and incompetent persons who reveal the inadequacy of their thinking by the purchase of a degree. After they have bought the degree, they can also buy sermons from sermon mills, but though they continue buying these fake remedies, they soon reveal their shallowness in their personal relations with their parishioners. The action of these unworthy ministers reflects upon a considerable body of strong and conscientious men who have long since ceased to care about degrees, but who are worthy of all the honors that any institution could confer upon them.

Are We Entering a New Era?

ONE of the most staggering phenomena of the times is the breakdown of representative government. It makes many feel that the very foundations of the social order are crumbling. Perhaps at no point is there such clear evidence that a new era is at hand as in the collapse of the mechanism on which we have grown accustomed to believe that security in every department of social life finally depends. The superficial verdict of some is that democracy is failing. The reactionary clamors to have us return to some order which the past has demonstrated to be secure. As though there were such. If any program of the past had demonstrated its security, manifestly it would still prevail. Precisely because of the failure of all such, we have moved on to where we now are. The only recourse in a new extremity is to move on again, and forward is the only direction in which a passable road lies.

The new guiding principle, when we discover and apply it, will be found an affair of religion and economics, of statecraft and industry, of sociology and personal ideals. Representative government, throughout the course of American civilization thus far, has not been merely a method of civil administration. It has been the formative principle in every department of our social life. The American meets any and every social issue by appointing a committee. It is easier to define its workings and to observe its collapse in the political field than elsewhere, but our social system is one, and this has been its guiding principle, its dominant force, its formula of procedure wherever two or three have been gathered together in any relation. Practically the only vitiating or modifying influence has been the carry-over from earlier types of social organization, atavisms which society has been too weak or too indolent to relinquish. Autocracy, against which our civilization has fought and won so doughtily, has yet died hard, even in our social scheme. Its last kicks have again and again almost toppled over our frail social structure. The reactionary has turned back to it lovingly in many an emergency, regretting the days when humanity was believed to be so happy though so securely in bondage. Along the path of representative government have lain all the good things which humanity has been encouraged to hope for. It is thus not surprising that the breakdown of this system, the hopeless confusion into which it has brought our whole social order, should now stagger even the hardiest, and lead the timid to wonder whether we are not plunging into the abyss.

The perspective of the historian offers some reassurance, though he may not prove a satisfying prophet to guide us into the new era. He points out the course which civilization has followed thus far, and, by depicting the chastening tragedies at earlier turning points in human progress, inspires a faith in human ability to marshal the material, intellectual and spiritual forces to meet this new crisis. The earliest social mass movements came to their climax in the great oriental imperial despotisms. They embodied what Fiske calls the principle of consolidation through conquest. They were utterly routed by the Roman principle of incorporation. Rome retained the method of conquest but used it not as an end, but as a means of social unification. Nations and races whom Rome conquered, sooner or later, and usually very soon, swelled with the Roman pride. Watch even the Apostle Paul straighten his shoulders, as he responds to the official, a "freedman," who protested that his "freedom" had cost him a great sum of money, and was slow to believe that Paul could have attained such opulence,—“I am a Roman,” says Paul, “for I was free born.”

This is the indelible and proud mark of the Roman, whether Tuscan, Frank or Gaul. His conqueror became his hero. Caesar is the superman, a god even before his death, and so securely apotheosized that a late Charles or a Napoleon or even a William Hohenzollern found his title to such short-lived majesty as he enjoyed in the conquering pose. This was new in its day, thrillingly new. It led philosophers and even saints to an assurance satisfying to them that the final bond had been established, the social ne plus ultra attained. The principle became the dogma of religion, and the religious, civil and economic order was bound up in it. The weakness of the bond, which permitted the disintegration of the Roman Empire, was so obscured in the vision of ecclesiasticism that the Holy Roman Empire immediately succeeded and persisted nominally or actually for a millennium. The interpretation which most historians give the middle ages is that the church rendered a lasting and ever-to-be-honored service to humanity by furnishing the only social bond of that long and, for the most part, dismal era. Perhaps another and truer interpretation may prove to be that a tenacious, uncompromising, unreasoning, anti-social religious dogmatism, insisted upon fastening upon society a principle of social organization which the collapse of the political state had already shown to be false, or at least inadequate. Thus, hierarchy, ecclesiasticism, interposed to violate and frustrate natural social forces, and condemned civilization to the long blight of the middle ages. It would seem that the collapse of the political order, in the fall of the Roman Empire, should have been a sufficiently clear demonstration that the principle on which it was founded could not permanently control. The stubborn retention of that principle by the church would seem, not a saving grace, but a monumental disservice to humanity. The principle had to go in the end, and under the guidance of true spiritual insights it would seem reasonable to expect that the new principle might have been given control a millennium earlier than it actually triumphed.

Such speculations are idle, except as they may furnish warnings in our new crisis. It is apparent that the Holy Roman Empire was founded upon a futility, that official religion interposed to save a social system which the collapse of the original political Roman state had surely doomed. That fact, however directly or indirectly it may be found reflected in events of today, is worthy of the most serious consideration. The crisis of today is that of official religion quite as much as, perhaps more than, that of other departments of the social scheme.

The principle which finally triumphed in the political order, and which in our western civilization has spread to every department, was that of representation. It introduced a new and far more powerful social bond than the Roman system could show. The Roman conqueror could not hold his own, however greatly superior to the bond of the ancient oriental empires his system proved to be. The loyalty he generated so successfully at first, proved too flimsy at last. The large social units he formed were held together by no bond which insured the liberty of the several elements. It was incorporation without representation, as Fiske phrases it. The new principle, which triumphed among the Teutonic peoples, and especially among the English, during the slow and blind struggles of the thirteenth through the eighteenth centuries, and brilliantly burst forth in the American revolution, was that of incorporation through representation. So glorious was this achievement that the proud Briton and the self-satisfied American have concluded that they may bask in its effulgence forever. It has been thought to be the final word. It has been by various devices more or less violently forced upon other lands and other races and other civilizations. Some have accepted it with good grace and others with very poor grace indeed. The grumblings against this system, and the growing resistance to the political domination which it imposes upon unwilling peoples in various parts of the world, are enraging to many of us and are surprising to all. We have had no other thought but that our system of "popular government" is to prove the saving of all humanity. The resistance of other races and social aggregations we have esteemed a mark of their perversity, a degeneracy or belated development, a backwardness or inferiority which time and hard knocks, some of which we find it our occasional duty to administer, will infallibly cure. It may break through our conceit and smug self-satisfaction to find our precious principle going down in the collapse of our own institutions. Not in Borcoboolahgah nor among the aborigines of Yucatan is representative government breaking down, but at Westminster and in Washington. And the collapse at the apex of our system seems to be about to bring on the ruin of the structure, at its base, in state and province and region and county and city and town.

A British writer in a recent number of one of our magazines discusses almost in despair what he styles the twilight of parliament. For him it is not the glimmering of a dawn; it is evening, harbinger of the night, and all too black a night. Any American who has not seen the signs of disintegration in our federal congress, both branches, has been blinded by partisanship or has not observed at all. It is true that some still look upon this distressing phenomenon as merely the recurrence, somewhat more painful than usual, of a governmental slump which alarmed the fathers in the eighteen-thirties, and which required a reckless Jackson to save the day; and again in the nineties of the old century and the first decade of the new, from which many believe we were redeemed by a greater and a bolder Roosevelt. But accumulating evidences of decay in our whole political system cannot longer escape the great mass of thoughtful Americans. The Briton wonders more anxiously than in any recent generation whether he and his civilization can "muddle through" much longer. Have we reached another turning-point in human history? Are we swinging on a major pivot? Is this a real crisis, or only another of those rough spots in the road which set sensitive maidens of advanced years and of the male sex in the halls of state and church to crying out their timid "ohs" and "ahs."

If we do not treat it as the former we shall not only be condemned by the historian of the future, but we shall fail of the courage of the very convictions which we have been vaunting ever since the war broke to shock us into new thoughtfulness. We have been announcing from every rostrum and proclaiming from every pulpit the dawning of a new day, the coming of a new era, the break-up of the old order and the challenge to build anew. To be sure, few of us have known what we meant by that. Not all have been downright sincere in our proclamations. What we have expected is a little patching here, and some rather vigorous polishing there, but a new order, a thorough rebuilding of our institutions, is what very, very few of us have consented to or are disposed to consent to, eloquently as we have encouraged our statesmen and pulpiteers to declaim on the subject.

If there were space here it might be profitable to point out the evidences of this collapse in representative government, but surely for most of the readers of The Christian Century the spectacle of our federal congress, of our state legislatures and civil officialdom, and of our ecclesiastical conclaves, is quite sufficient to carry conviction. The discovery of the fact is not our chief concern; that has been forced upon us. We are now seeking the new guiding principle. That found we shall be able more intelligently to build the social mechanism in civil, economic and religious departments which will insure social security. Perhaps only the historian of 2021 will clearly phrase the terms in which this new principle will be expressed. We shall arrive at it with much labor and pain, doubtless. But we shall attain it soonest through the open mind, and the expulsion of all dogmatism. At the least, can we not save the new age from the abysmal folly of an ecclesiastical or hierarchic obstinacy which insists upon saving the old order at the cost of decades and even centuries of spiritual reaction? If ever religion was needed to lead on, and not to hold back, it is now. Wherever else we are bound for, it is not back anywhere. Whatever we may need in the way of religion, it is not that which prides itself upon being old-fashioned. God save us and the coming generations from a repetition of the folly of a Holy Roman Empire builded out of the ruins of the political Roman Empire, social ideals and all!

However remote we may still be from the discovery of this new principle, it will give us clearer vision for the search if we recognize the fundamental defect of our present order, the evil virus which permeates all, and reveals itself at every turn in the organization of state and church, and in every phase of our larger social program. Is it not this? Are we not out everywhere, as individuals, as groups, as parties, as religious denominations, as social propagandists, to win our rights, to hold our own, to insure our interests, to "put over" our pet scheme? We have taken the fathers at their word, and have glorified rights until,—until we have forfeited them! The era was ushered in with a "bill of rights," and rights have been our Magna Charta from the first heroic struggle to this all but fatal hour. We have sanctioned the process by which each individual or social group has claimed the privilege of forming his or its own definition of rights, and have applauded their boldness and uncompromising determination to win those rights,—up to the point where they encroach upon the domain which we have marked out for our rights, when there is a fight. Apotheosizing rights has glorified fighting, and fighting writ large is war. War we now know. The seeds of war lie in our whole social system, they are dormant in every type of social organization, and they spring into noxious florescence with the first favoring wind and rain.

Our legislative bodies big and little are simply aggregations of sworn and fast-bound attorneys for special interests. The old political parties have in all but name gone to pieces, and they are succeeded everywhere by blocs which are even more blindly and irreconcilably committed to private or class interests. Their excesses of selfishness are shaming even their own attorneys in the halls of the federal congress. This clash and interclash of special or group interests riddle every ecclesiastical assembly which convenes, and turn national congresses of women's clubs and even missionary societies into figurative if not literal hair-pulling contests. The economic program is frankly on this basis, and the most enlightened statesmanship of business is to this day able to see no farther than the "democratization of industry" according to forms which have fastened upon our society the monumental disgraces from which we suffer in politics. Our glitteringly successful "co-operative" agricultural and industrial associations are simply the producing interests massed the more effectively to exploit the consuming public. We talk in faltering phrases of the identity of interest between capital and labor, while the social machinery under which they operate forces them into periodic clashes such as that which threatened up to a few days ago to lock the wheels of the entire industrial mechanism.

At this point the pious ecclesiastic arises to say, "I have known it all along; I said as much at the very start. What we need is Christianity, the preaching of the church, the practice of the principle of brotherly love." May we not now give short shrift to such patter? What do we mean by such phrases? The pious brother who prattles them is himself responsible for the perpetuation of ecclesiastical machinery which often goes farthest to belie and ravish this holy principle. Is it not time we had a little practice in churchly mechanism to support or take the place of such meaningless preaching? It gets us nowhere either in church or state to run on forever repeating these formulas. Precious and sufficing as is brotherly love the phrase is worse than meaningless, it is an out-and-out falsehood, so long as we nurture a social scheme which is set up and operates inexorably to make its sincere expression impossible. Our whole system, ecclesiastical and political and economic, is a fabric of specialized interests, organized to serve special interests, and successful only in the degree in which those special interests are served.

We are living in and by a "bill of rights," whatever may be our pious professions. We are each and all, as individuals and by groups and parties and denominations, striving for our rights. And the strife is milling out the best there is in our human nature. What we need is not to be lined up before a sedate old-maidenly Sunday school teacher and told that we should quit our fighting and love one another. We know that thoroughly well already, or, though it has escaped our apprehension, our tutor and her school will never succeed in inculcating the lesson. Out of her Sunday best, we are thoroughly aware that she is zealously joining the very strife against which she warns us.

Yet there is a way. A social mechanism can be devised which will embody the principle of service instead of rights, which will honor outgiving instead of seizure, creation instead of acquisition. But none of the programs or cults which have survived from the old order can build that society. No theory or practice which pits class against class offers any hope. We face a crisis in human affairs the like of which has occurred but twice or thrice in all millenniums, if ever before, and it means that a new principle and motive power must be incorporated in civilization. The day of rights is past. If love and service are to be dominating motives of human endeavor, what shall be the nature of the institutions through which they shall be given play? Not those of either state or church which survive from the old era of rights and sects.

The Silver Mine

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE is a place where they mine for silver, and some of those who seek it find it, and the number of those who do not is as sixteen to one. And this did they tell me concerning one great mine where now they take forth silver and lead in great quantities.

Eleven long years did they dig before they found the silver. And they sunk much money and many hopes before they got back much of either. For they digged a year upon one level, and made galleries to the right hand and to the left. Then did they sink the mine deeper and run galleries likewise. And then did they dig in other directions.

And when at the end of eleven years, their money having been well-nigh spent, they found the silver, then did they go back and try to discover why they had missed it before. And they found that some of their digging had been upon the wrong level, and some of it had been in the wrong direction. But one of their tunnels had been on the right level and in the right direction. And they went back to it, and drilled yet again, and put in two or three good blasts, and lo, the silver was there, also. And they reckoned how long before they had wrought there, and they found that it had been five years. And they measured the rock that had separated them from the silver when they abandoned that tunnel, and it was only five cubits.

Now if they had had additional faith as a grain of mustard seed and a few sticks of dynamite, they might have removed that mountain and begun to collect dividends five years sooner.

And I considered when they told me this how many men there be who halt five cubits on the hither side of success, when one more blast and a little more faith would bring them their heart's desire.

And I say unto all men who labor in a righteous cause not to be weary in well-doing, for the reward is to him that overcometh. For the man who stoppeth five cubits this side of success hath many years of toil ahead to make good his lack of faith.

VERSE

Is There a God?

OFTEN have I thought it odd
That men ask, "Is there a God?"

Have they never breathed a prayer
And rejoiced to feel Him there?

Have they questioned what man knows
How to shape a full-blown rose?

Have they heard the glad refrain
Of a robin in the rain?

How each morning all anew,
He bejewels earth with dew?

How He paints the sun at rest
On the canvas of the west?

Who has taught the tender art
Of a mother's loving heart?

Who but God could fashion guile
Like a tiny baby's smile?

Is there not a God to send
The warm hand-clasp of a friend?

Skeptics ply their questions rife;
There remains the fact of life.

Not alone in temples grand,
May we feel His moving hand.

Not alone at time of prayer—
God is present everywhere.

To the open soul each place
Holds some glimpses of His face.

Listening, Devotion hears
The sweet music of the spheres.

Mysteries of mind and heart
Show divine creative art.

The need of man is eyes to see
The presence of Divinity.

Methodist Dancer

THEY said the dance was all the devil's own,
They chorused in a voice of one accord,

But I went out unto his starry throne
And danced before the Lord.

It was not that I chose thus to affront
His marshalls of the self-appointed sort,
'Twas only that wild beauty bade my feet
Dance there within his court.

And all my soul felt God's eyes looking on,
His glance lent singing rhythm to my feet,
The time to which my body, my soul, danced
His august finger beat.

I had forgotton all the old, old lies,—
I had forgotten—till the marshalls came,
And then—I burned them there before their eyes
In beauty's clean, white flame.

I SAW him once—he stood a moment there;
He spake one word, which laid his spirit bare;
He grasped my hand, then passed beyond my ken;
But what I was, I shall not be again.

Two Saints

STRANGE how Thou moldest these unlikely clays!
To one who wanted idleness and ease,
And laughter and light love and silken ways,
Thou gavest toil and shipwreck and lean days,
And desert places knew his bended knees.

And one who chose the cloister and the reed.

And midnight prayer and simple holy things,
Thou gavest to a state's most public need,
And sent him hungry multitudes to feed,
And loosed him on the pride and shame of kings.

The Revaluation of Sunday

By Peter Ainslie

WHATEVER may be the theories and uses of one day in seven for rest, recreation and worship it is as much a part of human experience as altars and psalms and days and nights. In the days of the lunar religion nomads and shepherds sacredly counted the four phases of the moon and to them it appeared to stand still on the seventh day, which thus came to be considered tabu. Long before Moses received the law on Mount Sinai such a day was marked in the calendar of Babylon and perhaps of India, certainly in that country in a later period. The code of Hammurabi antedated the law of Moses by almost eight hundred years. The Assyro-Babylonian tablets bear witness to the custom of rest on one day in seven, while Hesiod and Homer held the Sabbath day sacred for the quest of knowledge. The ancient Egyptians and Greeks, from observing one day in ten, adopted the custom of one in seven, as did the Romans, whose earlier calendar was one in nine. The Scandinavian nations had similar practices. The Jews developed the idea of a rest day beyond that of any other nation, applying the principles of rest both to man and beast.

All manner of absurd traditions accumulated around the day, but the seventh day had a place in the Old Testament scriptures superior to all other days. When it was desecrated prophets came forth with fiery appeals, denouncing the offenders and exhorting fidelity in the keeping of this day. The voice of Amos was heard in Israel and that of Jeremiah in Judah, and later Ezekiel was heard among the captives in Babylon. Years before, Isaiah had declared that Jerusalem's safety was conditioned on abandoning the desecration of this day by secular pursuits and making its proper observance a delight.

A NON-SECTARIAN DAY

This day is as non-sectarian as prayer. The Jews had no more exclusive right to it than they had to the air of Asia, neither did the Babylonians nor the classic writers of Greece. It belonged to all mankind then and it belongs to all mankind now. It was put in the calendar of time for the freedom, progress and civilization of mankind. This is what Jesus means when he says, "The Sabbath was made for man." And so saying, he lifts it out of its legalism and sets it on its broad humanitarian basis. It was not the Jewish Sabbath any more than the Jewish man about which he was speaking. He had in mind this universal day grounded in human nature and all men's right to it.

With the rise of Christianity came the observance of the first day of the week with a significance distinct from that of the Jewish Sabbath. At first the Jewish Christians continued their observance of the seventh day along with their general adherence to the Jewish Law. The Gentile Christians, however, feeling no obligations to the Jewish law, leaned more toward the observance of the first day of the week because it marked the resurrection of the Saviour of the world. It was true that Jesus and his disciples had kept the seventh day in strict obedience to the law of Moses, but with the establishment of Christianity new conditions arose. The church of Christ was composed of both Jews and Gentiles and his lordship gave him pre-eminence over all former institutions and covenants.

While it is certain that the Jewish observance of the Sabbath was a definite influence on the mind of the early church, the ideas associated with the Jewish Sabbath were not transferred to the first day. In writing to the Galatians, Paul protested against this transfer, regarding the return to it as taking up again "the weak and beggarly rudiments." To the Colossians, he urged that one's piety should not be judged "in respect of a feast day, or a new moon, or a Sabbath day," sweeping the whole scale of Jewish observances. The first day was not so much considered by them as a rest day—because Jehovah rested on the seventh and not on the first day—but rather as a day of joyful remembrance of the resurrection of Christ in gathering for worship, preaching and observing the Lord's Supper. Consequently for some time both days were observed in the church—the seventh as a memorial of creation and the first in memory of the resurrection.

PREEMINENCE OF SUNDAY

But each decade witnessed an increased tendency toward the pre-eminence of the first day, until we find in the Epistle of Barnabas it is spoken of as the "true day," and for the first time in Christian literature Justin Martyr used the term "Sunday," accommodating himself to the Roman calendar, and at the same time pointing out that physical light was created on the first day and "the Light of the world" arose from the dead on that day. So with the accumulation of several centuries of prestige, it was easy for Constantine, on March 7, 321 A. D., to issue his famous edict, making Sunday the legal holiday throughout the Roman Empire. It read as follows: "On the solemn day of the sun let all the magistrates and people living in cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, people may freely attend to the cultivation of the fields, because it often happens that another day is not so suitable for planting the grain in furrows or the vines in trenches." His motives were purely political, and he was still a pagan, for his edict on the next day called for the consultation of soothsayers in the event that the palace should be struck by lightning. But the motives of the Christians centered around the resurrection of Christ, giving to this day a joyful sanctity.

In no instance did the early Christian writers regard the Christian Sunday as a continuation of the Jewish Sabbath, but they constantly kept the distinction between the days clearly marked, emphasizing the difference and contending with Paul that the resurrection abrogated the old dispensation and the law. While not recognizing the legal features of the Jewish Sabbath, they did of course recognize its moral and hygienic principles, which antedated Jewish law, which were contained in that law and which are now and ever will be a necessity in human life.

In later periods—beginning about the seventh century, on the rise of the Carolingian dynasty—the first attempts were made to base the observance of Sunday on the Decalogue. Preceding this period all sorts of Sunday regulations had been enacted such as the statute of 469 A. D., which called for the confiscation of all the property of those who quarreled on Sunday or witnessed an animal fight. In 585 the regulations of the Jewish Sabbath were first applied to Sunday and by the seventh century it was in full force. Women were forbidden to do sewing or cutting or embroidery or washing in public, only artistic embroidery and music were allowed. In Spain under Bishop Tostatus meat might be dressed on Sunday, but it was unlawful to wash dishes on that day. In England, as early as 694, there were many statutes prohibiting selling, traveling and field sports, culminating in the fourteenth century in its being unlawful to eat a heavy dinner on Sunday. Those who were the strictest in these observances were the most religious. It was this kind of religion that Voltaire sneered at and said, "If you would destroy this Christianity you must first kill Sunday." And these hypocritical practices nearly swamped Christianity in that period as similar practices nearly wrecked Judaism seventeen hundred years before. With this shift of basis also went the change in significance of the day, emphasizing less the place of worship and improvement of character on that day and more particularly stringent abstinence from manual labor.

FOR MAN AND BEAST

The Protestant reformation of the sixteenth century sought to restore Sunday to the significance that it bore in the minds of the early Christians. Recognizing the moral principles underlying the observance of the Jewish Sabbath, the reformers absolutely rejected the transfer theory, conceiving the Christian Sunday as the successor of the Jewish Sabbath. Luther was so hostile to it that he dared to say that the church "could make Friday her Sunday." Calvin was no less emphatic. He argued for the absolute necessity of the need of a day of rest for man and beast and for the observance of Sunday as the basis "of a joyful and free worship of God."

But piety was so wrapped up in Sabbath prohibitions that Protestantism was not able to free itself. In England under Elizabeth and James I the statutes passed from the negative to the positive, calling upon persons having no legal excuse to attend public worship on Sunday. In 1595, "The Doctrine of the Sabbath," a volume based on the Jewish Sabbath, by Nicholas Bounds, appeared in England. It was extremely severe, but it held a place of high authority for a long period, being the subject of controversy in shops and on street corners as well as preached from pulpits, where it was proclaimed that to work on Sunday was "as great a sin as to kill a man or commit adultery." Under the Puritans, in 1656, by an act of parliament all persons were compelled to attend church unless excused by the magistrate. On the colonization of New England these ideas were transferred across the Atlantic and somewhat intensified by advocating capital punishment for disobedience to Sunday regulations. To all appearances Sunday had become a dungeon day.

Some of these ideas must have filtered down to Virginia for I remember as a boy on possessing my first pocket-knife I attempted to sharpen it on a grind-stone Sunday afternoon. It was an entirely unnecessary performance, for the knife was new and I had only had it a day or two, but on being observed by our old Negro cook, who had been my mother's maid in slavery times and who had much liberty with the children, I was given an unforgettable flogging for the so-called desecration of Sunday. A few weeks after, on being given a Sunday book to read, I found special delight in the story of John Knox calling on John Calvin in Geneva and finding him on the lawn at a game of bowls. Play is a part of rest. Most games can find places of real ministration to the weary on Sunday afternoon. This does not include games for commercial purposes, because they become too dissipating, but play should be kept to the front where the whole family circle can share the recreation, and likewise find some road to acts of kindness to others on Sunday afternoon. This day has its message to family life above any other day in the week.

THE OPEN TOMB

This is the fine idealism that centers around this day. It is primarily a remembrance of that open tomb, broken beyond all the help of earthly masonry and giving to the soul the necessary opportunity of joyful freedom and sacred worship in order to make complete that development that marks kinship with him who broke the tomb and who still says: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die." By this fact every Sunday is radiant with hope and musical with prophecy.

The term Sunday is to be preferred over either Sabbath or Lord's Day because the former has about it a sectarian association and the latter a limitation of the Lord's days as though only one in seven is his, whereas all the days are his. Aside from the association of Sunday with the resurrection of Jesus, being the day of the sun, it emphasizes nature's taking a fresh start and our joy in its life. Jesus spoke of the sun as his Father's—"He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good." And so of this day it belongs to the bad as well as the good.

From physicists, psychologists, chemists and biologists we hear in plain language that nightly rest affords only partial recovery from daily labor and that the supplementary rest of one day in seven is necessary in order to maintain the physical power at the level of the highest efficiency. There is a gradual decline through the week, which can only be lifted by a prolonged rest of one day in seven. There is no physiological nor hygienic fact better established. An eminent New York physician, Dr. Willard Parker, says: "This I do not state as an opinion, but knowing that it has its foundation upon a law in man's nature as fixed as the law that he must take food or die." For one to deny to himself the benefits of this day is to approach suicide, and for one to deny them to others is more disastrous than scrimping the small wage earner of his wages or denying bread to the hungry. No legislature has the moral right to bargain away this day for labor or sports. The people themselves cannot do it and maintain the proper standard of ethics, much less their representative in legislature.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS

But the civil day of rest must be clearly distinguished from the day of worship. The state protects itself from ignorance by establishing compulsory education. It is likewise its duty to secure for every man one day of rest in seven for humanitarian reasons and to guard that day from such practices as are dangerous to public morals by such laws as foster high moral standards. Several million laborers in America work seven days a week. It is not right. In 1912 a federal statute was enacted closing first and second-class post offices on Sunday, thereby setting over 100,000 letter carriers and postal clerks free for rest one day in seven. Similar movements have followed both in the government and in commercial lines. Said a manager of one of the largest New York theatres: "If the people of the stage get rest on Sunday they do much better work. The public as well as the managers and actors profit by the closing of the theatres one day out of seven." The American Federation of Labor has long contended for a weekly rest day. The laws must secure to every man liberty to rest one day in seven, but the Sunday laws are a failure because they are associated with religion and are placed on the statute books for religious reasons. So long as that condition exists Sunday laws will be inefficient. It is as true now as when Charles Dickens said it: "You cannot make people religious by act of parliament." But if there had never been so much as a word about a day of rest in the Bible, the physiological and social necessities would be just as impelling because they are grounded in the nature of mankind.

The day of worship is another issue. To the Jews their day of worship begins at sundown on Friday and ends at sundown on Saturday. The law ought to throw around that day the same protection to the Jews that it throws around Sunday for the Christians. They are the two great days for worship in the history of the world, and without question the predominating days in American life. It is altogether possible to give to both high places in our calendar—Saturday and Sunday—one being a day for social recreation and the other a day for worship. In many instances Saturday is already observed as a half-holiday. It would not be impracticable to give the entire day. The Jews would be enabled to take Saturday for their day of worship and Sunday for social recreation and the Christians could reverse the order. Saturday from sundown to midnight, which is not held as part of either sacred day, could be used for such business as would provide necessary things for personal use on Sunday. As to whether Saturday or Sunday is the proper day for public worship is purely a theological question and it is not worth the argument.

A SCANDAL IN RELIGION

The contention between these two days has been a scandal in religion. The Jews first precipitated the controversy because of the traditions that had accumulated around their Sabbath. At first the Christians had no such day and the apostolic writers appear not to have desired such a day. Later, however, the Christians became as sectarian with their Sunday as the Jews were with their Saturday. The Council of Laodicea in 360 A. D., commanded all Christians to work on Saturday whether they had to or not. It was a measure of retaliation against the Jews who worshipped on Saturday and worked on Sunday. In 787 Charlemagne said in proclaiming a set of Sunday laws that exceeded all others up to that time for severity: "We issue this order in conformity with that which the Lord has also commanded in the law." This was the period in which the Saxons were given their choice by the Frankish conqueror of being baptized in the neighboring river or having their throats cut; likewise the Jews were compelled to go to church at the point of the sword—all this being done, it was claimed, "by the direction of the Holy Ghost," whose forged signature was attached to some very ungodly transactions but vouched for by the clergy.

Religious minorities should be protected if freedom of conscience is to be maintained. England, Holland and other European countries make exemption from Sunday laws of those who hold Saturday as the proper day for public worship. This includes Jews, Seventh Day Baptists, Seventh Day Adventists and the Christians of the Abyssinian church, who keep the seventh day along with the rest of the Mosaic law. Compulsory religious observance breeds contempt for religion in general and denies the principles of religious freedom and the spirit of Christianity.

CHRISTIAN FOES OF SUNDAY

The greatest foes to the proper observance of Sunday are not the seventh day observers, nor the foreign element accustomed to the continental Sunday nor the great mass of non-Christian pleasure seekers, but the first day Christians, who are the selfish patrons of Sunday excursions, Sunday theaters, Sunday newspapers, and such things, all of which require in a large city the labor of thousands of persons seven days out of seven. The sin of the first day Christian is not that he reads a Sunday newspaper but that his lack of brotherly feeling allows him to gratify his selfish pleasure at the cost of several hundred of his brothers who work seven days out of seven to produce the newspaper. So of excursions and all other activities that require labor on Sunday. The man who works for my Sunday pleasure is my brother, and I have not the moral right to demand that he work seven days out of seven. At the demand of labor there is in Australia a forty-eight hour week, closing of business on Saturday afternoon, closing on Sunday, no theatres nor amusements on Sunday and no street cars on Sunday afternoon. There are enough Christians by name in America to make Sunday properly observed by rest from labor, by attendance on the morning public worship, by some one or two deeds of kindness in the afternoon, by recreation in games with the family and friends in the afternoon and by such other social and religious activities as would enrich the memory of Sundays far beyond that of all other days of the week. Nietzsche and a great multitude with him are still saying, "These redeemed ones must appear more redeemed if I am to believe in their Redeemer."

Christians must find their revaluation of Sunday not in the civil law, which however must stand for the protection of labor, but in their own attitude toward a day—whether it be the first or the seventh or whether it be called Sunday, the Sabbath or Lord's Day—which had its origin in love and can only be properly observed in the practice of love among themselves and toward others. The observance of this day relates itself to rest, recreation, the family and religion. Man needs it physically, morally, socially, economically and religiously. Each of these aspects of his life is human, and religion is the most human of them all. Around the observance of this day center the stability and character of a nation. In its proper observance rest our temporal blessings and spiritual hopes. Emerson calls it "the core of civilization." Says Goldwin Smith, "It is the freedom and educating power of Sundays, which explains the average prosperity of America." Abolish that freedom and that educating power and you will have pulled down the pillars upon which the civilization of America rests.

THE LEVELLER OF MEN

Sunday is the leveller of mankind in the midst of the common inequalities of life. It abounds in opportunities, privileges and blessings. Beaconsfield says, "I hold it to be the most valuable blessing ever conceded to man. It is the cornerstone of our civilization." Instead of gloom about it, of all days it is the day of light and love. One might as well talk about eating and sleeping being gloomy practices. This day bears good will to man and beast, expressing God's love for the great wide world. Freed from the Old Testament regulations of the Jewish Sabbath, as well as from the Carolingian and Puritan regulations of Sunday laws it stands in its twofold aspect: (1) as the day of rest from labor, one day in seven for all men and women and (2) as a day by free choice of worship to God and fellowship with men. Of it Nathaniel Hawthorne says, "I watch its earliest sunshine, and fancy that a holier brightness marks the day, when there shall be no buzz of voices on the exchange, nor traffic in the shops, nor crowd, nor business anywhere. But whether I see it tangled down among tangled weeds, or beaming across the fields, or hemmed in between brick buildings, or tracing out the figure of the casement on my chamber floor, still I recognize the Sabbath sunshine. Doubts may flit with evil shadows around me, but so long as I imagine that the earth is hallowed, and the light of Heaven retains its sanctity on the Sabbath, never can my soul lose the instinct of its faith." Therefore hallow this day. Hallow it for the sake of America and all other nations in the international sisterhood; hallow it for the sake of the race of which we are parts; hallow it for ourselves and for him who gave it to us; and so hallow it that we shall prove that freedom, brotherhood and religion are the birthrights of all mankind.

A Parish Plebiscite

By Edwin W. Bishop

AS an active pastor I had often thought that the average congregation had little opportunity to become vocal concerning the various departments of church activity. Still less opportunity did the average congregation have to exhibit a reaction on the weekly Sunday morning sermon. Every week a preacher lays bare the workings of his mind and heart before a congregation, but the workings of the congregation's mind and heart are not fairly expressed in return.

A sermon is preached which arouses thought and questionings. If there were an opportunity for this reaction to become vocal at the time, would it not be advantageous for both minister and congregation alike? But the opportunity passes, another week intervenes, and the subject grows cold or is displaced by another. Probably good order forbids that people should rise in their pews at the conclusion of the morning service and indulge in remarks and it is certain that not every theme chosen by the minister would lend itself to such congregational treatment. A deeply spiritual or devotional theme enmeshed in an hour of worship where prayer, scripture reading, and music have been carefully chosen to produce a desired and unified result would certainly lose its distinctive quality by the injection of any argumentative, come-back elements. Yet not a few of the preacher's themes would lend themselves to this treatment and even challenge it. If a theme has been worthy of the thought of a preacher during the week, why shouldn't it be worthy for a congregation to express its reaction at the conclusion of the morning service? Might not the reaction be beneficial to the preacher? Might it not be beneficial to the congregation? To lead a thinking, feeling, but continually dumb congregation to become self-expressive—would it not be worth while all around?

Led by such thoughts as these, I conceived the idea of sending a plebiscite during the summer vacation to my parish members and of tabulating and analyzing the results. I arranged five groups of questions with subdivisions in each group. Altogether there were thirty-one inquiries, quite enough for sizzling summer weather. These questions were so arranged that it would require a minimum of effort and writing to answer. There was this saving clause in the prologue: "This method seeks to register prevailing parish thought. The pastor does not agree to conform to it in every particular but he would like to see its expression." I did indeed want the deliberate judgment of the parish upon some things, but I did not promise to be slavishly bound to such judgments and easily abrogate all deliberate judgments of my own.

So much for the purpose. Now for the results. Some signed their reports. A few sent personal letters in addition. But the identity of most of my correspondents was concealed. This was according to agreement. In giving the main results and some of the anonymous phrases I am therefore violating no confidences.

About eighty-five questionnaires out of a few hundred sent out were returned. At first blush this was disappointing. But when it is remembered that many were away on their summer outings and that a large group of people never respond to any form of circularizing, the fact that eighty-five different persons did take the trouble to reply indicates a stable and earnest cross-section of the congregation. As such the plebiscite should have weight. It is probably fairly indicative of the thought of the congregation at large.

I must omit from this article many of the questions and their replies as their significance was bound up with the local organization, but such as were of general interest may be given a wider reading.

SERMONS

Question: Should a sermon be 40, 30, or 20 minutes long? Thirty-two answered, 40 minutes. Twenty-seven favored 30 minutes. The remainder scattered between 30 and 40, with none registering for 20. This reply was something of a surprise. I had rather calculated that the day of the 20 or even 15-minute sermonette was at hand, but here was a congregation deliberately turning aside from the shorter discourse and declaring for the longer. What suggestions does this arouse in the mind of the modern preacher?

Question: Shall the themes presented be biblical, doctrinal, ethical, sociological, or philosophical? Thirty-three voted for biblical subjects, twenty-eight for sociological, twenty-three for philosophical, seventeen for ethical, and only five for doctrinal. The plain inference from this vote is that dogmatic theology as such is not desired. This is a fact with which probably every preacher has become more or less familiar. Truth put up in sealed packages is not as vital and dynamic to the modern mind as it is when it exhibits the imprint of a searcher. On the other hand, it is interesting and heartening to observe that the Bible is exalted, and that scriptural interpretation applied to the intense sociological problems of the day seems to be the greatest desire. Even a philosophical cast is not anathema.

Question: Shall the method of presentation be illustrative, narrative, or argumentative? Illustrative drew twenty-seven votes, argumentative twenty, and narrative eighteen. It was rather heartening to observe that the preaching which is the mere telling of stories was not as well thought of as a reasoned argument. Illustration, however, by quotation, allusion, metaphor, incident, and an occasional anecdote would seem to be as much thought of as in Christ's time and would be apparently as helpful. An old Scotch woman was once asked her opinion of a certain sermon. She replied cannily, "It wa' sound, but it had nae windows in it." No illustrative windows have left more than one good sermon in the zone of twilight.

Question: What special subject would you like to have treated? The gist of replies was as follows: "Up to times and up to date." "Life after death." "To justify the ways of God to men." "Something similar to Martin Luther and Lenten series." "Your conception of life after death." "Spiritual life." "How can a church gain spiritual power?" "World problems and remedy." "Relationship of nations." "International relations." "Your idea of what a Christian funeral should be." "Brotherly love—our duty to each other as Christians." "Relation of music to the soul." "Social welfare and public health." "Comparative religions." "Creeds, why should we have them? Christ did not teach them, did he?" "Vicarious suffering, atonement, immortality, responsibility in the light of heredity." These suggestions are illuminating. They indicate that the challenge of the religious world as it is today is understood by the pews. True, personal piety is still desired. The mystic is still here to be fed. The greatest doctrine of all, Immortality, is clamant for attention. But the new conception of Christianity interpreted and applied in areas where no attempt has yet been made to apply it, even to the conduct of the state and the nations, is a grist which no modern preacher can well refuse to put through his mill.

More persons answered this group of questions than any other group, and it would therefore seem evident that the sermon is still the key of Protestant church going. It may be one of our weaknesses. I believe that it is. Without stressing the sermon any less, I think it would be more valuable in the end to stress the sense of worship more; but this is a side of the question to which the average congregation has not given much thought. It is worthy of serious consideration.

CHURCH SCHOOL

This group proved a puzzler. Forty-three out of 85, or half, made no reply at all. Many replies answered only one or two questions. Some frankly threw up their hands in perplexity. Almost all seemed to regard it as an unsolved problem, with now and then a vestige of encouragement or appreciation interjected like chopped ham in a restaurant sandwich.

Question: What are the weaknesses of the church school? Replies were as follows: "Lack of adult attendance." "Lack of personal interest." "Small families." "Boys not as interested as girls." "Lack of religious interest in girls." "Too little interest in parents and adults." "Opening exercises too long for adults." "More interest from fathers and mothers." "The problem of home support."

Question: What suggestions have you for betterment? "More support from fathers and mothers." "Regular teachers with personal interest." "More varied opening exercises." "Better order as classes leave room." "More interest in fathers and mothers." "Different songs." "Some inducement for officers." "A contest of some sort."

These replies have probably hit the bull's-eye. There is a present solemn fact before the church today. Children are growing up ignorant of the Bible and therefore ungrounded in biblical living. The church school is not solving the situation, nor perhaps can it unaided. Many communities are turning to some week-day arrangement for biblical instruction in the secular schools. It would seem, however, as if the church school might be revived for its great task. It is an agency right at hand. It has had a wonderful history. But it must stand for more in the minds of the children and in the minds of the parents. It needs a rebirth of dignity in the thought of all. It needs home co-operation. All this means that a good many good-natured but lazy people who confine their Christian activity to coming to church on Sunday morning will have to bounce out of their laziness and slippered ease and begin to serve somewhere. If the average church congregation would take its church school seriously and determine that conditions were going to be remedied, and then would personally attend and serve and make an earnest appeal for home co-operation and see that it is given, the average church school could be transformed into a new creature within a space of a few months.

MISCELLANEOUS

Question: Have you any suggestion as to ushering? A number of people replied but the suggestions were few. The few, however, that I quote are timely and important: "Get people forward." "Be sure about ventilation." "No seating to be done during numbers on the program." "Less talking in rear of church during opening service." The average congregation has not analyzed the fine points of ushering, but it is still susceptible to their failure when it is not done with ease and courtesy. The average church could well pay more attention to this vital part of its activity.

Question: What suggestion have you as to church music? The opening reply was canny: "To criticise the church choir is a delicate and dangerous job, and I forbear." Another said, "Leave it to the organist." Then came a broadside: "Get some new anthems." "Let the choir sing hymns rather than difficult anthems." "Strike a more cheerful, more joyous note." "At least one old, familiar hymn in each service." "Something devotional that all can understand." "More familiar songs." "More songs that all can join in." "Hope the soloist and tremulo will become extinct." "Have violin and 'cello obligatos." "Names of selections and composers printed in the bulletin." "If 'The Battle Hymn of the Republic' is ever sung again, use marching time and not a dirge."

In the sum of these suggestions there is food for thought. Apparently simple, understandable, reverential music sung in a devotional manner, along with familiar hymns heartily joined in by the congregation, is what the average congregation really wants. It is not longing for jazz or the opera—God be praised! One particularly pertinent reply I will give in full: "Choir music, especially the solo part, is apt to be more mechanical than spiritual; too much thought of the correct use of the voice rather than impressing the audience with the sentiment of the song. I think a choir should understand that the music may be a very important part of the devotional side of a service, and not merely a musical entertainment. A noted choir-master used to say that a soloist who impressed an audience with the voice rather than with the spirit of the song was a failure."

Question: What suggestion have you about the use of the church plant? "The more use the better." "Complete the basement." "Use bowling alleys more." "Make all good use of it possible." "Have it a center for the children." "Always open." "Six days open, one day closed." These replies are significant in that the average congregation sees that the church plant should have more use for the capital invested than has been the custom among Protestant churches. We are all feeling our way in this direction. But some of the practical difficulties, such as competent oversight and the added expense for fuel and heat and janitor service, have to be taken into serious consideration.

Question: What do you think about a men's organization? One man judiciously said, "Debatable." Another wrote, "I do not see any method by which a men's organization can be made effective by any gathering on Sunday." Another, "Too many men's organizations already." Still another, "Most men have more organizations now than they can attend to." There were, however, some affirmations: "Think there should be one." "Absolutely indispensable." "Good if used for up-building of church." "Fine if organization can find a definite purpose and job." It is true that most of the men in our cities have more monthly, bi-weekly, and weekly meetings now than they really enjoy. There is some kind of club with its luncheon for every day in the week. For the church simply to provide another wheel in a busy man's life, unless the wheel by turning can produce something, is probably not worth while. And yet this curious fact which must often have been noticed and commented on by keen observers still stares us in the face, that long before these numerous clubs with their varying luncheons and dinners had come into existence the men of the Christian churches had been active in the same fashion. Such clubs as the Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, Exchange, Chamber of Commerce, Retailers, Wholesalers, and the whole gamut, organized on a broader, wider scale are probably doing more for the community at large than any church club could hope to do. And yet is it not pathetic that the old mother who started so many worthwhile ideas in our civilization, and then has lived to see them increase and prosper, should so frequently be left bereft of masculine time and attention?

The Harvest of Big Armaments

By Kirby Page

THE eyes of the world are upon the Washington conference. The future of mankind may be vitally affected by the decisions of these assembled delegates. It is highly imperative that the full weight of an aroused and intelligent public opinion should be brought to bear upon this conference. Rarely have the churches been confronted with a greater opportunity or a heavier responsibility. Now is the time for action.

If the peoples of the earth could be brought to a full realization of the price we pay for big armaments and could be aroused to express their protest against this madness, the governments of the nations would be compelled to reach an agreement concerning the limitation of armaments. As a step in this direction, let us enumerate some of the ways in which we pay for big armaments.

EMPTY TREASURIES

The most obvious price we pay is a monetary one. The wars of the past 130 years have cost the nations of the earth 209 billions of dollars. Prior to the Great War, all of the principal powers had accumulated huge debts. In 1913 the national debts of Austria, Hungary and Spain were each approximately two billions of dollars, Great Britain approximately three and a half billions, Germany nearly four billions, Russia four and a half billions, France nearly six and a half billions. In 1913 the national debt of the United States was slightly more than a billion dollars. As a result of the Great War, the national debts of the belligerent countries have reached a staggering total: Hungary more than nine billions, Austria nearly 18 billions, Russia 25 billions, Great Britain nearly 40 billions, France 46 billions, Germany 55 billions. The national debt of the United States is now nearly 25 billions of dollars. The combined national debts of the nations of the earth has now reached the colossal sum of 279 billions of dollars. The great-grandchildren of the present generation will be burdened with much of this indebtedness.

Three years after the close of the war which was to end war, millions of men are still under arms. The wild riot of expenditure for armaments goes on. In 1921 the army and navy appropriations of Japan were 282 millions of dollars—three times as much as in 1912; Great Britain 1,121 millions of dollars—three times as much as in 1912; the United States 1,422 millions of dollars—nearly six times as much as in 1912.

FEAR AND ENMITY

From every quarter we hear of high taxes. Government expenditures have reached unprecedented totals. In 1920 the expenses of the United States Government were slightly more than 4,582 millions of dollars. Of this huge sum, an appalling proportion was spent for past and future wars—92.6 per cent to be exact! Nine out of every ten dollars expended for war! Less than one dollar out of ten expended for civil departments, public works, education and public health combined. The public treasuries of the nations are being drained to pay for big armaments.

The time has come in human evolution when the peoples of the earth will not support an avowedly aggressive war. Belligerent governments can now wage war only on grounds of self-defence. The huge appropriations necessary for modern armaments can be secured only by appealing to the fears of the peoples. Hence in all of the countries vigorous campaigns for the creation of fear are being waged. In order to create the necessary degree of fear, the worst characteristics of other peoples are portrayed. Vigorous and sustained appeals are made to racial and national pride, misunderstandings are engendered, prejudices and passions are aroused. Fear is the solid foundation upon which big armaments are reared.

Now fear is a very bad thing for individuals and for nations. Fear causes us to be nervous and suspicious. It calls forth our baser passions. It is destructive of moral standards and gives supremacy to the doctrine of necessity. It causes us to excuse falsehoods, reprisals and atrocities. Fear erects a barrier and hinders good will between peoples and nations.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS IMPERILED

Europe and the rest of the world are in desperate need of a League of Nations. Without a League modern civilization is doomed to collapse. There are differences of opinion as to the value of the existing League of Nations. One thing is certain, however, the safety, stability and prosperity of the peoples of the earth depend upon the functioning of an effective League of Nations. Friendly cooperation between nations is one of the great needs of the hour.

Big armaments are a primary obstacle in the pathway of the League of Nations. The success of a League depends upon the degree of confidence, good will and cooperation manifested by different peoples. Big armaments, promoting as they do, fear, suspicion, enmity and rivalry, strike a deadly blow at the very foundations of a League of Nations. General Bliss has well said: "Those are mistaken who may think that there can be an enduring and effective association of the nations for the maintenance of peace so long as those nations are armed to the teeth solely against each other. And those are mistaken who think that, so long as the present military system exists, there can be any peaceful international court of arbitration."

Big armaments are social waste. They divert the funds of public treasuries from constructive uses to destructive ends. The huge cost of big armaments is taken from an altogether inadequate national income and is a chief factor in the increased cost of living. The high cost of living, in turn, is a chief cause of unrest, discontent and industrial strife.

Big armaments intensify industrial problems also by promoting a false philosophy of life. Fear, suspicion, enmity, dependence upon violence and force—these are dangerous attitudes for individuals, classes and nations. Big armaments promote a philosophy which is certain to lead to violence and destruction in the industrial struggle.

There is another disturbing phase of this subject. Not only do big armaments drain public treasuries, promote fear and hatred, hinder a League of Nations, intensify industrial problems and promote a false philosophy of life—big armaments are futile. Even victory by means of big armaments is tragic defeat. At this point there need be no doubt. We have the benefit of a generation of experience as a basis for our conclusion. In the recent war France, England, and their allies won an overwhelming victory over the Central Powers. So complete was the victory that the result was a dictated peace, not a negotiated peace. And yet the facts in the case are so clear that it is impossible to reach any other conclusion than that France and England lost the war. The gains of the victors are inconsequential as compared with their staggering losses. Victors and vanquished alike lost the war.

"THE FRUITS OF VICTORY"

The evidence in the case has been collected in a number of volumes, conspicuous among which are "The Fruits of Victory" by Norman Angell, and "The Defeat in the Victory" by George D. Herron. Meditation upon the facts set forth in these books will convince the reader that not only were Germany and Austria, France and England defeated, but that the whole world lost the war.

War is an arch enemy of humanity. Unless it is abolished, and abolished quickly, European civilization is doomed. Through painful experiences we have learned the realities of modern war. We know also that the next war will be far more costly, destructive and deadly than any past war. Every person above ten years of age who can read the English language should secure a copy of "The Next War" by Will Irwin. Blind indeed is the person who, after deliberating upon the array of facts set forth in this book, cannot see that the next world war will cause the downfall of modern civilization. War must go. The limitation of armaments is the first step in this direction.

Because of the imminent dangers with which we are confronted, the Washington conference is of extraordinary importance. The forces of militarism and imperialism in all of the countries are vigorously at work. These forces are exceedingly powerful. They will succeed in defeating the purpose of the Washington conference unless the plain peoples of the earth arouse themselves and give expression to their demand for an adequate limitation of armaments. The United States must take the lead in this matter. We are in a position of strategic importance. As the richest and most powerful of nations, we have it within our power to call a halt to this mad race of armaments.

A TIME FOR ACTION

This is the time for the churches to act. Each church in the nation should give voice to its corporate protest against big armaments. A mighty flood of resolutions of protest should roll down upon our President, members of Congress and the delegates to the Washington conference. In the columns of the secular and religious press, in personal conversation and private correspondence, in addresses and sermons, in every conceivable way, Christian people should unceasingly bear testimony against big armaments during these coming weeks. The millions of members of churches should unite in solemn intercession that the delegates to the conference may be given needed wisdom and courage.

Throughout all of this endeavor, however, Christian people should remember that reduction or limitation of armaments is only the first step—not the last step—in the abolition of war. While the whole world is thinking and talking of reduction of armaments Christian people should take occasion to emphasize the obvious fact that war is the utter negation of the principles of Jesus and a barrier to the progress of the Kingdom of God. The time is ripe for a vigorous campaign to get individual Christians and churches to go on record as utterly repudiating war as a means of settling difficulties between nations. There is enormous value in putting oneself on record as having withdrawn one's sanction and support from war.

The limitation of armaments and the going on record as having withdrawn our sanction from war are negative steps and are insufficient to insure the abolition of war. An earnest search must be made for the root causes of war and a vigorous attempt made to remedy these conditions. Such a search will, of course, lead us into the realm of industry. Even a superficial search will reveal many accepted practices in modern industry which directly violate fundamental Christian principles and which are contributory factors to the outbreak of war. The task before Christian people is nothing less than the seeking of those fundamental changes in the spirit and structure of modern society which will make possible the establishment of a truly Christian social order.

Save Russia!

THE most terrible catastrophe of modern times, aside from the war, is gnawing at the vitals of Russia. In the very heart of the country along the Volga an area as large as the entire Mississippi valley is as bare as a desert through drouth and twenty millions of human beings are slowly starving to death. It is not so rich a soil as that in our great Mississippi valley, but it is agricultural in character, possessing clay-like soil which does not stand drouth well though it produces very good crops when the rains are plentiful. Like the China famine of last year this one is not the result of a single crop failure, but of a cumulative series of three partial failures, the last being the most nearly total. When this fact is considered one can assess the marvelous resistance power of the Russian peasant and his extraordinary facility in saving and living without complaint until the last ground of hope is cut away. His is one of the most remarkable of peoples. His infinite patience, poetic mysticism, dogged persistence and quaint hospitality are the wonder of all travelers who stay long enough to know him.

To be well fed and then suddenly to lose all food will bring men to violence in their effort to obtain sustenance. But to have a partial ration for long months reduces vitality slowly and leaves them listless and powerless to do anything either violent or heroic. Correspondents sent out to investigate write that the scenes of riot and violence reported are made out of whole cloth and that the "great epoch-making trek" of millions is a myth of the imagination, as have been most tales from Russia in the past three years. There are more refugees than the railroads can manage but the railroads are few and poor and the distances great. In the average village the people are staying at home and awaiting death or relief with a calm that only malnutrition and slow starvation can produce.

In the Village of Semekino

The following account from a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian is typical: "Unless relief comes very soon there will be no one left alive here in Semekino. The villagers have lost all hope. Some of them are even resentful that a stranger should come and look at their misery. Talk about 'American Relief' makes no impression on them. The famine has lasted too many months, too many unfulfilled promises have been given. An old peasant woman said: 'God gives corn to America and none to Russia. He is a very strange God.' Another said she never had any luck, her children had not caught the cholera, and instead of dying quickly they would die slowly of starvation. Another began to weep when she said she had two children whom she could not feed. Another said, without showing any kind of emotion, that she killed her child yesterday because she could not continue to feed it. On the whole, the villagers did not display much grief. Some even laughed as they showed me their repulsive bread, and asked me to taste it. None of them seemed to be in physical pain. I do not think that any of the stories about the multitudes of people driven mad by hunger, trekking westwards in panic-stricken migrations, storming towns and trains are true. I have seen several chickens running about freely here in Semekino, but no one seemed to think of stealing them. On the way to Samara is a communal farm that supports ten families. It is built near a deep depression at the bottom of which there are bushes and reeds. An elderly man, the oldest man here, offered me milk, rye-bread and sunflower seeds with true Russian hospitality. It was impossible to refuse without hurting a deeply."

Christian Century Press

There is no "great-trek" there is a stream of famine refugees, most of whom are families who came from Germany or other section of Russia or who have some acquaintance or relatives at a distance, or are prompted by some other sort of hope. They form pitiful little processions along the roads and wait often for days or weeks at the railroad stations for their turn on the famine relief trains to be taken toward their destinations. Naturally the cities are the main focal points of congested and conglomerate misery. The correspondent who wrote the above in the Guardian gives a few "close-ups" of this human tragedy from the city of Samara:

"Most of the people are too filthy to show whether they are pale or not, but many of the children are dreadful to look at. This afternoon I noticed a bundle of rags stirring slightly amid a heap of rubbish and refuse. I approached and a boy of about fifteen looked up at me. The skin was drawn tightly over his pinched face. His eyes were like two slits. His face was ashen grey. His grey lips were shrivelled so as to bare his teeth in a horrible manner. He looked down again, his pointed nose almost touching the rubbish heap. His grey hands moved feebly amongst the ordure and garbage. He found a piece of green melon rind. He took it in the flat of his hand and scraped off the shrivelled fleshy part with his teeth. The weather has been warm and dry, although the nights are cool. Nevertheless, there is much mortality amongst the refugees. The first frosty night will kill great numbers of them. The dead are often left lying a long time before they are removed. I saw the body of a little child lying almost naked in the station and livid with decay. A swarm of flies was buzzing round a fetid sore on its back. A dead boy was lying stretched across the pavement of a frequented street. People walked round him quite indifferently as they passed by. Only an old woman peered inquisitively into his lifeless face, and then went her way. The sight was far too familiar for anyone to take much notice. An elderly man, too weak to stand, was dragging himself slowly across the street in a sitting posture. A boy was lying on the railway track as a train approached. There was some shouting, and he was lifted out of the way of the train. The limp body of what was once a big, burly man was carried away on a stretcher."

Measures of Relief

All Americans know, of course, that the work of the Hoover Commission is now just beginning to become operative and they have read of the Red Cross committee under Dr. Nansen, but they do not know of the heroic efforts being put forth by the Russian government itself nor of the obstructionist tactics of the International Relief Conference under the direction of the Supreme Allied Council. The Soviet government, according to all reliable correspondents, is giving its most strenuous efforts to relief. It is running free trains, turning schools, local commissaries and its great health organization into relief agencies and so effectually cooperating with all other agencies as to render the need of large staffs of foreign workers unnecessary. The English Friends (Quakers) are carrying on a large undertaking and serving as a model for all later comers. They are implicitly trusted and thus not only serve as path finders for others but are able to act as intermediaries in creating confidence between agencies so mutually suspicious of one another as are foreign committees and the soviet government. The Russian peasants in sections where there is plenty are sending millions of pounds of food, one district giving its entire surplus, another laying a tithe on its whole crop and all who have access doing their best. The government is furnishing great quantities of seed for the fall sowing and supervising its sowing to assure a chance at a crop next year.

But Russia is a primitive land with poor transportation facilities. Its railroads are few and almost destroyed by war deterioration. Its highways are poor and its vehicles primitive. Its rural life is chaotic as compared with ours; there are no telephones, daily papers, graded roads or other adequate means of communication. Turn the dial of time back to seventy years ago in America and give our land a population as large as it is now, with a few large cities and the masses still living in the country villages, with the rude roads of that time and only an occasional railroad line, and you have only a partial picture of the conditions in Russia, for you lack the blighting influences of centuries of Czarist bureaucracy, the superstition of a church corroded with traditionalism and priestcraft and an ignorance more nearly universal than America ever knew. To this you must add the universal destruction caused by a war that injured Russia more terribly than it did any other country, and the disintegration of a revolution more radical and far-reaching than any in the history of nations. The deep-going character of Russia's revolution is described in the words of Senator France after his visit there, who said that it is not merely a political revolution but a renaissance of the entire life of one hundred and sixty millions of people, social, political, religious and economic.

Making Political Weapons of Starvation

Mr. Hoover, Dr. Nansen and the Friends are strenuously pushing relief. Already American relief ships are at Riga and trainloads of their precious supplies are reaching the famine areas. But Mr. Hoover warns us that with his nine million dollars he can only make a beginning at the stupendous task of saving twenty million people. He will need one hundred million dollars. A strange report has been carried through the press that he will make no appeal to the American public at the present time because of our own financial difficulties. America is rich unto sinful luxury in comparison with the rest of the world. Our farms are rotting with unsold food. Our bank vaults are full. Our dollar is so expensive that all other countries count their currencies depreciated. We have 60 per cent of the world's gold. America is Croesus among peoples. We need above all else a little sacrificial blood-letting for the sake of saving the peoples who are anæmic with the deprivations following war. It seems incredible that any sort of expediency would prevent calling upon us for this paltry hundred millions and we must believe Mr. Hoover was not correctly reported.

The economic expediency involved in the above report is, however, virtuous as compared with the satanic attempt that seems all too evident in the proposals of the supreme council's International Famine Relief Conference. First it was proposed to make an extensive survey of the situation in Russia. This meant spending millions in money and months in time while the people perished. Where millions are starving there is no need to await surveys to start relief; if investigations are necessary they can proceed side by side with the relief that is unmistakably necessary. Then M. Noulens was appointed chairman of the sub-committee to make the investigations. This appointment revealed the colored gentleman in the woodpile. The Russian foreign office replied that "the nomination of M. Noulens is in itself a program," for "the Russian people remember how, as French ambassador in Petrograd, M. Noulens worked to bring about allied intervention, and how he participated actively in the fomenting of the counter revolutionary rising. He, as much as any living man, is responsible for the civil war, the foreign invasions and the blockade." Re-counting how the American Red Cross and other relief agencies are working strenuously and receiving the full cooperation of the government they then say, "As to the proposals of M. Noulens' Commission, the soviet government can only regard them as a monstrous gesture of mockery at the expense of men dying of hunger." If we are to judge by comparison with the activities of the other relief organizations the Russian foreign office was not so far wrong. It was the last desperate effort of the militaristic policy that began with Kautsky's cordon sanitaire, and was carried on through allied intervention and the backing of the czarist counter-revolutions of Kolchack, Yudenitch and Denekin. Even the most partisan can now see the futility of interference in Russia. Allied interference only drove all Russian democrats into the bolsheviki fold for the defence of the country against outsiders and prevented them from working out their own political salvation. In humanity's name feed the starving Russians, and in democracy's name let the Russians work out their own political salvation.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

A DICTIONARY OF RELIGION AND ETHICS

Edited by Shailer Mathews and Gerald Birney Smith, of the University of Chicago, with the co-operation of a large number of specialists. $8.00.

1. The book sets forth in compact form the results of modern study in the psychology of religion, both primitive and developed, the present status of religious life in America, Europe, and the most important mission fields, and the important phases of Christian belief and practice. It also covers both social and individual ethics.

2. All words of importance in the field of religion and ethics are defined. The most important of them are discussed at length. A system of cross references unifies the entire work.

3. The volume is intended primarily for ministers, Sunday-school teachers, and general readers who are interested in religion, not as technical students but as those who wish to acquire accurate and compact information of the latest developments of study in the field. It will be an especially useful reference book for public and Sunday-school libraries.

4. The articles are written historically, objectively, without speculation or propaganda, and in so far as possible by those most in sympathy with their subjects.

5. About one hundred scholars have co-operated with the editors, including well-known specialists in their respective fields.

Price $8.00, plus 20 cents postage.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Unchristian Christian Century

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Suppose a prohibition paper constantly filled its columns with articles commending licensed saloons, deprecating the eighteenth amendment, referring to supporters of prohibition as "preposterous upstarts," editorially mentioning the superior fitness from the point of scholarship and broadmindedness of the average bootlegger over the most cultured and refined officers and attorneys of the Anti-Saloon League, rejecting articles from ardent supporters of prohibition enforcement and finally advocating vigorously the election to offices having to do with prohibition enforcement former presidents and stockholders of distilleries and breweries—would the paper be a prohibition paper?

Is it possible for The Christian Century to be a Christian Century when it burns with indignation in its assault editorially and by printed contributions from numerous writers, upon those who defend the Bible, the deity and divinity of Christ, when it gives space to Unitarian doctrine, to all that savors of destructive criticism, when it bemoans the coming into the field of religious activity of great Christian characters formerly identified as great leaders in industry, politics, social welfare, etc., branding them as superficial, fantastical, demagogical? There is a strangeness, if not an inconsistency, in the attitude of The Christian Century towards thinking people today. I note fervent kindness and ardent favor towards those who entertain and advocate views already nurtured and voiced by the "Century" editor, whether they are scholarly or illiterate. But woe to the opponent of your Unitarian views, whether of the 2 per cent college-bred or of the 98 per cent non-college-bred. The seven woes do not express your bitterness towards them. You make no attempt to answer their argument. You do not give space to their defense of the Bible. You just pour forth the scorching, burning lava of Satanic contempt, bemeaning and belittling them to your readers. You seem to have acquired Ingersoll's desire in the only prayer he is supposed to have made, when he asked for words, long and slimy, that bite like venomous serpents and sting like an adder—all of which heaped upon the personality of the person whom you assault.

I only suggest a change in name of The Christian Century, or the selection of an editorial staff, the members of which are at least 2 per cent Christian. Sincerely 98 per cent,

Is Denominational Connexion
So Important?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am a reader of The Christian Century and enjoy reading its pages very much indeed. Especially do I enjoy your pronounced attitude against the sins of sectarianism as they apply to the church problem in the rural community. I have just opened the copy of your issue of Sept. 8 and find on page 4 the article "Making Way for the Community Church." This paragraph suggests two phases of the community church problem that I am very much interested in and I am writing in the hope that you will be able to help in the solution of this problem as it appears to me.

You mention the fact of the absorption of one church by the stronger church and say that is possibly not the ideal. With which statement I agree, except for the one reason that it gives the local church a denominational connection which it would not have otherwise and in consideration of the present status of church organization is desirable in some ways. Before coming to this place I had some experience in South Dakota where the Methodist church in the town was merged with the Congregational church which I was serving. There was much deliberation over the matter and I think that I know pretty well the minds of the denominational leaders of that state. I have talked with secretaries of both the Methodist denomination and the Congregational. They favor a plan of union known as a "reciprocal exchange" of fields, each church withdrawing from a certain field in favor of the other. They claim that this method has advantages over other plans of union.

The church which I am now serving is composed of two former bodies, the Methodist Protestant and Congregational. There are two other churches in the town so it cannot be strictly called a "community church." But it was organized as a "union church" independent of denominational connection with either body of which the two churches were formerly a part. The plan is working well in most particulars. But as a pastor who is interested in the broader, world-wide vision of the spread of the gospel I find the lack of particular agencies for the expression of this interest a real handicap in developing the missionary vision of the church. There is an agreement that whatever benevolences are raised shall be divided "fifty-fifty" between the missionary boards of the two denominations. Under such a plan, if the church were giving to the full extent of the claims of the boards of these denominations, one denomination gets very decidedly the best of the bargain. I will not attempt to explain this in detail. I find it impossible to set any standards which we should reach as a church because we cannot plead loyalty to any particular cause. Nor is it possible to settle on any one agency in which certain societies may manifest a special and personal interest. Because if some interest is fostered that belongs distinctively to one group, those belonging to the other group feel that there must be a corresponding interest in something on their side of the house.

As one who is very vitally interested in the development of the community church idea I should like to find some way out of the difficulties that I have suggested. I wonder whether you have discovered a way. I should like very much to see this problem discussed in the pages of your very helpful magazine.

Are the Creeds Roman?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

The criticism of Mr. G. K. Chesterton on page 17 of your issue of June 23 seems to me to be misleading. Your British correspondent says he cannot understand how a man of his (G. K. C.'s) type of mind can subscribe to the creeds of the Roman church.

There seem to be two mistakes at the root of this. He assumes (1) that G. K. C. is a Roman Catholic; (2) that the creeds of Christendom are Roman creeds.

I am open to correction, but the rumor that G. K. C. is a Roman Catholic, like a certain rumor of the death of Mark Twain, has been grossly exaggerated. G. K. C. is an Anglo-Catholic, and spoke on the platform of last year's Anglo-Catholic congress.

And the church of England (Article eight) says that the three creeds, Nicene creed, Athanasius's creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles creed, ought thoroughly to be received and believed, for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.

Would it not be more logical and charitable if the argument were stated the other way about:—men of the greatest intelligence, e. g., Thomas Aquinas, St. Augustine, Dante, Shakespeare, Gladstone, Lord Acton, Charles Kingsley, Jules Verne and John Wesley had no difficulty in subscribing to the creeds (which some call Roman). . . ergo, it is possible that my inability to improve on their standard of intelligence may be the reason of my failure to subscribe to the said creeds.

The truth is, intelligence has nothing to do with the matter at all. The creeds deal, in the main, with facts, and it is the facts that are denied today.

But whether they speak of facts, or truths, or metaphysical subtleties, they make demands on faith, not intelligence. "We believe," (as a greater man than even Chesterton or Albert Dawson has said) "because we do not understand."

There are millions of English speaking churchmen who find no difficulty in subscribing to the Roman creeds—so-called.

The two main things that keep us apart today are: (a) The Spanish, aristocratic, absolute and military spirit, exemplified in the Jesuits. England rose to the democratic pastoral spirit exhibited by Cardinal Manning who fought the Jesuits and put them in their place. (See Shane Leslie's Life of Manning, Chapter 17). (b) The Papal Infallibility, with its Temporal Power. Our authority is a United Episcopate; the Roman authority is the occupant of the chair of Peter.

And either authority would be more acceptable to many churchmen of my acquaintance than the Protestant infallibility of private judgment, or every man his own pope, which has now taken the place of an infallible book.

Heraclitus, not Democritus now rules the non-Catholic societies. All things are in a perpetual flux. Nothing is permanent. Of science and organization this is true. There is nothing stable. Modern philosophers are nothing more than quick-change artists. Bacon and Descartes are out of date. The favorite method of eliminating the Diety, from Democritus to Darwin, has always been to profess to account for the cosmos by describing the manner in which it has evolved. But Heraclitus has come to his own again, and Wells and Shaw are writing volume after volume to show up the superstition of Evolution. The "Mistakes of Darwin" is the companion volume to the "Mistakes of Moses."

"The centipede was happy quite Until the toad for fun
Said, Pray which leg goes after which,
Which left his mind in such a fix
He lay distracted in a ditch,
Considering how to run."

Just so, G. K. C. has a simple mind, because he holds a simple faith. His opponents seem to suffer from the complicated state of mind that afflicts Bunthorne in the Gilbert & Sullivan Opera.

(I quote from memory).

"It may be true that Popes and Priests have opposed new scientific theories, but so have men of science. Lord Bacon violently opposed the Copernican system, and with him in opposition was Descartes, "the Father of Modern Philosophy." In the middle of the 17th century and long afterwards, (says Hallam) there were still mathematicians of no small repute who struggled staunchly for the immovability of the earth. And Huxley had to admit, when he wrote to Mivart in 1885, that in the Galileo controversy he (Huxley) arrived at the conclusion that the Pope and the College of Cardinals had rather the best of it."

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

Salesmen or Ministers

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

My dear to-me-personally-unknown Morrison: You are giving us some great things in The Christian Century. It has so much of the ordinary garden variety of interest that it has to be read. This evening Clyde McGee's "Salesmen or Ministers" moves me to ask, why not put it in a circular and let it go into the pews, and let all ministers of whatever sort get it? There's healing in that article, and the churches need it, and weary ministers need it, and misguided shepherds need it. I hope it can be done.

To Mr. Bryan's Defense

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I very certainly protest against your attack on the Hon. W. J. Bryan. The animus of your editorial is very plain. I take your paper because I want to know what religious rationalism is saying. According to the tone of your article the Bible must be turned over to expert scientists for interpretation. The common people have no right to speak in the matter. Surely the intolerance of rationalism is assuming great proportions. Your effort to belittle Mr. Bryan will not go far nor accomplish much. Mr. Bryan has endeared himself to the common people by his splendid Christian character and his noble defense of the book that has meant so much to our nation. God's word will abide long after many scientific theories have crumbled. I do not want any publicity out of this, but I wanted you to know that someone thinks you have overstepped in your attack on Mr. Bryan.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Many of us take decided exceptions to your editorial entitled "The Passing of Mr. Bryan." We feel that he is just coming into his own as a moral and spiritual leader and defender of the "faith once delivered to the saints."

The Fruits of Victory

By NORMAN ANGELL

Author of "The Great Illusion."

NO ONE is really prepared to face the questions which the discussion of disarmament is bringing to the fore unless he is informed of the economic facts underlying such discussion. Norman Angell has furnished just this information in his new volume, "The Fruits of Victory." The argument of the book is that from an economic viewpoint war is utterly futile. Every minister who plans to take his part in the coming campaign for disarmament should have this volume and master its contents.

Buckhurst Hill, Essex, England, October 12, 1921.

AT Bristol last week the Congregational Union assembled. This week at Birmingham the Church Congress is in session. It is probable that each assembly thinks the other better than itself. A Congregationalist is by definition a man who criticizes his own church and all its ways, and most of all its officials, and probably churchmen declare that they ought to have a program such as the free churches have. There is a bishop who is a strong and very definite churchman, and with that combines a most generous admiration for free churchmen. Their praises he had been singing before a company of his clergy; when he had left, one of them said ruefully, "I wish the bishop would see that the free churches are just as beastly as we are."

This year at least from all hands come tidings of the fine meetings at Bristol. There was clearly a new spirit abroad. Dr. Jowett moved the assembly as even he has never moved it before, and among other notable speeches was one by Mr. Norwood of the City Temple. The plans for a forward movement were warmly received and the call for a campaign of spiritual adventure and service was made as with a clarion by many voices. It is the call to self-examination and re-dedication to the glorious will of God for this generation. It is not, first of all, a challenge to the Congregationalists, that they should build churches, or raise vast sums for work at home or abroad. There is something which comes before such tasks, without which such tasks are not only difficult, but impossible. With true insight the leaders of the Congregational churches have called us to make the coming session one of penitence and prayer, in which we shall return together to the springs of our life. They bid us pray, that we may be made meet for our inheritance. Our way must be through penitence, and even through despair, to the faith which alone can overcome the world.

The Church Congress

The Church of England covers an immense range of subjects in its annual congress. At the very outset, Dr. Gore, speaking to the English Church Union with characteristic courage, has lamented the lack of discipline in his church: "We are in this position: We have to admit that there is a large number of the learned men—many official teachers in the church—who are holding positions which are subversive of the fundamentals of the creeds. I cannot put it more mildly than that." As one remedy, he suggests disestablishment. It must surprise strangers to this land to note that the broad churchmen are for the most part in favor of establishment. They are in reality afraid that with disestablishment would come the dominance of the Anglo-Catholic school. The present position favors breadth in the church and gives to them a footing. It looks as though today the broad church were drawing the fire of both high and low churchmanship. Dr. Gore, the Anglo-Catholic; the Rev. Ronald Knox, Roman Catholic; the spokesmen of the evangelical alliance are at one in their rejection of Dr. Rashdall's heresies. We are clearly on the eve of a fierce theological controversy.

A Roman Preacher

When the Rev. Donald Knox went over to Rome, the church of England lost one of its wittiest and most daring sons. It was he who attacked Foundations, the volume of essays written by the present Bishop of Manchester and others. He called his satire, "The Absolute and a Bit of Hell." For years he used his nimble wit upon his Anglican friends who waited each autumn to hear from Dr. Sanday a report upon what they might still believe.

He is now preaching in London sermons of a daring and unconventional kind. Here is an example of his manner:

"Personally, I've always felt that if St. John's Gospel is not a true record of what our Lord said and did, it is the most deliberate and perjured piece of lying that stains the annals of literature." "I know what they say," said the preacher; "they say it's not a Gospel, but it's a sort of inspired commentary on the Gospel. Our Lord didn't really do these things that are recorded of him, but we should have thought no worse of him if he had. Our Lord never really said these things he is reported as saying, but they are just the kind of things he would have said if he had happened to think of it." Inspired fiddlesticks! "This is that disciple who giveth testimony of these things, and wrote these things, and we know that his testimony is true"—if that means that this wasn't the disciple, that he didn't give any testimony, that these words were written fifty years after his death, and even so record events which never happened and words which were never spoken, then I call that sentence a thumping lie. However, let them have it their own way; let them tell us, if they like, that St. John's Gospel was written by Leo XIII. We will take the other three Gospels, and find out from them what our Lord said about himself."

This is very effective rhetoric and very witty, but it will not bring much help to the reader of St. John who desires to know why it is different from St. Mark and how far in its wonderful pages symbol and fact are blended together. It is an example of the dilemma, a form of argument which may be useful at times but is often misleading and sometimes pitilessly cruel. One thing, however, is clear. The Roman church has once more won from the church of England a great advocate. Not for the first time moreover the foundations for this Catholic life were laid in an Evangelical home. Father Knox is the son of the former Bishop of Manchester, a strong evangelical. Even so, Newman and Manning were sons of the evangelical revival. Newman owed his soul to Thomas Scott. Such men claim that to the end they are true to their evangelical inheritance and they are Catholics in order to remain evangelicals!

From the Revolving Bookcase

One of the well-known broad churchmen of the last generation has been recalled in "The Recollections of Dean Fremantle." A singularly lovable man, devout, friendly to all fellow-Christians, he seems marked by the fatal vagueness of his school. They belonged to the party of the great mist. And, reading his life, no one can wonder at the growing power of the high church and the waning of the broad. The school of Jowett and Stanley and Fremantle, intellectually remarkable and spiritually attractive, never seemed to have a gospel for lost humanity. No one would say of them that the men who have turned the world upside down are come hither also. Still they had their part to play and they witnessed for intellectual sincerity.

. . . If anyone wishes to have a wise and tolerant picture of our public men, he will find it in Mr. Herbert Sidebotham's "Pillars of the State." Mr. Sidebotham left the Manchester Guardian for the Times not very long ago. No more brilliant pen than his has ever been given to the service of journalism. During the war he was a "student of war." Afterwards a "student of politics." He has a generous way of handling these statesmen. There is no venom and no party bitterness, but when they read the estimate of themselves they must feel a little as though they were going through a rehearsal of the judgment which future generations will pass upon them.

Paul Before Felix*

A HIGHLY dramatic situation presents itself to us when Paul is brought down to Caesarea and is examined before Felix. A corrupt Roman officer, possessing large power, is compelled to judge a fearless preacher who really judges him. A bit of interesting history centers about Felix. He was procurator of Palestine, being a free Roman citizen. He is distinguished as having been the husband of three queens! Drusilla was the youngest of three daughters of Agrippa I. Before she was six years old she had been betrothed to Epiphanes, king of Commagene. He, however, refused to be circumcised and so the marriage was forbidden. When Drusilla was about fourteen years of age, her brother was made ruler of the northern part of Palestine and he gave her to King Azizus. Her life with him was very unhappy and she longed to break away from him. This opportunity came when she met Felix, who was overcome by her beauty, and who tried every scheme to get her away from her husband. He even sent a magician, named Simon, to entice her away. Drusilla, thereupon, deserted the king and fled to Felix, transgressing the Jewish law by marrying a Gentile.

Felix was familiar with the fanatical Jews and when they dragged Paul in before him, because he had failed to observe certain of their technical temple rules (for he knew the facts whatever their accusation) he laughed up his sleeve and put Paul in prison. Paul's defence had been a masterpiece of tactful speech, although he had freely confessed his religion, had even made a place for that statement in his defence. There was not a false note in Paul. Once converted, he rang true to the very end. Living or dying he had but one theme—"Christ and him crucified."

The Governor of Palestine was evidently much impressed by his brilliant prisoner and some days after the hearing he invited Paul to address him. Here is a theme for a great artist—the marble throne room—with rich rugs and hangings, the powerful but dissolute Felix with the voluptuous and fascinating daughter of the Herods sitting at his side. Before them, while two or three soldiers and officers stood at attention, a Jew of striking appearance pleads with extended arms, from which chains are pendant, pleads not for himself but for his auditors, warns them, invites them, while the Roman governor is terrified and the fair Herodian looks on in dismay. How easy it would have been for Paul to have chosen other themes. He might have talked upon: "The Power and Splendor of the Roman Rule," or "The Last Word in Current Philosophy," or "The Contribution of The Jews to Roman Success." But the great preacher had but one topic, "Christ," and with all his masterly power he lifted Christ up: (1) Christ, the righteous—who demands righteousness, (2) Christ, the self-controlled, who insists upon control, (3) Christ, coming in judgment, when every deed shall cry out for justice. Righteousness before this clever, under-handed rascal; self-restraint before this pair of indulgent sinners; judgment! before Felix and Drusilla, who had shattered the decalogue. What a rebuke to the peddlars of rhetoric in our day. What a rebuke to those who lie awake nights thinking out soft and pretty things to say to the influential members in the pews next Sunday. Look at this upstanding Paul, this old hero, this battle-scarred soldier of the cross. How can you look level into his eyes when you sell your soul in these hectic days? They tell us that in England the chapels are deserted and that in America there are signs of decreased interest in the church. We can only meet this by telling the truth, by condemning evil, by lifting up our Master, by agreeing upon essential things. The fearlessness of Paul must burn itself into our consciences. There is a reason why men are remembered. Only a few names of those not living will remain, all the poor weak trimmers will fade out the day after they are buried. Why should they be remembered? All they wanted was physical comforts. They will have had their reward. Only the fearless prophets of the new day will be remembered. JOHN R. EWERS.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Religious Illiteracy a Peril to the State

Dr. Henry Chapman Swearingen, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, spoke recently before the synod of Missouri at Poplar Bluff. He deplored the religious illiteracy of the nation, and declared it to be a menace to free institutions. He said: "The education of the new generation of Americans religiously cannot be postponed without perilous consequences. At least we must make a beginning. Two indispensable conditions of a free government are general intelligence and general morality, the latter strong enough to lay upon evil impulses of great populations an effective inward restraint. We are alive to the need of intelligence and have provided for it through the greatest school system in the world. But we are failing in sound, moral instruction. All history testifies that moral standards not based upon and motivated by religious conviction, cannot abide. Eleven million children in America without any religious teaching whatever bodes no good for future citizenship. Some way must be found whereby the state will surrender the time and furnish opportunity and encouragement to religious organizations to reach all the boys and girls of the nation. The stability of free institutions on this continent is at stake."

Southern Illinois Grows in Importance

That section of Illinois familiarly known as "Egypt" has borne some stigma from its supposed lack of progress. The great coal mines that have been opened in this section in recent years have brought into that section some of the brightest minds of the nation, and great wealth is being developed. There is a growing oil industry as well. These operations change the map for the religious denominations, for some small villages that were over-churched now have new religious needs. Rev. H. H. Peters of the state society of Disciples announces that within the year new Disciples churches will be opened at Pittsburg and Royalton.

Junior Church is Organized at Minneapolis

The Hennepin Avenue Methodist church of Minneapolis has been wrestling with the problem of junior attendance at church. The result is the evolution of a junior church. Formerly there were scarcely any children between the ages of eight and fourteen in the morning church service. Now there is a large attendance of eager children who have formed a miniature Methodist church with their own officers. The associate pastor, Rev. Lewis L. Dunnington, is the leader of the group. The children dramatize Bible stories in order to secure the expressional activities that are so necessary to children. They have an art room in which to meet where the ministry of Christian pictures is added to that of the service.

On communion Sunday they join with the adult congregation. The purpose of the experiment is to bring the children into membership ultimately in the church. In joining the junior church, they assent to the following simple creed: "I believe that God is my loving Heavenly Father, and that Jesus Christ, his Son, is the Saviour of the world. I will endeavor to learn all I can about the life and teachings of the Master and to follow his example in all things." While the Sunday-school is regarded as an educational institution, the junior church is designed to constitute a training in the habit, method and spirit of worship.

Reformer Favors Amateur Boxing Bouts

The position of various Christian reformers is often misunderstood by the general public. In view of that misunderstanding it is a wonder that the secular papers did not put big headlines on their sporting pages announcing "Mr. Wilbur F. Crafts Favors Amateur Boxing." Speaking before the synod of New Jersey recently, he told the Presbyterian elders present that the church must sweep professional pugilism out of the land and only when this is done can "clean, honest amateur boxing bouts be restored." Dr. Crafts would amend the old gospel song about the ninety and nine that went astray. He asserts that on these days "it is fifty-fifty between the forces of righteousness and lawlessness."

How Denominations Cross Lines

The holding of the various synods belonging to the northern Presbyterian denomination calls attention to the way in which northern and southern Presbyterian territorial lines interweave. Owing to the merging of the Cumberland Presbyterians with the northern denomination, there is a large group of Presbyterian churches in Tennessee which belong to the "U. S. A." denomination. One hears of a considerable synod in Florida. In Texas the contests between the two denominations, northern and southern, have been notorious.

Disciples Will Preserve Historic Spot

With only a hundred years of history, indeed only ninety years since their separation from the Baptists, the Disciples are not as rich in historic monuments as some of the older communions. However they have already preserved the materials of the old Brush Run church, built under the direction of Thomas and Alexander Campbell and have made the Campbell home in Bethany the property of the church. The old Cane Ridge church in Kentucky which was the scene of the historic Cane Ridge revival under the leadership of Barton W. Stone, a Presbyterian minister, who afterward united his movement with that of the Campbells, is now falling into ruins. A fund is being collected to preserve the old church, and to preserve the burying ground where Barton W. Stone and other worthies of the Disciples movement lie buried. It is proposed that the churches of Bourbon county should be trustees of an endowment to keep the buildings and grounds in a presentable shape.

Presbyterian Missionary a Victim of River Pirates

"Safety First" is not the motto of missionaries. They go where duty calls, and this often leads them into danger. Dr. Henry M. McCandless and wife, missionaries in China, who are supported by the Munn Avenue Presbyterian church of East Orange, N. J., were captured not long since by river pirates. They were traveling up the North and Linchow rivers when pirates shot into their boat and compelled them to surrender. The bandits took all the property of the missionaries, including jewelry, bedding, clothing and even the typewriter which is the property of the mission. Three Chinese girls who were in the party were carried off.

How Evanston Churches Will Help World Peace

Churches everywhere are seeking in these days the most effective means of influencing public opinion in behalf of world peace. The evangelical churches of Evanston, Ill., have arranged two great peace campaigns for their city. On Armistice Day three churches in three sections of the city will be open, and in front of these churches will be displayed both the flag of the nation and the flag of the cross. A continuous prayer service is arranged for twelve hours beginning at nine in the morning, and lasting until nine at night. Every noon from Nov. 7 to 11 inclusive there will be a prayermeeting in a theater lasting thirty minutes which will be in charge of some minister.

Leading Ecclesiastics in Boston Conference on Unity

On the evening of October 27 a Conference on Christian Unity was held in Boston, the committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order being the host of the occasion, and men of various denominations being present. The leading speakers about the dinner table were Bishop Lawrence, of the Massachusetts diocese of the Protestant Episcopal church; Rev. Lemuel H. Murlin, president of Boston University, a Methodist institution; Rev. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, the distinguished Baptist leader connected with the foreign missionary work of her denomination. The topics discussed were "The Present Outlook for Christian Unity" and "By What Means is it Possible for Us Now to Further the Cause of Christian Unity?" Mrs. Peabody said: "The development of the colleges and the medical work of the orient has almost forced Christian Unity. A

Announcement

The demand for Dr. John A. Hutton's great book, "The Proposal of Jesus," has been so large the publishers suddenly find themselves without copies to meet the calls for the book. Another edition—to sell at $1.50—is being put through the presses and copies will be at hand about November 10.

The editor of The Christian Century says of this book:

"The Proposal of Jesus" opens up a new pathway to the mind of Jesus and suggests a fresh apologetic for the social gospel, putting Jesus fairly behind the social ideals of modern Christianity.

This stimulating book will be read by thousands of alert Christian leaders during this season. Send in your order now and the book will be mailed to you immediately upon receipt of our shipment of the new edition.

NOTE: Will those persons who already have unfilled orders in our hands please bear the above facts in mind, and be patient until a new supply makes it possible for us to fill their orders.

man to whom the English language is a problem any way is not interested in religious differences—differences which melt away with the miles. The historical reasons for our differences here are as Greek to men in India. Southern Presbyterians and Southern Methodists mean nothing to men in South China." Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, prominent Congregational minister, brought a message on an allied theme, "The Possibilities of International Good-will." It is planned to hold such conferences as the one in Boston in various cities of the United States to further the larger fellowship of Christian people.

Southern Women Do Not Want Mob Protection

A number of women, the most prominent in the state, who are members of the Georgia Inter-racial Committee, a Christian organization, have disclaimed any desire to be protected by mob violence. The southern men have justified mob violence as a means of protecting womanhood, and it is interesting to find the women willing to accept a kind of protection which has proven to be utterly ineffectual. The pronouncement of these women is as follows: "We have a deep sense of appreciation for the chivalry of men who would give their lives for the purity and safety of the women of their own race, yet we feel constrained to declare our convictions concerning the methods sometimes employed in this supposed protection. We find in our hearts no extenuation for crime, be it violation of womanhood, mob-violence, or the illegal taking of human life. We are convinced that if there is any one crime more dangerous than another, it is that crime which strikes at the root of and undermines constituted authority, breaks all laws and restraints of civilization, substitutes mob-violence and masked irresponsibility for established justice, and deprives society of a sense of protection against barbarism. Therefore, we believe that no falser appeal can be made to southern manhood than that mob-violence is necessary for the protection of womanhood, or that the brutal practice of lynching and burning of human beings is an expression of chivalry. We believe that these methods are 'no protection to anything or anybody but that they jeopardize every right and every security that we possess.' This action of the Georgia women has been followed by a similar pronouncement from a group of Alabama women who have also organized a woman's section of the Inter-Racial Committee in that state.

Dr. Fosdick Sees War Cloud in Orient

Dr. Harry E. Fosdick, noted author and preacher of New York City, has recently returned from the orient. He is quoted as saying that the Pacific question must be settled right, or there may be a bigger war than the one that started in 1914. He lays much blame upon white men who have gained control of territory. He wants all territory stolen from China returned as a basis for future peace in the orient. In connection with this question he points out to the Christian church the grave danger of thousands of missionaries in case war should break out in the far east. No recent traveler from the orient has been more impressed with the urgency of a right settlement of oriental questions than has Dr. Fosdick.

Proposes Washington as Church Headquarters

Most of the evangelical denominations of the country have missionary headquarters in New York, though the Disciples use St. Louis, and the Methodists have their unifying committee in Chicago. Bishop Mathews of the Protestant Episcopal church wants his communion to establish national headquarters in Washington in place of New York. The Roman Catholics are now the only large religious organization with headquarters in Washington. Bishop Mathews wants the Washington bishop to be the presiding bishop of the church, with a coadjutor to care for the work of the Washington churches. It is said that this plan of reorganization of the communion is being seriously considered. The aged Bishop Tuttle, of Missouri, is the present presiding bishop of the church.

Sir William Ramsay Swamped with Invitations

Sir William Ramsay, the distinguished British scholar who has spent a life in scholarly research on the life and travels of St. Paul, is visiting various educational institutions in this country. His coming has attracted wide notice, and he has already received more invitations to speak than he can possibly fill. He will remain in the United States until Feb. 10, when he will return to Great Britain. He hopes to return to America again the following winter.

Lutherans Claim to Be Largest Protestant Family

The year-book recently issued by the National Lutheran Council is the largest work of its kind ever issued in this country. It is full of facts and figures significant in the study of world-wide Lutheranism. The year-book makes the claim that Lutherans are now the largest Protestant denominational family in the world. It is claimed that there are 81,000,000 Lutherans in the world, 21,600,000 Anglicans, 17,800,000 Methodists, 11,500,000 Baptists, 9,700,000 Presbyterians, 5,500,000 Congregationalists and of all other Protestant bodies 10,000,000. The total Lutheran population is claimed to be 122,000,000 of which 64,574,000 are in Germany.

Dr. McComb Becomes Theological Professor

Dr. Samuel McComb, who acquired fame while associate rector of Emmanuel church in Boston as a leader in the Emmanuel movement, and who in recent years has been canon of the cathedral in Baltimore, has recently accepted a position as teacher of homiletics in the Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge. Dr. McComb is an Irishman, and comes from an Ulster Presbyterian family. While at Oxford he became identified with the church of England. He is already the author of a number of religious books of wide circulation, among which are "Religion and Medicine" and "Prayer—What it is and What it Does."

Eureka College Has a Poetry Festival

Musical festivals are common, but a poetry festival is the latest idea at Eureka College, a Disciples institution at Eureka, Ill. The guest of honor was Vachel Lindsay, the poet, of Springfield, Ill. He read a number of his earlier poems. Frank Waller Allen, author of a number of novels, shared the program with him. The program of the day was interspersed with good music rendered by the music department of the college.

Transylvania University Calls a New President

Disciples are raiding the state universities these days for college presidents. After calling Dr. Aley, president of the University of Maine, to become president of Butler College at Indianapolis, word comes of the call issued to Dr. J. P. McConnell, president of Southeastern Normal College of Virginia, to become president of Transylvania College of Lexington, Ky. He is a graduate of Milligan College, and secured the degree Ph.D. from the University of Virginia. It is stated that his choice is satisfactory to both theological groups in the denomination since he is not a theologian, but has spent all his life in teaching and administration. He comes to an institution which even under the difficult conditions of last year was able to meet all of its bills. Dr. R. H. Crossfield was the former president.

Park Their Cars Around the Church

Automobiles in some churches have meant an increase of attendance, but in many others they have meant a decline in the number of worshippers. Central Christian Church of Buffalo has set apart October 30 as automobile day. There are eighty machines in the homes of the members of this church and the big idea is to park them all around the church, even though the owners live only two or three blocks away. When the picnickers start to the country they will see something that will be the beginning of meditation. In addition to the visible demonstration, it is planned to use the cars to haul invalids and people living at a distance to the church.

Minister Outlines Sermons for the Year

The minister who spends half the week hunting for a sermon subject has the sympathy of Rev. Harold G. Barr, pastor of the Disciples church at Pleasantville, Ia. He has outlined his morning and evening sermon topics and his prayer-meeting topics for a whole year. In the series he has undertaken to introduce some pedagogical purpose. The months have for their dominant interest the following themes: September, Recruiting; October, Leadership; November, Christian Citizenship; December, Religious Educa-

By Kirby Page

The Sword or The Cross?

From "The Nation" (New York)

"In his searching little volume, "The Sword or the Cross," Mr. Page presents with force and truth the extreme position against war which must in our opinion be taken by everybody who would be a sincere and loyal follower of the teachings of Jesus. Undoubtedly this book would not have been allowed to circulate during the war, which is but another proof of the fact that all wars constitute in themselves a denial of Jesus and everything that he stood for. Mr. Page does not hesitate to accept the logical consequences of his position. Thus he declares in answer to the question whether war is justifiable as a means of preserving political liberty that 'the following of Jesus Christ is infinitely more important than the maintenance of political liberty.' Had the Bolsheviks but had the vision to see this at Brest-Litovsk, had they but refused to fight and also to sign the shameless German demands, and thus to resist the German evil, their whole status in the world, and probably their future, would be entirely different. We wish for Mr. Page's little volume what is, alas! an impossible wish, that it be placed in the hands of every school child in this allegedly Christian nation. It would do a world of good and be a powerful weapon in the fight which is now on to save humanity from being exterminated by the very science of warfare which it has lately devised, it being today a problem whether war shall go or civilization perish. Not the least of Mr. Page's service is his final disposition of those phrases of Jesus which, together with the episode of the money-changers in the temple, are so blasphemously cited by the believers in mass-murder to make it appear that Jesus condoned what would have made all his teachings merely ghastly hypocrisy."

tion in the Home; January, the Church; February, Religious Interests of Boys and Girls; March, Evangelism; April, Stewardship; May, the School. In the prayer-meeting one night a month is given to each of four interests. These are: Old Testament History, Christian Principles, the Church, A Trip around the World—Missions.

Presbyterians Publish a Year Book of Prayer

The Year Book of Prayer for Missions for 1922 of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. A. is just now being published. It presents in handy and attractive form a great body of information concerning the Home and Foreign Mission work of the Presbyterian church, with prayer topics definitely assigned by weeks and months, and with information about institutions and workers. There are maps of the mission field and tables of inspirational facts. The book circulates widely in Presbyterian circles every year.

Grand Jury Praises a Minister

Rev. Arthur Stout is probation officer in his county in addition to his duties as pastor of First Christian church at Nevada, Mo. The grand jury of the county recently made the following report on his activities: "The jury recognizes the splendid work being done by Rev. Arthur Stout, probation-officer, in looking after the welfare of boys and girls who are given over to his care in trying to better their condition." Mr. Stout is a director in the local public library, and in other ways connected with community movements. He resigned recently in his church, but a petition circulated through the community assured him of the good will of the city, and his church increased his salary five hundred dollars as an inducement to remain.

Dress a Doll for Christmas

One of the activities of the World Sunday School Association is to direct a shower of Christmas gifts to mission lands. They do not undertake to make many specifications, any Sunday-school being urged to send gifts to the favorite missionary this month for distribution among the native children at Christmas time. This year a great emphasis is being laid upon the matter of dressing dolls for children in mission lands. The parcel post charges are 12 cents per pound on parcels not exceeding 11 pounds in weight.

Unitarians Plan Some Revolutionary Steps

Unitarians meeting at their national gathering in Detroit recently took revolutionary action upsetting their own traditions in several important ways. The churches of this faith have gloried in their independency in the past, but the new note sounded is organization and authority. The Laymen's League expects its members to take orders from their superiors. In the past the recruiting of the denomination was by the slow process of education. Henceforth evangelism will be one of the watchwords. Chief Justice Taft was made president of the American Unitarian Association for the third term. More attention will be given to the young people of the denomination during the coming year.

Bishop Provides for Prayers for His Own Soul

Bishop Ridgeway died last July, and his will provides that the sum of £500 shall be paid to the dean and chapter of Salisbury for the restoration of one of the chapels. A part of the provision of the will is that annually on All Soul's Day prayers shall be offered for the souls of himself and his wife. This will is indicative of the tendency of a section of the church of England to restore the medieval practices of the Roman Catholic church. The prayers by their very nature indicate a belief in something like the Roman Catholic conception of purgatory.

Baptists to Have a Primer of Theology

Doctrinal questions are very much alive in the Baptist camp, and the veteran theologian of the denomination, Dr. Augustus Strong, has recently prepared a primer of theology which will be run serially in The Baptist, the official organ of the denomination, and later be put into booklet form. He is the author of a three-volume theology which sets forth Baptist doctrine in its more conservative form. Dr. Strong is the president emeritus of Rochester Theological Seminary.

Ford Hall Forum Starts in With a New Year

The fifteenth year of the Ford Hall Forum in Boston began on October 16. The speaker who opened the series was Alexander Irvine, whose topic was "What's Wrong with the World." On Oct. 30 Moissaye J. Olgin spoke on "The Balance Sheet of the Russian Revolution—What the Revolution Did and What it Failed to Accomplish." The meetings will be directed by Mr. George W. Coleman again this year in spite of the fact that he has taken on arduous duties in connection with the Babson Statistical Institute. In the course of the year nearly every advocate of a radically new idea will get a hearing, including the famous Mrs. Margaret Sanger of New York, the advocate of voluntary parenthood.

Dr. Fosdick Pleases All the Missionaries

Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, well known theological teacher of Union Theological Seminary, is known around the world for his remarkably helpful books on prayer, service and faith, and for his progressive views of evangelical religion. He spent last summer in China. Previous to his coming the members of the Bible Union of China, composed of missionaries who hold a belief in the physical return of Jesus and to the verbal inspiration of the scriptures, were prepared to disagree with the visiting teacher from the homeland. His deep piety and his reverent scholarship quite disarmed criticism, however, and it is said that before leaving China nearly every missionary had come to have a warm appreciation of his work.

Billy Sunday Misquoted in Arbuckle Case

Billy Sunday has been widely quoted over the country with regard to the Arbuckle case, it being reported that the evangelist considered that Arbuckle had been punished enough. The evangelist in answer to an inquiry states that he did take the position that the movie actor could not be convicted of murder, but that he had vigorously condemned his unconventional parties. Billy Sunday asserts that the women who attend these parties are just as bad as the men.

Fight on Newly Elected Bishop Fails

The election of Dr. Shipman of New York as suffragan bishop was no sooner announced than a bitter controversy broke out in the Protestant Episcopal church over this choice. Before he could be consecrated, the consent of a majority of the bishops of the country had to be secured. Some bishops refused to give this consent. Dr. Shipman was made the victim of much gossip and innuendo, but after the smoke of battle clears away it appears that the necessary consents have been secured. The newly elected bishop will be consecrated some time before Christmas.

Louisville Ministers Turn Out Unitarians

In many cities of the land, no question of doctrine is ever raised in forming the ministerial association. In Louisville this liberal policy has prevailed for some time, but recently the orthodox discovered that Unitarians and other "heretics" were getting in. A call was made for the revision of the constitution, and henceforth these aliens will be debarred from fellowship. Occasionally one meets a layman who wonders why these orthodox ministers do not take in all the "heretics" and convert them. That suggestion does not seem to have occurred to those ministers belonging to groups in which doctrine divides them.

What the Baptists Did to Union University

A hue and cry was recently raised against Union University, a Baptist institution of Tennessee. To quiet the opposition, the faculty adopted a resolution by which it hoped to restore confidence. They declared themselves at present, and traditionally, opposed to evolution. Each member of the faculty has been made to sign a creed in which among many other things he affirms that he believes "in Jehovah as the creator of the heavens and the earth." With regard to the Bible he asserts "its teachings are final and conclusive on all subjects about which it speaks." Each faculty member has asserted that he is a member of the Baptist church, and holds to the faith commonly held in these churches. In spite of these assurances, the Western Recorder still has doubts. So do a lot of other people.

Confessions of faith secured under such circumstances are apt to lack that ring of sincerity which comes from inner conviction.

What is The Daily Altar?

IT IS A GUIDE and inspiration to private devotion and family worship. Presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these hurried and high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost, this beautiful book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

The authors of the book are Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison.

ESTIMATES OF THE BOOK

The Christian Advocate: This compact volume will be very helpful in the stimulation of family worship, a grace that has been a diminishing factor in the family life of America for some time. It will be a great advantage to the religious life of the nation if this asset of faith and prayer can again become effective among us. And this book, with its excellently arranged selections for each day, will be of large assistance in that direction.

The Homiletic Review: If we are to meet, successfully, the great and growing number of problems in this eventful time, it is necessary that the quiet hour of meditation be observed as never before. For only a mind nicely poised, only a spirit daily enriched and nourished and guided by an unselfish purpose can adequately meet the situation. Every aid, therefore, to thoughtfulness and prayer should be welcomed, as we do this manual before us. It has been prepared "with the purpose of meeting in an entirely simple and practical manner some of the needs of individuals and households in the attainment of the sense of spiritual reality."

The Churchman: That we are in a new day in more ways than one is evidenced by this beautiful book.

The Presbyterian Advance: For meeting the need of those who would enjoy the privilege of daily prayer, but scarcely know how to begin, the authors have prepared this excellent and beautiful book.

The Central Christian Advocate: Beautifully bound, this book with its tasty and neat appearance, prepares one for the equal taste and care in its contents. Of all books for devotional use, this one in appearance and contents cannot be too highly commended.

The Christian Standard: The binding and make-up of the book are beyond all praise.

The Christian Evangelist: This book is beautifully arranged, handsomely bound and typographically satisfying. It should be a real help toward restoring the family altar.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D.D.: "The Daily Altar" is a bit of fine work. It certainly provides something to grow up to. Unlike many books of devotion, it is free from pious platitudes and pays the highest respect to the intelligence of its readers. Its devotional spirit is pervasive.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor Emeritus The Christian Evangelist: The book is happily conceived, happily worked out and most beautifully bound.

The Outlook

"Ambassador from Everywhere"

CONSIDER a few of the traits that have established the individuality of The Outlook and that commend it to its 100,000 readers.

1. Lyman Abbott, dean of American editors, is its Editor-in-Chief.
2. It is studiously edited by a board of publicists who weigh carefully each week the world's most important events, report them tersely, and then interpret them.
3. The most painstaking efforts are continuously exerted to make every editorial and every contributed article authoritative. It is the most quoted periodical on the floor of Congress.

4. The Outlook is American to the core; yet it scans events with a world-wide range of vision. No other publication could as truly be called The Outlook. One subscriber calls it a "magic carpet," carrying one to the week's most significant and most interesting places.
5. Prejudice or provincialism does not sit at the council tables of The Outlook. Its staff represents many backgrounds—the pulpit, the law, literature, diplomacy, politics, business, and the newspaper office. Graduates of eight important colleges or universities, including Harvard, Yale, Amherst, New York University, Princeton, Williams, Vassar, and the University of Chicago, are on the editorial and general staffs of The Outlook.

6. Most subscribers turn first to The Outlook's editorials. Of what other American periodical can this be said?
7. The quality of its journalism is electric, never dry. The importance of The Outlook as a cogent instrument of journalism is recognized even in newspaper circles; hundreds of editors of newspapers subscribe.

The next 52 issues of The Outlook and Anatole France's
"THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD," for only $5

WHETHER you like "crime" stories or are indifferent to them, you are sure to be delighted with "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard," by Anatole France. It is unlike any "crime" story ever written before.

This novel, crowned by the Institute, the most charming of Anatole France's stories, reveals perhaps more than any other of his works the character of the author himself.

It is the simple tale of the old professor Bonnard, but the old professor is really Anatole France, the young writer of thirty-six, projecting himself some thirty years into the future. Bonnard possesses

ANATOLE FRANCE

France's delightful traits and idiosyncrasies. He is "kindly, rather cynical, faintly ironic, fond of the classics and of humanity."

France has put all the grace that he is so rich in into this book, and it is not strange that this masterpiece of the elegant French stylist attracted one of the greatest stylists in English. Certainly, nothing could be more fitting than that "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard" should have been translated by Lafcadio Hearn.

The book is 4½ x 6¾ in., excellently printed, bound in croft leather, stamped in gold, Modern Library edition, a distinct addition to any library.

Fill in and mail coupon to-day with only $5 and you will receive "The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard" at once, and the next 52 numbers of The Outlook.

SURVEY GRAPHIC bids you to a voyage of discovery. The magazine is founded in the belief that the drama of human living may be as thrilling as the tale of a battle; that the destiny of a million new citizens, the struggle for public health, the aspirations of workaday men and women are as colorful as a trip to the Fortunate Isles. Survey Graphic will reach into the corners of the world—America and all the Seven Seas—to wherever the tides of a generous progress are astir. Its cargo will be stuff of creative experience, observation and invention. It will turn to the graphic arts to visualize these things in all manner of illustration, and for buoyancy seek the threefold gifts of vision, authenticity and charm.

SURVEY GRAPHIC will draw on unusual sources. It is the natural development of the scheme of staff research for which Survey Associates was chartered as an educational enterprise. Back of it lies a tested procedure of first-hand inquiry and open discussion, the range, integrity and insight of which have built up a cooperative publishing body of 1600 members and ten times that number of weekly subscribers. Survey Graphic is itself made possible as an experiment in social interpretation by special gifts to Survey Associates of a modest four-year promotion fund.

¶ Great sums of money have been put in recent years into social and industrial research. But the results, charged though they have been with public significance, have been all but buried in the reports of government bodies, universities and foundations. Fresh winds of social innovation have been stirring in the professions and in the organized movements of the time. But our various conceptions of the common welfare have not yet taken on the outlines of a new continent where all men can be at home. Rather they are an archipelago among whose islands Survey Associates will ply its commerce of good-will.

¶ Our plan is to continue the development of The Survey (weekly) as a current synthesis of events, evidence and experience, designed for the common service of all those who are consecutively interested in the broad fields of health, industry, education, race relations, child and family welfare, civics and community organization.

[$5.00 a year]

¶ This year Survey Graphic will be sent to weekly subscribers of The Survey once each month—as 12 issues of the 52 issues of the year.

¶ We project Survey Graphic as an illustrated monthly magazine to reach that larger circle of readers who, in every city and state, every profession, industry and church are coming to reinforce the slender company of men and women who bear the brunt of social upbuilding.
[$3.00 a year]

¶ November Survey Graphic reports the survey of criminal justice made for the Cleveland Foundation by Dean Roscoe Pound and Felix Frankfurter of Harvard Law School. Chester H. Rowell, of the Fresno Republican, writes on the social problems of the Pacific which come before the Disarmament Conference. Winthrop D. Lane follows the Senate Investigating Committee through the torn countryside of West Virginia. Alexander M. Bing, an American builder, tells of English trade unionists who have taken government contracts and are building a thousand homes.

OLD friends and new of Survey Associates, we bid to a voyage of discovery. For our idea is by no means to waterlog the venture into a freighter of worthy causes, but to be mindful of the invigorating gales of discussion, the currents that stir in troubled times even as in troubled waters, the salt spray of criticism and that gleam of far coast lines which men call the ideal.

EDITORIAL

Is the Church a Collection Agency?

THE war had scarcely ceased when a hardy clergyman made his declaration of independence in the Atlantic Monthly. He had been used as a collection agency and as a propagandist for all sorts of causes. He said he was through. Dr. George A. Gordon of Old South church, Boston, a leading Congregational minister, bolted the plans of his denomination, and insisted on the right of his congregation to make its own apportionments to benevolences. His church, too, had always been unusually generous. Rev. George Parkin Atwater has made a new classification of the roles of a minister. The average minister is "priest, prophet and publican." When one examines into the reasons for the large number of people in every city who were once active church people but who now are inactive, one finds the economic fact is often basic. These very same people may in some instances be niggardly, preferring to pour their bounty into movie shows rather than into religious work. But this is not the whole story. There are many other people who cannot keep up with the insistent demands of those who can see in the church nothing but a collection agency for the various "causes." It will be a great day for religion when some fair and honorable basis is found for the benevolence of the average household of church folk. Some profess to find it in the tithe. With the Jews the tithe paid the tax to the state as well as to organized religion. The analogy for our own time is altogether faulty. The state does not tax all men alike, or even in the same percentage of their incomes. The lodges need only a minimum of income, so they have a flat fee for membership. Some day the church will work out a system that is fair, and that will become authoritative. In that time, ministers may once more spend a little time with books and preach something to the people besides the accomplishments of "societies." The fountains of benevolence are starved because Christianity has grown poor at its heart. What we need is not another Interchurch World Movement, but more Savonarolas, and Luthers and Wesleys.

The Glory of the Church

MUCK-RAKING the church was begun as a sensational journalistic enterprise, but it has continued as a pastime of some preachers. Probably no organization in the world endures so much self-criticism as the church. One cannot doubt that much of this is wholesome. It is better for reforms to arise from within than to be forced from without. However, every social organization must give attention to morale. The critical habit can easily be over-done. Meanwhile there is abundant opportunity for the churchman of today to glory in the achievements of the church. To call the roll of her great characters is to review human history for two thousand years. Men of genius, vision and courage have lived in the greatest devotion to the church. They have been glad to consecrate to her service their choicest gifts. Even at this very time the world hardly understands how much good the church is doing. They do not know that many philanthropic organizations take the credit to themselves for their program, but never tell the world that the churches furnish most of the money for their program. A great many lodge men talk fulsomely of their homes for sick orphans and aged without realizing how much greater is the program of the church in this same field. Ambassador Morgenthau, a Jew, bore testimony to the service of American missionaries in the orient. He said: "Christian missionaries in Turkey are carrying forward a magnificent work of social service, education, philanthropy, sanitation, medical healing and moral uplift. They are, I discovered, in reality advance agents of civilization." The church is still the most trustworthy exponent of conscience in the community life. The consciousness of God, so necessary as a basis for morality and fraternity, is fostered by the church. Both in history and in present achievement the church is worthy of her place in the community life. To take liberties with a celebrated saying of Paul, a modern Christian, fully conceding the church's faults, may still say, "I am not ashamed of the church of Jesus Christ."

Marshall Foch and International Courtesy

MARSHALL FOCH is not a total abstainer. He comes from a country in which the making of wine is a leading national enterprise, and the drinking of it a universal and virtually unopposed custom. Yet it is announced on his arrival on the shores of America that while in America he will get along without the wine which is customary with his daily meal in France. This announcement is due to sheer courtesy rather than to any conscientious scruple. But in this act of courtesy the great soldier has set a good example for many other international visitors who are in our country at this time. We read newspaper accounts of some who assert that their healths will be jeopardized if they remain long in America without their daily booze. Special arrangements are demanded by some whereby the delegates to the Washington Conference be allowed to bring in a trunk full of liquor through our customs house. British officialdom has exhibited the opposite attitude from that of General Foch. It has too often shown itself contemptuous of the prohibition laws of America. The good feeling of America and Great Britain is already endangered by the crew of British bootleggers who are smuggling liquor into America from the West Indies. Is not this a time when the British delegates might learn something from the courtesy of the French hero? Perhaps a world conference attended by men whose brains are not befogged with after-dinner liquors will produce a very different document from that evolved at Versailles. It is said the ancient Germans in council considered every question twice, once while drunk and once while sober. The diplomats have already tried their hands at our problems while drunk. Why not see how these problems look while sober?

Theology's Death Greatly Exaggerated

IT IS widely assumed that theology, once regarded as the queen of sciences, is dead. Theological professors are often discussed as though they were a quite obsolescent if not obsolete species. Against this popular notion some religious leaders have been of late protesting, insisting that theology is very much alive and that theologians are very human. If one were to apply to religious meetings the theological test, one could easily discern that it is after all theology which gathers the religious assemblage together. It may be a mistaken and wrong-headed crowd, but it is for theology that they come. The kind of minister who preaches (as a Los Angeles divine did recently) on "What Kind of Ladies Attend Pajama Parties?" will be found to be speaking to a far smaller audience than will gather for Christian Science, premillennialism or even for an aggressive and up-standing statement of progressive religious views. If one applies to religious literature the test of popularity one will find that an astonishing percentage of the genuinely popular books, the best-sellers, are really theological. Fosdick's "The Meaning of Prayer" is not merely devotional. It meets many intellectual questions in the religious field. His whole series of handy sized manuals that have gone so well are better described as theological than anything else. Theology may be out-of-date, as when a group of laymen in Los Angeles revive and circulate once more a sermon of the revered Dwight L. Moody on the Second Coming, or when some enterprising person digs up some forgotten plates of Finney's Lectures on Systematic Theology and offers them for service to living preachers. Theology may be unscientific in the hands of those who refuse to face facts, and are conscious of defending prejudices and authoritative utterances of the past. But there is bound to be theology as long as there is religion. It may be unsystematic and inadequate, it may be medieval and dogmatic in method, or it may be scientific and modern. The attitude for the modern church to take is not to decry theology as the source of our religious troubles, but to insist upon that freedom for the theologian which the laboratory scientist has already secured, and which is in the way of being secured by the scientific investigators in economics.

Suicide on the Increase

THE statistical bulletin of the Metropolitan Life Insurance company presents in a recent issue some interesting facts and conclusions with regard to suicide. During the year 1920 the rate of suicide among the policy-holders of the company was only half what it was in 1911. During the first seven months of 1921 there is a 26 per cent gain over the rate of last year. A graph has been made for a period of ten years which seems to establish some sort of connection between economic prosperity and the suicide rate. This is significant as far as it goes, but one must not draw the deduction that the problem of self-murder is one entirely connected with economics. A study of the motives leading to suicide reveals a great variety of motives. The fear of exposure in evil deeds is a frequent motive. When the defaulter grows tired of living on his ill-gotten gains in Mexico he may take his own life. The girl who has been betrayed in her love may prefer to die, even though staying on is not at all a question of room rent. Suicide often results from temporary fits of depression which come to perfectly normal people. The Salvation Army does a commendable service in rescuing every year a considerable number of people from their suicidal intentions. It is a matter easily observed that religious sanctions have much to do with this reprehensible act. In Japan religion has nothing to say against the practice of killing oneself for spite against an enemy, or as a vindication of personal honor. There the practice of self-murder is much more common than in the United States where religious teaching is hostile. Temperament has much to do with the matter. The gloomy Scandinavian is more subject to this temptation than is the cheerful Irishman. Meanwhile, in the face of a rising tide of suicide, the church should find it worth while not only to apply the commandment of the decalogue against suicide, but to help those in sorrow and trouble lest they be tempted beyond their strength.

Sherwood Eddy at the University of Chicago

FOR a week great audiences have gathered in Mandel Hall at the University of Chicago to listen to the direct, forceful and persuasive messages of Mr. Sherwood Eddy, who was secured by the university Young Men's Christian Association to give to the students the appeal of the gospel to the holy life. For several years past these addresses of Mr. Eddy have been a customary feature of the university schedule, and no speaker has produced a more profound effect upon the student body. In addition to the evening addresses, Mr. Eddy has spoken at chapel services, and at faculty gatherings, and has conducted, with the help of a dozen or more of the faculty members a series of personal conferences with men at the Reynolds Club, and with women at Ida Noyes hall. The results, both those that are capable of tabulation, and those of less evident nature, have been of a gratifying character. Such a sane and inspiring interpreter of the gospel message in its modern application to life can do much to offset the damage to the faith of young men and women wrought by the reactionary utterances of would-be defenders of the Christian religion like Mr. Bryan, whose recent visit to the University is remembered with regret and chagrin by Christian leaders in the faculty and the student body.

The Lost Art of Recreation

LITTLE true recreation is to be found in America. For the most part Americans gather in crowds to watch others amuse themselves. The ninety thousand people who paid a big admission fee to see a prize fight in New Jersey recently would have had a much more wholesome experience if they had put on the gloves themselves, and paired off all over a city park. Big football games are a pathetic exhibition of the very same thing. A score or so of fine athletic fellows on either team exhibit themselves before thousands of students who take no exercise except what the university forces them to take. The automobile has taken the place of the four-mile walk a day with a good many men. The moving picture least of all meets the need for true recreation. There is no expressional activity. Just as we used to object to death-bed scenes described by revivalists, so we find in the movie show the play of big emotions without any corresponding activities. Just now the churches are importuned by many of the young people to hold public dances in the church parish houses and social rooms. Evangelical churches, even those of the more liberal spirit, have difficulty in acceding to this demand on account of the highly objectionable sex dances that now hold the center of interest, even though the dance is perhaps less harmful than certain erotic moving pictures. It is not by any means the first task of the church to furnish recreation. Some would say that the church had no responsibility at all. But the community needs leadership. In America we have forgotten how to play and someone must teach us again. Perhaps it will have to be done by the church.

A Master Workman Talking Shop

DR. JOHN HUTTON has published his lectures on preaching—"conversations" he calls them—delivered to divinity students in Aberdeen, Glasgow and Edinburgh, and repeated at Northfield during the summer. They appear under the significant title, "That the Ministry Be Not Blamed," and it is a brilliant book, rich in personal revelation, and full of those swift, startling insights which made the author so rewarding to his readers. It is always interesting to see how a master workman does his work, and among the multitude of books about the holy art of preaching this one will have a place unique.

Every man has his own way of working, and if we cannot follow all the methods which Dr. Hutton recommends—as to reading, for example—it is not to be wondered at that he is tenacious of methods which have been so fruitful in his own study. He reads with pen in hand—he will not allow us to use a pencil, save when we write sermons—making copious notes; and he insists that any other way of reading is a form of indulgence, or an invitation to sleep. Far from it. Some of us reject notebooks as a form of slavery, and an insult to the noble office of memory. But that is a mere detail, and we are more than willing for Dr. Hutton to have his say, however dogmatic.

As to the technique of preaching, not much that is new has been said since Phelps and Broadus, and little has been added to its history and philosophy since Dykes, Dargan, and Behrends. The great value of Dr. Hutton's lectures—like those of Dr. Cadman—is in the method of approach to the modern mind in its bewilderment. Here he is a sure-footed guide both in precept and in practice, by virtue not only of his insight, but, no less, of his candor and courage. His emphasis upon the nature of faith is much needed. It is not knowledge; it is mixed with uncertainty, else it would not be faith. He prefers the risk and peril and moral urgency of faith to the paralysis of dead certainty; as the pope, in "The Ring and the Book," prays to be delivered from "the torpor of assurance." Faith stands midway between denial and credulity, both of which mean the end of adventure and entreaty. Dr. Hutton agrees with Emerson when he said that God has given us the 'choice between truth and repose," whereas half the weary modern world is seeking repose.

Equally important is Dr. Hutton's demand for the preaching of the vital, creative, fundamental truths of Christian faith, as, for instance, the mighty truth of forgiveness. Tell men of the perpetual miracle of divine forgiveness—like a fountain forever flowing—but take care that your insight is corrected by the profound insight of the great Russians who brood over the problem, not as to how God can forgive man, but how man can forgive himself! More than once he appeals to the Russians—Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Duimov—"who knows so much about the soul of man that our most subtle minds, minds like Meredith's even, seem heavy and half awake." His indebtedness to Browning is celebrated with rejoicing gratitude in a passage which is also an invitation to the ministry as a vocation:

"Surely it is no time for a sensitive man who knows history, and who knows his own soul, to hesitate on the threshold of this ancient career. Probably never in the history of man was the great final question about life at stake as it is today. All our questions fall back upon deeper questions, and these on deeper still, until they pause before the great and awful question as to what this life of ours means. Are we human beings irrelevant to this vast system which was our cradle and becomes our grave? Or is there a blessed hypothesis which thinking, feeling men can honorably hold—a hypothesis which without robbing life of its mystery and awe ends for us its aching ambiguity? May we speak to men of God? There is one solving word for this universe: it is God. There is one solving word for God: it is Christ.

"I am sorry for you men that you have no great poet, as we had, to set your Christian blood leaping, and disposing you almost to dance before the Lord. We had Browning; for whom be all thanks to God forever and forever. And Browning spent his whole life, and wrote seventeen volumes, to this and no other effect:

"While I see day succeed the deepest night—
How can I speak but as I know?—my speech
Must be, throughout the darkness, "It will end:
The light that did burn, will burn.'"

Disarmament Insufficient

THE old story about a certain wooden horse seems, in these days when Greek is no longer generally studied, to be passing from memory. The Greeks had been engaging in the ancient game of war with the usual result—nothing. They felt that they could not indefinitely keep up the contest of armed competition; they were weary of it; so they made a gesture of disarmament, retiring from the field, leaving only their tribute to the gods in the shape of the huge wooden horse. It is unnecessary to recount the denouement other than to recall the fact that the action of the Greeks indicated merely a change of tactics, not a change of heart; but Troy fell for it—and by it.

The story is singularly appropriate to the present situation among the nations. They are tired of war, and, what is more, they simply cannot continue to carry the tremendous burden of naval and military preparedness indefinitely and hope to work out the economic adjustments that are needed to establish normalcy. With industry stagnant, and no one knowing how even the interest on the great debts is to be paid, England, France, Japan and America are each of them spending on armament today about four times what they did before the war. Under the circumstances, limitation of expensive armament is the most promising possibility. The envoys will meet on November 11, to consider ways for its accomplishment.

Had the Trojans, in the case of the wooden horse, followed their usual custom of examining the entrails of the offering to the gods, they would have learned some valuable truths. Such a procedure is not without point today. One can note the change of tactics on the part of the nations, but there is nothing to indicate that in regard to the method of war there has been any change of heart. In spite of a very general revulsion at the fact of war, there is still among both people and governments the same reliance upon destructive power as the ultimate safeguard of the nation that there has been in the past. One or two well directed questions to almost any individual will develop that fact.

But let us proceed with the dissection of the animal. It is generally understood now that the next war will be fought largely with gas and that gas is the offspring of the dye industry. Less than a year ago the campaign to develop the dye industry because of its strategic importance was largely camouflaged. Now both Secretary Weeks and Secretary Denby have come out for it, the Chemical Foundation is urging the embargo on dyes in the old phrase as "our insurance against war," and the industry is reported to have one of the strongest lobbies in Washington. Yet there is little indication that that kind of armament, the most terrible for destruction, will be seriously limited by the conference.

Again, it is now a commonplace that economic rivalry is the most fertile seed of war, but there has been no suggestion that the nations would in Washington consider how they could do away with that rivalry. Indeed, if consistency is a desideratum for nations, they could hardly do so as long as their economic life at home is established upon that same competitive clash of rival interests. The building of power to dominate in the commercial field and, as well, the building of power to dominate in the labor field, have their natural outcome in the struggle to dominate nationally.

No doubt there has been a change of tactics; but the spirit of war is still being fostered, the occasions for it are in the making, and the most effective means to carry it on are being developed, all in spite of anything the conference on the limitation of armament is likely to do. Those who desire a warless world will do well to bear these things in mind even while they bring every possible pressure to bear upon the conference to encourage it to live up to its name.

Perhaps at this point the appositeness of the story of the wooden horse breaks down, for the Trojans would have continued to have war whether they listened to Cassandra or not. Under the present circumstances there is still a way out. The forces of good will in the country must not be content with the weaving of garlands to decorate the wooden horse. They must give themselves to the one thing which can save the situation—the kindling in men's hearts of such a concern for the welfare of their brother men that they will not abide it that a single one, be he rich or poor, white, black, or yellow, should be exploited for the profit or pleasure of another. The development of a recognition, in the practical relationships of modern life, of the infinite worth of each personality, will call not for the expedient reduction of armies and navies, but for their complete elimination, in order that the instinct for fellowship, which is more widespread than many people suppose, may have a real chance to function.

When this is done, men will recognize the truth of those words of the late Bishop Greer's, that "the true safeguarding of a nation is not to be found in the weapons of war, but in those eternal principles which make for righteousness and truth and brotherhood and peace." The effort to establish social life upon such a basis may test the very foundation of the economic order, but a glance at history since the time of the wooden horse would indicate that the construction of a warless world should be begun from the foundations.

Facing the War Argument

PUBLIC opinion exhibits two marked tendencies in respect to the results of the approaching conference in behalf of the limitation of armaments. There are many people who appear to be hopeful that some constructive program can be formulated. The church groups are largely of this mind. Christian people are by habit trained to some acceptance of the principle that the thing that is right and greatly desirable is not unattainable. One can hardly be a disciple of the Master of men and be a confirmed pessimist. And what so necessary at this time for the good of the race and the realization of Christian ideals as the banning of war, and the limitation of the processes by which it is encouraged?

But there is an opposite opinion, which finds expression among people of all classes. It is inspired by the centuries-long drama of war, its absorption of the attention and energies of so large a part of the race during all history, and the seeming futility of attempting at this late date to eliminate it from the list of human adventures. The average man seems to cherish this opinion. With a cynical disbelief in the reality of either the possibility or the desire to end war, he confesses that while he has no objection to the efforts amiable people are making in behalf of universal peace, he is too much a man of the world to share their optimism, or to believe that peace parleys can achieve any worthwhile results. And so, while the churches are preparing to unite in prayer on Armistice Sunday for the divine blessing on the conference, great numbers of our fellow citizens will nurse their hesitations, and reaffirm their skepticism.

If the appeal is made to history, the doubters appear to have a strong case. What are most of these garnered pages of human events but the stories of national animosities, campaigns, battles, sieges, massacres, the dreadful harvesting of the rank growths that have sprung from the dragon's teeth sown by the spirit of war? What are these countless miles of canvass in all the museums and art galleries of the world but the pictured pomp and circumstance of glorious war by land and sea, in all the ages and under every sky? Have we not believed and taught our children to understand that history, from the days of Herodotus down is the chronicle of the hatreds of the race, and their embodiment in the shock and tragedy of fighting?

When Frederick of Prussia wrote in those French journals of his, under the cynical and mocking eyes of his Parisian guest, Voltaire, that war was the serious business of every self-respecting nation, and that peace was but the inglorious interlude between the great military impulses that marked the world's progress, he expressed the convinced sentiment of the ancient and medieval world. And in spite of the fact that the views of Frederick, cherished and repeated by Prussians of the school of von Moltke, Bismark and William II brought Germany crashing to its ruin, the world has not yet been cured of its furtive insistence that war is an ineradicable element in the fabric of human life, and that the same old tragedies must persist to the end of the play. "There always have been wars; there always will be." That is the parrot-like reiteration of the sceptic who is content to take humanity at its worst, and is hopeless of amendment.

But history itself has another lesson to teach. It is making increasingly clear the fact that the most ancient and deeply imbedded wrongs have yielded slowly and reluctantly but surely to the mandates of humanity, and largely under the inspiration of Christian teaching. The list is long, and too familiar to require detailed recounting. But in every instance the current of popular opinion was against the practicability of the reform, and even when the order of society was in process of change, and the ancient abuse was yielding to the pressure of organized authority, it was the fashion to doubt the success of the venture, and to predict that the evil would return.

Piracy was accepted as an unsocial but inevitable practice in the middle ages, and down to modern times. Beyond the shore lines of the lands where a semblance of order prevailed, it was understood that ships were at the mercy of whatever corsair might pursue and capture them. There was no agreement among the nations to combine for the policing of the seas. The best that could be done was when some nation that had suffered too severely from the evil arose in its wrath and raided the pirate haunts, and so won a brief respite from plundering. In such days most men despaired of any more effective means of ridding the great waters of buccaneering. Today, except in obscure corners of the seven seas, piracy is obsolete.

Slavery was the most deeply entrenched social institution of antiquity. The slave population of Rome far outnumbered the free. Even early Christianity made no open protest against it. Slaves were exhorted by the apostle Paul to be obedient to their masters, and Onesimus was sent back to his owner by the same Christian teacher. Every biblical and economic argument was invoked in defence of the system. Men said it was a part of the fixed order of the world. Yet in the fulness of time it went its way, and in its trail serfdom, which was a secondary type of slavery.

The barbarities of the treatment of criminals under the old regime are incapable of description. It was the common practice of English law to imprison men for debt. Torture was freely employed in the examination of those accused of crime. The death penalty was the accepted punishment for one hundred and eight common offenses in the days of the Puritans. Much yet remains to be done to make the treatment of those accused of crime square with the teachings of the Christian religion. Yet in spite of the appallingly slow movement of public opinion, and the confident assertion of cynics that criminal laws could not be altered, a wholly new spirit has come over the world of judicial procedure, and bad as it is, the treatment of the criminal is vastly more humane than formerly.

Waiving entirely the more recent campaigns in behalf of prohibition and woman's emancipation, which are not yet completed, though far on the way to success, one naturally asks why should not war, though an ancient and deeply intrenched evil, give way like the rest to the spirit of humanity and good will? For after all it is not half so formidable as it appears, and has played no such pretentious part in history as its apologists affirm. It is easy to slip over the long stretches of human experience in which the race has been quietly and constructively learning its lessons and building up its institutions, and fix attention upon the dramatic episodes of siege and battle. That was the habit of earlier historians. It is no longer the method of the best. The undisturbed and laborious story of the common people and the growth of their arts and industries is the true narrative of the scientific chronicler.

To be sure, fighting is one of the most difficult habits to eradicate. Yet it has slowly yielded to the pressure of enlightened opinion. There was a time when every man went armed to his daily task. Spear or axe or sword or dirk was the essential equipment of artisan and noble alike. Today in all but the most lawless of the so-called civilized portions of the earth the carrying of personal weapons has become infrequent or illicit. Once the duel was the ordinary arbiter of personal disagreements. Today it survives only in belated areas of the earth. Once cities built walls to protect themselves from their nearest neighbors, and usually, in the spring of the year, in the time when, as the biblical writer described the custom of his day, "kings go forth to battle," their people marched out on some pretext or other to fight with the most convenient enemy. Today all this folly and childishness has yielded to the progressive spirit of good will. Why should nations fight each other, any more than individuals or neighboring cities?

There are usually four classes of people in every country who desire war, and with those exceptions the nations wish for peace. The four classes are the men of the military and naval profession, to whom war is a vocation and a pathway to promotion; the makers and dispensers of the munitions and necessities of war, who are not concerned when and how it comes nor with whom, so they may profit thereby; the money lenders, without whose assistance no nation can make war, and who have the same interest in its promotion and the same indifference to its havoc or results; and the yellow journalists, who for some sensational reasons, or to gratify some personal spite, magnify the signs and provocations of war. With these exceptions there are few in any land who believe war necessary or desirable. Unfortunately these four classes contrive to make themselves heard far above the calmer voices of internationalism and good will. And it is the business of the great mass of thoughtful citizens in this land and all the lands to discern the difference between the clamors of jingo hatred and the utterances of reason and brotherhood.

All the moral and spiritual motives of humanity are on the side of peace progressively realized through the limitation of armaments and the cementing of the bonds of mutual understanding and tolerance among the nations. And rapidly the economic motives are massing themselves on the same side of the question, until men are asking with deepest anxiety whether the continuance of war and war preparations does not mean the ruin of the resources of all the lands in the mad race to protect themselves against each other, an insane reversion to barbarism.

The Big Black Dog

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THESE was a man whose name was Schneider. And he came forth from Germany, and dwelt upon a farm. And he had a Great Big Vicious Black Dog. And the custom of the Dog was to run into the Road and Bark Furiously at everything that passed by. And he frightened horses, so that they sometimes became unmanageable. And he frightened women, so that the wives of farmers drave to town by other roads when they could. And he frightened little children who went by to school.

Now I dwelt not in that place, but I sojourned there for three years in the days of my youth. And I heard many folk complain and say that the thing had become Unendurable.

And I went away unto College, and was gone Three Years. And I returned and spent a week of my vacation there. And each evening I borrowed an Horse and a Buggy, and went for a Drive. And each evening I drave with some one else, for I had divers friends in that place.

And one night as we drave we went by the farm of Schneider, and his Dog rushed forth at us. And the horse was frightened.

And I spake in my wrath unto the damsel that sat with me, saying, Hath this Infamous Dog been permitted to live yet these added Three Years?

She said, Yea, and groweth worse as he groweth older.

And I said in mine heart, The Lord do so to me and more also if he grow two days older than he now is.

And the next evening I started forth as soon as the sun went down, and although I was going in another direction, yet did I drive past the farm of Schneider. And there lay something beside me on the seat of the Buggy. And as yet I was alone.

And I came to the farm of Schneider in the twilight, but it was light enough for my purposes.

And the Dog rushed out at the head of mine horse, and leaped up as if he would bite mine horse's head. And when the horse went faster, then did the Dog run beside the Buggy, and the Dog leaped up as it were between the wheels. And his great red Mouth was opened.

And I held the reins in my left hand. And I pointed my right hand and that which I held therein straight down the open throat of the Dog. And I shot but once, for once was Plenty.

And mine horse was frightened and Going Some, and I permitted him to go.

Now on the next day, and certain days thereafter, Schneider was going to and fro and inquiring everywhere who had killed his Dog. But he never suspected me, for my date that night lay in another direction, and I kept my date. And within a day or two I was gone. But I heard much rejoicing over the death of Schneider's dog, and much wonder as to who had done it.

And even to this day it is not known who killed Schneider his Dog, nor who hit Billy Patterson.

Now I have thought often of that incident in my youth. For I have seen abuses and nuisances that people tolerate day after day until the days grow into years, when they ought to rise up and put an end to them. For it is not necessary for such things to be.

And when I face the recording angel and he reckoneth up my too few good deeds, I know that he will give me credit for at least one beside those that people know.

For things that are wrong should be met with decision, and should be abolished. In an easy-going age, Toleration itself becometh sometimes Intolerable.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

A Question

GOD, who made the shining stars,
The circling planets, the fair, green earth,
With friendly seasons—jubilant spring,
Bountiful summer, winter that puts tired life to rest;
God, who made morning songs and sweet night-crooning;
God of the forests and silver rivers,
Gardens and orchards green and golden,
God of harmony, God of beauty,
Who made war?

America Sings of the Dawn

TURN from your songs of old years,
Spurn your old sorrows and tears,
Scorn the dark battles of hate,
Turn to the new songs that wait.
Sing of my mountains,
Sing my clear fountains,
Mothering rivers
To feed my wide prairies.
See, in my corn lands
Are songs in the making;
In my deep forests
Are chants. In the waking
Of spring, in the breaking
Of dawn, in the gladness
Of Junetime, the sadness
Of autumn, there are lyrics
Of love and of dreaming.

Seek no more
In the yellowing records of yore;
Leave the old volumes of lore.
Rise at the dawn,
Climb to the heights,
Drink of the sunrise,

Greet the new day that is breaking
From over the seas.
List! on the breeze
Come new songs of gladness;
On dark lands of sadness
A new light is coming.
The pale wraiths of war
Are frightened and fleeing;
The dark fiends of hate
Are falling and dying.
'Tis the dawning of freedom,
The long-desired love-time,
The lost dream of brothers.

God's Dreams

DREAMS are they—but they are God's dreams!
Shall we decry them and scorn them?
That men shall love one another,
That white shall call black man brother,
That greed shall pass from the market-place,
That lust shall yield to love for the race,
That man shall meet with God face to face—
Dreams are they all,
But shall we despise them—
God's dreams!

Dreams are they—to become man's dreams!
Can we say nay as they claim us?
That men shall cease from their hating,
That war shall soon be abating,
That the glory of kings and lords shall pale,
That the pride of dominion and power shall fail,
That the love of humanity shall prevail—
Dreams are they all,
But shall we despise them—
God's dreams!

Out of a Job

By Alva W. Taylor

MEN whose daily income does not depend upon the wage paid by others can have little realization of what it means to be without a job. The professional and business man takes a day off at his own will and the farmer works long hours one season and does as he pleases another. When a man runs his own business there is no one to complain when he lays off, but when he works for another, for him to quit interferes with the run of things. Thus the wage earner is accused of shiftlessness when he does no more than his employer does in taking time for his own devices at his own will. Of course there are shiftless wage earners just as there are shiftless sons of the well-to-do; often it is shiftlessness that drives them down into the wage earning class but it is an unjust mass judgment that would call all unemployed men shiftless. There is a cheap, spurious air of superiority that speaks of labor as an inferior class and talks about "so-and-so being good enough for their class."

"The saddest sight under the sun," said Carlyle, "is that of a man willing to work but with no chance to work." It is a stinging criticism of our social progress that we have not yet made provision for a job for every member of society who needs a job. This problem is at the bottom of all social problems; it is fundamental to all sound social progress—the sine qua non of a healthy civilization. Until security of life is insured we have not provided civilization's temple with a cornerstone. Lloyd George premised England's responsibility to the unemployed by saying: "Starvation for the man who is willing to work and who is deprived of work through no fault of his own brings a situation which no civilized community can tolerate."

A FOREWARNING TO AMERICA

The situation in England is a forewarning to America. With not more than one-third as large a percentage of her wage earners unemployed as in our case, the situation is much more serious than with us. Great marching demonstrations are staged, the premier's residence becomes the goal of hungry processions, infirmaries are stormed and taken by men without where to sleep, unemployment allowances have eaten up $400,000,000 already, mobs gather where jobs are offered and the ground is made fertile in a million hearts for the sowing of the seeds of radicalism and for destroying faith in the present state of government and society. The most conservative labor leaders look upon present conditions as the gravest in the entire stretch of their careers. In England the majority are wage earners; there is small outlet of personal opportunity on farm or in private enterprise. The only refuge is in emigration, but it requires at least a small capital to emigrate, and it is not easy for the lower half of British wage earners to ever lay up even a small bit of capital.

If the reader would take an evening walk through the crowded streets and alleyways of Shoreditch in East London he would be able to visualize what it means to belong to this lower waged class. It was of them that Huxley said that if there was nothing better to be offered them it would be better for a merciful comet to destroy the earth they dwelt upon. It was in this East London that Charles Booth, a retired shipper, found by his great survey of "The Life and Labors of the People of East London" that one-third of them went to bed each night with less than enough to eat; that is to say, they were in a state of perpetual poverty. Over in the west end great mansions spend every night on useless luxury enough to supply the total need of the east end. Benjamin Kidd used to marvel that the poor of East London were so patient, for they might loot West London's luxury to feed East London's poverty. Of course such a procedure would not change the state of affairs, but unless that state of affairs is changed there is grave danger that some extra crisis will turn London into such a scene as Paris witnessed during the commune or as Petrograd and Moscow have witnessed in recent years. The economic and social system that puts 72 per cent of the wealth of the realm in the hands of 2 per cent of the people, and leaves one-third of the people in want, could at least be bettered, to say nothing more radical; and when the burden of such economic maladjustment as the war has brought about falls upon this same one-third more than upon any other class the maladjustment has become cruelty.

ENGLAND'S EXPERIENCE

America is rapidly becoming an industrial country. We should have the good sense to learn from England's industrial history and make adequate provision to save ourselves from the inequities she has experienced. Right here it should be said that but for such social organization as she has effected the suffering would be much more acute and the dangers of revolution imminent as never before in steady old England. The best of the employers, all the labor leaders and more experienced statesmen, almost without exception, will tell you that the labor union, the acceptance of collective bargaining, the laws for social insurance against old-age, sickness and unemployment, and the provision for employment agencies under governmental supervision have saved the day. Mr. Hoover's conference on unemployment made some recognition of fundamental things but confined itself largely, as perhaps it should have done, to emergency recommendations. But it is high time that some such conference should sit as a sort of social parliament to spend months studying and commending to society and industry and government the fundamental and permanent means for meeting the problem of unemployment. Laissez faire in a land of vast untouched opportunity may, like original sin in a medieval age, work very well simply because there is no practical test of its results, but no one will advocate it in a complex age like ours unless he stands to profit by it at the expense of those who must go down in such a "dog-eat-dog" system of things.

There is no provision in our present industrial arrangements, or lack of arrangements, that insures a job to any wage earner. He must get as he may have luck to get, and hold by merit so long as there is anything to hold. To provide insurance by reducing everything to an iron-clad system would be ruinous to initiative, merit and individual enterprise, but that does not argue that nothing can be done to give a more adequate security to every man willing and able to work. The wage earner stands the first and greatest loss in any and every depression. The steel trust has a half billion dollars in its coffers to insure dividends against depression, but its first act is to discharge wage earners by the tens of thousands when the depression comes; it has no wage-fund to insure against loss of wage income. Why not insure the workers their bread and butter as well as the stockholders their limousines? The employing company carries insurance against loss by fire and flood; why not also carry insurance against loss of the workers' savings and the foreclosure of the mortgage on his cottage? There is no greater fallacy than that capital takes the risks. Labor takes the greater risks because it risks bread and butter, and it takes the first losses.

ALWAYS WITH US

Unemployment is not a mere emergency disaster. It is aggravated just now by post-war conditions but it is always with us. In normal pre-war times there were some seven million workers every year who were at some time out of work. It cannot be said that any great portion of this number were idlers who worked a few days and then took a few days off; these figures do not deal with that class. One-half of this number were out of work for periods of from one to three months, one-third of them for from four to six months and 800,000 suffered loss of employment annually for from nine months to a year. The New York state department of labor reported that over a series of years the average per month of unemployment was 18 per cent of the entire wage earning class. There are no comparative statistics but one doubts if capital would remain employed in any business that brought it so large a percentage of loss regularly with only average returns the remainder of the time. There is another difference between capital and labor in the matter of risks. Labor must work or starve; capital may retire to bond holding or some other more secure though less remunerative form of profitable return.

The chief causes for this perpetual state of unemployment lie in casual employment without which our modern industry would have to undergo great readjustments, in the disproportional increase of machine production over the increase of population and of the standard of living and in the lack of adequate machinery to get the manless job and the jobless man together. Millions are employed in industries that cannot operate all the year round. What would happen to the farmer in the north if he could not make enough in the summer to carry him idle through the winter?—for idle he must be by force of circumstance. But the man who works for the farmer, especially in harvest, fruit-picking and canning is not always so fortunate.

Suppose railroad and lake shipping and lumber earned normal dividends in the open seasons and could get no business in closed seasons—at least they would demand larger earnings in season to cover losses out-of-season, for without adequate profit capital will not work. But labor must work hardest when profit is smallest. Our population has increased only three times while the machine product of industry has increased ten times. The standards of living have risen also but nothing like to three times the level of two generations ago; the great increases have gone into the increase of capital in the hands of the few. Less than one per cent of our families have incomes of $3,000 per year and 65 per cent possess nothing beyond household goods and clothing. Our average per capita wealth in 1850 was $307; today it is somewhere around $2,500. The surrogate courts of New York report that only 3 per cent of the estates are more than $10,000 (and up to hundreds of millions of course) while 82 per cent of deaths leave no tangible assets.

There are minor causes such as the inadequate distribution of immigrants, industrial depression in various trades, personal weakness and illness, the "scrapping" of the old and the putting of women and children in the place of man, the natural bread-winner. Like the poor, some of these afflictions we will have always with us, but the major causes are curable and there are remedies to give aid to the minor.

GET THE MAN TO THE JOB

The first thing that could be done would be to provide adequate governmental employment agencies to get the jobless man to the manless job. This would be no cure, but a help. Men with families cannot easily transfer from one place to another, and often the jobless man is not trained for the manless job. It would greatly help with the unskilled where the greatest amount of normal unemployment comes and in emergency it would enable the skilled man out of work at least to make a living at a temporary common labor job. In England and Germany it has proved of great value in absorbing the lower edge of perpetual unemployment and tiding over seasons and emergencies. America set up a fine scheme through the postoffices a few years ago; it needed improvement and development but it was a beginning. It was quietly and suddenly killed; why has not yet been explained—it looks as if occult forces were at work. Canada, instead of scrapping her bureaus, strengthened them, and they have proved of incalculable value in this time of emergency. To unemployment agencies should be added, by will of the employers, a larger habit of utilizing dull seasons to lay up product for busy seasons. This however cannot be expected to provide for any large percentage of the average of unemployment for there are no profitable means by which employers can overcome most of the seasonal employment. Anything that stabilizes business to this end will also help, and as industry grows more complex it must become less speculative and more stable or society will be involved in disaster.

The fundamental cure lies in a better distribution of the profits of industry. If labor is adequate for the peak loads manifestly there must be idleness at other times. A city tramway cannot carry the morning and evening crowds with the same current that is profitable during the light hours of the day, so its charges must provide for machinery that is idle during much of the time. Just so must industry provide a wage fund that will insure a modern American standard of living all the year out of the wages that can be earned when work is available. The figures, given above on the increase and distribution of wealth, give reason to believe there is enough profit in the production of wealth to do this if a larger share of it were allocated to wage income and a smaller to total profits.

At the present time profits, in terms of rents, dividends, interest, etc., is taking out of the total increase in wealth from two to three times as much as are wages. Our average annual per capita income before the war was nearly if not quite $1,800 per family of five, while the average wage, according to the congressional committee on industrial relations, was less than $750 for two-thirds of the wage earners and less than $500 for one-third of them. Many other authorities could be cited and all agree substantially on these figures. For instance the United States bureau of health reported that two-thirds of them received less than $15 per week, not counting lost time, averaging from one to two months per year. The investigations by Professors Streightoff and King, made independently of each other, agree with these findings. Thus the average family income is three times that of the average wage income of two-thirds of the wage earners. But the smaller incomes above the wage line of income are those of farmers, professional men and small business, leaving those of big business, such as industry is so largely, in the upper strata of big incomes, and the estimate that the profits fund from all sources is from two to three times that of the wage fund cannot be far from correct.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN HELP

Of course it will be replied that the wage earner has the benefit of wages from the members of his family. This is unfortunately true. It means that for the sake of wages mothers work, children work instead of remaining in school, and there is a deficit in family life and in citizenship as a result. It means that the standards of living are kept down. The first requisite of an American standard is that the natural bread-winner earn the living, the mother keep the home and the children have the chance at least to go through high school. The second requisite might be put down in terms of sufficient income to give the family recreation, culture, insurance, a home paid for and well kept, a margin for philanthropies and a chance to save against the rainy day and old age. This cannot be defended as more than a minimum; the wage earner has as much right to a chance to lay up capital as has any other productive factor in society. Skill requires brains in mechanics as well as in the office that sells its product. Many an office manager with less skill and much less responsibility will talk loftily about the "over-paid" railroad engineers when he is receiving more than do they. There is a current presumption that any sort of a white collared job that does not require grime on the hands is therefore a "brain-worker's" job, and that brains deserve any amount they can get while the skill that requires soiled hands deserves nothing more than a living. In saying this we are not in the least arguing against differences in payment for differences in work or skill or brains—we would have to give up our own job if we did—but only against the abuse of a universally accepted differentiation.

BASIS OF TAXATION

"If things were divided equally," it is always replied by some one, "they would not remain so a week," which is true enough, but to say so is irrelevant because there is no such implication in this argument. There was never so inequitable a distribution of wealth as today and there will never be again. It came about because machinery brought a tremendous increase in earning power to those who owned it and the equities of social relationships did not change as rapidly as the machinery grew in productive power. We are now changing the equities. The graduated income tax, the excess profits tax, the inheritance tax and the exemption of small incomes from all taxation are illustrations of this change. In this time of tidal reaction great pressure is being brought to swing us back into the old days, but the principle is established and will suffer no more than a temporary reaction. The fairest tax in the world, said John Stuart Mill, is the tax on that excess of wealth above the necessities of livelihood. We have also made laws to deprive private individuals from exploiting nature's gifts in free mineral, oil, wood and water, and had we done this from the beginning there would be a much smaller margin today between the very rich and the very poor. There is enough natural opportunity to give every ambitious man the stimulus of profit and yet to maintain a good living for every industrious man who is willing to work.

The first things, however, that can be done and are being done in the older industrial lands are the provisions for social insurance covering old age, sickness, accidents and unemployment. These things are no longer experiments in Europe—they are proven successes, and but for them there would be revolution in some lands over there today as a result of war's economic cataclysm. Far-seeing Americans will study the experience of countries like England and Germany in these matters and seek to adopt and improve their programs. One further experiment should be tried and that is the plan of so arranging public works, such as road building, soil reclamation, etc., that they would absorb idle labor as far as practicable. Such work is always to be done and it is society's readiest way to discharge its obligation to its less fortunate members. The example of the Federal Reserve Bank in lending money to make currency and credit elastic is salutary. Let governments, state, federal and municipal, keep public works open, paying a slightly smaller wage than regular industry when there is unemployment, thus absorbing the unemployed but insuring their return to regular industry when there are jobs open there. This would do more than all the emergency plans outlined by Mr. Hoover's conference, we suspect, and it would be a permanent arrangement.

Mr. Hoover gave us the ultimate prescription when he stated that the problem is human rather than economic and that it could be settled if treated as a human problem instead of an economic one. The protest against providing public work now because it means keeping up taxation is not a human protest and the effort of certain radical anti-union interests to take advantage of the situation to break up the unions, crowd down wages and "teach labor its lesson," is inhuman. It is gratifying to find a protest all along the line against resorting to soup kitchens and bread lines. That registers a big gain in both an understanding and a solution of the problem. Workless men are not beggars, and society owes itself more respect than to treat them as such. The movement for part time work, as recommended by the manufacturers committee, means that labor must care for its own unemployed members instead of making it a social obligation of all. It is a worthy method where some exigency forces short-time work, but it is not a worthy solution for a crisis like this.

LABOR NOT SPENDTHRIFT

Labor has been "living off its own fat," to use a phrase coined by the American Association for Labor Legislation. It has thus far lived off its savings largely, but the time is near when those will be exhausted and then, with winter upon us, the real problem becomes acute. In England its "fat" is already eaten. This fact shows that the silk-shirt talk of war times was largely fallacious. Many did buy silk shirts, such as salaried young men wear most of the time, but adult labor as a whole saved money, and it always will when there is money to save. Saving is a fundamental instinct that operates powerfully except among those who are born amidst a plethora of things. This will be denied by those who select a few known cases to illustrate their prejudices against a whole class. No doubt there are too many who do not save as they should, but labor as a whole saves more than any other class when the margin it has to save is taken into consideration.

The debit side of unemployment is not confined to money loss, though it is estimated that the present crisis has cost some six billion dollars in loss of wages. The serious part of it is the loss of morale and character. The workless man becomes an ambitionless man. Our shiftless class is made up of men made idle by idleness, by drink and other dissipation and of those "born-short." As a whole they are more sinned against than sinning, perhaps; at least jobless men easily become idlers, drinkers and parasites. There is discouragement, a loss of faith in society, a bitter hate of the better-to-do and wild ideas of reform. Society cannot afford unemployment, and a social order made conscious of itself will not allow it to persist any more than they would tolerate conditions where disease festers. A social order that can cure it and does not, is sadly lacking in conscience. Here is ample room for applied Christianity. Will our pulpits wax eloquent with culture and religious balm for the well-to-do who sit in their pews while in every city there is want that need not be, and the social order is afflicted with this festering sore; or will they ring with prophetic messages calling those who possess culture and have the consolations of plenty to discern their plain duties on behalf of those who suffer in every such time?

VERSE

Mother-Wonder

I HAVE washed their clothes and their faces
And their lithe, round limbs,
And sent them off to school.
I wonder if I have washed their hearts clean?
All the heart-cleansing water I had
Was rained into a black lined barrel
Burned out through the ages,
I being a drop-saver like my forbears.
And the soap—it may have been made of fat too old
And lye too keen biting;
The linen rag my great-great-grandmother wove
From flax she raised on fresh-broken ground.
I tried to wash their hearts clean with these.
They looked clean—what I could see of them
Shining from their happy eyes,
I looking with my dimmed, mother-proud ones
Half-full of tears,—
I wonder—!

Oh, Grave, Where Is Thy Victory?

In Memory of Frank Wakely Gunsaulus

IF THIS were all, the closing of thine eyes,
The last faint flutter of the farewell breath,
If thy Life ended in the maze called Death,
If thy Soul, loosed from prison, could not rise;
Whence were the green that, peeping through the sod,
Looks, as it opens on a brilliant world
Undreamed of, ere it woke with leaves unfurl'd,
Though planned through ages by a careful God?

A thousand years is nothing in His sight.
Thy work here ended is but there begun!
Thy Soul, the seed, which gropes through earth and night,
And as the opening bud, doth greet the sun,
'Till full-grown, standing in Eternal Light,
Thou hear'st Him say, "Servant of God, well done!"

BEATRICE GUNSAULUS MERRIMAN.

Death

NO sign of life or love to meet me;
No tender kiss, no arms to hold me;
Vast silences stretch pale hands to greet me;
Loneliness, a hungry ghost salutes me,
Cold waves of fear sweep over me;
Mortality is gone.

Hark! What breaks the stillness 'round me?
Who comes amidst the silence toward me?
I cannot feel or touch, or see thee,
Yet doubt and fear have fled from me,
A holiness embraces me,
Eternity is here.

Are Christian Missions in the Far East Worth While?

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

WE are to seek this morning* an answer to the question whether Christian missions in the far east are worth while. Often in this church we have spoken together about the missionary cause. We have known that, if a man believes at all deeply in Jesus Christ, he must believe in him for all mankind. But there comes a new and revealing illumination upon the Christian campaign for the world when a man has gone for the first time to the far east; when for the first time he sees the Christian gospel lighting its lamps against the background of an ancient non-Christian civilization.

You expect me, of course, to bring an affirmative reply to our morning's question, and yet I have tried not to beg the question by a preconceived opinion. Indeed, one first of all is impressed by the presumption of our fresh, new west, with our international follies and sins, going to the ancient east with our religion. As one goes through the streets of Vancouver to take the steamer, one learns that there is not a house in the city, now standing, over thirty-five years old. So fresh and new is our western land! Then, landing in Yokohama, he goes out the first day to see the great statue of Buddha at Kamakura, sitting there among the trees upon his gigantic lotus bloom, where for nearly seven centuries he has brooded upon things eternal. How presumptuous it seems for us in the new west to go to the ancient east with our faith! Is it presumptuous?

THE PICTURE OF THE MISSIONARY

There is at least one thing that the returning traveler desires to do for his friends; he wishes that he could reconstruct the popular picture of a missionary. We ministers have suffered enough from caricature, and when we appear in humorous papers or upon the stage we are generally the most inane and anæmic specimens of humanity that the genius of the artist or actor can portray. But the missionaries have suffered more. Pale, pious and pulmonary, they have been pictured for years to the popular imagination. From our youth up have we not seen them so—dressed like freaks and expectant of incarceration in a cannibal? And yet, as a matter of fact, a more normal group of upstanding men and women I do not know where you will find on earth. Of course, there are failures among them, belated minds, provincial spirits, inept misfits.

There are six thousand Christian missionaries in China. Could you get a group of six thousand physicians or lawyers or ministers at home without having undesirables among them to regret? But as for the mass of them, one recalls again and again what Robert Louis Stevenson, after his long years in the eastern seas, said about one missionary whom he knew: "The most attractive, simple, brave and interesting man in the whole Pacific." It is not alone the popular caricature, however; it is the Christian people themselves who have wronged the missionaries by misunderstanding. For they have often in imagination lifted them up to superhuman levels of self-sacrifice, picturing them as people who have turned their backs on normal love of human comfort and who have inured themselves to a barren and ascetic self-denial. This is not true. On the whole, the missionaries do not live in physical discomfort. Their houses are oftentimes the most desirable residences in town. Generally the missionaries are well served, for one can get five servants in China for the price of a single maid in New York City. Often they have summer homes upon a mountain top where, at least for a few weeks, they can retire from the intolerable heat and from the grievous pressure of an alien civilization.

ONE SPOT OF DECENCY

If they could not so cushion their lives, if, amid the appalling filth of large areas of the far east, they could not preserve one spot of decency and cleanliness, reminiscent of the sweetness of a Christian family at home, they would die. The sacrifice of the missionaries is far deeper than physical discomfort. It is the sacrifice of tearing yourself away from the dear and familiar background of your own people; of living for years amid strange tongues and in obscure places; of seeing your children grow in loveliness as they grow in age until the long-feared and dreadful day arrives when the children, so young, must be sent home for an education, leaving you to pray, across six thousand miles of sea and land, for your little ones. These are the sacrifices of the missionaries. But you do not hear the missionaries speak about them. I never saw a group of people who gloried more in their work. They know that the far east is the very center of the world today. They feel themselves played upon by the most powerful and important forces upon earth. They pity the folks who have to live in Gopher Prairie or in Greenwich Village, on the periphery of the world's life. If I were a young man, starting all over again, having seen what I have seen, I am not sure that I could stay in America. I am not sure that I could resist the lure of the far east and of that body of Christian men and women who are laying the foundations of the new Christian church. When I think of missions now, I think of them in terms of the missionaries. Is their work worth while?

In the first place, is it not worth while when you think of the need of the far east? Consider China. China is in appalling spiritual need and none of her traditional religions offers hope of any moral power to lift her up. I do not mean that the Chinese are "poor heathen." They are not "poor heathen." They are a very great race, but they are a very great race in appalling need. We in America have fooled ourselves these last few years with tooioseate pictures of the new China. Had not the dynasty of the old Manchus been driven out? Had not democracy triumphed? Was not China now our sister republic? Were not these splendid Chinese students that come to our western universities typical of the new land? So we have spoken to one another. My friends, we may not any longer content ourselves with seeing China through such a concealing haze of sentiment.

I will not speak at length of the seventy million pairs of women's bound feet in China today, although it is sickening to see that agonizing process still going on with little girls and the crippling results evident everywhere among grown women. They say that will get better. I will not speak at length of the illiteracy of China, although it has made the name "republic" an empty shell. Only five per cent of the Chinese can read and write. They say that with the coming of phonetic writing that will get better. I will not speak at length about the lack of communication that makes famines terrible and the growth of national public spirit almost impossible. Three months after the fall of the Manchus and the establishment of the republic, friends of mine found whole villages within seventy miles of Peking whose inhabitants had never heard of it and would not believe it when they were told. Within twenty-four hours of Peking, they had not heard, after three months, of the greatest contemporary event in Chinese history. Sun Yat-Sen is today ruler of South China at Canton and has been for long months. Yet within fifty miles of Canton you will find plenty of Chinese who have never heard of Sun Yat-Sen.

CHINA'S NEED

Such things we shall not speak of, for such things can be remedied if there is one thing to rely upon—intelligently directed moral power. But it is for the lack of this that China is sick today. "Squeeze," or as we should call it, graft, is a recognized social institution in China. The cook in your kitchen buys all the food you eat and takes squeeze for himself from every purchase. In all such positions it is commonly understood that when any money passes through a Chinese hand a certain percentage shall remain there. This is the immemorial custom of the country and everybody understands it and provides for it. And now the Chinese are trying to build a republic, with public office considered an opportunity for private squeeze. Under the Manchus the amount of squeeze was fairly well regulated. There was little use for a governing official to squeeze too much, for if he did it straightway should be squeezed out of him by the man higher up. But in the republic that regulative power of the empire has fallen away and officials are free to take as much as they can. The rapacity, the venality, the lack of public spirit on the part of Chinese officialdom today is the most dismaying thing I ever thought possible in a human government. Moreover, under the old Manchus a man was fairly secure in his tenure of office, but under the republic no man knows how long he will be in office. Wherefore the rule is to begin to squeeze as soon as you can and to squeeze as hard as you can, as long as you can. There is a story now going the rounds of China of one official in office four days who succeeded in that time in laying up a fortune sufficient to keep himself and his family in affluence for the rest of their lives. Whole provinces in China today are in the hands of an official group of rapacious ex-bandits, maintaining private armies and willing at any time to sell China out; and up to date there has not been enough moral power and cooperative capacity in China to throw these vultures off.

SQUEEZE, A RECOGNIZED INSTITUTION

The most powerful man in China, I suppose, is Chang Tso Lin, a murderer and ex-bandit. They call him the Emperor of Mukden. He is supposed to be in the pay of Japan. He came down from Mukden to Peking a while ago and took six million dollars from a bankrupt government for a military expedition that he never intended to make and that nobody in China ever expected him to make, and put it in his own pocket. I myself saw the train of Wang, another military Tuchun, who, having squeezed his wealth from the hapless people of Hunan, was going, as his predecessors had before him, to settle down with his harem in the foreign concession of Tien Tsin to live in affluence on his ill-gotten gains. In the center of Ueking you will see the palatial home of one of the Chinese officials who sold his country out to Japan when the twenty-one demands were made two years ago. In the capital city of his country, which he betrayed to the enemy, he has built a palace with the price of his betrayal. During the last year, in Tien Tsin and Peking, banks have been springing up like mushrooms, and every time a new bank came into existence it was understood that some officer of state was starting an institution to lend money to his own government at 16 per cent interest with liberal discounts. Moreover, the government put a surtax on certain articles to obtain money for famine relief, but it is commonly believed throughout China that at least sixteen million dollars of that famine money went into private pockets. Certainly I know this to be true that when generous Chinese gave to the cause of the famine sufferers it was with the strict stipulation that not one cent should go through the hands of Chinese officials, but that every cent should go through the missionary boards.

Do I seem to shame China? But it is for the love of China. It is for the love of that marvelous people who with a solid patience, unmoved by the superficial turmoil of political intrigue, pursue their tireless industry. There is no race on earth potentially greater, nor is there any hope of a settled orient or a peaceful world except in a strong and self-controlled China. I pleaded with you last week for such an international attitude as would put China's sovereignty back into her own hands. But, my friends, you cannot make a tree stand up by props alone. The tree must have roots. There must be inward life. The cry of China today is for rising tides of moral and spiritual life. No hope awaits China apart from an access of intelligent, public-spirited character.

FAILURE OF RELIGION

David Yiu is the Chinese head of the Young Men's Christian Association of China. I was pouring out to him my amazement and shame over this riot of chaos and corruption in which China is weltering today. He replied, "All true, but underneath our political troubles lies something deeper still—our moral and religious lack." Who that has seen it can doubt it? Let the arm-chair professors of comparative religion say what they will about the glories of the ancient faiths of the east! They are not saving China. They are not offering any hope of saving China. Confucius was a great character, but his teaching is an Old Testament, almost indissolubly associated with a social order now rapidly passing away. Gautama Buddha was a magnificent character, but he never had an aggressive message of social righteousness, as the whole far east, where his influence has been dominant, bears testimony, and in China Buddhism has degenerated until his individualistic gospel is hopelessly corrupt. Because I believe that all truth comes from God, if I saw real life welling up in China from these ancient faiths I should know that it came from the heart of God and I should thank him for it. But it is not there. The plain fact is that the great mass of popular religion in China is a religion of fear—fear of the demons.

At Ningpo there is a modern electric light plant presided over by Chinese engineers supposedly acquainted with western technical science. A few months ago a mysterious disorder befell the machinery. After making an investigation the engineers failed scientifically to locate the trouble. Whereupon they sent for the necromancers and around that twentieth century electric light plant the necromancers marched, beating their drums to drive the devils out of the bewitched engines. What is more, it worked! Whatever was the matter with the machinery remedied itself. Or here is a wealthy Chinese who has had six children, all girls. He wants a son as every Chinese does; wherefore he sends for the necromancer to look over his property and to tell him wherein he has offended the gods or given the demons power to harm him. And the necromancer discovers that from the open door of the house one can see the smoke from a foreigner's chimney across the way. So the Chinese, under the necromancer's orders, builds a false wall high enough to hide from sight the foreign chimney. And what is more, it worked! The next child was a boy.

YOUNG CHINA

Everywhere in China, from pathetic little joss houses down side streets where the vehement beating of witch doctor's drums can be heard all day, to Chinese supposed to be touched by western influences but who in times of crisis go back to the fear of demons, you find the center of the religion of China in the dread of the spiritual world.

Now, from these old religions—Taoism with its magic and necromancy, Buddhism with its reincarnations, endless heavens and hells, and its utter lack of a social gospel, Confucianism, for all its nobility, associated with a bygone social order—the best of young China is turning away. And the future belongs to young China. Up from the schools, out of homes often uninfluential and obscure, filled with the ferment of new ideas, passionate for a great nation, comes young China. And young China does need the moral power, the social passion, the undiscourageable faith in God, the transforming spirit of Jesus Christ.

Indeed, as one comes back from China to America, there is this one difference that he feels. China untouched by the Christian gospel seems a dreary land and a dreary land, too, where no water is. And America also is a needy land. We, too, are a long sea-mile from being Christian. If Christianity made this western civilization that has exhibited itself during the last few years to the horrified observance of the world, so much the worse for Christianity! Yet, for all our need, under our western life, the source of all that is most beautiful in it, making oases wherever it does well up, is a stream whose fountains are in Galilee. Never fully welcomed, never allowed to do its proper work, an influence still is here impregnating our literature, permeating our social and personal ideals, that rebukes us in our sin, that never will let us rest content in our iniquity. A Figure rises majestic above this western world from whose constraining influence we never altogether can escape—a Master who would save us if we would give ourselves to him, who has saved us when we have given ourselves to him. That is the hope of the western world and that would be the hope of China.

HOPE IN THE MISSIONARIES

Wherever in China today that spirit of Jesus, through schools and chapels and hospitals, gets its grip on men, you will see its characteristic and proper fruit. Has my picture of China seemed dark? Yet all the brighter is the dawn of the new Chinese manhood and womanhood which everywhere shines out against the old background. Woe to the man who speaks discouragingly of China in the presence of the missionaries! They have already seen changes so immense and salutary; they believe so deeply in the elemental greatness of the Chinese people; they have seen such luminous examples of transformed persons and transformed communities; they have so learned to love these Anglo-Saxons of the west with more than the average Anglo-Saxon's amiability; they see the Christian movement in China moving forward so surely with doors opening and opportunities growing, that like Paul at Ephesus they feel the very obstacles are hopeful: "A great door and effectual is opened unto me and there are many adversaries." They know that China's break with her old traditions, lacking the guidance of a powerful, forward-looking government, is bound to issue in temporary chaos; they know that China has been a monarchy, largely under foreign dynasties, for nearly four thousand years and a republic for only ten years; they know that the cupidity of her officials, while it is a serious reflection on their morals, is also a serious reflection on the morals of western states and business enterprises which together with Japan have been largely responsible for encouraging it and profiting by it; they know that a large part of the seeming lack of public spirit and conscience in China is the easily explicable result of sheer poverty, the lack of any margin of safety between the means of subsistence and the needs of the population.

The great believers in China are those foreigners who know her best—the missionaries. The most stirring and courageous words I heard in China about the hopes of the republic came from a missionary who had been a prisoner in the beleaguered legation in Peking during the Boxer rebellion. She had seen the worst of the Chinese; she believed the best about them. And the new Christians in China justify the missionaries' confidence. Four delegates, I understand, are coming from China to the conference in Washington. Every one of them has attended a Christian mission school. Three of the four are graduates of Christian mission schools. Two of the four are active Christians. Is it worth while?

CHRISTIANITY'S GROWTH

In the second place, is it not worth while when you think of the growth of the Christian movement in China and Japan? How one wishes that he could make vivid to the imagination of his friends at home those new far eastern Christians as they come out from their ancient, non-Christian traditions to give their allegiance to the Lord. Ever since our childhood we have read with fascinated minds the stories of the Roman Empire where long ago those first Christians took their stand for Christ against the overwhelming power and splendor of that ancient civilization. You can see the same things over again in the far east today.

Come for a moment to Kyoto in Japan. A thousand Buddhist temples, among them some of the most beautiful structures mankind has ever planned, throng and beautify the city's streets and the hillsides round about. Towering over the town you see the lofty mountain where eleven centuries ago the first Buddhist missionaries built their swarming monasteries. Before the temple altars you can see devout pilgrims pray with passionate repetition that Amida Buddha will give to them eternal life. By night you can see the Shinto gods carried from their shrines through the city's streets, while the crowds dance riotously about their progress. One would imagine himself in ancient Ephesus when the cry went up, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" There, on Sunday, in a fine Young Men's Christian Association building, I spoke to an eager group of Japanese Christians and met the first Japanese who ever became a Christian in Kyoto. And there I saw Doshisha University, a Christian college with two thousand students. Is it worth while?

A MILLION CHRISTIANS

One night in Tokyo it was my privilege to sit at dinner next to Kawaii San. Her ancestors for forty generations had been Shinto priests of the imperial shrine at Ise. It is the most honored of all the Shinto shrines of the empire. It was there, just a little while ago, that the crown prince went to report his safe arrival to the spirits of his ancestors. And there, for forty generations, the forefathers of Kawaii San had been priests of Shinto. Then trouble came to one member of the family. He went into the far country of dissipation. He disgraced his family. But through the influence of a missionary the power of Christ laid hold upon him. Christ made a man out of a moral wreck. So Kawaii San's father turned his back on Ise and honor and, moved by the marvel of his brother's reformation, became a Christian. Today Kawaii San is at the head of the Young Women's Christian Association in Japan. Is it worth while?

At first one is tempted to claim that there has not been time to prove whether Christian missions are worth while. It was 1859 when the first Protestant missionaries landed in Japan. As late as 1872 all the prominent cross roads of the empire still bore the old edict boards, proclaiming death to everyone accepting the Christian faith. It was not until 1880 that the Japanese New Testament first was published. It was 1889 before the constitution was promulgated that gave religious liberty to the Japanese. We have had only a few years in which we could prove whether Christian missions were worth while. Today twenty-two members of the imperial Japanese parliament are Christians. Of the six men who were closest to the crown prince on his trip around the world three were Christians. It was a Christian, I am told, who wrote those fine, forward-looking speeches for him. From 1859 to 1872 only ten Japanese were baptized in the whole empire. Now, just fifty years later, we have a Protestant Christian church of 135,000 members and a million adherents. Is it worth while?

INDEPENDENT NATIVE CHURCH

One of the most encouraging facts in the Christian movement in the far east is this, that the native churches there with increasing self-consciousness and power are looking toward the day when they can throw over the necessity of foreign missionaries altogether. I take it that the overwhelming majority of American Christians, when they have thought of foreign missions, have thought of it as something that would go on and on as long as the Christian church lasted. Upon the contrary, the business of foreign missions is indicated in the words of a French king to the tutor he engaged for his children. "Make yourself useless," said the king. "Make yourself useless as soon as possible." So foreign missionaries are making themselves useless as soon as possible by building up a self-controlled and self-supporting native church. All the native Presbyterian and Congregational churches in Japan are entirely self-supporting now. The Methodist native churches in Japan are raising two-thirds of their own maintenance. There are three hundred and fifty-eight Christian congregations in Japan now that are entirely self-supporting; four hundred and sixty-six more that are partly so. Still we must support the foreign missionaries, must help finance the forward movements of the church into unoccupied areas, but sooner or later the day will come when the Christian church in Japan and the Christian church in China will take their stand beside us, not dependent, but independent, brothers in the tasks of the kingdom.

The real power of the Christian movement, however, can most easily be seen, not so much in its converts that one can count, as in its indirect influence. Consider, for example, the influence of Christianity upon Japanese Buddhism. Buddhism in Japan is much more alert and impressive than in China. In Japan you can see Buddhism either at its best or at its worst. If you would see it at its worst come to the most popular Buddhist temple in Japan, in Tokyo. Tens of thousands of people every day throng its courts. You will see there a wooden image of Buddha with healing powers, to be rubbed on the same member which in yourself is ill. Hour after hour you will see Japanese mothers holding their children to rub that image, so worn now by the attrition of countless millions of human hands that it no longer resembles a human form. You will see an image of the children's god, an ugly idol, around which hang the pitiful garments of children who have died, that the favor of the god may be gained and the little ones saved from hell. There you will see the great wire screen in which hundreds of paper slips are tied, that ill luck may fly away and good luck come. And there are booths where the Buddhist priests sell charms that drive away the devils or persuade the gods. This is Buddhism at its worst.

If you would see Buddhism at its best, come to call with me on the Lord Abbot Otani, head of the Hongwangi sect of Buddhists, ten million strong. Otani San, his daughter, is studying English in the Young Women's Christian Association and is looking eagerly forward to an American education. He himself is an abbot by heritage, a son of abbots reaching far back in Buddhist history, and on the wall of the temple, where the people worship, his grand-sire's portrait hangs among the pictures of the saints. A vigorous, intelligent, forward-looking gentleman, the present Lord Abbot is trying to reform Buddhism. Listen to him as he says—how familiar it is!—"The heart of all religion is faith that binds the soul to its Lord. Have faith in Amida Buddha—that is the heart of the Gospel—for he is all mercy and compassion and love, and he will have us by his grace and not by words of ours. There are no miracles in Buddhism save this one, the transformation of the heart of man by faith in him." That is Buddhism at its best.

IMITATION OF CHRISTIANITY

If now you ask the reason why everywhere in Japan you run upon the endeavor to reform Buddhism, you will find the greater part of the reason in the presence of Christianity. They are giving us the sincerest of all forms of flattery, which is imitation. They preach faith much as we preach it; they publish their Bibles much as we do ours; they copy our hymn books, though no ancient Buddhist ever thought of singing, and you now can hear their songs: "Oh, for a thousand tongues to sing my blessed Buddha's praise"; they have copied our Sunday schools and in the great Chion-in temple in Kyoto I saw the new Sunday school building where they teach their children; they have now their Young Men's Buddhist Association and evangelistic campaigns; and, last of all, they are desperately trying to copy our Christian ideals and methods of social service although such ideals never entered into historic Buddhism at all. As one missionary put it, contrasting the old days with the new, "Then Christianity had to vindicate its right to a fair hearing in Buddhist Japan. Now Japanese Buddhists are vindicating their place in Japanese life by an appeal to activities and methods learned from Christians." Is it worth while?

My friends, I have felt this morning that because you are Christian you have responded to these Christian hopes for the far east. China and Japan, provinces in the kingdom of God—the welfare of the world depends on that today.

And these hopes are not impossible. Only as one comes back from the far east to America he carries this burden on his spirit; the western governments can make them impossible. For is it not plain what most quickly can blight these expectations and ruin these labors of the Christian church? We western Christians cannot go on forever preaching Christ as individuals and acting the devil as states. The people of the far east are not fools. They see. There are forty million professed Christians in the United States, forty million people who have called themselves by the name of the Prince of Peace. Today in the capital of the nation where all these Christians live, east and west prepare to confer together about the possibility of settling their difficulties by reason and not by riot. If out of that conference there should come a constructive result, if the western nations should prove themselves to be sincerely in earnest about laying the foundations of peace, that would not only be a great day for the whole earth with all its tribes and creeds; it would be the most convincing piece of Christian propaganda that ever stirred the heart of the far east to its depths. For they are watching us today, with what mingled suspicion and hope who can describe? to see whether Christian America is really in earnest about peace and is willing to make mutual sacrifices with them to obtain it. Deep in the heart of the far east when she thinks of the west is an ancient word that was our Master's too, "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Therefore by their fruits ye shall know them."

War

THE bugler blows

And the fields deliver a valiant crop

Of healthy manhood; their harvests drop
And fatten crows.

The drummer beats

And the sons of the sea renounce their nets,
Their wives, their sweethearts and their debts,
Their sturdy fleets.

Striped pantaloons, brass buttons and pleats,
Glorious, gaudy winding sheets,

Death's high disguise.

Tenebral toys to woo and win

Men to their graves for a ruler's sin

Or a statesman's lies.

Tens of thousands in blue and tens of thousands in gray
Face the glare of the midday sun in serried battle array.
A dummy in red and gold on an estrapading horse, Signals. The earth resounds with the clash of human force.

The tens of thousands in blue and tens of thousands in gray

Let death loose upon unknown heads and blow their souls away.

The dummy in red and gold rides to the setting sun
Leaving behind a field of blood and prating of battle won.

And the devil says, as he drives his ghouls,

"Thank God that men are fools!"

General Pershing in the Abbey

London, October 18, 1921.

NOTHING was wanting to make the ceremony of yesterday solemn and moving in its appeal. It has touched the heart of our people deeply to receive the congressional medal of honor; and the words of the ambassador and of General Pershing in the Abbey, words nobly conceived, will awaken a response throughout the nation. We are a reserved, and sometimes a blundering people, but we are never ungrateful; and such gestures as this will never be forgotten. It is necessary perhaps to say this because of the blunder of some office or other in the days before this ceremony. It seems even to have been thought at one time through that same blunder that we were unworthy to receive this great honor. The very thought that such a misunderstanding was possible has made us unhappy. But there can be no doubt now that however the hitch came to pass, there was never any hesitation on the part of the government or the people.

Ipswich

It reads as though there had been wonderful doings in this East Anglican town in which there are about 80,000 inhabitants. My account comes from The Challenge, a journal which is not likely to be carried away by a wave of emotion. It appears that all the churches of Ipswich, high, low and broad, Catholic and Protestant, have held a simultaneous mission, which has greatly improved the town. For eight days the services lasted. Night after night the numbers increased. The cinemas, though their queues diminished, displayed announcements like this, "Ipswich is moving toward God; have you started yet?" On the last day a united service was held in front of the town hall; and there the mayor and corporation, representative citizens and officials, of the labor party, leaders of the churches met together, and there the bishop solemnly claimed the town for God and offered its corporate life "to the joyous active service of Jesus Christ." This is indeed a significant and most hopeful fact,—the offering to God of the whole corporate life of a town. These are the closing words of The Challenge upon this matter; they should be read with the understanding that they are from a paper with broad church sympathies, and they are manifestly the words of the Rev. C. E. Raven, a daring pioneer in the realms of Christian thought:

"If these people only dare to believe that a Christian revolution is practicable, if they will go forward, refusing to lose confidence in God's will and power, strong in mutual trust, unafraid to dream and to do and to be called fools for doing, then all things are possible for them. Much study, much patience as well as much boldness, much prayer, much fellowship, in a word the Christ-spirit, is needed. But Christ has plainly been present there during the mission, and the town will not easily forget him or deny. A sudden and mastastrophic renewal of the Christian life, an apocalyptic coming of the kingdom, is what many of us have been expecting: like a landslide the world will one day move to God: here may be the rock which shall start the avalanche. A Christian community—what might it not accomplish for itself and for the world! Maranatha."

The Encyclopaedic Church Congress

There must have been many who felt as they read the accounts of the Church Congress that the church of England was attempting too much. Stung no doubt by the taunt that the church was too much aloof from radical affairs, it spent its time last week largely in the discussion of one problem after another, till the brain reeled; and in the confusion there was some danger lest the distinctive gift of the Christian church to the world should be forgotten. Even the secular papers gently took the church to task for this rather practical problem, which could be raised. A week is a short time for such a survey and the attempt to crowd too much into a brief compass might well lead to a lack of perspective. It must be added that the platform of the congress is remarkably comprehensive and the thought comes to a free churchman that on such a platform there are more varieties of religious thought and experience than there are in a free church council. Some declare that these parties in the church of England are nearer to each other than once they were; others, that disestablishment would divide them swiftly into three or more camps. For my own part I believe rather in the main movement within this church as in others towards unity; but there are without doubt signs that relapses may occur and old controversies may be revived for a while. Still in the main it is time that there is less party spirit in the church of England today than there was a generation ago.

Critics of Christianity

My friend, Dr. Orchard, is accustomed to give lectures on Thursday evenings. A few years ago he spoke upon ancient heresies in their modern dress; this autumn he is to speak on Critics of Christianity. His list of critics is, composed of Celsus, Porphyry, Hume, Voltaire, Comte, Nietzsche, H. G. Wells, and J. M. Robertson. It will be seen that the preacher is prepared to discuss attacks made from every quarter, and there is no question that the citadel will be defended with courage and skill.

Other Things

Today, October 18, the dean of St. Paul's is lecturing on "Eternal Life and Survival" in connection with the opening of Hackney College. It will be of interest to know the dean's latest thoughts upon this subject; but of this more may be told next week. In Mansfield College Dr. Schweitzer is to deliver a course of lectures this autumn on the Dale Foundation. The lecturer is the great protagonist of the Apocalyptic school of New Testament interpretation. He is a brilliant theologian, accomplished doctor; a great student of music,—he wrote a masterly study of Bach; he has been a medical missionary upon the Congo; he will lecture at Mansfield in French, I understand; it is certain that his course will not be the least interesting of the many delivered under the trust which commemorates Dr. Dale at Mansfield. Sir W. M. Ramsay, Dr. Reaveley Glover, Dr. Hadfield have been among the previous lecturers. Dr. Schweitzer's coming is one sign among many of the resumption of international relations in the realm

A Great Word from a Mystic

In a book of extracts upon the Life of Love I find today, and I share the discovery with my readers, a great passage from Thomas Traherne. It is like a glorious piece of music. Traherne was only discovered a few years ago; I wonder if there are other seventeenth century writers still undiscovered. "To love one person with a private love is poor and miserable; to love all is glorious. To love all persons in all ages, all angels, all worlds, is divine and heavenly. To love all cities and kingdoms, all kings and all peasants, and every person in all worlds with a natural, intimate, familiar love, as of him alone, is blessed. This makes a man effectually blessed in all worlds, a delightful Lord of all things, a glorious friend to all persons, a concerned person in all transactions, and ever present with all affairs. So that he must be ever filled with company, ever in the midst of all nations, ever joyful and ever blessed. The greatness of this man's love no man can measure; it is stable like the sun, it endureth forever as the moon, it is a faithful witness in heaven.' It is wonderful that a man could write like that. It is even more wonderful that he should feel like that.

CORRESPONDENCE

Problem In Conduct

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Consider the countless and varied tasks which ministers are asked to perform today. They must not only know their own business well, but be able to give an intelligent and authoritative opinion upon every other business in the world. They must not only be able to preach the gospel adequately and impersonally, but be ready to make a speech on any subject under heaven for any organization which may exist, at any time they are called upon.

But the worm will turn. This is my turn! I have in my possession a letter written to me by a business firm in a mid-western city in which they courteously declare it will "take only a moment of my time and I will be doing others a great favor," if I will only send to them the names of the people in my congregation who are obliged to wear false teeth. It matters not what particular contraption they desire to send them on approval or to sell them if possible.

I submit, sir, that if I answer all such questions it will be utterly impossible for me to maintain my work at the proper level and to carry on the regular work of the ministry. How can I know what people in my congregation wear false teeth! I may be guilty of many indelicacies in service and I may seem to be unfamiliar with many subjects, but it does seem past reason that I should have this extra burden laid upon me!

I humbly ask, sir, your consideration and advice.

Ecclesiastics and Church Unity

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I notice in the October 13 number of The Christian Century a reference to the attitude of Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell in the matter of church union, that I think does an injustice to a very worthy man and Methodist minister. After referring to the statement made by the bishop, that "the popular craze for church union was a menace to Protestant Christianity," and that he especially deprecated the Lambeth proposals, you go on to say: "Opposition to church union is frequently found among secretaries, presidents of small denominational colleges and other church functionaries whose position in a united church might be altered."

No doubt you are correct in this statement, but in the connection in which it stands, you imply that that is the reason for the attitude of Bishop Hartzell. This can not be true in this case, for Bishop Hartzell is a retired bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, and as such holds no office which could in any way be affected by any change likely to be affected by church union. Moreover, he is incapable of being influenced by the narrow motives which you seem to attribute to him. He is a man of wide experience in his relation not only to his own church but to other churches, in his own and other countries, and is not behind other ministers in his earnest desire for the promotion of the kingdom of God in every practicable way. I call attention to the matter, feeling that an unintentional injustice has been done.

Evanston, Ill.

OLIN F. MATTISON.

[There was no intention to apply the general statement made in our editorial to Bishop Hartzell personally, except in the broadest sense that his views were no doubt largely determined (unconsciously, or subconsciously, of course) by his ecclesiastical position and denominational interest. Neither to the great and good bishop, for whose integrity and unselfishness we have the greatest respect, nor to any person in the other groups referred to do we impute any conscious determination of views on the subject of unity by self-interest.—THE EDITOR.]

"Worse Than Infidel"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your caustic criticism of the attitude of Hon William J. Bryan concerning the inspiration of the scriptures and current religious teachings may awaken enthusiasm and even applause in the mind of the average reader of your periodical, but to the thoughtful, sane and unwarped believer in God's word and its inspiration you have given Mr. Bryan new credentials as a far-seeing and constructive statesman. Evidently the editors of your bright and quite interesting journal assumed that because they have green goggles on the whole world is green. While the analogy is not apropos, I call your attention to the fact that the prophet Elijah upon a time thought that he was the only prophet of God left. It is quite evident that in your enthusiasm for the radical criticism cult you have reached the conclusion that there are none left in the world who are following the old paths and who believe the Bible is divinely inspired, like our mothers believed it.

Candidly, you have another think coming to you. There are more than ten thousand times seven thousand prophets who have never bowed the knee to Baal. Those of us who have spent some time in the study and investigation of science, falsely so-called, which seeks to discredit the Bible, know that within the next decade all this ground upon which the radical critics are howling and cavorting now, will be shifted, and they will then confront new so-called scientific truths, having meantime discarded all that they now believe. They shed their scientific skins oftener than the snake sheds his skin. In my own day the so-called scientists have changed ground at least a dozen times, and all that we know about them is that we know nothing about them.

Your reference to Bob Ingersoll is characteristic of your cult. Bob Ingersoll was an outspoken enemy to Christianity and the word of God. You are the enemy to both, though you veil your enmity in high-sounding and well-rounded phrases, camouflaged with claims to an erudition which none of you possess. Men do not gain a knowledge of the Bible through the processes of intellectual investigation. In the language of the great book itself, "Men cannot by wisdom find out God." There was wisdom in the days of Socrates, but they did not find the secret places of the great God. Christianity reveals itself in exactly inverse ratio to the revelations which are achieved by the investigations of scholastics.

However, it is not my purpose to lengthen this communication, but simply to call your attention to a great injustice you are doing one of the greatest Christians of our time. I have not at all times been in agreement with Mr. Bryan's politics, but I am in the fullest accord with him in his heroic defense of the word of God as a book wholly inspired and one which is an infallible guide to men for all the tasks and duties of this life, and for all the things of the life to come. And so as far as Bob Ingersoll is concerned I feel that his attitude compared to yours was far preferable.

I have more respect for an outspoken and downright infidel than I have for men of the type of your editors who have stolen the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. And if this be treason, make the most of it.

The Letter Was Delivered

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: That editorial to President Harding, Christian, is great. I trust that you have taken steps to bring it to the President's notice in such a manner that he will read every word of it, for it expresses the true mind of the church and that he ought to know.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just finished reading your letter to "President Harding, Christian," and I want to commend you for the fine, Christian way in which you point out the crisis of opportunity to be met by the simple duty of the "Christian President."

We are responding to the call for prayer, and doing it in every church service, and are preparing to observe "Disarmament Sunday," but could we not do it with greater power, zeal and hope if we were assured that the Christian forces had in the Christian President Christ's first strong effort toward answering our common prayer.

Selling Religion

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with great interest the article by Clyde McGee in The Christian Century for October 13 because "them's my sentiments." But I do feel that a word ought to be added to what is there said by way of explanation of the attitude of those who have been led to apply the technical terminology of salesmanship to the work of the church.

The modern young business man does not think of the science of salesmanship as essentially a commercial transaction in barter. For him, salesmanship consists in convincing his prospective customer of the value of the product which he represents. The sale follows as a matter of course, and the delivery of the goods and the payment of the bill are routine details. Therefore, when an American business man makes the now common statement that "It is the business of the church to sell religion," he does not mean commercial bartering of a commodity for money: he means that it is the business of the church to take aggressive steps to convince people of the value of religion. Of course if they are so convinced they will seek to secure its benefits. With a full understanding of what is meant by the terms so used we see that the

"Nearly Every Week"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Let me thank you for your editorial letter to President Harding, Christian, in your issue of October 20. That alone would be worth to me what your paper has cost for a year. Perhaps as an old fashioned Presbyterian preacher, I ought to tell you that in many things you are wrong. I realize the difficulty which faces us who bow to the authority of a book, but I am more and more feeling that a greater difficulty will some day face you fellows who will not accept any authority save your own reason. However that may be, I rest assured that the Lord is not going to let any of us defeat his holy and loving purpose; and that some of these days, we will all see eye to eye because we shall know even as we are known. Hoping that you will not move too fast and that the rest of us will not move too slowly, and thanking you for the inspiration you afford me nearly every week, I am, yours cordially,

BOOKS

THE NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE. By Andrew A. Bruce. This is a remarkably interesting study of the Non-Partisan League by one whose competence can hardly be challenged. Born in India, educated in English schools and in the University of Wisconsin, experienced in railway law and in general practice, professor and dean of the law school of the University of North Dakota, he served as Associate-Justice of the Supreme Court before and during the time when the Non-Partisan League was forcing its way and power in North Dakota and as Chief Justice until 1919 when he resigned and became a professor of law in the University of Minnesota.

This book does not pretend to be unbiased. It is in fact a very able brief against the ideas and policies of the League. A judicial tone is maintained with few exceptions but the concessions are in no case such as raise any doubt about the obnoxious character of the League, its leadership, its specific measures or its tendencies.

It is refreshing to learn in its twenty-ninth chapter that the question—that is, the whole question under discussion—is "one of expediency and necessity;" that it is after all "an economic question;" and it is true, as the author says that "it is much to be regretted that in its solution there has been so little sane discussion, so much politics, and so much crimination and recrimination." It is reassuring to learn that "much as we may bicker about the matter, the bonds of North Dakota are as good as gold." It is disturbing to discover that "it is by no means inconceivable that Alexander McKenzie may again sit in the throne room of North Dakota." The author confirms the general impression gained by liberals at a distance that the bankers precipitated the crisis or as he expresses it that "the conservatives became more and more willing to face a present financial crisis rather than any longer to tolerate the scheme of state-ownership;" and the author renders a distinct service in making public the vigorous and justifiable defiance of the North Dakota Industrial Commission in its letter of January 7, 1921 to the bankers.

The close reader of Judge Bruce's volume will find the truth about this attempt of the banks to force a change of policy on the legislature as a condition of their own performance of their elementary and obvious function but it is as if from a reluctant witness. We get no help in understanding the obstacles against which the Non-Partisan administration had to contend. Apparently this is not from desire to distort or withhold information but from an intense and quite understandable hostility to the League, and all that it represents. It is true that there are sentences here and there which justify the purely economic efforts of an agricultural state "to retain for itself the profits which heretofore it has been compelled to share with outsiders; but there is no glow of passion, no righteous indignation, in these passages—only a very cold acknowledgment that the farmers are not unpatriotic free-lovers, or downright thieves.

The author in short is a straight-forward, hard-hitting partisan. He is well informed and seeks to be scrupulously fair. He seems to acquit even Townley and Lemke of the charge of corruption—or at least believes that "it would be difficult to prove that they have themselves become rich or that the acquisition of wealth has been their main and paramount purpose." He is confident that the power of the League is waning; that its economic policies are unsound and have already failed. His gravest charge is that the Non-Partisan League has threatened the rule of law. This, of course, is a serious charge and it is doubtful whether any except those who were already hostile to the League will consider that it is sustained. That the League is ill advised in its attitude towards the schools and towards the courts seems clear and if there is any defense against criticism on these scores, it can be only in the counter claim that exploiting property has also consistently done its utmost to control both the courts and the educational institutions. Much is made of the alleged attempt to endanger the land grant school funds. It is fair to recall that thus far it is not Minnesota or North Dakota which in fact have squandered these superb trust funds but other and older states in which the principles of the Non-Partisan League have been held in as great contempt as the author could ask.

This book avoids most of the sweeping and absurd charges which have appeared in the Eastern press and in local anti-League press. He especially points out that enemies of the League have too much emphasized the charge of "socialism." But how could this charge be more unfairly emphasized than in this very volume? The two hundred and sixty-seven preceding pages continually ring the changes on the charge of socialism, and the socialist hierarchy.

Judge Bruce's book, notwithstanding its uncompromising partisanship, is the best source of information on the political history of the past six years in the North Dakota laboratory. (Macmillan. $3.00.)

EDWARD T. DEVINE.

SMOKE AND STEEL, by Carl Sandburg. Five Gary Bohunks fell into a furnace of white-hot steel, and their flesh and bones were burned up along with a few tons of limestone and other junk. A Taylor Street Dago carried an armful of red, blue, and yellow balloons, selling them to the kids for a nickle per. A vaudeville dancer died, and the show had to be called off because she couldn't be replaced. A Michigan Avenue "madame," put out of business by the harness bulls, maundered of love to a pet parrot, a goldfish, and two white mice. A worn-out, discouraged woman hung about the shadows of North Clark Street all night long, but got no business.

Of such stuff Carl Sandburg makes poetry—the poetry that composes "Smoke and Steel." The book is hardly one that will be raved over at meetings of small town Cultus Clubs, or the more pretentious "study groups" of larger cities; neither will it be welcomed by those gentle souls that worship the music of Shelley and the prattle of Drinkwater. Sandburg has music, but it is the music of the elevated train, the factory whistle, and the crankshaft grinder. His poetry tells of life as we live it, not as we see it at the Opera or the Tivoli. We are handed ourselves just as we are, in all our crookedness, our foolishness, our blood-thirstiness, and there is no saving chatter about patriotism and majesty of the law. If we don't like this treatment we may go to the devil with our woe; we may not go to Carl Sandburg.

But in this book, more than in the others that Sandburg has written, we see that he has a quarrel with the life that he portrays so well. We sense in him a something that fights against life, and refuses to be beaten. It may be downed for a while, but always it makes him come back, ready to deliver a new blow, to champion some new unfortunate, to point out some new crookedness:

They laid hands on him

And the fool-killers had a laugh,

And the necktie party was a go, by God.

They laid hands on him and he was a goner.

They hammered him to pieces and he stood up.

They buried him and he walked out of the grave, by God,

Asking again: Where did that blood come from?

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Secret of Success *

IT is well to remember that every effect has an adequate cause. Things do not happen. Luck accounts for nothing. Paul was the great apostle to the Gentiles because back there somewhere something happened. Nor do we have to search long to find that something. It was the heavenly vision and that was Christ himself. When he says that he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision he is not speaking of some golden dream, of some half-mythical vagary, he is speaking of his vision of the radiant, resurrected Jesus. It was Jesus whom he obeyed. It was Jesus whom he served. It was Christ who lived in him and for whom he lived every moment of his vigorous life. Paul was a torch. Like John the Baptist he was a burning and a shining light. John shone because he burned. Paul had influence because he consumed himself for Christ. It is ever so; the incandescent lamp is consuming itself; the candle, before it, did the same. I heard that brilliant New York preacher Henry Sloane Coffin say last summer that his work "took it out of him." He shines in New York, because he is such a prodigious toiler—he burns himself up. One of the greatest preachers in the west goes home Sunday nights a wreck—he has saved others, himself he cannot save. Jesus had the philosophy right. Recently in our church a military funeral was held for one of our over-seas trained nurses. She was one of the noblest women God ever made. She worked as the head of a hospital on the border, she went over-seas with the first contingent, she worked up near the firing-lines, when the war was over she went to Albania. Coming home, she took a position in a hospital. One day she collapsed, in a short while she was dead—she saved others—herself she could not save. We shine only because we burn. Others of you could shine more if you would burn more. He who saves his life shall lose it and he who loses his life shall find it! Jesus was right—as always. When Henry Martyn arrived in India his first act was to kneel on the sands and pray: "And now, O God, let me burn up for Thee." He did; he flashed over India, kindling a hundred stations into light, then died, exhausted. When you go to Washington you cannot fail to see in the Congressional Library the picture entitled "Religion." It represents a man and a woman kneeling before a rude stone on which a flame is burning. I went to look at it again just the other day. I always feel like singing as I look at it, "My Heart an Altar and Thy Love the Flame"! Now the secret of all the burning—all this passionate service—all this shining influence is to be found in just what Paul had—a vital experience. I don't much care whether one is a liberal or a conservative so long as he is vital; so long as he has a first-hand, as contrasted with a second-hand experience. I detest second-hand clothes and also second-hand religious experiences. Nobody can get religion for you, you have to get it yourself! Kipling sang of poor Tomlinson of Berkeley Square, who went shivering down to hell, but the Devil, sitting on his pile of slag, would not let Tomlinson in, because he had never done anything really bad; nor would Peter let him into heaven because he had never done anything decidedly good. All that Tomlinson had was derived from some book or he had heard somebody else say it; he knew nothing and had done nothing of himself. They sent him back to do something positive. Kipling painted a real figure there.

I like to think of the blind man whom Jesus healed. The miserable Pharisees blinked the fact of his healing and sought to confuse him with the How? When? Where? Who? "But he said: One thing I know—I was blind—now I see." You can't beat that. He knew something for himself. He had had an experience himself. It was not that he heard somebody else say it, it was not that he had read it in a book, it had happened to him. Now that is what you need! You need to know what Christ has done for you. Suppose you were asked, "What has Jesus ever done for you?" have you a first-hand answer? Forget the catechism, forget the preacher, tell us in your own words just what Jesus has done for you! I can tell you why so many people in the churches are cold, indifferent, dull and lifeless—they don't know that Jesus ever did anything for them. They mumble the formulas, but they don't know what he has done for them individually. No wonder they have no fire. They are not torches—they are icicles! Read the 4th chapter of Zechariah and note that the lamps that had tubes going into the two olive trees kept on burning—the tubes went into the living trees and the oil never ceased to flow into the golden bowl! There is your picture. "Trees by rivers of living water"—"lives hid with Christ in God."—Pauls with power.

That the Ministry Be Not Blamed

By John A. Hutton

Author of "The Proposal of Jesus."

THESE "Warrack Lectures on Preaching" should be read by all ministers seeking assurance and consolation after battling with a hard and oftentimes unresponsive world. Dr. Hutton has brought forth treasures of wisdom not only for the beginner but for the hardened campaigner as well. Rare commonsense and practical helpfulness characterize the book.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Unitarian Denomination Changes Front

Until this year the Unitarian denomination would have scorned to call itself a sect. Henceforth it will be conscious of its denominational obligations, following the epoch-making meeting at Detroit. It will not be satisfied with calling the roll of dead poet members as a basis for self-respect. It proposes to go out into the world and make Unitarians of men. This denomination has a larger wealth per capita than any other communion in America, but has done less with this money than most denominations. This is to be remedied in the missionary and propagandist plans for the near future. Evangelicals are to hear a new challenge in every community where there is a Unitarian church.

Higher Critics Establish a Parallel

Some high critics in the Baptist denomination have been working on quite modern documents. They have studied the confession of faith adopted by the Baptist Conference on Fundamentals in the light of a previous document, the Doctrinal statement issued by the Christian Fundamentals Association which met at Denver last June. It is shown by placing the two documents in parallel columns that the doctrinal content and in some instances the verbiage is almost exactly the same. The result of this presentation is to indicate that the Fundamental movement in the Baptist denomination is not strictly baptistic, but is an exotic growth. Probably the last has not yet been heard of the Fundamental controversy in the denomination. As a propaganda fostered by capitalists and obscurantists from the outside, it may last a long time yet.

Procession to the Vatican

In an article in the Atlantic Monthly, L. J. S. Wood describes what he calls "The procession to the Vatican." France now maintains an embassy at the Vatican as does Great Britain. In interpreting the significance of this new movement, Mr. Wood says: "But Rome's diplomatic relations with the world today are not with Catholic princes, but with 'democratic' states, represented by parliaments and prime ministers. It has been in disparagement of limited companies that they have 'no souls to be saved or bodies to be kicked.' In the old days of Catholic princes and of the Temporal Power, both these conditions stood. Such entities today have the first half of the phrase only in the measure of righteousness of feeling expressed in the policy of the nation influencing the government; and the second half stands only in the lessened and entirely changed measure of adjustment of diplomatic differences. In truth, today Rome's aspect in its relations with the world flocking to it must be very different from that of olden days. How it will align itself will be matter for interesting study by future students of history. And it is for the future students of history, not for a passing note-maker of the time, to comment on another striking phenomenon. There is one great country to which the Pope's eyes turned specially in every crisis of the war; which, up to the very last minute, he believed never would come in; to which his eyes turned all the same after it had done so; to which the eyes of the Vatican are still turned, the more so in view of its evidently increased prestige and objective and subjective importance—and that is the one country which is not joining in the rush to Rome. The United States receives a purely religious representative of the Pope in the person of an Apostolic Delegate, but it has no diplomatic relations with the Holy See. That, too, is a policy as to which future students of history, at the Vatican and in America, will have opportunity for noting results and forming judgment."

Evangelistic Committee Makes Astounding Charge

The Evangelistic Committee of New York has made a public charge of an astonishing nature with regard to an antireligious organization in New York. It is asserted that $160,000 is being spent in New York on a propaganda which includes in its objects the teaching of free-love, atheism and un-Americanism. The story is told of one young man who teaches a class to steal, and of another with a class in radicalism where unpatriotic teachings supplant the pure spirit of Americanism. The committee is asking for a budget of $11,000 for immediate needs in carrying on a counter propaganda.

Presbyterian Executives Will Meet at Atlantic City

A national executive conference of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. A. will be held at Atlantic City, Nov. 9-16. Most states will be represented by two men, but some of the smaller ones will have only one. This executive conference will face the task of fixing the benevolent budget for the coming year. Local Presbyterian churches last year raised for their own work $31,000,000. The benevolent budget the same year was $12,000,000. It is likely that this benevolent budget will be increased for next year in view of the net gain in membership of 85,000,000 shown in the annual reports.

Young People Parade in Behalf of Christian Endeavor

The Christian Endeavor Movement is strong in Worcester, Mass., but fifty enthusiastic members of the organization who were at the national convention in New York last summer determined recently to demonstrate this strength. Following the lead of the great New York meeting, they placed in line of parade the members of the various local societies in Worcester. One thousand young people marched down the streets of the city carrying their Bibles. The New York Club clad in red middies and white skirts or trousers headed the delegation. A strong evangelistic program has been adopted by the Worcester Union for this winter and the slogan is "Win-a-Friend for Christ." The Kansas City Union has also taken on a great deal of new life the past year. The total attendance at the rallies for the year was 6,000.

Reports Big Campaign of Bible Reading in Australia

The Pocket Testament League is spreading its activities through the world by means of a trip being taken by the international secretary, Rev. George T. B. Davis. He has spent some time in Sydney recently, and while there placed 21,000 pocket testaments. His visit there has been under the direction of the Evangelization Society of South Wales. Reports are coming in from many sections, indicating that the increased reading of the Bible has brought a great increase of religious interest and many conversions.

Chicago Will Have Big Evangelistic Campaign

The Chicago Church Federation has planned a big campaign for winning 30,000 new converts in the churches. A secular paper erroneously speaks of the campaign as "a proselyting campaign." Nothing will count on the thirty thousand goal except genuine conversions. Transfers from one church to another do not figure in the campaign. First reliance will be placed upon the evangelistic message on the lips of the pastor in his regular ministrations. In addition the mid-week services will be utilized. There will be personal workers groups, where special training will be given in recruiting work. The campaign will also be carried into the Sunday-schools, and the young people's societies. The use of the professional evangelist is not considered to be much of a factor in the campaign.

Working Women Make War Against War

The working women of the world now have an international organization. The Second International Congress of Working Women held their sessions at Geneva, Switzerland, recently. An American woman, Mrs. Raymond Robins, is the president of the congress. One of the leading topics was the havoc wrought in industry by war. The meeting manifested more religious spirit than most gatherings of working men, as may be seen from the following words from their manifesto: "It can be done! The power of a great faith can recreate the mind and will of the people of the earth paralyzed by the aftermath of the war, and set free the spirit of mankind. A great faith held fast by the handful of poor folks—carpenters and fishermen, menders of nets, and working women—two thousand years ago, changed the face of the earth in spite of empires and Caesars. A great faith held fast by the working women of all nations can redeem the world. It is the hour of decision."

Henry Ward Beecher Remembered in Village Church

Not every village church can boast so inspiring a tradition as that of the Presbyterian church of Lawrenceburg, Ind. Henry Ward Beecher was once its pastor. In his memory a Beecher Club of men was organized some time since. The present pastor, Rev. Forest C. Taylor, recently arranged with the Lawrenceburg Press to publish a Beecher edition. The paper had 32 pages, and contained many pictures that are interesting to those who cultivate the memory of the great preacher of Civil war days. Lawrenceburg was his first pastorate.

Episcopalian Gives Communion to Y. M. C. A. Men

Because Detroit is the home of Bishop Williams, the vigorous broad church bishop who is so much beloved in all communions, the Detroit Y. M. C. A. felt no hesitation this year in arranging for their annual retreat up Detroit river at Grosse Isle in St. James' Episcopal church. In this meeting 135 men sought the blessing of God on the work of the Detroit Y. M. C. A. for this year. Dr. J. A. Vance, well known Presbyterian minister, spoke. Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of the leading Methodist church of Detroit, spoke on "The Overflowing Vessel." At the close of the day the holy communion was administered in St. James' church by Dr. Duff, the rector. The association in Detroit reports a fifty per cent increase in Bible study this fall.

Mr. Jiggs Starts to Sunday School

Publicity methods in the churches grow more ingenious as the men employing them become more experienced. A Business Men's Class in the Presbyterian Sunday-school of Girard, Kans., has a clever artist who can duplicate the popular characters in the cartoon sections of the newspapers. These are introduced in the class printing in new poses. Recently the famous Mr. Jiggs asked Maggie if he could not go to Sunday-school. Maggie, with rolling pin in hand, gave her permission provided Jiggs would go to the Presbyterian Sunday-school.

To Dance, or Not to Dance, That is the Question

While the Methodists of the big cities are heartily tired of the prohibitions in their discipline book against certain forbidden amusements, including dancing, card playing and theater-going, and wish to have these prohibitions taken out of the discipline book, there are some in other communions that are not so sure. The Protestant Episcopal church often has dances in the parish house. Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, of that communion, in a public communication states the following with regard to his observations on this question: "My study has led me to conclude that with all our liberality in the matter of amusements, we are not inducing the young people to consecrate their lives to the service of Jesus and his church; with the handicap of the prohibition of amusements, the Methodists are getting and holding their young people and my investigation has shown me a wonderful work being done by the young Methodists. In the past I have encouraged my people in the use (but not the abuse) of these various pleasures, always directing and, with my wife, chaperoning young people; but I frankly (though sadly) admit that I cannot show spiritual results. Nor am I alone in this respect."

Teaches Hebrew History in High School

When one thinks about it, it is rather silly that in America we have thought it legal to teach the history of every other people except the ancient Hebrews. Mr. Charles N. Knopf taught history during the past year in the high school at Fullerton, Cal. Instead of teaching ancient history by giving six weeks to oriental history, and the remainder to the Græco-Roman, he divided the year into two parts, giving one-half to the Semitic history. The school studied the achievements of the Sumerian reformer, Urukagina, and pondered on the code of Hammurabi which provided that a gadding, troublesome wife should be ducked in the river. The Semitic story was carried down through the New Testament era, Roman Catholic pupils being excused from looking up biblical references if they so chose.

Presbyterians Send Man to Czecho-Slovakia

Rev. Kenneth D. Miller, associate director of the Department of City and Immigrant Work of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, is being sent to Czecho-Slovakia on a special mission. This is in line with the denominational policy of connecting up with the new Protestant movement in that country. Mr. Miller was recently awarded the Cross of War by the government of Czecho-Slovakia for service rendered the Czechs in Russia during the war. He will sail from New York on October 29.

Commending Religious Reading to the Congregation

This is the time of year when Methodism officially decrees that subscriptions be secured for their denominational papers. Denominations less closely organized than the Methodists also use this period to push the journals that set forth the denominational news. These routine tasks of the church are often difficult to perform in an interesting way, but Rev. H. A. Jump, pastor of First Congregational church of Manchester, N. H., recently found a new method. He preached a "surprise" sermon, and when it came to its conclusion he announced that everything in it had been culled from a single issue of the denominational weekly. The result was a generous lot of subscriptions for that paper. In many Disciples churches sample copies of the various journals are placed on a literature table, and copies of them are provided for those interested. Subscriptions are taken by those in charge of this work.

Protest the Teaching of Evolution in the Schools

The Long Run Association of the Southern Baptists has taken up arms against the "God-defying evolution teachers" and passed resolutions against them. The demand is made that no teacher known to hold such views shall be employed by public tax money. The Baptist doctrine of the separation of church and state seems to have gotten itself into perilous predicament here when the Baptist association undertakes to direct the expenditure of public tax funds.

Congregational Moderator Takes Duties Seriously

Dr. W. E. Barton, of Oak Park, Chicago, is the Moderator of the National Council of Congregational churches this year and next. He has a great church in Oak Park which would absorb most of the time of an ordinary man, and his literary labors would occupy the full time of some journalists and authors, but in addition to these duties, he plans a vigorous campaign in behalf of his denomination during his term of office. His congregation has been very gracious in their attitude to their pastor in these days of heavy responsibility, giving him great freedom in the making of his appointments. During the month of November he will attend a number of denominational meetings in the east. Most important among these engagements is the Diamond Jubilee address before the American Missionary Association on Nov. 10. In the month of January, Dr. Barton will give a great deal of attention to the progress of Congregationalism in the southern states.

Great English Minister Praises "Ambassadors of God"

Britishers who take up their residence in this country to preach the gospel never drop out of sight of their loyal friends across the water. It is many years since Dr. S. Parkes Cadman left his Wesleyan church in England to become a minister of a Congregational church in New York but one still finds his name many times in English church journals. His recent achievement in producing the book

French Pastor Criticises America

Churchmen in Great Britain and on the Continent are mostly supporters of the League of Nations, believing that through this means there is the best opportunity for realizing the Christian goal of world peace. Rev. Wilfred Monod, pastor of the Huguenot Church of the Oratoire, and a professor on the Paris Theological faculty, wrote a personal letter recently to Rev. Charles S. Macfarland which has been made public. The French theologian declares:

"At the moment when the League of Nations holds its solemn sessions at Geneva let me express to you in all frankness the grief which I feel as a Christian, and the inquietude I feel as a man, as a citizen of the world, to discover that the United States is not present at this assemblage of nations. Among the arguments brought forward to justify this attitude is this—that the American democracy has too much respect for its independence and its own dignity to consent to the formation of a super-government destined to diminish the sovereignty of each individual state. But has this fear any more reality than a scarecrow to frighten away the birds? M. Leon Bourgeois has just spoken the following words before the second assembly of the League of Nations: 'We do not want to offend the political sovereignty of any state and of any nation. We do not seek to establish any sovereignty; but above the political sovereignty of the state, there is a moral sovereignty, it is that of Right.'

"The alternatives are these: either international anarchy, or international order. The latter will come on that day on which the United States will renounce the antiquated and ferocious fiction of the absolute sovereignty of each individual state. This pretension is nonsensical and immoral. Before our chamber of deputies, President Wilson had the courage to point out that axiom, and to denounce this false principle of sovereignty, without limit and rule, of the state, that bloodthirsty Moloch which the governing classes try to identify with 'country'. Before the eruption of the world war, during the conference of The Hague, where were laid the foundations of international arbitration, the delegates of certain governments drew back from the obligation of recourse to it. This, pitiable evasion was hardly tolerable before the ghastly catastrophe which has bathed our planet in human blood; but today it is hideous and damnable. 'The honor of the state' and the 'sovereignty of the state' are dead formulae; they are empty, hypocritical, and homicidal.

"The United States refused to ratify the treaty of Versailles because it did not want to assume burdensome duties (for instance, the care of agonized Armenia), but now it wants to profit by the rights which the treaty concedes to it. And to lend weight to its claims, it is constructing a colossal fleet, its military expenditures reach dizzy figures. The entire world is noting the progress of the military spirit in the United States, some with a malign joy, others with inquietude; and the press, in many countries, even testifies to a lack of respect for the disarmament conference convoked by President Harding. It is whispered that this is nothing but a phase of the naval rivalry between England and the United States and Japan.

"The United States cannot any longer practice its narrow policy of isolation. It does not want to any more, for its interests lie in cooperation with the rest of the nations, and it ought not to do so: neither conscience nor evangelical tradition will permit it to repeat the words of Cain: 'Am I my brother's keeper?'

"Of course, the actual league under our eyes calls forth criticism. Without the United States, Russia and Germany, it seems to group the greater victorious European powers, and to take on the character of a military coalition in the eyes of certain neutral powers. Again, it is reproached with being, not the representation of the parliaments, but the instrument of governments. And there is food for still other well founded criticism. The application of the famous Article X is not easily interpreted. And yet, the League of Nations lives and moves and has its being. That is the wonder! Something really new has come to our old planet, something unique in history. For the first time the idea of an association of nations is transformed from theory to fact. It is today the most original and audacious manifestation of the ideal of humanity."

called "Ambassadors of God" has been especially satisfactory to his countrymen. Rev. W. L. Watkinson, considered by many the leading pulpiteer of England, declares after reading the book that another book on preaching will not be needed for forty years, so well has the American preacher done his work. Dr. Cadman is commended for large learning and keen discernment in his study of the great lights of the Christian pulpit.

Foreign Board Finds a New Editor

The American Board of Foreign Missions, supported mostly by Congregational churches, has placed one of its associate secretaries, Rev. Enoch Frye Bell, in charge of its editorial and publicity department. He will edit the regular publications of the board, and in addition will serve as foreign news editor for the press. He has lived in Japan and for fifteen years has been working in the office of the board. This gives him unrivalled opportunities for developing the new department work placed in his hands.

Episcopalians Experiment With Young People's Organizations

The Protestant Episcopal church has no outstanding organization of their young people corresponding to the Epworth League or Baptist Union. They have a very significant movement in their Girls' Friendly Societies, but this does not provide a meeting ground for young people of both sexes. In some of the more evangelical dioceses, the Christian Endeavor movement has been introduced with good results, but in other sections the use of this organization would be impossible on account of theological prejudice. Recently the Young People's League has been formed which seems to be meeting with success, and it is hoped by many that the Young People's League movement may evolve into a national movement for young people.

Dr. Guy's Lectures on Japan

During the past fortnight Dr. Harvey H. Guy of Berkeley, California, has been delivering an interesting and scholarly series of lectures interpretative of Japanese conditions and relationships at the College of Missions in Indianapolis and the University of Chicago. Dr. Guy's academic history connects him with Drake University, Chicago and Yale. He was for five years dean of the Sei Gakuin in Toyko, for three years dean of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, and later professor of church history in Pacific Theological Seminary and professor of the history of philosophy of religion in the Pacific School of Religion at Berkeley. His experience of twelve years as a missionary in Japan has given him exceptional opportunities for the sympathetic study of the questions which are most to the front in American relations with the Orient at the present time. In the lectures he dealt with such important matters as the challenge of the new Far East, Japan in revolution and evolution,

What is The Daily Altar?

IT IS A GUIDE and inspiration to private devotion and family worship. Presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these hurried and high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost, this beautiful book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

The authors of the book are Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison.

ESTIMATES OF THE BOOK

The Christian Advocate: This compact volume will be very helpful in the stimulation of family worship, a grace that has been a diminishing factor in the family life of America for some time. It will be a great advantage to the religious life of the nation if this asset of faith and prayer can again become effective among us. And this book, with its excellently arranged selections for each day, will be of large assistance in that direction.

The Homiletic Review: If we are to meet, successfully, the great and growing number of problems in this eventful time, it is necessary that the quiet hour of meditation be observed as never before. For only a mind nicely poised, only a spirit daily enriched and nourished and guided by an unselfish purpose can adequately meet the situation. Every aid, therefore, to thoughtfulness and prayer should be welcomed, as we do this manual before us. It has been prepared "with the purpose of meeting in an entirely simple and practical manner some of the needs of individuals and households in the attainment of the sense of spiritual reality."

The Churchman: That we are in a new day in more ways than one is evidenced by this beautiful book.

The Presbyterian Advance: For meeting the need of those who would enjoy the privilege of daily prayer, but scarcely know how to begin, the authors have prepared this excellent and beautiful book.

The Central Christian Advocate: Beautifully bound, this book with its tasty and neat appearance, prepares one for the equal taste and care in its contents. Of all books for devotional use, this one in appearance and contents cannot be too highly commended.

The Christian Standard: The binding and make-up of the book are beyond all praise.

The Christian Evangelist: This book is beautifully arranged, handsomely bound and typographically satisfying. It should be a real help toward restoring the family altar.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D.D.: "The Daily Altar" is a bit of fine work. It certainly provides something to grow up to. Unlike many books of devotion, it is free from pious platitudes and pays the highest respect to the intelligence of its readers. Its devotional spirit is pervasive.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor Emeritus The Christian Evangelist: The book is happily conceived, happily worked out and most beautifully bound.

international conflicts and adjustments of the Japanese people, Japan at work, Japan at worship, tendencies in modern Japanese thought, and the Christian approach to the modern Japanese. Those who listened to these scholarly addresses were impressed with the importance of having so sympathetic and sane an interpreter of Oriental life in these nervous and prejudiced days, and felt that Dr. Guy ought to be located in some institution nearer the center of American academic life, where his information and missionary enthusiasm might reach a much wider circle of American students.

Dr. Willett's Western Journey

During the winter quarter at the University of Chicago, which is his vacation period, Dr. Willett expects to visit the northwest and Pacific coast, as he did last year. He will devote his time primarily to the interpretation of the cooperative movement among the churches, the work of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, of which he is an official representative, and the values and achievements of local federations and councils. Some portion of his time will be given to lectures on biblical and educational themes, under the auspices of colleges, groups of churches, Y. M. C. A.s and other organizations. He expects to spend the month of January on the way west, between St. Paul and the northern Pacific coast; the month of February in Northern California, and March in Southern California. The movement for closer association of the churches for effective effort is noticeable throughout the land, but nowhere more evidently than on the Pacific coast. It is to promote this movement and particularly the ministries of the Federal Council that Dr. Willett will spend this month in this area.

Annual Meeting of the Federal Council in Chicago

In December of last year the quadrennial meeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America was held in Boston. The entire membership of the council, consisting of more than four hundred representatives of the thirty cooperating Protestant bodies, was present or accounted for by alternates. That body will not convene again until 1924. But there is an annual meeting of the executive committee of the council, numbering about one hundred, and equally representative of the constituent bodies. That gathering is to be held in Chicago, December 14-16, under the joint auspices of the Chicago committee of the Federal Council and the Chicago Church Federation. During those three days the entire work of the council during the past year will be presented in reports and reviewed in discussion. Some very remarkable results have been achieved by the commissions, particularly those on Evangelism, Social Service and International Justice and Goodwill. The recently established committee on works of mercy and relief includes several formerly unrelated activities in behalf of the relief of afflicted regions and groups of people. Mr. Hoover's recent appeal to this committee to take the lead in the huge responsibility for the supply of food to the starving in Russia is evidence of the government's recognition of the immense power which the churches in their united capacity possess. Similar is the importance of President Harding's request that the Federal Council employ its great influence in creating an atmosphere favorable to the program and the ideals of the approaching conference looking to the limitation of armaments. The inauguration of the Chicago office of the Federal Council is another evidence of the progressive and expanding program of the organization. The December meeting should be one of the most important of the year from the standpoint of cooperative Christian work.

Y. M. C. A. Takes up the Forum Method

The forum method of disseminating knowledge and formulating opinion is now being employed by the Central Y. M. C. A. of Brooklyn, the largest association of the land. Forum discussions are held on Monday and Friday evenings, and these are very largely attended. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman is giving a great deal of time to this enterprise, and he is ably seconded by Rev. Samuel Lindsay of Hanson Place Baptist church. The topics relate not only to social uplift, but often relate more definitely to the personal life of the men.

World Alliance of Christian Associations Plan Week of Prayer

The World Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations announces through its president, Dr. John R. Mott, that November 13-19 will be observed this year as the Week of Prayer for young men. Among the occasions for thanksgiving suggested is the growing consciousness of brotherhood which has been quickened throughout the world. The note sounded this year will have large reference to the international obligations of Christian men. Christian associations are directed to pray for a closer relation to the churches by which both the churches and the associations will be benefited.

Sixteen Million Sunday School People Interested in Convention

The eyes of over sixteen million Bible students will turn to Kansas City where the next convention of the international Sunday school convention will be held June 21-27. The delegates are apportioned to the various states and provinces of North America on the basis of constituency, and the total delegation will be eight thousand. Illinois has been allotted 365 delegates and other states of the various systems of instruction proportionately. Exhibits will be made which have been offered by the Sunday schools during the past hundred years in order to show that the Sunday school is a genuinely progressive institution. The evangelicals in the Sunday school ranks in recent years tried to organize separately, but they are back in the parent movement again working harmoniously. Rev. Robert Hopkins is acting general secretary of the International Sunday School Association. He is the Disciples leader of religious education.

Former Officers of Moody Institute Continued

The annual board meeting of the Moody Institute was held on October 19 and at this meeting the former officers were re-elected. The president, Mr. Henry P. Crowell, is a very successful business man of Chicago, and is president of the Quaker Oats company. The vice president is former Judge McKenzie Cleland, known for his advanced views in the field of criminology. Mr. Bryan Y. Craig, attorney-at-law, is the secretary. The predominating influence on the board is Presbyterian, although there are also Congregational influences as well. One of the outstanding features of the year's report was the sailing to the foreign field of forty-three students of Moody institute.

Prominent Y. W. C. A. Leader Passes Away

The untimely passing of Miss Grace L. Coppock removes from the helm of National Young Women's Christian association of China its strong leader and general secretary. Miss Coppock was a graduate of the University of Nebraska and has served many years in China. She returned to America in 1911, but spent her entire furlough speaking in various sections of the country. When she became national secretary in China there were seven foreign secretaries and two native Chinese members on the staff. Today the association has eighty-four foreign secretaries and forty-two Chinese secretaries.

Disciples Churches Have a Program for Armistice Week

The Officers' Council of the United Christian Missionary Society has sent to all the churches of the communion directions for the observance of Armistice Week in view of the Conference on Limitation of Armaments going on at Washington. These churches are urged to enter heartily into all union meetings that may be arranged by direction of the Federal Council. Individual members are urged to write letters to the press in which they set forth their views in behalf of world peace. Many papers have a department which makes use of such communications. The week of November 6-11 is being observed by a series of prayer meetings running through the week. Churches having bells are to ring them at each noon hour during the week as a call to prayer. In addition to all of these plans, congregations are urged to send in peace resolutions to the American members of the Peace Conference. It is hoped that through such a program the conscience of the Christian church may be made to register at a time when many have grave fears that a conference designed to promote peace might conceivably be the beginning of another disastrous war.

The Outline of History By H. G. WELLS

Now in One Volume at $5.00

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY was unquestionably the best selling and most widely discussed non-fiction publication of the past year. The list price of $10.50 for the two-volume set, however, placed it out of reach of many potential book purchasers. In response to an urgent demand for a cheaper edition there is now published a one-volume edition that will appeal to a much wider market. It represents H. G. Wells' answer to the criticisms, favorable and unfavorable, which the first edition drew from scholars in all fields. Without sacrificing his own original viewpoint, Mr. Wells has taken advantage of constructive suggestions relative to both general emphasis and detailed content. The one-volume edition is printed on thin bible paper, and contains 1272 pages. (Add 15 cents postage).

THE WORLD'S DAWN

The world was old long before the coming of man, those immeasurable ages of life's first faint stirrings of which most of us know so little and are unable to learn much from professional monographs. The "Outline" gives this marvellously interesting story in language which brings before the mind's eye a thoroughly understandable realization of those ages through which mass and matter passed, up to the crude beginnings of living creation, and thence to the giant reptiles and animals—a brilliantly told story, covering millions of years and culminating in the advent of man.

MAN'S ADVENT.

The dim mystery of man's origin is wisely dealt with. Sources are examined—the Bible, Evolution, and so on, in the light of actual discoveries of the Neanderthalic and other ages, and so is composed a picture of earliest human life and origins, which is full of enlightenment on the question. After that picture, the reader is shown mankind's victories and failures in the struggle for life against mammoths and monsters, his gradual rise from the primitive, the instinct of love and hate, the family idea, the earliest methods of protection and reasoning, the growth of intelligence. And so he emerges from savagery, he takes his first step along the path which leads to today.

CIVILIZATION'S CRADLE.

It is curious to picture an inarticulate world, yet it was so till man began to think; then came speech, which for long was the only means of record, a time of mythology and superstition out of which religion grew. The next steps in communication were signs, picture-language and writing, then art and culture. How, gradually, over many centuries, all this came about in different parts of the world is told in the "Outline" and a marvellously fascinating story it is of a world in civilization's cradle, still in the swaddling clothes of development.

A SUGGESTION: Turn back to page 30 and list your Autumn book order—and put "The Outline of History" first in the list. (You may have reasonable time to pay for the books.) Prepare for a great year by reading great books.

HISTORY'S BEGINNINGS

When mankind woke up to a realization of cause and effect, history began; sanguinary wars, brutal enslavings of nations wholesale, magnificent though crude conceptions. Thrilling pages these make in "Outline," wherein graphic portrayal is given of how these early races, some vanished, others surviving, made history, and in doing so wove the fabric of the world's polity, out of which evolved both the freedoms and expressions of today.

IN ANNO DOMINI

A right understanding of these years is necessary to the student of social and political questions, particularly in early Anno Domini when the world consciousness was keen and its conscience impressionable. It was the age of mind over matter, of noble chivalries struggling amid selfishness and greed, of Crusades and Magna Charta, the dawn of light and freedom. These two thousand years of progress are vividly outlined by Mr. Wells in words which get at the truth through the glamour and glitter and leave the reader in good view of the facts in accurate perspective.

WHAT OF TOMORROW?

After coming down to recent years, traversing the nineteenth century and revealing much about the Great War, the author takes the reader to the top of the high tower of his farsightedly practical imagination and shows him the world as it is to be if right and freedom are to sway and mankind is to gain good from the trials which have lately been tearing civilization. Without doubt such a coherent and common sense plan of world co-operation as here depicted is an ideal worth the sacrifice of the War years, and if it is to come it will only be by united and unselfish action. Such a plan to study and work for is alone worth many times the cost of this work—invaluable as it is in other respects.

Each One Win—Two!

THE PRESENT SEASON is opening with the largest subscription increase in the history of The Christian Century. Last year the list was very nearly doubled; this year, with the added enthusiasm of our thousands of new friends our present larger list should be actually doubled—or even trebled. When the present season is over, the only persons not knowing the thrill of victory will be those who did not do their part in bringing the victory to pass. From now until Christmas will be a veritable harvest-time for new subscriptions. Are you selecting the two friends you are planning to add to our list? Do not forget the generous offer we are making.

Premiums Both for Yourself and Your Subscribing Friends.

Secure two new annual subscriptions to The Christian Century at $4.00 (ministers $3.00) and send their remittances to us. To each of these new subscribers we will mail without charge one of the books listed herewith. Four Great Books on Modern Religion

Jesus in the Experience of Men:

By T. R. Glover

Like Dr. Glover's earlier volume, "The Jesus of History," this one demonstrates afresh that "Jesus of Nazareth does stand in the center of human history, that he has brought God and Man into a new relation, that he is the present concern of every one of us and that there is more in him than we have yet accounted for." The author describes his purpose as primarily historical—watching "the Christian apostle and the Christian community brought face to face with new issues, intellectual, spiritual and social, and doing their best to adjust old and new." Professor Glover is Fellow in St. John's College, Cambridge, and University lecturer in ancient history.

Price $1.90, plus 12 cents postage.

Outspoken Essays:

By Dean W. R. Inge

Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, is one of the great scholars of the Church of England, a Christian philosopher, a keen student of modern life and its tendencies against the background of history. His writings have given religious faith in England a new intellectual appeal. He has won attention no less by the fearless honesty of his inquiry than by his profound comment upon the problems which today engage the minds of men. While he excludes from his consideration no source of knowledge, his approach to the study of these matters is that of the man who believes in God, who believes in the teaching of Jesus, who, because of this faith, accepts the priestly vocation and devotes himself to the service of his fellows through the avenues which the church affords. This book is one of the most popular of the books of "the gloomy dean," as he is sometimes unjustly called. Dr. Newton believes that this book is one of the few current books that will be read fifty years from now.

Price $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

What Christianity Means to Me:

By Lyman Abbott

As indicated by its sub-title, this book is "a spiritual autobiography." Dr. Abbott states his purpose in the book as follows: "I began the systematic study of the New Testament when I entered the ministry in 1866. Since that time I have been a student of one book, a follower of one Master. This volume is an endeavor to state simply and clearly the results of these sixty years of Bible study, this more than sixty years of Christian experience. The grounds of my confidence in the truth of the statements made in this volume are the teaching of Jesus Christ and His apostles as reported in the New Testament, interpreted and confirmed by a study of life and by my own spiritual consciousness of Christ's gracious presence and life-giving love."

Price $1.75, plus 12 cents postage.

The Proposal of Jesus:

By John H. Hutton

The thesis of this book is that Jesus—disregarding, it is true, the petty disputes and the sects and parties of his day—had as the chief message of his ministry a definite solution for the larger situation of his time, both political and religious, intended to avert the tragic and inevitable national disaster which he saw impending. The author holds that Jesus came into the world for the very purpose of submitting to mankind a program for both personal and social life, in the name of God. He was put to death because he adhered to his program as the only public policy which could save the Jewish nation. Also, that his program "still stands, and still represents his mind and what he accepted as the mind of God and the final ruling upon the conduct of human affairs." Dr. Newton says of the book: "The author makes the whole ministry and message of Jesus not only luminous but awe-inspiring."

Price $2.00, plus 12 cents postage.

These four books, with "What and Where is God," have been our "best sellers" during the past six months. They are essential books. Every alert minister and thoughtful churchman should possess all of them.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS, 508 So. Dearborn St., Chicago

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

Note: Add 10 cents for postage on each book ordered.

Here is a fine library of books on the greatest possible theme. Their possession and study will insure a fruitful year for any churchman or churchwoman.

Giving God the Freedom of the City

A MOST extraordinary scene was that witnessed recently at Ipswich, England, as related by Mr. Shillito in his Table Talk last week. There had been a union mission of all the churches, Anglican and Free—not at first successful, but gathering power betimes—which touched the whole city profoundly. It closed with a vast united service in front of the town hall—since no building was large enough—at which, in the presence of the mayor and city officials, after solemn prayer, the bishop, in the name of all the churches, offered to God the corporate life of the city “in joyous active service of Jesus Christ.” Such a united consecration of corporate life is unique, so far as we are aware, in the history of English religion. It was not only picturesque, but significant, and, we trust, prophetic, not only of the deepening sense of corporate and community life, but of the way of approach toward Christian unity and power. Individual conversions were followed, as they always should be, by corporate dedication: too often, hitherto, the two things have been separate, as if they belonged to different strata. The comment of the editor of The Challenge is worth repeating to American as well as English churchfolk:

“If these people only dare to believe that a Christian revolution is practicable, if they will go forward, refusing to lose confidence in God’s will and power, strong in mutual trust, unafraid to dream and to do and to be called fools for doing, then all things are possible for them. Much study, much patience, as well as much boldness and much prayer, much fellowship, in a word the Christ-spirit, is needed. A sudden and catastrophic renewal of the Christian life, an apocalyptic coming of the kingdom, is what many of us have been expecting. Like a landslide the world will one day move to God; here may be the rock which will start the avalanche. A Christian community—what might it not accomplish for itself and for the world!”

Popularizing the New Orthodoxy

THE greatest weakness of progressive orthodoxy is its danger of becoming esoteric and intellectualistic. The so-called “liberal” denominations have amply demonstrated the futility of making a great religious movement “high-brow” and aloof. Religion, and above all the Christian religion, must be comprehended by the masses. The hurtful sectarian movements of the time have vogue because they have mastered the technique of carrying their message to the back-doors of working people. The faith-cure movement in all of its varieties has learned the art of getting its concepts and vocabulary into the minds of the most humble. Premillennialism is not particularly easy to understand. Nevertheless through tracts, papers, and cheap popular books it has spread its message through the land until hundreds of thousands are looking for the imminent visible return of Jesus. Meanwhile the journalism of orthodoxy continues to decline even when supported by the officialdom of a denomination. The old tract societies are dead, for the most part. The Methodist Tract Society is no more, though it once rendered a good service. Where Disciples once circulated thousands of tracts, they now scatter hundreds, and according to the present indications it will soon be tens. The reason the older tractarian movements failed is to be found in the fact that the tracts never changed to meet changing needs and new intellectual and moral demands. What is needed today is fresh popular statements of the great doctrinal verities of religion. Most religious books are in the language of the scholar and the preacher rather than in the language of the man of the street. Once in awhile when something appears which is at once intellectually respectable and yet simply written, like the Fosdick books, or the Swain book on "What and Where Is God," it offers real competition with the novel as a best seller. The need of the hour is for preaching and writing which will popularize the new orthodoxy as John Wesley popularized his new piety.

Dr. Rufus Jones and William James

IT may well be stated without reasonable fear of contradiction, said the London Times, that America has given us in the twentieth century the two most interesting writers, in English, on philosophy and religion. William James is secure; Rufus Jones may claim a position beside him. And there is no doubt that the second owes not a little to the influence of the first. This is indeed high praise, evoked by a recent book on "The Later Periods of Quakerism," to read which is to see how religious history—too often in presentation, if not in reality, a drab, unromantic thing—can be made as vivid and picturesque as a story of the middle ages. Certainly he is the noblest living interpreter of the deep and vital faith of the Society of Friends, whose mission, he tells us, is not theological at all, but mystical and prophetic; and he seems to return more and more to the older mysticism, from which, he fears, his people have somewhat departed. If anyone imagines that mysticism is dreamy and unpractical, let him read in this volume the work of the Friends in the emancipation of slaves, among the Indians, in prisons, and in behalf of a more humane industrial order. A briefer book by Dr. Jones forms one of the Christian Revolution Series, now happily accessible in this country, entitled "The Remnant"; and it is full of wise thought and living insight. Anyone who writes of mysticism should give us an unforced impression of goodness; and no one who reads Dr. Jones can fail to recognize in him something of the natural saint to whom "Christ is God eternally revealing himself—God in immediate relationship with man."

War's Vast Legacy in National Debts

NO man liveth to himself or dieth to himself, declares Holy Scripture, and this is well illustrated by the way in which war burdens are being passed on to nations that had no part in the world war. We are not surprised to learn that the world war meant an increase of the American national debt from 1,029,000,000 to $23,922,000,000, but it is rather surprising to find that Sweden, a non-combatant country, has increased her national debt in the same period from $161,000,000 to $340,000,000. The City National Bank of New York, which is authority for the above figures, has brought together a statement of the national debts of all the countries of the civilized world. It is shown that since 1913 the total of these debts has increased from $43,362,300,000 to $382,634,000,000. A total indebtedness of a third of a trillion of dollars starts us talking international debts in a new mathematical vocabulary. The interest on this indebtedness is such a vast sum that it will rest like a crushing burden on the world for a whole century. The destruction of property and the crippling of industry in the leading countries of the world have broken down the markets for other countries. Even those who have sought to walk in the paths of peace and amity must now help pay for the next hundred years along with the rest. This helps to emphasize the fact that the nations of earth are one great family. It also bears vivid witness to Mr. Norman Angell's thesis that in war the victor loses. Every war must of necessity be a world war, and the formulation of peace must of necessity be a matter of world concern. Yet there are old-fashioned statesmen who have not taken in the full significance of the new facts which relate to the economic order of this day. One who is acquainted with economics knows full well that another war involving an increase in the national debts of the world in the same proportion would bring down to chaos practically every government of the world. It is either world peace or an economic debacle which even with the help of the feeble analogy of the recent war is quite beyond our comprehension.

An Interpretation of Chicago's Artistic Life

THE latest number of Art and Archæology is a double issue, devoted to the art interests of Chicago. To many of the citizens of this center of industrial and commercial activities the recital of the wealth of artistic material and enthusiasm that is characteristic of Chicago will come as a surprise, while to the visitor from elsewhere who thinks of this city only in terms of its business achievements it may sound incredible. On the other hand many of those who come to our big town for a few days of eager inspection go away with a more adequate knowledge of its artistry and art interests than the average Chicagoan ever possesses. To such as desire at least an elementary knowledge of the higher life of Chicago on the artistic side, an examination of this exceedingly interesting magazine is to be recommended. There in a few fascinating and generously illustrated pages are set forth in brief outline the history of Chicago's art interests, the growth of its architectural sensitiveness, the enormous stimulus of the World's Columbian Exposition to all the arts in this region, but particularly architecture, and the more recent expressions of that spirit in buildings such as the Art Institute, the gothic scheme of the University of Chicago, the new Field Museum of Natural History, and the many business structures that combine the practical with the beautiful. The magnificent Chicago Plan, which has proceeded toward completion through several political administrations, each of which has claimed the credit of its successive features, now begins to take adequate form in the new elaboration of Michigan Boulevard, the widening of Roosevelt Road, formerly Twelfth Street, the great bridge across the river, the lakeshore parkways north and south from Grant Park, the completion of the outer system of boulevards quite encircling the city, the unsurpassed system of parks and playgrounds, and the recently opened wealth of Forest Reserve areas. To all these must be added the intensive artistic life generated by the Art Institute, with its great collections of paintings and statuary, its many departments and its three thousand students; the many private collections of artistic material, which are in large part held in trust for public enjoyment; its musical interests and institutions, reaching their climax in the unrivalled orchestra, now adequately housed in its own building; the marvelous library facilities offered by a half dozen huge collections, all cooperating in the interest of literary efficiency; and its educational foundations, of every grade, culminating in the two great universities. These institutions are not mere detached expressions of the artistic temper, but are all of them the result of public devotion to the high aims of the life of beauty and of power, and are supported with a generosity which speaks eloquently for the genuineness of the art interest of the city.

Roman Fury Aroused by European Defections

MANY religious communions in America as well as the Y. M. C. A. have raised relief funds and have administered them in central Europe. It has been abhorrent to American givers to think of restricting the use of the funds to any particular household of faith. The spirit of the Good Samaritan has dominated the workers, and in the stricken countries Catholics and Protestants alike have profited by the generosity of Friends, Methodists, Lutherans, Baptists, the Y. M. C. A., and other forces. Meanwhile a strong Protestant movement has broken out in central Europe which seems to be quite independent of outside influence. Replying to Roman Catholic charges of proselytism the relief workers assert on their honor that they have been engaged in philanthropy and not in Protestant propaganda. The removal of governmental discriminations against Protestant sects in some of the new slavic countries has been a significant fact. Protestantism would have been a strong force in these countries long since but for government interference. In a little over a year in Czecho-Slovakia two million people have ceased to be Roman Catholics. Some have gone over to infidelity, but many have joined either the Protestant churches or the Greek Orthodox church. This defection has aroused Rome to great fury, and the narrow type of ecclesiastic is fighting every kind of American influence in central Europe, embarrassing even the Hoover commission. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Warsaw has addressed a personal letter to his clergy warning them against the Y. M. C. A. This attack has reacted, and many Catholic newspapers in Poland are openly resenting the criticisms of the archbishop. They call attention to the fact that Polish soldiers were served by no Catholic organization, and that now that the war is over, it is ungracious to attribute to the brave workers at the front unworthy motives. Meanwhile there is a section of Roman Catholic opinion which will work consistently for the old medieval conditions of religious repression. Broad-minded religionists over the world must be on the alert to insist that there be a free field and no favors. Religious toleration has come to be a growing ideal in every section of the world. There must be no backward step.

A Counter Movement in Chinese Buddhism

WHEN the head of the Buddhist religion was driven out of India many centuries ago, he came to China and for a long time China was, so to speak, the capital of Buddhism. Translation of ancient Chinese texts has given us most of the knowledge that we possess with regard to Gautama. There followed the long centuries of decline in which Buddhist monasteries, like Christian monasteries, lost their zeal for learning, and were filled with avarice and evil deeds. With the coming of Christianity in its very best expression as personified in the Christian missionaries, the ancient faiths of China have felt a distinct challenge and they are not minded to surrender the field without a struggle. A reform movement of considerable magnitude has arisen within Mahayana Buddhism with the express purpose of resorting once more to the study of the ancient texts of the faith, and of establishing an order of devoted and spiritual monks and nuns. Every effort will be made to reconcile Buddhism with the incoming of these western ideas which are changing the whole intellectual map in China. It is found, however, that Buddhism has at least one insuperable difficulty in its way. Its essential principle is pessimistic. The elimination of desire means retirement from the world rather than a re-making of the world. Such a counsel of perfection of very necessity involves holy orders for the few, while the great mass are only partly influenced by the religious ideals. The Christianity of Jesus on the other hand is capable of being taken into the life of the whole community. It is not inconsistent with family life as is Buddhism, or with the practice of industry. If Buddhism is reformed until it is no longer pessimistic, it will no longer be Buddhism but another religion. Meanwhile with increasing knowledge of the essential texts of Buddhism Christian scholars are coming to a better understanding of the essential nature of that ancient faith. A Christian missionary has dared to say that were he not permitted to be a Christian, he would rather be a disciple of Mahayana Buddhism than of any other religion upon the face of the earth. Such intellectual sympathy as this will help Christian missionaries to give to the orient the essential thing that Christianity has to offer.

The Visit and Mission of Madame Yajima

ONE of the most interesting personalities coming from another country to America is a Japanese lady of more than ninety years, who is making a tour of the United States in the interest of better relations and understanding between the people of the two countries. Madame Yajima was converted to the Christian faith at the age of forty, and for fifty years she has been a prominent figure in the religious life of her country, and in all modern reforms. She has for many years been the president of the Japanese Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She has been active in the movement for woman's emancipation from her feudal position, and in the effort to secure equal suffrage. When the efforts of the militarists of both nations to stir up the feeling of antagonism became apparent, she threw herself with ardor into the campaign to instruct her fellow countrywomen regarding the common interests of Japan and the United States, and the need of cultivating sentiments of friendship on both sides. With this purpose in view she circulated a petition among the intelligent women of her land, addressed to the President of the United States, begging his influence in behalf of the limitation of armaments, and the strengthening of the friendly relations between the two countries. This petition, signed by more than ten thousand Japanese women, has been exhibited in many American cities to interested audiences, to whom Madame Yajima has spoken on the same theme; and last week it was presented to President Harding at the White House by this venerable messenger of peace. A profound impression has been created by Madame Yajima wherever she has gone. All people of good will are sure to follow her mission with deep interest, and earnest prayers for its success.

The Return of America

THE normal American is not embarrassed by the reflection that throughout its history his country has been known as a land of ideals. Even in the most pessimistic and cynical periods of its experience, there was a certain pride in all American hearts in the recognition of the fact that our country has been given the honored place of an enlightener of the nations, a pioneer in the vanguard of the world's progress. That for which the first founders of the republic have been venerated, whether they were the Pilgrims of Plymouth Rock or the Cavaliers of Jamestown, was the idealism with which they sought a new home in the western world, and projected their plans for a new sort of commonwealth.

They were men who, escaping from the limitations, the persecutions and the autocracy of the old world, were comforted by the conviction that in this new land all things were possible. There was room for expansion, there was freedom to try the great experiments of which they had dreamed, there was the inspiration of a fresh beginning, untrammelled by the traditions that had curbed and chafed them in the old home. It was not strange, therefore, that to all men of discernment in that age, the origins of the American republic seemed like a fresh beginning of world ideals.

And this has been the sentiment both of Americans and the peoples of other lands. In the high spirit of Washington and his compatriots the young democracy pushed out into its great career. To be sure in the review of the details of our history there has been much to regret. The sordid and selfish motives of small and upscrupulous leaders have at times obscured the brighter ideals of the fathers of the nation. But as a people we have learned to overlook the depressing facts of our past, and to fix attention upon the luminous tokens of our high destiny, the lofty and inspiring utterances of the moral leaders who have occupied the exalted places in our regard.

In most of our relations with our neighbors on this continent and across the ocean we have upheld the fine traditions of peace, democracy, educational enthusiasm, social justice, moral integrity, and reverence for religion. Even our wars, with perhaps the exception of the Mexican conflict, of which we are not proud, have been fought for the sake of our national ideals of liberty, democracy and good will, rather than for any form of national aggrandisement. We like to think of ourselves as friends of all the world, and interpreters of the highest in national life. We wish also to have the rest of the world think of us in these terms.

For such reasons it seems very hard for thoughtful Americans, and for men of vision in other lands, to account for the reaction that has characterized the past three years. Before the entrance of the United States into the war there was much searching of heart as to whether the nation would be able to give account of itself in the struggle for democracy then going on across the sea. Was not America too commercialized to be able to respond to a great world call? But though our response was not as prompt as some of our admirers desired, we came in good time with such unanimity as to turn the tide of battle, and prove to all men the reality of our idealism, without hope of indemnities or added territory.

Then came the long and tragic relapse. We appeared to forget all the promises we had made regarding the ending of war, the discarding of the old diplomacies of indirection, the recognition of the rights of the smaller nations, and the guarantees of justice to the oppressed of all the earth. Political animosity among our leaders silenced the voices of prophetic conviction. Divided sentiment in the nation, skillfully fostered by partisan bitterness and petulant disdain of the mood of international good will, brought on the lean and sterile years through which we have been passing. With the conviction expressed by practically every national leader of all parties that we were involved in a covenant of friendship and responsibility from which we could not well withdraw, we fell out with each other over phrases, and turned back from the task for which many of our noblest sons gave up their lives.

That America's reaction from the mission and opportunity created for her by her participation in the war has been a grievous and disillusioning shock to a host of friends and fellow workers in Europe, every day brings fresh proof. If our long hesitation in entering the war was the theme of endless sarcasm and condemnation, not less has our practical withdrawal from the still more important consequences of that war been the cause of astonishment and grief to the choicest spirits in the lands of the great alliance. The voices in which these sentiments are expressed are not often heard on this side of the sea, where our satisfied and complacent isolation has taken new and aggressive form. But Americans who journey overseas, and those who have correspondents among the Christian leaders of Europe, know the humbling facts as to what is thought of us because of this recreant course.

To be sure, some of this sentiment is justified by the cynicism of a part of the American press, that because of its vociferous character gets itself taken seriously as the interpreter of the only opinion prevailing. And when the nation is unfortunate enough to have men of ambassadorial rank who persist in disclaiming any idealism in America's motives in entering the war, and affirming that under no conditions, either by explicit action or by implication, will the United States ever enter into covenant relations with any of the powers of Europe, our brethren across the ocean may well be pardoned for losing some measure of their faith in us. One of the most noted of Christian journalists in Great Britain recently wrote to a friend in this country: "It gave some of us here sore heartache when it seemed as if the American people, having put their hand to the plough, deserted the plough in the middle of the field still strewn with the debris of the war." The president of one of the larger English religious bodies writes: "We who are lovers of the American nation and believers in its tremendous destiny as one of the greatest powers any age has known, have had our anxious moments this year."

A British political leader whose name is familiar to students of contemporary affairs uses these words: "We had looked in the old country for the United States to be with us until the complete re-establishment of peace, and the settling down of the nations combatting on both sides to the making together of a new and nobler world, purged of the perpetual nightmare of the shadow of war, and the rattling of the sabres of a sterilizing and paralyzing militarism. Your people, it seems, had serious doubts as to the policy of departing from its traditional disinterestedness in the concerns of the old world. It is not for us to question the right of the American people to take their own course. But we do feel that the attitude they took was a most serious misfortune to the old world." And an eminent Frenchman writes in a private communication: "If the United States does not accept their mission to the human race, the stars will drop from their flag."

But it is not from politicians and partisan newspapers that help may be expected in this critical hour, when the President, awake at last to the imperative demands of the time, and the call for America's leadership in the task of limiting armaments and promoting sentiments of peace, has summoned the representatives of the nations to sit in solemn conclave for the consideration of these problems. Much may be hoped from the men who have been chosen to represent our government. But if the matter is to be left to the hesitant and compromising debates of political leaders, the issue is hopeless. Unless the churches and the moral forces of this and the other nations take the lead and mold public opinion to such expression as shall influence action at the conference, the men accustomed to the give and take of diplomatic finesse and hesitance will simply mark time and, as a recent writer has affirmed, "the world will go from armament to armament until the next great war will carry civilization down with a crash."

America must strike the deciding blow in the world reconstruction as she did in the war, and this can only be done by the creation of an atmosphere of eager and prayerful solicitude on the part of Christian men and women throughout the nation. The moral leadership of America was never needed so much as today. Our people must not be impatient with the peoples of Europe in these days. The old age there is dying in agony. The better and nobler age is struggling in the pangs of a difficult birth. Many believe that we are now in one of those historic moments when a new era is about to begin, as at the time of the coming of our Lord, or at the time of the Reformation. From the present turmoil there is working out slowly but surely a new world. But this new world must be infused with the spirit of Christianity, and this can best be interpreted by the churches of America.

In the midst of the world war America, by her disinterestedness and generous assistance to the cause of democracy and world righteousness, exerted an almost incalculable influence. That influence has now been lost in large part through factional controversy and political short-sightedness. But a new chance is given the moral leaders of America in the present emergency. There is now an opportunity to speak with effectiveness through the American churches. An earnest and positive declaration of American Christian idealism would not only do much to bring about a real limitation of armaments in the conference at Washington, but also to bring America back into the moral life and leadership of the world.

The New Turn in the Railroad Conflict

RECOGNIZING that a state of war prevails in American industry, the recent "surrender" of the railroad unions will appear, as it passes into the clearer perspective of history, to be one of the most advantageous defeats which organized labor has suffered, and one of the costliest victories which stock-holding capital has ever won. There is increasing evidence that a better quality of brains is in control of labor than of capital. This was marked and keenly commented upon by a leading magazine editor several years ago as he watched the play and counter play of wits in Washington while the Adamson law was under consideration. Said he, "The labor leaders made circles around the magnates of capital."

We have manifestly not emerged from a state of war in industry. The public as an umpire, or government as the public's instrument for recording and impressing its will, does not shine. Rather both have been put "in a hole." The decision of the labor unions to call off the strike sounds like a surrender to the sovereign will of the public as voiced in its government, but the leadership of labor is far too sagacious to suppose that the government is capable of making good its responsibility. They are awaiting its inevitable failure under its present domination. Stock-holding capital has over-reached. It has plunged forward to a point where the full force of its blow was to fall upon the "enemy." The blow has been spent upon the vacant space where the "enemy" was supposed to be and was believed to be intent upon remaining. Doubtless the exhausted sponsors of stock-holding capital are now making a more or less careful reckoning of their gains. Probably second and third thoughts are not so satisfying as was the first flush of "victory."

What are these "gains"? First, the continued service of hundreds of thousands of employes, sullen in the sense of injustice, spiritless in their work, and of necessity more and more inefficient. Railroad management is shut up to the retention of this kind of labor while the public has been made alert to expect greatly increased efficiency in its railroad service. Failure will be more plainly than ever the fault of the management. To whimper and make excuse for this inevitable failure, by complaining that they got what they clamored for, will not, six months or a year hence, put the railroad managers in a very favorable light.

Second, the railroad managers have demanded and secured, in the full blaze of the most glaring publicity, concessions in wage scales—on the basis of what claims? That lower passenger and freight rates may be allowed! The public will be greatly pleased, and its memory of this service will be kept green by the progressively decreasing costs of living! But what thoughtful citizen expects the railroad management to make good this implied promise to the guileless public? The railroad managers must themselves be sweating in cold night-chills as they face the certainty that they will not and cannot fulfill these high popular hopes. The meager concessions which they can make here and there will not camouflage the situation for very long, nor over very large areas. In some sections both passenger and freight rates went up like a jack released from his box at once the threat of the strike was removed.

Third, the surest result of this "victory" is a whetting of the rapacity of stock-holding capital. The reduction in wage scales and the advance in freight and passenger rates has a common and total significance for the powers which finally control railroad policy, and that is to increase the dividends upon railroad stocks which have for two generations been notoriously and universally manipulated and watered, and then rewatered and manipulated again, until not the most acute and conscientious accountant could possibly put even an approximately just valuation upon them. The evil day for our railroad management has simply been deferred. Such Pyrrhic victories as this latest will only make the more overwhelming the final defeat of a policy which has already brought our railroad system to virtual bankruptcy, and which must ere long rout the whole evil scheme from the field. A railroad management which defends this system and serves the interests which dominate our railroad policy can only come to ignominy. To escape this inevitable result the best young brains are turning away from railroad administration, hopeless of ever making the blind and rapacious demands of stock-holding capital, which now domineers over railroad policy, square with enlightened public conscience in its conception of what may properly be expected of a great public service organization such as the carrier system of the country should be. It is not surprising, therefore, that our discerning magazine editor should find labor leaders, sagacious and inspired with the consciousness of a human cause, "making circles" around opponents who must have either sold out to interests bereft of human sensibilities or are distraught by the revolt of their own consciences against the claims and aims which they are employed to support.

Here is where the great thoughtless, professedly Christian public comes in. We ought to be guileful enough at least to understand that the alleged triumph of the public interests in this "surrender" of organized labor is cheap, and leads straight on to nowhere. This is an ignoble strife which we have been witnessing. We are not saved by the issue. We may not hail the discomfiture of the evil and the triumph of the good. This contest, in just the degree it is intensified or is drawn out through time, will defeat both parties to it, and bring to ruin the real interests of us all. We are puttering, and evading fundamental moral and economic issues. We are either doing nothing at all, letting things slide in the hope that by chance they will slide uphill into the kingdom of heaven, or, at best, we are seeking to patch up an outworn system of conducting one of the most important departments of our social order. Here is involved not finally a question of technique, of administration, of efficient organization, but as clear-cut a moral issue as the ethical and social forces of a civilization have to encounter. We cannot continue to allow stock-holding capital to domineer over this or any other branch of our social scheme, and even pretend to call it Christian. The discussion of this iniquity should not longer be permitted merely to entertain economists and academicians in their cloisters. Nor should our ethical leadership be confined to the periodic attack of ignorant pulpiteers upon the "malefactors of great wealth," who are safely left unnamed or are impersonated in two or three of the most majestic of our financial overlords. This program has already frustrated itself. These "malefactors" on closer acquaintance are found to be among the choicest of our church membership, not only zealous in the formal observance of the letter of church practice but often not less conspicuously displaying those "spiritual" graces by which our homiletics lay such great store. We have manifestly done them individually a great injustice by these indiscriminate attacks, and have advanced the cause of social righteousness no whit.

Nor will ferocious onslaughts upon American labor, or upon the accepted leadership of American labor, carry us any further. Wage scales must go up. We force them down at the peril of our whole civilization. Not alone for the railroad management has this Pyrrhic victory spelled out a new syllable in the final disaster, but it will recoil upon us. Our government cannot make good its new responsibilities. It cannot, it certainly will not administer even-handed justice. We have not put it in the way of doing so. The stockholder must be compelled to let go of our vital industries. His bread and meat are profits and the goal of his every hope is dividends, and then more and larger dividends. Capital is entitled to its just compensation as capital. When industries need capital they should pay the just price. But to turn our industries over to the stockholder, and give him full and final authority to determine their policies, is to invite sure disaster, and to frustrate every hope of a civilization ordered by the ideals of the Christian religion. To preach a gospel of unselfishness in the face of officially organized selfishness is an idle and futile toying with words. This question is becoming clear enough to be taken out of the hands of juggling technicians. It is a clean-cut moral issue. Are stockholders to be permitted to control the public service? Shall idlers—and every stock-holder is an idler, for the purposes of the enterprise in which he is only a stock-holder—shall idlers be permitted to domineer over the workers in the industries of a Christian civilization? We certainly ought to be able to think far enough into our confused economic problem to answer that question intelligently and carry our Christian conscience with us to that goal.

The Switch Engine

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I SOMETIMES travel, and I spend many nights subject to the tender mercies such as they be of the Pullman Company. And I sometimes wake in the night when the train hath reached a junction. And it happeneth often that a Switch Engine cometh up behind, and catcheth hold of two or three cars, and runneth away with them as though it were an Automobile Bandit. And it puffeth and it snorteth and it goeth fast, but it goeth not far. For presently it runneth upon a side-track and leaveth a sleeper. And then it runneth upon a side-track and picketh up a sleeper. And sometimes it cutteth out a Chair-car, or taketh on a Diner. And these operations doth it perform with Commendable Industry, and no Undue Modesty.

For it saith as it snorteth about:

It is up to me to make up this train in Twenty Minutes, and behold it ran in five minutes late, and the old man will be red in the face if he pull not out on time; therefore I must get busy, and cut out two cars and set in three, and what happeneth unto the train after that belongeth not unto me, and I should worry.

Now this process fooleth the inexperienced Traveler. For he heareth the snorting, and feeleth the rapid motion, and he saith, Behold, now are we Going Some. And just then his car bumpeth up against the Cedar Rapids sleeper, and driveth sleep from his eyes and slumber from his eyelids. But this process fooleth me not. When the train stoppeth in the night, and we start up suddenly and with Rapid Motion, and with much snorting of the Engine, then know I that we are running down into the Yards with two or three cars, to pick up a sleeper from Oshkosh, or to leave one for Oconomowoc. And I prepare for the Bump.

Now there be good men who come to me to Promote good causes. And there be some who hook onto every new movement that pulleth into the Union Depot, and haul it up and down the main line and the adjacent sidings, and with much puffing announce the near arrival of the Millennium. And these be Useful Men. I know not how without them we should make up our trains of organization and achievement. But I am not wholly fooled by the whoop and hurrah, neither do I altogether deceive myself with the Initial Speed of these divers and sundry enterprises. I know that as yet we are not out of the Yards, and that when we really get going, and to pulling freight, it will be with a more solemn and sedate evidence of progress than is advertised when we are only picking up the sleeper from Kalamazoo.

For the Switch Engine, though it be a worthy and industrious and commendable Factor in Human Progress, is not that which furnisheth the sustained Power for the Long Grade and the Steady Pull.

Wherefore when a good cause is starting, I applaud the speed with which we get under way, and I rejoice in the Bump of the Terre Haute accession and the jolt of the arrival of the contingent from Kokomo, but I wait for the steadier and slower pull that doth certify that we are out on the Main Line, and actually moving toward our Destination.

The Optimism of Faith

ABOVE the raucous cries
Of world-old wrong,
Faith hears, in accents deep,
Truth's battle song.

Athwart the fearful gloom
Of sin's black night,
Faith sees, slow-conquering,
Love's kindly light.

God Rules the Seas!

A THOUSAND dreadnoughts proudly flaunt
Their flags before the breeze;
A million seamen ride the waves,
But God rules the seas.

Before a king had donned a crown,
Or queen had lolled at ease,
The floods beat high against the sky,
And God ruled the seas.

Before a lord had claimed the tide
To curb as he might please,
The waters of the earth flowed wide,
And God ruled the seas.

The fountains of the deep are His,
And His the favoring breeze;
His are the laws of ebb and flow,
For God rules the seas.

God's Victors

GOD'S battles are forever won,
Though oft His warriors bite the dust;
Triumphant in their death they lie,
Who fall in warfare just.

The final issue standeth sure,
When right and wrong in conflict meet;
Who fight for right may be laid low,
But right knows no defeat.

Eternal Life and Survival*

By Dean W. R. Inge

ETERNAL life, as I hope to show, is a quality of ultimate reality. Survival is a quantitative measure of duration. The eternal life belongs to the conception of reality as a kingdom of values. Survival conceives human existence as a page of history. The relation between them raises the question of the nature and reality of time, the most difficult and perhaps the most important of all philosophical problems. We are not dealing with a mere intellectual puzzle but with a problem which is being forced upon all Christian bodies and upon every thoughtful mind. If we compare the religious and homiletic literature of the present day with that of earlier generations nothing will strike us more forcibly than the secularization of the Christian hope which marks the utterance of all who wish to enlist the sympathies of the younger generation. The old gaudily colored pictures of bliss and torment have passed away. Our contemporaries desire a religion without a hell, and some even seem to prefer a religion without a heaven. References to the future life are perfunctory, and are chiefly used in a rather gingerly manner, in consoling mourners and fortifying those about to die. The working-class audience in particular listens with marked impatience to addresses upon human immortality. The workingman is apt to think that the preacher is trying to put him off with checks drawn upon the bank of heaven, the solvency of which he greatly doubts, in order to persuade him not to claim what he conceives to be his rights here and now. Our revolutionists think that heaven and hell are made to discharge the function of bolstering up social injustice.

A CHRIST FOR THIS LIFE ONLY

I am not speaking of the irreligious, who at all times have derided or neglected the hopes and fears of the Christian; nor of the devout who have not been much affected by modern changes, but of the large body of well-intentioned people who call themselves Christians and attend, at least sometimes, places of worship. These people as a class have hopes in Christ, but in this life only. Christianity for them is, or ought to be, mainly an instrument of social reform. A new apocalypticism has taken the place of the blessed hope of everlasting life. It has driven it out and almost killed it. Now in part this is an illusion which will cure itself. Attempts have been made to realize the millennium in Russia, and the result has been, and is, such an inferno as the world has never seen before. At home also there has been a great deal of disillusionment. The new apocalypticism has received a severe blow.

But let no one suppose we shall go back to the popular teaching about future life which satisfied our grandparents. There must and ought to be great changes, for these traditional notions have been rejected very largely because they are not good enough to be true. Belief in a future life is sometimes a religious belief, but by no means always. If I believe in a future life because I enjoy my existence here and want to perpetuate it beyond my earthly span, that has nothing to do with religion. If I desire a future life because I am miserable here and think I have a claim to compensation, that is not religion. If I desire a future life because I have made certain investments in good works on which I hope to make a handsome profit—in the words of the hymn:

Whatever, Lord, I lend to Thee,
Repaid a thousandfold will be.
Then gladly will I lend to Thee,
Who gavest all—

—that has no more to do with religion than if I invested my money on the faith of one of the very similarly worded circulars which I find on my breakfast table.

ABSOLUTE VALUES

The main thesis of this paper is that true faith is belief in the reality of absolute values. By this I mean that there are some things which refuse to be regarded as means toward anything outside themselves, some ideals which we are compelled to regard as attributes of God himself, as parts of his nature and character. These values are not ideals only in the sense that they are not facts, or that they will have their existence only in the future. They are facts here and now; or rather, they are facts always and everywhere. They are the warp and the woof on which the texture of reality is woven, and it is in this kingdom of absolute values that we must look for and find our immortality. It is because we know what truth, beauty and goodness mean that we have our part in the eternal life of God whose revealed attributes these are; and I repeat that these values stand in their own right and cannot be made means to anything else.

This has been felt at all times by the best men and women. The last of the great Greek philosophers says severely: "If a man seeks anything in the good life apart from itself it is not the good life that he is seeking," and a Christian saint expressed the wish that heaven and hell were blotted out that she might love God for himself only. Thus there is a noble element in the rejection of the old doctrines of reward and punishment. It is felt that the appropriate reward of a life of disinterested service and self-sacrifice is not a residence in a city with streets of gold and gates of pearl, and that the appropriate punishment of those that have been hard-hearted, hypocritical and worldly is not to be roasted in an oven. If these rewards and punishments were known, as orthodoxy declares them, to be certain, they would vulgarize virtue and make disinterestedness impossible.

Popular teaching has invested God with our own mercenariness and vindictiveness. In its anxiety to make its sanctions impressive it has sought to make up for the uncertainty and the deferred date of its inducements by painting them in the crudest possible colors, and has so outraged our sense of decency and justice. The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot be recognized in a God who could so reward and so punish. And there is nothing in our experience of the present life to suggest that in the second volume of God's book the divine government will be of a totally different kind from that which we know here. Within our experience the reward of good living is not to make a fortune but to become a good man, and the punishment of habitual sin is to become a bad man. Sow an action and reap a habit; sow a habit and reap a character; sow a character and reap a destiny. This seems to us to be just, but the popular eschatology makes the Creator an oriental sultan who prides himself on the crude lavishness of his rewards and the implacable ferocity of his punishments. We cannot suppose that the civilized world will ever go back to these beliefs. They are, as I have said, not good enough to be true.

HELL NOT BENEATH THE GROUND

Again, the advance of science has made the old eschatological framework unutterable. Curiously enough, it was not Darwin, or any other nineteenth century scientist who struck the blow, but Galileo in the time of the renaissance. If the earth is a planet revolving round the sun, and if the solar system is only a speck in infinite space, the old geographical heaven and hell must be abandoned. Hell is not beneath the ground. Volcanic eruptions are not caused, as the Schoolmen suggested, by overcrowding in the infernal regions, and heaven is not a place which could be reached by an aeroplane if we knew the way. There is no religious topography. There is no particular place where God lives. This has, of course, been admitted by all Christian philosophers for ages, long before Galileo. Theologians declared, without being accused of heresy, that God has his center everywhere and his circumference nowhere, so that we cannot get nearer heaven by altering our position in space. Educated Christians, even in the middle ages, were not committed to the child's picture-book theology, which is often supposed to be the only accredited doctrine of the Christian religion, but it is notorious that even at the present day most people still believe that Christianity involves the existence of a local geographical heaven and hell.

Here, then, we have a plain case in which traditional teaching is flatly contradictory to the facts of science which have been known for centuries, and also ethically revolting. Can we be surprised that it has lost all power to influence conduct or to command real credence? The main reason perhaps why so little has been done to relieve Christianity of this burden is that certain other beliefs are bound up with it. For instance, if heaven is not a place what shall we do with our bodies in heaven, and what reason is there any longer to believe in a general resurrection or in the physical resurrection and ascension of Christ? There are no doubt many who would be glad to be relieved of these miracles. But many more would feel that the foundations of their belief were being shaken if the physical resurrection was impugned. The majority of men and women are in a sense materialists. They live in a world of space and time and the spaceless and timeless is for them the unreal or non-existent. Materialistic dogmatism is the clerical form of dogmatic materialism. The theology of the average bigot is of amazing crudity, but he has never thought it out. His theology, such as it is, is the carrier of his value. It is nothing to him that thought and knowledge have left behind forms of expression which were once natural enough. He thinks that his values are being attacked and resists furiously.

CARNAL AND SPIRITUAL KNOWLEDGE

Thus it is very difficult to get rid of irrational and obsolete forms of belief, and especially in eschatology where all is, and must be, symbolic. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." It is true that St. Paul goes on to say that God hath revealed them to us by his spirit, but the spirit does not reveal phenomenal facts but spiritual values, the reality of which it assures to us. St. Paul makes a clear distinction between the knowledge which is open to the carnal mind and that which comes through the spirit. "The carnal mind knoweth not the things of the spirit of God." It cannot know them because they are spiritually discerned. In this life, and in so far as we are earthly beings, we are unable to form any clear conception of the spiritual world. Any clear picture that we form must be partially untrue precisely because it is intelligible to the carnal mind. A local heaven and hell, with graphic joys and torture, is eminently intelligible to the carnal mind; it is eminently unsatisfactory to the spiritual man even before he has got very far in the knowledge of God and Christ which St. John says is eternal life. And observe how closely St. Paul connects his warning of the inadequacy of our knowledge with his glorious hymn to the greatest of the Christian values: "Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity." It is these moral and spiritual values which lift us out of the limitations of carnal knowledge. These are the things which abide, which are immortal, while prophecies, tongues, knowledge, dogmas and theologies have their day and pass. But the mass of believers still demand a sign and still desire to interpret their faith materialistically. They desire to do it and yet they cannot, because the new knowledge which is now common property cries out against it, and their moral sense also protests; hence the dilemma in which the churches are placed.

BELIEF INFECTED WITH INSINCERITY

Nevertheless, we have no real choice. We cannot uphold as part of our faith beliefs about the external world which we know to be false. To do this is to infect the whole body of our beliefs with insincerity. We acquiesce too easily in the conflict between religion and science. There ought to be no such conflict. The conflict of religion is not with science but with the materialistic philosophy built upon science: a philosophy which takes an abstract field of inquiry for the whole of reality, and ignores those spiritual values which are just as much part of our knowledge and experience as the purely quantitative aspects of reality with which the natural sciences are concerned. From this false philosophy we can only be rescued by a truer philosophy which endeavors to do justice to values as well as to what we call facts. We should try to think out these problems, difficult as they are, for without this philosophy we shall not be able to vindicate our faith in eternal life against those who, in the name of science, would rob us of it.

I should like to say something of the manner in which some earlier religions dealt with the ideas of eternal life and of survival in time, for the problem is a very old one. The speculation of the Brahmins, it has been said, finds being in all becoming. The speculation of the Buddhist finds in all apparent being nothing but becoming. There are no persons in this creed, and its idea of salvation involves, though not strictly annihilation, yet the extinction of will and knowledge and feeling, the constituents of personal conscious life. Hard as it may be for us to understand it, the escape from the endless wheel of time and change seems to the Buddhist the ideal of blessedness. The European says, with Tennyson: Give me the wages of going on, and not to die. The Asiatic says: Give me deliverance from the flux of daily living and daily dying; give me a final rest in the arms of the eternal. Brahminism is theistic; its god is personal, all-knowing and all-powerful. The creation is, as it were, his body, but his soul is untroubled by the whirl of happenings in time. Human souls live in him and are inspired by him. Salvation consists in the knowledge of God which enables us to live the divine life of detachment from the vain shadows of earth.

THE HEBREW IDEA

To turn to Judaism, the most remarkable thing about Jewish religion is the small part which ideas of the future life played in it. The Hebrews, like other primitive nations, must have had their superstitions, their animism, necromancy, and so forth, but this is the important thing—their later beliefs about eternal life did not apparently grow out of these crude notions but were independent of them. The prophets, with all their exalted ethical, social and religious teaching, turned their thoughts mainly to God and not to man, and yet to this life not to the next. The Jewish belief in immortality was not developed out of barbaric religion; it was the late-born child of far other speculations. From the beginning to the end of the Old Testament the question is asked with poignant earnestness, "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" To establish a theodicy which should justify the ways of God to man without contradicting experience was the main problem of Hebrew religion. It was the long pondering over this problem, it was the persistent determination to surrender neither the justice of God nor the ethical claims of man, which at last led the Jews to their belief in human immortality.

In Greece we find the primitive belief in survival and the mystical doctrine of the union of the human spirit with the divine both together. More than any other nation, the Greeks regarded exemption from the doom of death as the differentia of divinity. This made a qualitative difference in human and divine life which could not be overstepped, but the mystical sects believed that in ecstatic states the soul was rapt out of temporal existence and enjoyed for a space the timeless and deathless existence of the gods. A mystic doctrine was that the soul is only a pilgrim and a sojourner upon the earth, being in truth a divine being lapsed from its first estate. For its sins it is condemned to pass through the sorrowful weary wheel of successive births and deaths until it attains deliverance and becomes a god instead of a mortal. The philosophers quite early distinguished eternity from endless duration. "True being," says Parmenides, "never was and never will be, since it is altogether present in the eternal now." Plato in a famous passage calls time "the moving image of eternity." Its perpetuity is a copy of the real eternity of the divine life in which there is no succession but unchanging perfection. Philo, the Hellenizing Jew, who was a contemporary of Christ, follows Plato in saying that God is withdrawn from both ends of time, for his life is not time but eternity, the archetype and the pattern of time, and in eternity, he says, there is no past or future, but only present.

THE NEW TESTAMENT VIEW

Now let us consider the teaching of the New Testament about eternal life and survival. We know that Christ preached to simple-minded Jewish peasants, men indeed who had had a good education but who were quite untouched by the religious philosophy which we find in Philo. There is no trace of Greek ideas in the synoptic gospels. The great difficulty for us in considering the teaching of Christ about eternal life is the hotly controversial question whether he shared the apocalyptic dreams of some of his contemporaries. Personally, I think he used the traditional prophetic language about the Day of the Lord, but that like John the Baptist he revived the older prophetic tradition, and did not attach himself to the recent apocalyptists. No doubt there are apocalyptic passages in the synoptics, and what is more important the first two generations of Christians believed that the presence, the parousia, of the Messiah, was imminent. But the expectation of a sudden, dramatic, and above all violent upsetting of all human institutions by miracle, seems quite contrary to the temper of our Lord's mind. It is more to our present purpose to remind ourselves that Christ dwells very little on the future estate except in the parables of the sheep and goats, and Dives and Lazarus; that these parables do not profess to be descriptions of actual events, past, present or future, and that they reproduce the current notions which have no supernatural authority. His own one argument for immortality is, God is not the God of the dead but of the living, for we all live unto him. This as an argument not for resurrection or survival but for eternal life. Because he lives we shall live also.

ZION AND GREECE

Now in St. Paul Christianity makes its momentous choice, it enters into the heritage of Greco-Roman civilization and becomes a religion for Europeans. From that time to this the continuity of Christianity with classical antiquity has been far closer than with the civilization and religion of the Hebrews. The original gospel of Christ rises above the difference between Thy sons, O Zion, and Thy sons, O Greece. All through the Pauline epistles we can trace the receding influence of messianic Judaism, with its doctrine of a reign of the saints on earth, and the growing influence of the Greek idea of eternal life as a higher mode of existence, differing qualitatively from earthly life in time and accessible here and now to the spiritual. The kingdom of God is seldom mentioned. The Son of Man disappears, the dominant thought is the contrast of life according to the flesh and life according to the spirit, while between the two comes the psychic life having affinities with both, but different from spirit in being individual and purely human, while the life of the spirit is in a sense super-individual, one in all persons, and divine. This psychology, with its tripartite classification of the personality, is distinctly Greek, not Jewish, and it has remained the cornerstone of Christian philosophy which, in its doctrine of the spirit, practically identified with the glorified and yet ever-present Christ, has a strongly mystical tendency.

Life in the spirit, eternal life, is the present possession of the spiritual man. But while we are in the body we have only an earnest, as St. Paul said, of the life that shall be. At death we shall change. This mortal shall put on immortality, a kind of clothing of the soul. The soul now becomes spirit, conformable to the conditions of purely spiritual existence. There is here no doubt an attempt to combine Greek and Jewish conceptions which a strict philosophy might find inconsistent. Salvation is elevation to a higher state of being, exalted above time. Apocalypticism is not specifically abandoned or even consciously repudiated. But for the religious consciousness I feel myself that the futurity of salvation cannot be discredited, even when we lay most stress on eternal life as opposed to survival. We must remember what even philosophers of the school of Plato sometimes forgot, that the mere substitution of simultaneity for succession does not effect the desired change from a quantitative to a qualitative conception of eternal life or immortality, and that nothing is gained by getting rid of the idea of flux merely to substitute for that the idea of immobility.

ETERNITY AND TIME

The subject is very difficult. We are conscious of contaminating our thoughts of eternity with ideas which belong only to time. But time has its values, those which belong to the activities of the will, and if we attempt to banish all ideas of futurity and succession from our conceptions of eternity, we shall be in great danger of losing those values which are of the highest importance to us while we are here on our probation. At any rate, Christian eschatology has remained very much where St. Paul left it.

The Johannine writings may be called an inspired interpretation of the person and significance of Christ addressed to the third generation of Christians. They are the best commentary on St. Paul's epistle, which they presuppose. They carry the theology of St. Paul to its logical conclusion. The Pauline churches needed a Gospel, partly because they were threatened with agnostic theosophy which encouraged mysticism without morality, and virtually cut Christianity loose from the historical ministry of Christ, and partly also because the existing gospels taught an apotheosis Christology, whereas the Pauline churches demanded an incarnation Christology. The phrase "eternal life" which in the Gospel according to St. John, takes the place of the synoptic "kingdom of God," occurs seventeen times in the Gospel and six times in the first Epistle. Nowhere is there any emphasis on the word "eternal." Life, in the Johannine sense, is necessarily eternal. We must not then neglect the passages where life is used without the adjective. They will throw light on eternal life as conceived by the evangelist. Christ, in the synoptics, frequently used "life" in the religious sense: "It is better to enter into life"—"Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life"—are significant of our Lord's use of the word. Our translators have not dared to render, "He that wishes to save his soul," as it ought to be, "shall lose it." They have thus weakened one of the great texts in the Gospels which means a real surrender of the ego, not a mere willingness to face death.

JOHN AND PAUL

There is not really very much change from this in St. John, or at any rate in St. John as compared with St. Paul. As compared with the synoptics, we do find the transfer of the emphasis away from the expected judgment of the apocalyptic type at the end of the world back to judgment already executed in principle by the coming of Jesus and the spirit. It necessitates a complete recast of the traditional teaching. And hence a spiritual gospel to teach the last things from a new point of view was needed just as urgently as one to teach the first things from the viewpoint of Christ's pre-existence as the creative and redemptive wisdom of God. In St. John life as a present possession is strongly emphasized, and the whole idea of a reign of the saints on earth has disappeared. In the Lazarus story Jesus corrects Martha's words "I know that he shall rise again at the resurrection of the last day" by replying: "I am the resurrection and the life."

Bishop Westcott says that in spiritual things we must guard against all conclusions which rest upon the notion of succession and duration. Eternal life is not an endless succession of being in time, but being of which time is not a measure. We have no powers to grasp the idea except through forms and images of sense, but we must not transfer them as realities to another order. It is plain that all the stage scenery of apotheosis is virtually discarded in the fourth Gospel. It is quite possible that when the evangelist makes Christ say to Mary Magdalene, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father," and then tells Thomas to touch him, he means the ascension to have taken place between the two speeches. Some critics have held that view. In any case, the bodily ascension is outside the real thought of the evangelist. To sum up, in this gospel, as Von Hugel says, the Way, the Truth, and the Life are an ascending scale of values, and "I am the resurrection and the life" is the inner meaning of the raising of Lazarus, the last of the seven great miracle symbols of the gospel of eternal life.

I have not time to trace the influence of the Johannine conception of eternal life in later theology. I would just like to quote to you two or three sentences from Augustine: "Thou, O God, predest all past times by the height of thy ever-present eternity, and thou exceedest all future times, since they are future and when they have come will be past. Thy years neither come nor go, but these years of ours both come and go that so they may all come. All thy years abide together because they abide, but our years will only be when they have ceased to be. Thy years are but one day, and this thy day is not every day but today. This thy today is eternal." And again: "True eternity is present where there is nothing of time." And again, of the moment of vision: "If that our touch of the eternal wisdom, which abideth above all things, were to be continued so that eternal life would be like that moment of intelligence, would not that be the meaning of the words 'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'?" As Eckhardt says: "Temporal becoming ends with eternal unbecoming. Eternal becoming has neither beginning nor end."

Eternal life then, you will see, to these thinkers, is the atmosphere which we breathe when we are above our normal selves. We surround ourselves with the world after our own likeness. We are that which we love. As Spinoza said: "The things that are for the most part considered among men as the highest good are reducible to three: riches, honor, sensual pleasure. By these the man is distracted so that he can think of no other good. Happiness or unhappiness resides alone in the quality of the object which we love. Envy, fear and hate occur in the love of perishable things, but the love of what is eternal and infinite feeds the soul with joy alone."

A REBOUND AGAINST MATERIALISM

In these thoughts we breathe a more rarified and far more bracing air than in the picture-book theology of popular religion, and as for the pitiful fancies of our modern necromancers it seems a shame even to speak of them in such a connection. In them we see in part the rebound against the tyranny of nineteenth century materialism, an assertion, however misguided, of the right of the will and affections to make themselves heard in any discussion of the ultimate values; in part the pathetic longing of the bereaved to realize the continued existence of those whom they have loved and lost; in part also, a revolt against a secularized religion which has practically confined our hopes in Christ to this life. The remedy is to offer a more worthy conception of human immortality. The right to speak about the eternal values, the right even to believe in them, must be earned by strict self-discipline. "If anyone is willing to do his will he shall know of the doctrine." "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." In proportion as we acclimatize ourselves to the pure and fine air of the spiritual world the difficulties and puzzles of popular eschatology fade away into comparative insignificance. We no longer pin our hopes on continued existence in time, which is no real part of the Christian hope. I do not wish to deny dogmatically that there may, in Browning's words, "be other tasks in other worlds, God willing," though it is difficult perhaps to see how a reincarnation under different conditions can be identified as a new probation for my soul. Man will continue to speculate about rebirth, but we know nothing one way or the other, and the question has not much to do with eternal life.

PERSISTING PERSONALITY

I do not think the question whether our personality will be preserved in existence will trouble us much when we are living as spiritual persons. Nothing that really is can ever perish. All values are preserved and safe for ever. Therefore we may be sure that whatever in our personal lives has a value in God's sight will be always present to him and preserved by him as living fact. What constituents of the amalgam which the law recognizes as our individuality will be thought worth preserving I do not pretend to know; what I do see clearly is that all our higher interests, all that belongs to the world of spirit, are super-individual, as love is super-individual. They lift us clean out of ourselves into a sphere where time does not hurl its own products into nothingness, and where beings are separated from each other not by space but only by difference of nature. The dread possibility is always before us that we may so attach ourselves to the impermanent and the unreal that we may lose our part and lot in that eternal and blessed world.

That is the fate which popular theology has symbolized as hell, and though we no longer believe that the body will be resuscitated in order to endure never-ending physical torture in a subterranean dungeon, we must never delude ourselves into thinking that we are in no danger of a fate which to an immortal spirit meant to live for ever in the presence of God is at least equally dreadful, that of permanent, self-chosen exclusion from the knowledge of God and the society of blessed spirits. I have no sympathy with the popular ridicule of hell. Remember the words of Christ: "Fear not them that kill the body and after that have no more that they can do. But I would forewarn you whom you shall fear. Fear him who after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell. Yea, I say unto you fear." And also the warning in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear, for our God is a consuming fire."

DEAN W. R. INGE, of St. Paul's, London, is probably the most influential voice in British churchmanship.

JOHN RALPH VORIS, well known American church leader of interdenominational activities, just returned from a visit to Russia and Asia Minor as a member of a commission of five representing Near East Relief.

The Russia I Saw

By John Ralph Voris

AFTER my experience in Russia the impression that first crowds all others into the background centers in America. I look with amazement upon the ignorance of Americans in general with respect to Russia. We are shadowy in regard to her people, her customs, institutions, ideals and history. Such is not the case with our attitude toward historical England, France, Germany, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Switzerland, or Poland, or, thanks to missionaries, toward China, Japan, India or Armenia. But of Russia we know little. Everyone of course realizes vaguely that the older Tsarist regimes crushed the peasants and sent anarchists to Siberia. Everyone knows Tolstoi—although my Jewish cabin-mate on the one-class boat on which I returned from France, an American citizen of unusual intelligence in many fields, having just read with delight the "Resurrection," wanted to know "where that German, Tolstoi, was born." A few have read Doestoevsky and Gorky, and a few recognize the contribution of Russian music and the ballet to the world of art.

OUR MUSTY KNOWLEDGE

But most of us in our Kiplingese days thought mistily of a great land which was really a bear that walked like a man of which we were to "Beware."

This is the case with the country in the past. Our lack of comprehension of the present situation in Russia, though more reasonable, is equally great. We have had two pictures of the nation as it is supposed to be today. One is an idealistic, overdrawn, Utopia, depicted by those who see in the Russian communistic attempt the goal of their dreams. These people suffer humiliation over the trend toward moderation today. To them the Russian experiment has a halo about it. They not only hope it will wend its revolutionary way toward 100 per cent communism there, but they see in it the hope for America and the world. Criticise any phase of the experiment and they impale you on the fork of capitalistic reaction. They represent an extreme neurotic type who in art are the futurists, in poetry the "imagists," and in economics the parlor bolsheviks and revolutionary workers. They are not numerous in America, and their presence is really very good for our souls, causing a sane and wholesome reaction on the part of most people, but they have too largely been the self-appointed mouthpieces of the Russia of today, and, unfortunately, for the most part, her only interpreters. Russia has been judged and condemned for her advocates.

AN OVERDRAWN UTOPIA

On the other hand we had the wild wave of fear-crazed propaganda against the present Russia, a mild insanity which has very largely run its course, but leaves in its wake utter indifference instead of vital curiosity and intelligent interest. The newspapers have been the public expression of this curious phenomenon with respect to Russia, but they have not been so much the cause as the result, I surmise. Whether cause or result they have not given us even that small part of true news which sifted its way out from Russia. Distorted headlines capping biased news have until recently consistently "confirmed" the news of the downfall of the Soviet regime, and the victories, consecutively, of the counter-revolutionary armies, under Kolshak, Wrangel and Deneikin. They have told us of the orgy of bloodshedding. They have pictured the luxury and ease in which the weaklings who control the government are wallowing.

THE PARIS BIAS

Most of this news had its origin, or at least its bias in Paris or Constantinople, both of which are steeped in anti-bolshevistic atmosphere. It is perfectly natural that such should be the case on account of the influx of refugees who stir the sympathy and imagination, whether they are the starving, shabby, frail remnants of former proud intelligentsia, so many of whom I saw in Constantinople and in Tiflis, or the luxury-loving ease-seeking few who have saved enough from the wreckage to live with something like their former grandeur. A Russian woman on our ship told me that Paris has three Russian papers, all anti-government. The subsidy for these comes from somewhere. The day I left Paris there was a column article in the morning Herald proclaiming a ball given the night before in behalf of the poorer Russian refugees, in Paris, not in the Volga, and it described the rich costumes of the Russian leaders of the ball. This is, of course, not the whole story of these Constantinople and Paris Russians, but it is part of it. The Kenneth Roberts story in the Saturday Post for July 16 was a classic which should be read by all who are interested in the Russian refugee situation in Constantinople. I purchased the Post for 40 cents there in "Constant," and reveled in that picture which so well described what I saw all about me.

FILTERED NEWS

Here is an interesting sidelight on this point. I read the New York Times with a painstaking, almost devotional attitude. In its news columns it is ordinarily apparently fair. But I felt last winter its Russian news was always, up to the late spring, one-sided and distorted, or prejudiced. Mr. Walter Duranty, a brilliant young English writer, is the foreign correspondent of the Times, whose name was most familiar in the Russian dispatches, and whose cabled articles, published on the front page, have recently stirred the country. Duranty was with the small group of correspondents whose car was attached to the same train that took our car to Samara, on the Volga. I had an opportunity to talk at length with him not only on the railroad journey, but in the automobile on our way to a typical famine center, and at the village where we all had our most vivid local impressions, and the scene of Duranty's first famous cablegram to the Times.

I told Duranty my feeling about the unfairness of the Times. He said, in substance, that he himself had been partly responsible for it. He had his news filtered to him in Europe and in turn he had been prejudiced against the soviet regime. He was at that time writing mostly from Paris. It was before any reporters were permitted in Russia. But, he informed me, the Times went further and played up the anti-Bolshevist side in headlines. At the time of our conversation he had been in the country but a few days. Even then, however, he had already begun to suspect that he was at least partly wrong. As I read his dispatches now, I feel that he is trying to be fair to the situation, and I want to say that the Times, in giving Duranty's news stories such a conspicuous place, at a time when the American people are interested in other things nearer home is really playing very square.

Other papers are beginning to take a different attitude. The Baltimore News of the day on which I redraft this first paper, has an extended editorial based on the report of our commission. It favors a more friendly attitude toward the Russian situation.

Another example from memory and I am done with this. The Paris edition of the New York Herald on the morning I left France had a story with the display heading, "Soviet Government Impedes American Relief." Interested as a matter of course I eagerly read it, for I have not been sure of the permanent attitude of the soviet government. But the article was a dud. Most of it was given to the story, a month old then, of the arrest and imprisonment of the members of the voluntary Russian relief committee. The arrest was on August 28, in the late afternoon, as I happened to know, for I barely missed being present. The Paris Herald surely had this item by wire, promptly. Yet it reported the fact under the scare heading on September 25. I am not discussing here the justice or injustice of the arrest of the Russian committee. I am simply saying that it had nothing whatever to do with the American relief workers. In fact, the representatives of the American relief arrived only late that afternoon. The headline misinterpreted the facts. Tacked on to the article was a paragraph to the effect that Mr. Walter Brown of the A.R.A. was about to come from Riga to Paris, or London—I have forgotten which—to meet with Red Cross officials. But there was nothing whatever to indicate any disposition on the part of the Russian government to hinder American relief. I should add that the New York editions of the Herald have been, like the Times, fair to the famine news. When we were in Constantinople there were constant rumors proclaiming the approaching fall of the present Russian regime.

RUSSIA IS NOT AMERICA

I have dealt with this at some length, with personal illustrations, in order to make my point clear that America has not sincerely tried to understand Russia. We must deliberately try to face the whole situation afresh, with prejudices put aside, if we are going to be able to comprehend the movement of history as the truth is going to be disclosed to us during the months to come.

There is another element with respect to which I am not equipped even superficially to deal at the present time, although I have read Russian literature diligently this summer during the long days on the train. That is the fact that we cannot understand the present government in Russia without taking her background of history, temperament and ideals into consideration. One can no more do it than one can jump into trigonometry without arithmetic and algebra. I wish I might put this with such emphasis that it will not be forgotten. The present form of government is possible because of what Russia is and has been, and not because it is in itself either right or wrong. It is not America that is sovietized; it is Russia, with Russian problems and Russian traditions.

I recognize that I should adduce proof for this statement rather than offer it thus categorically. But in order to make a case I should have to go into the many questions which are not particularly apropos, and with which I am not equipped. However, we must consider the imbedded injustices—such as the former system of landlordism—with half of Russia in the hands of the big land owners, or the crown, and only small portions allotted to the individual peasant; the ignorance of peasant and workingman; the absence of landlords in Paris and Vienna; the paternalistic rather than democratic attitude of the ruling class; the luxury and power of the wealthy and the unbelievable poverty and impotency of the peasant; the spy system, the reign of fear. Those who have read and who take the trouble to recall Gorky, Tolstoi, and Doestoevsky, will have these and similar things in mind.

PERHAPS PROVIDENTIAL

Only some great catastrophic event could break through the crust of such conditions. A mild palliative, or progressive movement, in such a situation would have as little effect as a cup of weak tea on a man with the D. T's. The revolution headed by Kerensky was not mildly progressive; it was radical. But it was nevertheless midway between the old regime of the czars and the bolshevist plan during its earlier operation. The bright red bolshevist regarded Kerensky and the menshevist movement as insipid, characterless and futile, while to the ruling class and the bourgeoisie it was extreme. I believe the world may well regret, according to its present light, the fall of the Kerensky government. "If Kerensky had been as strong a man as Lenin," said one of the leading young soviet authorities to me as we walked down the Moscow streets one afternoon, "he would have won. But he was weak." "Then it was not the system for which he stood?" I asked. "No, not that alone, so much as the man."

And yet if the moderate party had continued in power the tendency might have been to grow more radical. Or the radicals would persistently have bored from underneath. As it was the extreme left won. The radicals had it all their own way. The bottom was struck. The tendency now is to rise, to moderate. If anything over there may be considered providential, who knows but that this development may be providential in a broad, general way, after all?

Thus the historic background of injustice and oppression should be taken into consideration either before criticising or extolling the soviet government. Yet not only that side, but the positive, must be weighed when trying to estimate the value of the bolshevist system. We must consider what has been the contribution of Russia to humanity; what she has given in the way of science and discovery, of engineering and statesmanship, of art, literature, music; of agriculture, mining and forestry. And further, we must ask what temperamental characteristics do her people have that make them so willing to have a strongly centralized government and to lay so much stress upon solidarity. We must remember the system of the village commune which had been in vogue for decades, if not even for centuries, in which the villages had actually been practicing a form of communism long before there was any thought of a revolution. We must not forget the many different types of peoples who make up the varied territory of Greater Russia.

I shall refer by implication to all of these points in reporting my observations and impressions. To understand this historical background takes much more time and effort than most critics of Russia are willing to give to it. And yet there is the almost universal condemnation and boycott of the soviet government, with little or no attempt to discover whether the development has not been understandable and reasonable after all, in the light of conditions, and without giving to the Russian people the right which we would demand for ourselves—of determining for themselves the kind of a government they wish, without interference from the outside.

BOLSHEVIST MADNESS

But no consideration of this problem should omit the bolshevist attitude toward other nations, particularly since it explains in part the attitude of other nations toward Russia. Of all weaknesses in the manner in which the bolsheviks have set about the task as they conceived it, none was so great, so unthinkable as their conception of the psychology of other peoples. They seemingly expected that the world was as ready for a revolution as was Russia, and that the "hungry, downtrodden masses" the world over would revolt as soon as they had a chance. However strong they may be on the psychology of their own country, the Russian leaders had about as much of an insight into the temper of other countries as the Germans had during the war. They thought that Russia was called to the leadership of the World Revolution. It will pay to note more carefully this ideal, or hallucination, for in it there lies the explanation of much of the later development both within and without.

Russia has but herself or her leaders to blame for the attitude of other countries toward her government. A country whose leaders deliberately set out through any kind of means whatever to undermine other governments can certainly not be surprised or complain if those governments in turn take defensive and offensive action. In so far as the United States felt that the Russian government was deliberately sowing seeds of discontent among our people and creating disloyalty, we had a perfect right to refuse any relationships officially. If the United States knew that accredited Russian leaders were making it their primary business to create a world revolution, then the United States could hardly be criticised for protecting herself even though it caused hardships to innocent people.

I want to consider this still further. But before doing so let me make a distinction which was made clear to me by one of the younger soviet leaders in Moscow. This distinction is important and fundamental. There is a sharp line between the word bolshevist and the word soviet; and likewise between communism and sovietism. Bolshevism and communism are one, to all practical intents and purposes. That is, the extreme bolsheviks were communists. A soviet form of government may be communistic or not. Bolshevism, and communism, are economic philosophies. Sovietism is a practical political method.

THE SOVIET SYSTEM

I found in Russia some officials who are not bolsheviks, although most officials are. But they are not bolsheviks or communists because they believe in or work in the soviet form of government. The soviet system may be as mild and tame as our system of government. To say that one favors the soviet system for Russia, should one wish so to do, is not to say that he favors communism or bolshevism.

Now to return to the question of thrusting revolution upon other nations. The protagonists for the International Revolution are for the most part the extremists on the far left, whether in Russia, Italy or Germany. Their advocates are to be found in every land including India and the United States, but a larger proportion came from Russia than any other country. Indeed, the Russians were last year, at least, conceded to be the leaders. These men found their expression in the Third Internationale.

A report of the printed speeches of the members of the Third Internationale which met in Moscow at the Kremlin in 1920 has been issued as a United States congressional document. To read it is to make one "see red" in several senses. It makes a man who is liberally inclined and who would be just to the radical as well as to the conservative, a moss-backed reactionary. You want to take up arms against the crew who would be guilty of such monumental impudence as to proclaim that they wished to overthrow all existing governments, whatever the methods required, and to use bloody methods to accomplish that end. And hardly less bitter than their attitude toward capitalist governments is their hostility toward all socialistic, menshevistic and other cooperative movements. Their language is the extreme, the uncontrolled language of mental inebriation.

WHY WE SEE RED

When you read these documents you wonder what insanity struck these wild dreamers. In view of this sort of thing it is no wonder that the newspapers of America leaned over backward against the whole bolshevist movement. One who wishes to be liberal admits that perhaps after all the instinct of self-preservation which caused such a universal hostility on the part of other nations toward Russia was a sane one. This sort of a thing alienated potential friends. But the Third Internationale was not officially promoted by the soviet government, my informant advised me. It is true that many of the leaders of red internationalism were officials and leaders in the soviet government, but they acted as individuals, just as an official of the American government might conceivably be a socialist.

But it is true today that most of the leaders of soviet Russia are not the extremists of the Third Internationale. True, many of them may have been connected with the world movement, and still are. They may have hoped for its success. They do not try to mask the fact. But they are more moderate than the Internationale leaders, in reputation, and certainly in practice. And conversely, the most extreme of the Third Internationale leaders have gradually been losing their influence with respect to the policies of the present regime. The soviet practice certainly is mild as compared to the Internationale eruptions. Whether this practice is moderate through the influence of those who represent the moderate tendencies of communism, or because compelled to be so through the pressure of circumstances, is not so important. The significant point is this: the soviet leaders are today interested in Russia as their field of operations, and they are working for and in Russia. They are ready to recognize that the soviet government cannot hope for even eventual, much less present recognition, as long as it is suspected of promoting revolution in lands with which it is seeking official relationship.

I say this perhaps too positively, for of course I cannot know what underhanded machinations may be going on. But my impression over there was that those leaders are as honestly absorbed in doing a job in and for Russia as are our leaders, even in our non-internationalized period, are absorbed in working for America. I am not basing my attitude of toleration upon a technical distinction between sovietism and communism, or between the Third Internationale and the soviet government. As long as the extremes of communism were being promoted by the soviet regime, it was to all practical purposes communism. And when so many of the leaders of sovietism were also the leaders of the world revolution, there was reason to fear the good faith of sovietism even though it agreed to keep from extending its propaganda into some particular land with which it had trade agreements.

HANDS OFF AMERICA

I think I feel more strongly than before I went to Russia the conviction that America had not only a perfect right, but an undeniable duty to say to bolshevist leaders: Hands off America! I would have our government say it today. We want no one from the outside tampering with our government. When we are ready to make any change in it we will take care of that from within. I would like to say that with more force than my profession or a journalistic page would permit. I am with the man in the street in my own feeling about this. And I feel more strongly, too, than ever before that a man is simply insane who thinks that Russia has something better in its form of government than the United States. Only one singularly gifted in blinding himself to the virtues of his country and the vices of Russia can have such a wild fancy.

But after saying this thing I would close this paper by making four observations:

First: I believe the present system in Russia, evolving, moderating, will live, in Russia. I am certain anything else will be anarchy. I hesitate to make such a statement categorically, for so many prophets have proved their fallibility when they foretold the fall of the soviet power, naming often the day and the hour, though the fall came not, one hardly rushes into prophecy on the other side.

Second: to believe that the soviet regime may live does not mean that one believes this an ideal form of government for any country, and certainly it does not mean that one wishes it, or communism, either now or in the future, for the United States.

Third: the United States should permit Russia to work out her own principles of political economy and of government. I can add that Admiral Bristol, high commissioner at Constantinople, uttered a similar sentiment in an interview with our commission at Constantinople on September 18, as did also Mr. Herbert Hoover in an interview on October 27, at Washington.

Fourth: there may be in the experiment over there much that is worth while for Russia, and for the whole world.

VERSE

The New Day

NOR east nor west shall light the starry way
To perfect peace, to manhood's purple dawning,
For north and south alike shall heed the warning.
The crumbling rule of potentate, the sway
Of mighty monarchies, the cruel play
Of despot's hand is o'er. The petty scorning
Of races vanisheth, and white the morning
Of that bright sun of heaven's perfect day.

The order changeth and by right divine
Of men not kings, true Justice ever rules.
Armed anarchy, the tyranny of schools
Are but the fruit of folly's evil vine.
The kingdom of the beautiful, the good
Will usher in the reign of brotherhood.

BENJAMIN COLLINS WOODBURY.

Let Me Be Thine

SO many pray to Thee, and rise
And work against Thy will,
From Thee I turn away my eyes,
And wander lonely still.

I fear to ask the thing desired,
For fear that I might be Thereafter weak, and so be fired
By dreams but dross to Thee.

Therefore, O Lord, forgive that I
Kneel not within thy shrine;
But underneath whatever sky
I fare, let me be Thine.

A Second Report on the Steel Strike

THE commission appointed by the Interchurch World Movement to investigate the steel strike and labor conditions in the steel industry has held together informally to complete the work left unfinished by the failure of that movement. The publication of the report on the "Steel Strike of 1919" brought in enough money to enable them now to bring out a second volume. It is entitled "Public Opinion and the Steel Strike of 1919." It is a volume of supplementary studies covering such aspects of the great industrial contest as the following: Undercover Men (that is, the use of the labor spy system); The Pittsburgh Newspapers and the Strike (how accurately did they report it); Civil Rights in Western Pennsylvania (a study of the suppression of freedom of speech and assembly in the Pittsburgh district); The Mind of Immigrant Communities; Welfare Work of the United States Steel Corporation; The Pittsburgh Pulpit and the Strike; a report on "The Steel Report and Public Opinion" (that is, the reception given the first volume), and an addendum giving for the first time an account of "The Mediation Effort by the Commission." There are 346 pages of vital material. Harcourt, Brace & Co. are the publishers, and the volume will be issued in both cloth and paper at popular prices.

A prominent government official pronounces this second volume as more important, if anything, than the first, because it brings to public notice the attack upon that most fundamental of American rights, the right of public assemblage and liberty of expression. Senator McKellar said recently, as a member of the senate committee investigating the West Virginia miners' war, that the spy system found there "violates every idea of right that I ever had. I never would have believed that a thing like this would happen, and I am not surprised that you are having trouble down there in Mingo county."

The Industrial Spy System

Senator McKellar's profound astonishment is shared by all who appreciate the fact that the use of a spy system in industry is the introduction of a system that has not been tolerated in any honorable business in civilization outside of war and the pursuit of criminals. In the first volume this commission pointed out the fact that the spy or so-called "under-cover" system was Judge Gary's alternative to open and frank conference with his men. Following the issuance of this report a study was made by Sydney Howard under the direction of Dr. Richard Cabot of Harvard University, which gives a mass of conclusive information. The West Virginia mine investigation will reveal conditions similar to those given in these two studies. The report, just out, of the church committee in Denver on the street railway strike of 1920 tells something of the same story. In other words, there are companies who treat their labor relationships as if they constituted a state of war, or as if workingmen were potential criminals; this is their alternative to frank recognition of the right of labor to organize and to hold open conference with employers on an equality of representation. English employers have expressed themselves as astounded at this thing; with them long experience has brought a conviction that open dealing is the better way.

In this study a large number of the sample reports made to the employing concerns are given. They reveal all the wiles of the regular spy or secret service man. By deceit, lying, playing double and any sort of unethical device the work is carried on, for in this business the end justifies the means. The paid spies not only join the labor forces as presumably honest workingmen, but they join the unions, promote union activities (especially those under the ban) and then report to their employers. It may pay to hire a thief to catch a thief because he knows the ways of thieves, but when that class of men are hired to spy on honest men their reports still take on the color of thieves. The documents here printed reveal ignorance, chicanery, illiteracy and a petty magnifying of small matters that brand the whole plan as criminal in its practical working as well as in its conception. These spy gentry even trailed the investigating commission, looted their office of files and made up silly reports that reached the offices of the United States Steel Corporation. Adequate publicity will certainly be sufficient to put an end to this sort of iniquitous business.

Suppressing the Freedom of Assemblage

The first report told something of the suppression of assemblage and of free speech in the Pittsburgh area. This one gives the details and furnishes documentary evidence of its adequacy and of the method used, describing the situation town by town throughout the area and comparing same with those places where the strike was conducted in a perfectly orderly way without such interference with civil liberties. Men walked from Monessen across the river into Washington county and from the Pittsburgh area across the state line into Ohio and held their meetings; there was no disorder, no hostility to lawful government, and nothing secret service officials and government agents could complain about. Yet in Allegheny county there was a complete and often brutal suppression of all public meetings outside of the labor temple in the heart of the city of Pittsburgh and therefore inaccessible to the great majority of the strikers. This was done by civil officials who were also employes of the steel companies and by a truculent constabulary, the governor of the state concurring. The only answer so far made to criticism is to say that Governor Sproul is a fine gentleman and that there might have been riots had this not been done. The sufficient answer to which is that no criticism is made of the governor's personal manners and that there were no riots where assemblage was not interfered with.

It is a grave thing to interfere with that most fundamental of all democratic guarantees—the freedom of speech and assemblage. It can be safely done only when evidence is manifest and unmistakable that it is resulting in crime. It is an assault upon genuine Americanism, a direct denial of constitutional rights, and it is a triumph of phariseism when it is done in the name of 100 per cent Americanism. When a great employing concern can play its cards through the expedient of utilizing its own employes as civil and police officials it may keep strictly within the letter of the law while it is breaking every moral obligation which it owes a free society under a republican government. It is easy under the prejudice of class and race strife to justify such procedure through both police and courts, but it will react either to destroy democratic institutions or to create a bitter warfare in which both law and order are denied.

Reporting an Industrial Warfare

No more scientific and authentic account of the accuracy and adequacy of newspaper reporting in a time of strife and prejudice has been furnished than this study of the manner in which the Pittsburgh press reported the strike from day to day. It is made by an old and experienced newspaper man who compared the daily issues of the papers with the actual events as they transpired before the eyes of all who searched for them. In just one single issue (of the Leader) was there a clear and honest demand that the whole truth be revealed and justice done. The daily reports were always one-sided, reflecting the employers' side only, and often were viciously misleading. The least that can be said is that labor's side was never stated, while that of the employers was given daily publication. In the strategy of breaking morale through spreading reports of men returning to work in great numbers and of the resumption of work in the mills the employers had ready and gallant help from the daily press, while the scream of "bolshhevik" was reiterated often enough to push the suggestion into solid conviction in the minds of the masses. The news furnished by the local dailies was the news read by the country at large, and upon this basis the mind of the public was moulded. It is hardly to be expected that newspapers owned by steel investors would be non-partisan, but they should at least not sail under the false colors of "news" papers, and certainly the public at large will soon be warned not to accept their reports as genuine.

The study of the Pittsburgh pulpit is the least satisfactory chapter in the volume. The pulpit was not as adequately studied as the press, and the replies to questionnaires sent out were too few to allow sure judgments. The pulpit had no means of knowing what was happening except such reports as the daily press gave, and the fact is that it acted wisely in saying little when it could speak with so little certainty. It is however a subject which deserves a most thorough-going analysis. What can a Christian minister do when in the midst of an internecine warfare where, in his own community, both class and racial prejudice runs high, the exact facts are not at hand and the church is supported so largely by those partisans to one side of the controversy? There is an imminent necessity that this subject be frankly discussed and that a demand be made by ministers for the right to discharge their prophetic functions.

* * *

The Mind of the Striker and of the Public

Perhaps the most scholarly chapter in the volume is the one on "The Mind of Immigrant Communities." Space here will not allow a review of it, but it can be said that the subject is not only important but that it is only by comprehending it that there can be any understanding of the issue where immigrant workingmen are involved.

A very thorough and fair summary of the welfare work of the United States Steel Corporation is given. It is a heartening chapter, but we must be reminded that the activities of which it treats are wholly paternalistic and furnish no answer to the question of the twelve hour day, the seven day week and the right to representation and conference. It is these latter things that are the issues in steel. These issues the steel companies have made no attempt to meet. They have not remedied them as abuses nor have they defended them as attacked in the conclusions of these reports. All sorts of "answers" have been assayed, from the silly stuff put forth by the Rev. Mr. Bigelow to the very labored effort presented to the senate committee on education and labor. We are still promised an answer but so far it has been very "still." The answers essayed in the form of attacks on the ability, patriotism or appropriateness of the investigators and their investigation have worn themselves out. Until the twelve hour day and the seven day week are either justified or abolished and some better alternative to organization and conference than the vicious spy system is adopted the steel companies will owe the public a real answer.

Let us hope this second volume will elicit such an answer.

British Table Talk

London, October 25, 1921.

HERE is a piece of wisdom which is worth shipping across the Atlantic:

"The dervishes asked me—

'Whom do you think a rare man that you have met in your life?

'A man without a right ideal'

They asked again—

'And whom do you think a still rarer man?'

'A man without a wrong method.'

This question of method is often shelved as unimportant. But if it is remembered, how much good work is wasted because of a wrong method. There may be wisdom in paying some heed to it. So at least the leaders of the free churches think in their plans for personal evangelism. Dr. Clifford—for the old hero of many a fight is back on the field leading this also—and his lieutenants know that there is need of a technique in disciplin-making. Not only what? but How? has to be answered. A series of studies for circles of would-be disciple winners has been arranged. It is generally agreed that the button-holing method to which certain evangelical people descended is responsible for much of the recent failure in personal evangelism. It was too formal and too mechanical. There must be other ways, truer to the New Testament. If these could be discovered and applied to our needs there might be a great increase of disciples. Many with the heart of a disciple are only waiting for the authentic call. But they will not be won by the mechanical formula from a stranger or a casual acquaintance, "Are you saved?"

Who Will Go for Us?

One of our missionary doctors is lying very seriously ill. It may be near the end. His one concern is for his work in the field and the one message of comfort which could complete his peace would be to know that another doctor could take his place. That message his society, the London Missionary Society, cannot send. At the present moment there is no one to go. Could anything be sadder? It seems as though at this moment there were no recruits from the medical profession ready for this service. Is it so in America? The medical missionary has to forfeit any chance of making wealth. But from the point of view of a wide experience, if he loves his profession, he has a place which stay-at-homes might envy. And in years to come there will come, we believe, contributions to science of increasing importance from the mission field. But for the present we are in sore need.

Toc H.

During the war at Poperinghe just behind the line in Belgium, there was a remarkable club or home for soldiers called "Talbot House." Its boniface was the Rev. P. B. Clayton—a man to whom the ancient grace of hilarity has been given in no small measure. It was a club dear to thousands of soldiers. When the war ended, P. B. Clayton did not feel that his chaplaincy was over. His old friends were in London or other cities, no longer in khaki, but needing no less such places as Talbot House. Therefore he has set himself to establish homes in London and elsewhere (they are called "Toc H" now) where the same spirit of camaraderie and true and pure religion without any cant or unreality can be found. This is a great answer to a terrible need in the big cities and none felt it more than the ex-soldiers. "The parochial system so far as it still exists in big cities is a survival from an age when everyone lived at home. But young men today are as mobile as they were in the army." It may be interesting to give Mr. Clayton's vision in his own words:

"For centuries past the church has spent millions on religious education. Well and good. But oh! the pity and the folly of neglecting the only partly finished product. There is (I understand) one chaplain to every 300 public and grammar school-boys in the United Kingdom; and one to every 150 undergraduates. But to the 55,000 who come into big cities every year in September, there was not before Toc H. one single specialist chaplain. Toc H. will (please God) have four at work in this vast field by Easter, 1922. But if the church wants the younger men it must launch out into the deep. It will never get them by shivering on the shore. It must launch out and let down a net not of four, but of 40 chaplains in the very near future. Surely the experiment is worth it."

Already large gifts have been given to Mr. Clayton and he is worth all that can be given. If I were a millionaire and were told to sell all and give to the poor, I should plead as an alternative that I might give it in first to such men as this. He is visiting Canada soon on his own errand. If anyone wishes to learn more, I am sure a letter addressed to the Rev. P. B. Clayton, St. Martins-in-the-Fields, would not be long in reaching him. Birds of a feather hang around that church.

Westward!

By the time these words appear we shall be looking Westward with the prayer in our hearts that Washington may do what Paris left undone. It is not likely that we shall talk of all our hopes, but they are deep down in the heart of every man with any serious thought or any understanding of the human scene. It is not a time in our minds for national pride or jealousy. May God's blessing rest upon any nation which in the name of Christ and humanity seeks to heal "the open sore of the world."

Dr. Berry and Mansfield College:

Mansfield College has been called suddenly to select another chairman of its council. It is an honorable succession. Dale of Birmingham, Mackennal of Bowdon, Sir Alfred Dale, who died this summer—these are the former chairmen. Now to them is added the Rev. Sidney Berry of Carr's Lane and his friends are sure that he will bring to this high position great gifts and unfaltering devotion to the Christian ministry among the churches, this order and to Mansfield College, of which he is a son. He must be somewhere about forty years of age, but already he has won for himself a rare position of influence among us. An admirable preacher, a man of administrative gifts, a true pastor and friend and at the same time always "a man and a brother." It was a great call which came to him when he followed Dale and Jowett, but he has not failed to answer it. My American readers will not have forgotten that Charles Berry, his father, was once invited to follow Henry Ward Beecher. They know something, too, of Mr. Sidney Berry who has been across the Atlantic more than once. It would be surprising if he does not come again.

A Worker's Creed

Very often in the corner of a journal some word may be read which will give a thrill of joy to the reader. Here is one poem, anonymous, and yet worthy of a place among our spiritual treasures.

"The beauty of life is to be found
Not in luxury, but in simplicity,
In sweat of the hand, sweat of the brow, and sweat of the heart;
In pride of work, without greed of gold;
In thoughts that rise above the needs of self;
In loving kindness to one's fellow men.
To be honest in handicraft, loyal in friendship, strong in suffering, and rich in laughter,
Is to be a good comrade in the workshops of life,
And to such faithful servants
God will pay fair wages of peace and joy."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Why Did Paul Have Power?*

MEN covet power, women admire it. If I could give you today the secret of Paul's undoubted power and could tell you how to secure it, I would soon be a millionaire! I cannot give it to you—completely. Power is always mysterious. I cannot tell you why Napoleon—a small man—had power, while some huge physical giants are only poor boobs! Riding out to a University one day I admired a wonderfully shaped head on a man. There I said is the typical professor's skull; what stores of wisdom are massed in orderly fashion in that noble top-piece—that afternoon I sat in a barber's chair while that fellow shaved me! Outward appearances tell something, but not everything. One of the greatest writers on this planet wears clothes that would frighten the very crows. One day I saw, in person, a famous author—his head did not look as though it contained anything at all—a most contemptible head—yet a very remarkable authority—if I named the subject you might recognize him! Looks tell less and less in these days of "exterior decoration." Paul was not much for looks if we may judge from the scanty materials at hand. He may have had weak eyes—most scholars think so. He was not like Apollos in appearance, but when Paul appeared the ponderous orator vanished. You may say that Paul had genius and there you will speak truly—he did have that. You may say that genius is only another name for hard work and there you are off the track. What a foolish half-truth! I know hundreds of plodders, who toil and grind and sweat without a glimmer of the God-given illumination which we recognize as genius. No, genius is first of all a lavish and direct gift from heaven. Dante, Angelo, Beethoven, St. Francis, and their like were no ordinary mortals grubbing and plodding. All were hard workers as genius usually is, although some may work "in heats and enjoy long periods of delightful stupidity." We help ourselves very little therefore by finding out that Paul was a genius. What has he for us?

(1) Paul had faith and therefore power. He believed in God. He believed that the universe was friendly. He believed that it paid to work for good causes. He was not palsied by pessimism as many are today. Yesterday I read a statement that the churches are all empty; today another interview says that religion never had such a hold as now. Yesterday a great journal told me that business is very, very bad; while today a noted daily paper says that we are on the edge of the biggest business boom and on the widest scale ever dreamed of. It depends upon who does the looking. My impression from successful people, however, is that such men and women possess unusual faith. They believe something positive. They trust God, believe in the plain people and have confidence in themselves. A large mail order house says that very few people ever try to cheat the firm. People as a rule are pretty good. Surely God can be trusted. But as in Jesus' day, only a few are willing to put confidence in him to any great extent. Suppose you woke up some morning and just took God at his word—what a marvelous world you would be living in. Jesus told us that the birds and the flowers trust God and He takes care of them. The world is hungry for God and feeble because not relying upon His strength. Paul took God at par value, he never discounted Him. Make much of God and He will make much of you!

(2) Paul had control and therefore power. I rode in a train with an old man this forenoon, who remarked: "Self-denial is the index of all strong characters." He was right. Too many men are trying to control cities who cannot control themselves. Of a man who was most just and gracious to others it was said: "Yes, but he is a tyrant with himself." He made every passion, every lust, every unholy ambition, every hurtful appetite, every questionable thought, every wrong desire lie at his feet. Often it happens that the man who is soft with himself is a tyrant toward others. I never have any doubt about Paul's perfect control over himself. This spells power over men.

(3) Paul had a genuine, disinterested interest in men and therefore power. One objective marked every effort—"That I might save some." He did not regard men as clusters of grapes to be squeezed into his cup, his interest was unselfish, he sought their good. Men soon catch this note in a man. We hate to be exploited. We don't like to be used for another's joy or profit. Paul loved his fellow men of every sort. Nothing gives power more than this. We cannot hope to equal Paul in his talents and divine gifts but we can imitate him in his faith, his control, his disinterested love. These spell power.

JOHN R. EWERS.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Key to the World Problem

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a constant reader, follower and admirer of The Christian Century, I hope you will be kind enough to allow a few lines of your valuable space to correct some errors that are too patent to be allowed to pass unchallenged. These errors were in Mr. Guy's article in your journal on the far eastern question, the subject of the hour.

First as to Japan's population. It is very near 56,000,000 instead of 70,000,000 as stated. Fifty-six million persons are enough to live in a country almost the size of California, especially since the geography says that only 16 to 18 per cent of the land is fit for cultivation. The Japanese have not been quick to take to other lands when they have had the opportunity. Parts of Germany and all of Belgium are, considering the average conditions and wants of the people, more nearly over-populated than Japan. Only about 50 per cent of the land of Germany and Belgium is tillable; and about 20 per cent of the United States, European Russia and Great Britain and Ireland is cultivated; while the percentage is much smaller for Sweden, Finland, Norway, Serbia, Switzerland, Cuba, Costa Rica, Canada and Chile, and less than 2 per cent in some of these countries. Japan then is not seriously over-populated, but as time goes on she will be.

Second. China is not over-populated. Her area is a third more than ours. She has perhaps less than 400,000,000 population and her gains per year are small because her death rate is very high, very near her birth rate. Japan having adopted western sanitary methods, has been able to cut her death rate almost in two. India is still religiously (I am speaking figuratively and literally) drinking the holy germ-laden waters of her sacred Ganges and therefore her death rate continues high. India is not seriously over-populated.

Now, may I add a word concerning Mr. Guy's main question, "What are we going to do about these countries?" What are we going to do about their religion, what are we going to do about furnishing them a God to take the place of their gods that he says (as I understand him) we have taken away from them? If he has any idea that western civilization can convert them to the religion of our Jesus he is talking the language of a dreamer. The educated and the ignorant alike of the oriental will have none of our religion. They promptly tell us to put our own house in order, and show them what the church is doing to obtain social justice in America or Europe. Unless we can show them that the great principles we espouse have done something for the amelioration of the peoples of America and Europe, something toward adjusting not only territory but property and the products of useful toil to the needs of humanity, the oriental will send us about our business, saying in our own language: "Physician, heal thyself."

Reducing the problem of the far east (which turns out to be a world problem) to its lowest terms and looking at it, if I may be permitted to attempt to do such as a student in world affairs, through the eyes of Downing Street, I can see but one and only one solution. This solution is so obvious and so simple that there is no wonder no one has ever put it forward. This is the way it looks to me:

England owns and controls about half of the world that is of material importance. She has all the corner lots. Through Japan it is in her power to control the far east including China, a country larger than the United States and of about the same natural resources. By making her union with Japan closer and closer which she can easily do by nodding her head when Japan asks if she is to have a free hand in the development (or exploitation) of China, England will not only control the sea but control the world.

China will not go in for nationalism, as Professor Dewey's illuminating articles indicate. Since the Han dynasty China has been a "local option" empire and the rank and file do not know nor care anything about the national government. Millions do not know whether there is a president or a king or an emperor or an empress. China as a nation is poor, but as for the individuals hundreds of thousands of them are rich, as they have the accumulated riches of hundreds and thousands of years.

China will be developed. As well to attempt to stay the tides as to say no to this proposition. Her historic parallel is Egypt, only in this case trade, not territory, is the objective. Japan and England will develop China. This is as certain as anything can be that has not already happened. Even the altruist would admit that in the development intelligence would add to the blessings of the "greatest good to the greatest number." England will furnish a large part of that intelligence. It will be a simple process. The Chinese are workers. Properly directed, they can do all the necessary hard work of the world. On the contrary, the Indians are a torrid zone people where work is almost unnecessary and very disagreeable.

The hopeful side, and I believe the good side of the picture, is: "The student of modern history is compelled to stand with uncovered head in the presence of British achievements in behalf of civilization, democracy, education, morality and world progress. In spite of British mistakes, follies and sins, a list that is unforgettable and appalling, and that true Britons are the first to confess, the British nation has stood on all the continents as the promoter of world ideals; and on all the seven seas its ships have been the harbingers of justice and liberty."

It is up to the United States to come to an agreement with Great Britain, and of course Japan will fall in line. The hope of the world lies in this. Even those who sympathize with the aspirations of Ireland or entertain suspicions concerning the motives of Japan must see this or we are, so far as world peace is concerned, of all men most miserable, because we are headed for destruction.

A Golden Rule Sunday

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial addressed to President Harding, Christian, was a splendid constructive effort to have our President undertake as a Christian to introduce Christian principles directly into the affairs of nations. He has the greatest opportunity any President ever had to revolutionize the world's thought by adopting your suggestions. Is he big enough to do it? Let us pray for it.

Now I have an idea which ought to fire the imaginations of Christian people over the country and help towards the ideal of Christianizing society. It is to have a Golden Rule Sunday, say the second Sunday of January, on which every minister in the country would preach upon the golden rule as applied to government, business and social life. The impact upon public thought of so many sermons based on the Christianization of the social order and making use of the universally accepted idea of the golden rule would be tremendous. If it were followed by a Golden Rule Week, in which people pledged themselves to live definitely every day of that week with the golden rule in mind and guiding every action, it would help to demonstrate the feasibility of applied Christianity and induce people to make it the permanent rule of life. The newspapers would be attracted by the novelty of such a united effort and the main object of the plan would be secured in drawing the attention of industrial leaders as well as governmental leaders sincere enough to put in practice that which they all profess. The account in the October issue of The American Magazine of the Nash experiment in putting the golden rule into practice in the clothing factory in Cincinnati, the best account yet appearing of that remarkable and entirely successful effort, might serve as a practical basis for our thought. It demonstrates the Christianizing effect of the golden rule when put into practice under the most difficult conditions.

Ministerial associations, like the Chicago Federation of Churches, would undoubtedly be ready to co-operate in the movement to have a Golden Rule Sunday and obtain the consent of local ministers. In this way the details of the matter could be readily carried out. Perhaps the Federal Council of Churches would undertake the task of securing nation-wide co-operation? The church recognizes its exceptional need to secure public attention for Christian principles at this juncture. Is there a more popular way to do it than by emphasizing the feasibility of the golden rule?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The "Editorial Letter to President Harding, Christian," in the issue of October 20 deserves wide publicity—how clear and concisely the issue is stated. You deserve the appreciation of all "believers in a warless world" for this strong presentation. One wonders whether the letter really came to the eye of the President and what effect it made upon him! The visit each week of The Christian Century to our home is prized by Mrs. Ireland and myself. Sometimes the rush of pastoral work and organization work crowds out the reading for a few days, but one never sits down to a quiet forenoon with The Christian Century without being amply rewarded. Heartily and sincerely yours,

Spearfish, S. D.

Thinks the McAfee View Distorted

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I must voice a protest against the article in your issue of October 27, entitled "Some Unchristian Aspects of Christian Missions," by Joseph Ernest McAfee. No one can question the fervor and sincerity of Mr. McAfee. But his article is a strange and harmful perversion and misinterpretation of facts.

It is well to paint Cromwell with his wart. But Mr. McAfee would paint the wart and call it Cromwell. He draws a caricature of Christian missions, and declares that it is a photograph. By the method he uses anyone could prove that anything in the world—education, democracy, the Red Cross, the American government, what you will, is hopelessly wrong and ought to be abolished. The method is to take the worst phases of the movement in question as typical, to explain away the best phases as accidental or inconsistent with the "system," and to judge the movement as a whole by a preconceived estimate of it.

Mr. McAfee makes much of the regrettable activity of anti-quoted and obscurantist forces in Korea. He leaves us to infer that that is the direct result of "denominational board" activities. He ignores the fact that at least one of the boards working in Korea has stood firm for union institutions, for liberty of thought and opinion, and for a mission work free from divisive theological influence and committed to a wholesome evangelism; and that, when a crisis came, and an issue was joined, the church backed up the board in its progressive and Christian policy.

He presents the movement of Christians in Africa toward self-support and a growth of desire for self-government on the part of native churches, as revolutionary movements, whereas they were and are encouraged by the boards at home, welcomed and fostered as in direct line with the principles and ideals of missionary policy. He explains away Howard Bliss' magnificent valedictory testimony, everywhere welcomed by leaders of missionary activity as the clearest possible statement of the ideals they cherish. He ascribes motives to our missionary educators, physicians, preachers, and social workers, which the most of them would indignantly repudiate, motives the possession of which by any missionary would lead our boards to consider the recall of that missionary as unfit.

He speaks of the "spirit of patronage" as ruling our missionary work. Only a diseased imagination could make such a statement. I have been close to many churches in their mission work, and have found there not the attitude of "superior" toward "inferior," but a wholesome desire of those who recognize themselves as privileged to share their privileges with the less privileged. To call such splendid service as is being rendered in China by the Central Presbyterian Church, and the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, and by many other churches, "patronage," is to offer a gratuitous insult in the name of a distorted conception of democracy.

I am not equipped to answer this article properly. You should ask some one like Dr. Brown of the Presbyterian board, or Dr. Barton of the American board, to give the true picture which is here caricatured. But I know one "denominational board," through ten years of closest contact, and its spirit and ideal and method are exactly what Mr. McAfee says should obtain but does not.

One incident is typical. Some years ago, a motion was made in the board of which I speak, committing it to hearty and unre-served cooperation in a union mission enterprise in China. One member, who might be described as "the last of the Old Guard," rose and exclaimed in solemn protest, "But, Mr. President, if this sort of thing goes on, the time will come when there will be no Presbyterian church in China at all." From all over the room came answers, "That is just what we are after"; "Amen." And the vote was within one of being unanimous.

That is typical. Our mission boards, and the churches back of them, are Christian first, and denominational after—and a long way after. Mr. McAfee is mistaking motes for motives.

Chicago Association Worker Honored

Recently Mr. L. Wilbur Messer was entertained at the Union League Club of Chicago by a prominent layman of Chicago in honor of the fortieth anniversary of the beginning of Mr. Messer's work with the Association. Cyrus H. McCormick and John V. Farwell, prominent business men, were members of the committee which invited Mr. Messer to leave Peoria thirty-three years ago to come to Chicago. Mr. Farwell presided at the luncheon and a number of the men bore testimony to the remarkable success of the secretary in the Chicago field. Mr. Messer in responding to congratulations expressed the hope that the achievements of the next few years would make the past look very small indeed.

Perils of Orthodoxy Set Forth by Presbyterian Moderator

Among the many recent utterances of Dr. H. C. Swearingen, moderator of the Presbyterian church, few are more striking than his recent address at the Synod of Pennsylvania when he inveighed against the perils of orthodoxy. He said: "I believe in orthodoxy, but not an orthodoxy that spends its chief strength in defending itself. It ought to be at work, inflaming the conscience and stirring the church with an ethical passion. We do not need a new gospel, but a closer application of the one we have. The Puritan preachers did not pare down their messages nor dilute their evangelicism, but they announced the bearing of God's truth on the moral struggles of their time, and one of the results was the establishment of the institutions of freedom. Theirs became the most potent voices on the continent in behalf of liberty. They preached the Bible, but they searched the conduct of men with it. They were not mere purveyors of doctrines, however true; they linked them to the lives men were leading and illuminated with them the big issues that engrossed the minds of their contemporaries. They did not abdicate their position of moral authority. The church today is in danger of surrounding its moral passion to other interests and of permitting the publicist, the teacher, the editor, the statesman, and even the business man, to become the prophet of an ethical rejuvenation and the voice of the conscience of mankind down in the regions where men of the present generation are making the world's policies and doing the world's work."

Episcopalians Put Vast Sums Into Cathedrals

The project of the Episcopal church in building a vast cathedral in New York, first estimated to cost ten millions but now known to involve a final expenditure of twelve millions, is to be followed by other like ambitious projects in the great cities of the land. The Episcopal church in Chicago talks of a cathedral to cost six millions. Other great projects are on foot in Philadelphia, Baltimore,

Washington and San Francisco, reaching a total of thirty-six millions. Objections are heard, of course, but the church leaders argue that so long as great commercial organizations are housed in imposing skyscrapers, it will be necessary for the church to develop more significant buildings. The Chicago cathedral will include a combination of offices, public hall, library and a headquarters for church activities of various kinds.

Seminary Will Teach Church Publicity

Henceforth young Baptist ministers who come out of Rochester Theological Seminary of Rochester will have training in church publicity. The seminary authorities have secured Rev. Charles A. McAlpine to teach this new subject in the seminary. He has had an abundant experience in this line of activity. He served as executive secretary of the Baptist Missionary Convention of the state of New York, and in the Victory Campaign of the Baptists of the north in 1919 he was publicity secretary. He has continued since as the publicity director of the Northern Baptist Convention. He is also director of publicity for the American Bible Society.

Plans Formulated for World Conference

While the theologians continue to plan for the World Conference on Faith and Order, another set of churchmen propose to approximate brotherhood in the Christian church by bringing the great Christian leaders of the world together to consider the practical problems of the modern world. The first meeting in behalf of such an ecumenical conference was held in Geneva in August, 1920, and sectional communities were organized for America, Great Britain, Continental Europe and the eastern churches. The American committee met in New York recently and voted to recommend that the conference be held in Stockholm some time in 1924. It is believed that nearly every Christian communion in the world except the Roman Catholic will be represented at this meeting. The topics to be considered will be the various social, industrial, economic and international problems that confront the world. Upon these it is hoped to have an authoritative utterance.

Educational Leader Startles With His Figures

Rev. H. E. Beckler in his campaign for funds for educational institutions in Texas has recently published some figures with regard to Disciples churches which are startling in the extreme. He asserts that there are about 9,000 Disciples congregations in the country, and for these there are only 3,500 preachers. A number of preachers are listed who are also teachers or business men. He asserts that there are 1,000 preachers less than ten years ago. As an example of the sad condition of things in this denomination he recites the fact that the state of Oklahoma has 397 churches and only 70 located preachers. The Disciples ministry is largely recruited by college men, without a degree, who go into the ministry with but little professional training. The ministerial turnover in this class is very large.

Fred B. Smith on a World Tour

Fred B. Smith, the veteran Y. M. C. A. leader, who in recent years has been in the employ of the Federal Council of Churches assisting in the organization of city federations, is to start soon on a new enterprise. He will set out on a world tour representing a number of great Christian organizations. It is said that contributions to his traveling expenses are being made by the Church Peace Union, the Federal Council, the Christian Endeavor Union and the two Christian associations. Mr. Smith plans to visit Hawaii, Japan, China, India, the Philippines, Egypt and most of the countries of Europe. His plan of action is to interview leaders in all lines of effort, endeavoring to explain the point of view of America. The enterprise will require about eight months. Before setting out, Mr. Smith visited the White House in company with Bishop McDowell and a number of other influential churchmen, and received the congratulations and good wishes of the President before setting out on his long journey. Mr. Smith believes the world needs mediators these days who will interpret nations to each other in a friendly light. It is well known that the United States is far from popular in many sections of the world at this time.

Sensational Wedding in Missouri

Sensationalism in connection with weddings is less in favor than formerly when young people demanded to be married on roller skates or accepted an invitation to be married at the county fair in consideration of a gift of household goods. That this sentiment is not dead, however, may be judged from a press report announcing that Rev. B. H. Smith, a Disciples minister of Missouri, recently married a couple in a flying machine.

Christian Mayor Does Not Disappoint Fort Worth

The great meat-packing city of the southwest, Ft. Worth, decided last spring that it had enough of the old-time political leader for mayor, and elected a professor of Texas Christian University. When the professor first threw his hat in the ring, it was not taken seriously, but as the time for election drew near, it was evident to close observers that the fight was going to be close. Now after six months of his administration has gone by, he commands an unusual degree of loyalty. The police force has been made to respect the law, the fire-fighting organization is efficient and the mayor is now issuing an appeal to the city for play-grounds for the children and parks where the community's sense of beauty may be expressed. The mayor is from an old-time Disciples family and is himself a devout member of the church. His opponents tried to secure his recall recently, but this effort was considered as a joke in Ft. Worth.

Baptist General Board of Promotion Elects Officers

The Baptist General Board of Promotion met in Indianapolis on November 3 and elected their officers for the coming year. Dr. Emory W. Hunt of Bucknell University was made president of the board; Rev. S. J. Skevington of Los Angeles, vice president; Mrs. W. S. Abernathy of Washington, second vice president. John Y. Aitchison of New York was continued as general director. He was formerly the home missions leader of the denomination. H. A. Heath was made secretary of conferences and conventions, and F. W. Padelford secretary of publicity and statistics. This denomination was once very loosely organized, but under the exigencies of the times it has been necessary to develop a high degree of centralization.

Boston Has Another Forum

In Boston the inhabitants, like those of ancient Athens, spend much time in hearing or telling a new thing. The Forum movement is peculiarly adapted to the temperament of the Bostonese. Old South Congregational church, of which Dr. Gordon is pastor, has developed a Forum which may rival in interest the well-known meeting in Ford Hall. The speakers for the winter months are all eminent people. Dr. Toyokichi Iyenaga will speak on Nov. 27 on "Need America Fear Japan?" On January 8 William Hard, the journalist, will tell the story of the disarmament congress now in session in Washington.

Statistical Study of Methods

Preachers may argue endlessly over methods and not be able to agree so the Board of Sunday schools of the Presbyterian church has decided to apply the statistical method to some of the problems. Do attendance contests in the Sunday schools help or hinder in the long run? Thirty-two schools in the San Francisco presbytery were studied, and it was found that twenty-two of these had used the contest method. They had a twenty per cent gain in membership and average attendance while the others had only eleven per cent gain.

Issues that Agitate Southern Methodism

Nearly every denomination likes to talk about some perennial question which is never settled, but which relieves ennui whenever other matters of more urgent nature are not on the forum for discussion. In southern Methodism a change of name is one of these questions. It is obvious that it is a little foolish for the Methodist Episcopal church, South, to be working in the northern provinces of China, and trying to explain that south in the United States is north in China.

And then the limiting word hinders development in sections of the country other than in those states once connected with the confederacy. There are some insurgent spirits who continually assert that the presiding eldership should be abolished. It costs money is the reason usually assigned, but there is probably a deeper reason. A presiding elder is a person who comes around every three months to investigate the parish church and some ministers regard him as a nuisance. On this question there would naturally be two points of view.

Religious Toleration the Law in Palestine

The Zionists are not particularly pleased with the ruling that immigrant Jews will be admitted to Palestine only as fast as they can secure employment. The High Commissioner Samuel, himself a Jew, has taken the position that the old Arab inhabitants of the country have prior rights. All religions will be given an equal footing, and in view of the fact that three great world religions have holy places in the land, the task of the commissioner is none too easy. Many Zionists have the hope that factories may be developed in Palestine, and thus a land which is none too fertile for agriculture may be made a great industrial country. These hopes are regarded by other Jews as chimerical.

Sensational Preaching Is Denounced in Press

One of the reasons why sensational preaching tends to decrease in the nation is the unwillingness of the press to exploit it. If some conscienceless preacher wants to discuss "pajama parties" with his eye on the reporter in the back pew he has little reward for his pains for many great newspapers have closed their columns to this kind of homiletic trash. As illustrative of this attitude is a recent editorial utterance of the Boston Herald: "The church that lasts must have a foundation of substantial and thoughtful men and women. As a rule the preacher who gets the ear of the public by sensational methods, making his pulpit rather notorious than famous, does not develop such lasting congregations."

Kansas Presbyterians Want the World to Know

Religious people once affected to be very independent of the mediums of publicity. This attitude of aloofness to newspapers is happily passing away and in many sections machinery is being set up to carry the story of church progress to the ends of the earth. Not only does the general assembly of the Presbyterian church have an efficient publicity department, but some of the synods or state organizations, of the denomination are developing publicity methods. The synod of Kansas, which met recently, has authorized the appointment of three elders who shall be newspaper men and who shall be charged with sending synod news throughout the state. These elders are directed to employ the young men of the department of journalism of the College of Emporia to assist in this worthy enterprise.

Disciples Enumerate Aids in Immigrant Work

A recent publication of the Disciples is one put out by the Sunday school council setting forth a list of religious publications for immigrants. Not only are Disciples publications listed, but those of all other denominations as well. It is shown that Disciples have literature for Chinese, French, Japanese, Russian and Spanish peoples. The astonishing assertion is made that the Disciples lead all the denominations in work among the French people of this country. It is equally astonishing to find that no Disciples Sunday school publications have yet been issued in a foreign language for any immigrant people of this country.

Religious Education Workers Will Meet at Madison

Religious education is rapidly becoming a profession and there are in the state of Wisconsin enough of these professional workers to constitute themselves into a convention. The second state convention of the R. E. A. will be held at Madison, November 21-23. This meeting will be attended by presidents of Wisconsin colleges, and heads of biblical departments in these colleges, by directors or professors, of religious education, by university pastors and by boards that direct religious work in universities. The object of the approaching meeting is to formulate a statewide interdenominational religious education program for Wisconsin, including the university. A leading speaker announced is Professor Charles Foster Kent of Yale.

Congregational Union Addressed by Bishop

Bishops are now frequent visitors in non-conformist meetings in England, and the spirit of reconciliation is in the air. The Congregational Union of England met in Bristol recently and the Bishop of Bristol was present to make a speech. He reminded his auditors that the Congregational fathers would be a little shocked were they to return to earth and find a Congregational moderator in each zone doing something of the work of a bishop; and Dr. Jones serving as a chairman of moderators. The Congregationalist has the good grace to laugh at the thrust of the bishop. The younger Congregationalists are largely committed to the cause of union, though not a union of unconditional surrender.

Church Supplies the Community Newspaper

Following the lead of Rev. Clay Trusty and several other ministers of Indianapolis, who have for a number of years published community newspapers in that city, Rev. Abbo E. Abben, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Le Claire, Ia., is publishing a paper for two small towns which carries the community news, and which also serves as a propagandist medium for his church. But for his enterprise two towns would be entirely without a medium of acquaintance, and the service which the church is rendering in this section is very much appreciated by the people. Mr. Trusty has made his paper pay financially, but the Iowa venture is still too new for one to predict what its financial future will be.

Presbytery Inquires Most Important Church Need

Churches have spiritual needs of which they are perennially conscious, but in addition to these the methods of organization have constant need of revision to meet modern conditions. Among the activities of the California synod of Presbyterians this year was a questionnaire sent to the various presbyteries of the state inquiring the most outstanding needs in the presbytery with regard to organization and methods of work. The following formulation of findings has been made: "Inquiry made as to the most important needs of each presbytery showed five presbyteries urging equipment, four recommending better salaries and administration budgets, four recommending better administration, three seeking good pastors, three asking for emphasis on evangelism, two asking for staff workers, two for family religion, two for missionary education, two for women's organizations, two for better missionary spirit, one for new Sunday Schools, one for more conferences, one for a pastor-evangelist, one for boy's work, one for more hours given to religious education, one for more religious life, one for young people's ideals, one to prevent the high school wastage."

Sunday School Leader Returns from Eururopean Trip

Among the forces making for an international consciousness in Christianity is the World's Sunday School Association. Mr. W. C. Pearce, associate general secretary, has recently returned from an extensive trip in Europe. He held conferences in the Scandinavian countries, Holland, Germany, France and among several Slavic peoples. Mr. Pearce arrived in New York on October 24 and is now busy in preparing a report of his journeys, which may be given the very widest publicity. He holds that the remedy for the war evil is to be found in the religious education of the children of the various nations. With this opinion many wise students of human nature will agree.

Presbyterians Want Opportunity to Present Christian Vocations

The shortage of ministers is a world problem on which there is much comment at the present time. The Presbyterians of California believe that this problem will never be solved unless the attack is made on young men earlier than the college period. In most high schools vocational talks are given from time to time. The Presbyterians hope to induce ministerial associations in various cities to unite in the request that addresses be made in every California high school this year on the subject of the Christian callings. The ministry, the mission field and a number of allied Christian vocations are to be presented in their true light as heroic consecration to the community good, and a kind of consecration which is powerfully influential in the building of the life of the next generation. Following the high school addresses a state conference will be held of Presbyterian young people who may be interested in taking up a Christian vocation, and in the state conference the ways and means will be explained.

High School Boys Will Face Life Problems

The Y. M. C. A. is unique among Christian organizations in its program of bringing purpose into the lives of young people. Not only are college young men gathered at Lake Geneva in the summer, there is also a program for "older boys" who are mostly of high school age. In the state of Illinois the latter part of November there will be held an older boy's conference which will be addressed by men who have special experience in this kind of task. The obligation of the boys to make a Christian investment of their lives is brought home to them, not only in the choice of a vocation, but in the planning of avocations as well. The college age is often too late to have the largest effect on boys and many students of young life insist that the high school age is the most impressionable period of all for the discussion of vocational problems and moral questions.

State Organization With a Service Program

Denominations with a congregational polity have had a rapid change in the function of the city and state missionary organizations in recent years. This is well illustrated in the program of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, the only tie that links the Disciples churches of Illinois together. This society once found its chief motive in the founding of new churches and perhaps half of the churches of the state in one way or another owe their existence to this organization. In recent years the development of proper church methods in existing churches through district superintendents has been a marked feature. Churches that cannot support a minister alone are linked together to call a minister to the service of two or three churches. Churches and ministers are introduced to each other and gradually a purely missionary organization has evolved into one administrative in character. Rev. H. H. Peters is secretary of the organization, and it is supported by an annual offering taken in November.

Minister Plans the Whole Winter's Preaching

The ministry of a strong preacher is usually marked by pedagogical method. Sermon subjects are not casual and unrelated ideas but are the result of a deliberate plan to educate the people in religion. Rev. M. L. Pontius of Jacksonville is pastor of the largest Disciples church of Illinois and the largest church of any denomination in Jacksonville. He has printed his sermon subjects for a period of five months so that the people may know in advance his homiletical program. In his audience are many students from the educational institutions of Jacksonville.

Ministerial Experience Leads to a Novel

The minister-authors of the country have in many instances been led to their writing by some vivid experience of the pastoral life. Dr. Daniel F. Fox, pastor of First Congregational church of Pasadena, Cal., wrote his first novel in that way. One day a convert from a penitentiary came into the minister's study and told his troubles. He needed work to live honestly, for he had upon him the support of a wife and daughter. The minister, brooding over his experience in helping this man, conceived the plan of his recent novel, called "The Vindication of Robert Creighton." It is said to have a special appeal for young people.

John R. Mott Organizes for Student Relief

Dr. John R. Mott, head of the International Y. M. C. A., is now sponsoring a plan of relief for students in various war-stricken countries. One of the greatest needs in the rehabilitation of these countries is educated leadership. Of this leadership there is but a meager supply, and it is still open to question whether many institutions of learning will not have to close their doors. Already money has been raised and distributed in 120 different institutions of higher learning, and 70,000 students have been benefited in some measure. The Student Friendship Fund is being organized by Dr. Mott, and it is hoped to raise $500,000 in the United States during the coming year.

Missionary Shows Panther Skin

Dr. Mary Longdon, a Disciples Missionary of India, was very seriously injured by a panther in India last year when she went out to investigate a commotion in her hen-house. Later the panther was trapped by another missionary, and now Dr. Longdon exhibits the skin to wondering friends. The panther skin was on exhibit at Winona Lake, Ind., during the international convention, at the Disciples' missionary booth. Dr. Longdon is now speaking in local churches in various parts of the country.

Methodists Make Positive Suggestions on Recreation

Too long has Methodism contented itself with negative suggestions with regard to recreation. This is the first denomination to establish a department which will make positive suggestions. One of the forms of recreation which will be to the front this year among Methodists will be pitching horse-shoes. For the man who cannot join a golf club this recreation has the advantage of cheapness, and to some it will be even more exciting. For the young people "eats" will be a prominent feature in the program. In place of the dance and the card parties and the theaters there is a long list of the encouraged recreations which do not violate any of the provisions to be found in the book of discipline of the church.

Federation Secures Publicity for Religion

The Council of Churches of Dayton, O., is a very successful city federation. Rev. Irvin E. Deer is executive secretary. Among its varied activities the past year has been an ambitious program of religious publicity. A bill posting firm donates $720 worth of space to the churches, and at an expense of $260 lithographs were secured which helped to make prominent a go-to-church campaign. The secretary kept the files of the local newspapers for August, and it was shown that these papers gave the churches eighteen and one-half pages of news space in that period. Fifty per cent of the protestant news was written by the executive secretary. On November 14 Prof. Alva W. Taylor, who spent the summer in Europe in the study of international questions, spoke at a dinner meeting of the Council of Churches.

The Infinite Artist

By Frederick F. Shannon

Minister Central Church, Chicago

CENTRAL CHURCH is a Chicago institution. It has been more fortunate than most other similarly distinguished pulpits in great cities in securing, when a change has been required, a man who could succeed under the peculiar conditions of an independent church worshipping in a rented down-town auditorium. This volume takes title from the opening sermon. "An Abounding Personality" is Dr. Shannon's tribute to his predecessor, Frank W. Gunsaulus. Other sermons included are: The Infinite Artist; the Larger Freedom; Christ's Judgment of the Universe; The Iron Gate; The Supreme Originality; To Athens—and Beyond; Housekeeping and Soulkeeping; New and Old; The Dreamer.

Price $1.25, plus 13 cents postage.

Children by Chance or by Choice

By William Hawley Smith, Author of "The Evolution of Dodd," "All the Children of All the People," etc.

Both in theory and teaching, this book is in perfect harmony with the sermon by Maude Royden, "A WOMAN'S VIEW OF THE VIRGIN BIRTH," which appeared in The Christian Century for Oct. 20th, 1921.

Like the author of that sermon, Mr. Smith believes that sex in humanity is not depraved and sinful, in and of itself; but that, on the contrary, it is God-ordained, and that its most sacred function is intelligent, deliberately-planned and loving parenthood. He also holds that, besides this primal characteristic, there is a purposely-instituted, unique and entirely human quality included, which reveals itself in various forms of affectional expression, which, righteously exercised, make for the physical, mental and spiritual well-being of husbands and wives, in no uncertain way. This view of the subject is thoroughly original with the author, and is productive of the most searching thought on the part of the reader.

The book is of special interest to young parents, and will prove itself of untold value to all such. It has received the highest commendations from noted physicians and distinguished clergymen in this country and abroad.

court every morning. The idea in this plan is that the ministers may become acquainted with the administration of justice, and that the court may feel the reinforcement of the better element of the city in his decisions.

Fighting Parson Made Chaplain of American Legion

At the recent national meeting of the American Legion, Rev. Earl Blackman, Disciples pastor of Chanute, Kan., and widely known in his state as the "fighting parson," was made chaplain. The office was one for which there was considerable contest, but the man from Chanute won by a big majority and it was made unanimous. During the war he issued a challenge that he would box any other chaplain in the army. His challenge was accepted by six other parsons, but the higher-ups stopped the fight, to the great disappointment of the "dough-boys."

Gives Up Double- Barrelled Profession"

Dr. Burris A. Jenkins, who for three years has been pastor of Linwood Boulevard Christian church, Kansas City, Mo., and editor of the Kansas City Post, has resigned his position with the newspaper. The announcement came as a great surprise to his friends. On the Sunday following the announcement the minister referred to the persistent rumor of recent years that he had taken over the newspaper in order to become United States senator. He told his congregation that he had no such desire and that he would rather be pastor of Linwood church than to be United States senator. Under his editorial management the Kansas City Post has made a large gain in circulation, and has become widely influential. As editor of the Post Dr. Jenkins defended the Versailles treaty, and exalted the ideal of world peace.

Methodist Mission Work Stirs Up Brazilian Ecclesiastic

The educational work of the Methodist church in Brazil is now strong enough to encounter the most bitter opposition on the part of the Roman ecclesiastics of the country. Recently the Archbishop of Marianna sent out a pastoral to all his parishes warning them of the "insidious" Methodist educational program. The archbishop says: "It is not the love of the truth that induces the American sects to spend in their protestant propaganda sums so large that they mount up to millions of dollars. If it is love of their neighbor and the love of God that brings them to be missionaries to us, as with badly dissimulated feigning they affirm, why do they not make use of this charity in bringing to better terms the unfaithful who abound in the United States more than in any other country in the world that calls itself Christian? From the statistics of the republic it is known that there are living there sixty millions of men without religion, without baptism, with no religious belief. There are more heathen there than in all the other American republics put together. The reason lies in the assiduity the American Protestant has in dominating in South America, and even beyond. With fine and sagacious perspicacity they recognize that the most efficacious way to unite men, a way stronger than politics, or the sympathy of race, stronger even than blood kinship, is the tie of religion. From this comes their desperate perseverance in wanting to convert us Brazilians to the sects of the north, because once they succeed in uniting us to them in religion, the highway is open to dominate us in politics, in commerce and to establish in Brazil the American imperialism."

Four Hundred Thousand for France and Belgium

The executive committee of the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Memorial Fund recently passed a motion guaranteeing to give one dollar for every three contributed by others towards the rehabilitation of Protestant work in France and Belgium. Already the Commission on Relations with France and Belgium of the Federal Council of Churches has drawn $55,898.83 of the possible $100,000. It is hoped that before this arrangement expires on December 31 enough more may be raised to meet the maximum possibility of help from the Rockefeller Memorial Fund. The Federal Council is also making a call for aid to the French churches in carrying on foreign mission work. Sixty million colonials now live under the French flag, and mission work in these lands must be in the French language. French Protestant churches have since the war doubled the foreign mission offerings but the Federal Council proposes to supplement their efforts with aid to the extent of eighty thousand dollars a year. Most of this money would be expended on African territory, and much in the lands from which the French colonial troops came when they helped in the winning of the war.

Over Eight Thousand Young People Become Missionaries

THE Students Volunteer Movement has become by all means the most important agency of the church in the recruiting of the missionary force in foreign lands. Since the movement began, a total of 8,742 young people have gone to foreign lands under the direction of the various mission boards. These young people were in their college life filled with the missionary passion and made intelligent with regard to the needs of the great fields of the world. The distribution of these young people on the various fields is significant. China leads with 2,709; India follows with 1,703; then come Japan and Korea with 1,052; Africa with 942; South America with 624; Western Asia with 289.

The past year has been the most gratifying in the whole history of the movement. The increase in number sailing to the fields over the preceding year was 25 per cent, and the increase over the average of the past ten years was over 50 per cent. In the early days of the movement President James McCosh of Princeton wrote with regard to the movement: "Has any such offering of living young men and women been presented in our age, in our country, in any age, or in any country, since the day of Pentecost?" If these words were true when they were spoken how much the more are they true in the light of the great missionary achievement of the past ten years.

The Student Volunteer Movement collects statistics with regard to the religious activities of their students while they are in college. It has been learned that the past year one in ten of the volunteers has been president of a Christian association. These young people have also been useful in the local churches, eight in ten of the women teaching in Sunday schools and five in ten of the men being similarly engaged.

Mission study in the colleges has been promoted among young people who do not intend to go to the foreign field. During the past year 271 institutions reported 781 classes in mission study, and in these classes 19,269 men and women were enrolled. Twenty-two institutions organized "World Problems Forums" and these were attended by 4,508 students.

Strong demand has been made upon the organization to organize groups in the local churches, but this tendency has been resisted. The Missionary Education movement now serves that need and large numbers of young people throughout the land not enrolled in college are carrying on mission study courses. The Student Volunteer movement claims the credit of starting the Missionary Education movement.

Not only do the students study missions and induce others to do so, but they are making missionary contributions as never before. The movement in its annual reports from students makes inquiry about the giving to the various home and foreign mission boards. The amount last year was $240,550 last year as against $135,919 the preceding year.

College executives bear tribute to the educational influence of the Student Volunteer movement. It is one of the very few forces which induce students to think internationally, and the latter kind of thinking is one of the very greatest needs of the day.

The organization of the movement is carried on by sixteen men and women secretaries, so it will be seen that a relatively small budget suffices to keep the work going. These sixteen men and women touched the lives of ten thousand students last year in thirty-seven volunteer union conferences in the United States and Canada.

Amid all the alleged materialism and lack of faith among students in the colleges and universities today, the Student Volunteer movement is an encouraging evidence of the fact that this generation of young people, no less than preceding generations, has heard the call of the heroic and is willing to follow a leader in great exploits which will add to the annals of heroism which make the race glorious.

"The Church's Stake in the Armament Conference"

A SERIES OF EDITORIALS on "The Church's Stake in the Armament Conference" is beginning now in The Christian Century. In no peaceful period has the church given so much evidence of a vital interest in the essentially Christian business of abolishing war as in the past few months. Enlightened Christian churchmen are coming to regard the Washington conference as an event in whose issue and outcome they have, as Christians, the most vital stake. They feel, moreover, that the responsibility of creating an atmosphere not merely of ardent expectancy but of moral demand rests peculiarly upon them and their churches in these crucial, vibrant weeks. This conviction has been finding steady expression in The Christian Century, in whose pages are discussed from week to week the great issues of the social order, of industry and business, of states and communities, of Christian unity, of theology and ethics, of the personal spiritual life—and all with a candor unrestricted by denominational interests and horizons. No thoughtful man or woman, inside the church or outside, can afford to be without this free interpreter of religion in these great days.

FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

SIGNIFICANT APPRECIATIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

REV. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y.

"I regard The Christian Century as one of the very best religious papers published in the country, and always read it not only with interest but with profit. Wherever I go among men who are wide-awake, I find they are reading your journal."

JOHN SPARGO, famed socialist-philosopher, New York.

"Of all the religious journals coming to my desk the one that I regularly and carefully read with the closest attention and interest is The Christian Century. I admire its editorial policy for its courage, its forcefulness and its devotion to fundamental Christian ideals. It is a great American journal."

REV. CHARLES E. GILKEY, Hyde Park Baptist Church, Chicago.

"I have been reading religious periodicals during the last ten years, but not one of them has contributed either to my thinking, preaching or living, anything like the wealth of guidance and inspiration that I find in The Christian Century."

PROF. HARRY F. WARD, Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.

"I consider The Christian Century the most promising venture in the field of religious journalism in the English-speaking world. It is on the way to create a common mind among the leaders of Christianity in this country, because it is leading them to think about common problems in the spirit of the Gospels."

PRES. W. H. P. FAUNCE, Brown University.

"I read every paragraph in The Christian Century every week with constantly growing satisfaction. Religious newspapers frequently put us into an irreligious mood, but here is one which, whether we agree with its specific opinions or not, has the horizon of the New Testament and the boundless sympathy of the Nazarene. Here is a journal that puts first things first and leaves the petty things far out on the circumference."

SHERWOOD EDDY, missionary statesman and prophet.

"The Christian Century holds a unique place in American journalism. Among the few journals that have stood for complete social justice and a full social gospel I believe The Christian Century holds a unique place. It is fearlessly sounding forth the truth that America in general and the Christian church in particular need to hear."

EDWIN MARKHAM, widely-famed poet.

"I consider The Christian Century one of the most progressive, if not the most progressive, church paper, in a social sense, that I have ever read. I want its editor to know that I am back of him with all my power."

LOUIS F. POST, formerly Assistant Secretary of Labor.

"The Christian Century emphasizes the principles of the golden rule, the second great commandment and the Lord's prayer, and inculcates their application not only to life for the next world, but also to life in this world."

REV. CORNELIUS WOELFKIN, Fifth Ave. Baptist Church, N. Y.

"The Christian Century is the one publication which comes to my home that gets a reading straight through upon its arrival, and I always anticipate its coming."

PRES. OZORA S. DAVIS, Chicago Theological Seminary.

"There are some things that a man cannot get on without in these days; The Christian Century is one of them. I do not subscribe to all that you write or include in your columns, for sometimes you make me wrathful. But I have never detected a cheap or insincere note in the paper. You are fearless and constructive and are leading the way. I have found your journal on the tables of men from the Atlantic to the Pacific in a somewhat wide cruise this year. I find that The Christian Century is a sort of earmark of honest and alert thinking, and its absence—well, it may mean only that the person has not the price of the paper, although above all things it is worth the price."

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?

The People of Tipi Sapa

The Folk-Lore of the Dakota or Sioux Indians. Gleaned from "Tipi Sapa," the REV. P. J. DELORIA, by SARAH EMILIA OLDEN. With foreword by HUGH LATIMER BURLESON, Bishop of South Dakota.

Handsome as a gift book, valuable as a study of the Sioux Indians in their days of savagery, absorbing in its missionary interest, this book may be said to LEAD among the Christian books of the year. Across the double fly leaf, front and back, is a beautiful Pipe of Peace in colors. Twenty full-page illustrations perpetuate scenes of Indian life, many of them reproduced from pictures in the American Museum of Natural History, New York. The eighteen chapters tell of the ante-civilization life of the Sioux—their Training of Children, Marriage, Fighting, Ghosts, Communicating with Spirits, Buffalo Hunting, Societies, Games, Sun Dance, etc. The cover shows a striking Indian design in Indian colors.

This book is a remarkable one.

The Spirit of Peace

"The Spirit of Peace—that is what we want today," begins the Preface. "None of our problems are really incapable of solution, not even the problems of Russia, Ireland, or of Industrial Peace at Home, and still less of the Reunion of Christendom, if the real Spirit of Peace, the will to find a way to Peace, was present. These Sermons and Addresses, spoken at various times and in various places during the last two years, are part of a ceaseless effort to produce the Spirit of Peace in the World."

The sermons contained in this volume amply set forth the spirit thus stated by their author. There are four sermons preached during Advent and Christmas, 1919, seven during Septuagesima, Lent, and Easter, three in Ascensiontide, six on Trinity and After, and two in Advent, 1920.

The Bishop of London is probably the foremost popular preacher in the Anglican Communion and his successive volumes of sermons are awaited with great interest.

EDITORIAL

John Hay's Voice in the Washington Conference

AT this august moment with China forming the background of a conference of the world's powers looking toward peace, there is something singularly heartening in the words of the great hymn written by John Hay, secretary of state under Mr. Roosevelt, and author of the open door policy in China. Whatever hopes China has in the present conference grow out of or refer back to the policy defined by Mr. Hay when that sleeping nation was being awakened by the boisterous knocking of the western powers and Japan upon her doors, demanding commercial privileges and special concessions with bases and sphere of influence and all the now familiar rights of exploitation. The story of Mr. Hay's vigorous assertion of the policy of the open door makes one of the fairest of chapters in the record of American diplomacy. This same man speaks now at the Washington conference through the principles which his lucid statesmanship then and there gave formulation. But he speaks also in another mood through the great hymn which, all unconscious of its timeliness, the hand of the advertiser placed in last week's issue of The Christian Century on the page opposite the one on which the reader's eye now rests. For the purpose of the present editorial we have asked that it be placed there again this week. It is the master work of this master statesman. It should have been sung immediately after Dr. Abernethy's prayer at the opening of the Washington conference. It expresses the Christian attitude toward the mighty tasks in hand. Over against the helpless fatalism which found unfortunate expression in President Harding's pre-conference utterances as to what we might expect from the conference, John Hay protested that the destinies of mankind were in the control of man's will backed up by the will of God. To pray "Thy will be done" is no impotent act of sterile resignation, but a militant act of courage and accomplishment. God wills international brotherhood. He wills the banishment of war. In the face of the thousands of years of war-filled history, in the face of "human nature as it is," to pray the Lord's prayer is to share God's will against war with a faith that " . . . springs like the eagle,

Who soars to meet the sun,
And cries exulting unto Thee,
O Lord, Thy will be done!"

This, and this alone, is Christian faith. And this faith alone has the promise of victory.

Does Japan Wish War With the United States?

IT seems increasingly necessary that American public sentiment should discriminate between the two attitudes of mind represented among the Japanese people. There is unquestionably a very strong militaristic group which has in time past dominated the national policy. But it must also be kept in mind that this is by no means representative of the nation as a whole. The late premier, Mr. Hara, was chosen as an advocate of friendly relations with the outer world, and especially with the United States. The fact that his assassination has not changed the political program of Japan, but that he has been succeeded by a member of his own group, is significant. Moreover the assassination itself will organize sentiment in sympathy with the plans he had under way. Recent visitors to Japan, among whom is Dr. Fosdick of New York declare that the American people know but little of the very impressive liberal movement which against heavy odds is making itself felt in Japan. This is manifested in a growing freedom of the press in attacking the government whenever its tendency is reactionary and militaristic. A professor, Mr. Ozarki, recently organized an important campaign in behalf of disarmament. Not long ago a group of young men who had completed their terms of compulsory military service were met on their return by their townfolk carrying a banner inscribed "Congratulations upon your release from prison." In a recent post-card canvass regarding disarmament, 30,000 replies were received, 94 per cent of which were in favor of the limitation of armament. The visit of Madam Yajima to this country, with her formidable petition from the women of Japan to President Harding invoking his services in behalf of world disarmament and peace, is another impressive sign of Japanese sentiment. It is unfortunate that people should put all Japanese in one category and imagine that America must be either pro-Japanese or anti-Japanese. It is rather our obligation to encourage the progressive, liberal and pacific spirit which is so marked among the Japanese people, and prove in as many ways as possible the friendliness of the United States to this trans-Pacific neighbor.

Would Make Lynching a Crime

THE peculiar American crime that compels our nation to hang its head is that of lynching. One can scarcely find any analogy of this practice in any civilized nation of the world. It is a sheer survival from a primitive state of society. Whatever defense lynching may have had when distance prevented the proper organization of legal machinery, has long since been lost. An anti-lynch bill is now before congress which would go a long way in bringing to an end this disgraceful practice. The bill is sponsored by Representative Dyer of Missouri. Any state or municipal officer who fails to protect a prisoner from death at the hands of a mob would be, according to this bill, subject to a heavy fine and imprisonment up to five years. In addition to this provision, any county in which a lynching takes place would be subject to a fine of ten thousand dollars to be paid into the federal treasury. The idea of fining a whole county is unique and helps to deal with those backward communities where it is impossible to secure any evidence against the men who participate in mob violence. The bill deserves the support of Christian citizenship, for the solution of the race question is greatly complicated by lynching. The Negro people have come to the place in their development where they are able to voice their protest against this caricature of justice, and newspapers throughout the country with Negro editors are talking very plainly about the various illegal practices under which they suffer. There is only one way in which two races can dwell together in the same land, and that is on the basis of equal justice to both. Any other basis means continual struggle. The white race is numerically stronger, and has many more centuries of civilization. It is clearly the duty of this race to take the lead in movements which will lead to the peaceful relation of blacks and whites in the republic. President Harding has recently spoken a brave word in the city of Atlanta. He demanded for the Negroes their civil rights. There are mutterings on the part of the belated element in the southland, but for the most part the nation, north and south, approves.

The Church, an Eagle or an Ostrich

ECHOES of the recent Ecumenical Conference of Methodists in London betray unmistakable dissatisfaction with the results of its deliberations. Dr. George Jackson, in the Manchester Guardian, thinks it lacked picturesqueness as well as vitality; it made little impression, he says, upon London. Dr. Lofthouse of Handsworth College, Birmingham, says it reminded him of the fable of the eagle and the ostrich in the presence of threatening danger, and that it adopted the attitude of the ostrich. It had a magnificent opportunity to mobilize world-wide moral forces; "but, after the manner of most ecclesiastical assemblies," it contented itself with timid, tepid resolutions on the problems and perils of modern times. The conference convened in "a world impoverished by losses, torn by brute force, tormented by lust, and yet there was not a single reference to it all." Of course, he would make an exception in the case of prohibition, but that was provoked by the attack of Lord Northcliffe. Dr. Platt says that what impressed him most of all was the lack of religion, of the spiritual atmosphere. "Worldly wisdom and the desire to figure in the public eye obviously prevailed. There was endless speech, but little vital insight and eloquence." No doubt every religious gathering is disappointing to ardent, forward-looking men, but this is an unusual list of outspoken indictments; and it raises many questions about the utility of such assemblies. A world conference ought to deal with world problems, and it must have vision and courage. Reports of the conference in London suggest that there may be something in the widespread conviction as to the bankruptcy of religious leadership.

Denver Strike Report Published

DURING August and September of 1920 occurred the Denver tramway strike and controversy, which involved the loss of the lives of seven persons, and serious injury to several others; the demoralization of street railway service; the destruction of much valuable property; the importation of armed strikebreakers; the intervention of federal troops and military law for a month; the imprisonment of seven members of the executive board of the labor union on a sentence of ninety days; the wrecking of the offices of a daily newspaper; the dislocation of more than a thousand of Denver's workingmen, and their replacement by a new body of employes, and a marked increase of industrial strife and bitterness. The issue was so important to the moral as well as the industrial interests of the city that a representative company of church people met about the middle of August and appointed a Commission of Religious Forces to make a careful investigation of the conditions and their causes, and to make a suitable report. This commission was made up of nine members, with Mr. James H. Causey as chairman, and included representatives of the Protestant churches, Roman Catholics and Jews. The services were secured of Dr. Edward T. Devine, representing the Federal Council of Churches, and of Dr. John A. Ryan and Dr. John A. Lapp of the National Catholic Welfare Council. A very careful and exhaustive inquiry was made into all the facts connected with the unfortunate episode, and an attempt was made to estimate the responsibility of the three groups involved in the controversy: the tramway company, the labor unions, and the city administration and public in general. The publication has been long delayed, owing to the complexity of the problems involved, and the difficulty of arriving at an unbiassed judgment. Now that the report has appeared, it will be studied with deep interest by those concerned for the progress of intelligent social concern for social questions, and the best means of obviating labor disturbances of this sort. The churches of Denver are to be congratulated upon the measure of solicitude manifested by them in this lamentable affair. The report may be secured on request to the office of the Federal Council of Churches in New York or Chicago.

General Foch True to His Religion

AS General Foch visits one after another of the American cities on his triumphal progress through the land, he does not hesitate to let his religious loyalties be known. While in Chicago he declined the protection of a guard on his way to church. It was his habit to go every Sunday without a guard. Though Clemenceau did not personally like Marshal Foch, he became convinced that here was the man who could mobilize not only the material resources of the allies, but their spiritual resources as well. It is after all in the matter of morale that a war is finally settled. Though Marshal Foch be of the Catholic faith, he will make it a little easier for men of all religions to stand by their convictions as he passes through the country. The young man whose hero is a military character learns from the simple piety of the old warrior that courage and piety are not mutually exclusive principles but rather are twin forces.

Deplorable Conditions on Ellis Island

THE newspapers have had many vivid reports of wretched conditions into which the immigrants at Ellis Island have been plunged on their arrival in America with high hopes for life in the land of liberty and opportunity. The rude and discourteous treatment of these unhappy people has been made the theme of caustic and revealing articles by special correspondents in different parts of the country. The authorities are claiming that these statements have been exaggerated, or that the conditions are being remedied. There are good reasons to believe, however, that very little has been done to change the deplorable conditions which prevail at Ellis Island, and which impose almost indescribable hardships and humiliation upon whole groups of people arriving from other lands. American citizens are in no mood to have the national ideals interpreted to people who come from other lands in terms of discourtesy by ignorant and impudent public servants, who fail utterly to appreciate the treatment due even the poorest and most ignorant of those who seek the hospitality of American citizenship. The bureau of immigration should be made to realize that a very deep sentiment of indignation is being fostered in the minds of intelligent people by the continuance of these reports, and that drastic measures will unquestionably be taken as the result of this public sentiment if conditions are not improved. The good name of America is not to be smirched by irresponsible and arrogant conduct of men who treat human beings like animals as they are herded into immigrant quarters on Ellis Island.

The Reconstructed Church at Rheims

ONE phase of the European war which touches sensitively American Protestantism is the devastation wrought among the Protestant churches of France by the destructive agencies of the war. A score of churches belonging to the rather limited and unresourceful Protestant group were destroyed, and one of these was the Protestant church in the old town of Rheims, where such destruction was wrought upon the beautiful cathedral. One of the earliest efforts of the French Protestants has been the reconstruction of churches in the most important places, of which this is one, and on October 23rd the cornerstone of the new church was laid. Out of their deep poverty the Protestant community have gathered 250,000 francs, and friends have contributed an amount almost as large. Of the 400 churches belonging to the Evangelical Reformed communion in France thirty-five were partially wrecked and twelve totally destroyed. The new church at Rheims is only one of many efforts now being made by French Protestants to restore their faith throughout the land. They have wrought heroically to this end, and the laying of the cornerstone of the new church at Rheims is an evidence of their faith and consecration in spite of war and its terrible losses. They are deserving of the help of American Protestants, many of whom have already contributed through the Federal Council of Churches to the restoration work in France and Belgium.

Making the Bible Say What it Means

ANOTABLE service has been performed in behalf of a clearer understanding of the Bible by scholars who have turned the classic language of the Scriptures into modern speech. It is often the case that a measure of familiarity with the verbal forms of expression to which one has grown accustomed may prevent an adequate understanding of a passage. The more colloquial versions, like the Twentieth Century New Testament, the Common Speech New Testament, Weymouth's Version, Moffatt's and others of the same order have proved valuable in making old texts live with new meaning. Suppose one reads 1 Corinthians 13, with one of these recent renderings: "Love is never glad when others go wrong, love is gladdened by goodness, always slow to expose, always eager to believe the best, always hopeful, always patient." It may be that something of the stateliness and classic precision of the Authorized and Revised Versions is missing. But there is an unescapable directness and thrust in the new phrasing which forbids its being read in any commonplace or complaisant mood. Objection has often been made to the employment of the newer and less conventional versions in public worship. That of course is a matter of individual taste and discretion on the part of the minister. But for private study of the Bible nothing is likely to be more freshening and suggestive than one of the authentic translations that put the thought of the original into the speech of today, and by avoidance of the familiar and reverential phrases of the common versions bring the mind with a certain mandatory compulsion face to face with the thought of the ancient writers.

The Church's Stake in the Armament Conference

NOT since slavery days has American Christianity experienced so unified and concentrated a purpose and feeling as during the four months since President Harding invited the leading nations into conference on the limitation of armaments. No wave of evangelism has ever called forth the emotion and commanded the will of the churches in a fashion equal to that of the cause of peace. The prohibition movement was more diffuse and sporadic in its progress, reaching at no time a stage of conscious crisis where the issue defined itself in simple terms which clearly demanded then and there the expression of Christian public opinion. The peace cause alone since the slavery issue has so defined itself. And the Christian consciousness throughout the whole nation has been aroused to a state of vibrancy and determination which must thrill every heart with a great new respect for the church and its holy faith. Ministry and laity in local churches, conventions and the responsible officary of the general church, and the entire religious press, show that they are recovering from the disillusionment and smothering effects of the Versailles treaty and are holding up their Christian heads again. The note of timidity and super-caution, of pessimism and fatality, which, alas, has crept into common and public speech in the past three years, has been conspicuously absent in the utterances of Christian faith in these recent days of approach to the Washington conference.

The church, it would seem, has come at last to feel deeply and with strongly rooted conviction that the business of making a warless world is primarily the church's business, if it is not indeed its primary and essential business. And it is flinging the weight of its words and the greater weight of its imponderable conviction with decisiveness into the scales of destiny. It is a sound reaction from the ethical bafflement of the war period, and a thrilling renaissance from the visionless indifference and irresponsibility of the two generations previous to the war when the pleadings of the peace cause found only here and there a soul with ears to hear.

The implications of this new awakening, this regeneration of Christian feeling that is now in process, are numerous and highly significant. Our churchmanship is coming to conceive the Christian task in large terms, in terms of the social, political and international system within which human life is carried on. Increasingly the church sees that it has a stake in every public crisis—in every strike, in every election, in every threatened war, in every legislative development, in every council of the rulers of the secular order. In the case of the armament conference the church's stake is enormous. The high purpose for which the diplomats have gathered in Washington is of the very genius of Christianity, and the new mood of our churchmanship will not let us rest until the full impact of the church's moral power has been brought directly to bear in furtherance of that high purpose. It grows more clear that the deputies of nations whose public opinion is predominantly Christian, are no mere instruments of the political state as such, but must be regarded as the organ of that public opinion which creates and upholds the state. And the responsibility of the Christian church to give to public opinion a Christian character, and to hold the state and its representatives responsible for carrying into practice that Christianized public opinion is one of the moral discoveries which our present day churchmanship is now in process of making.

The direct interest of the church in the Washington conference hardly lends itself to treatment in a specific article. A constant interpretation of religion's overt and objective involvement in the proceedings is being made in these pages and in all Christian newspapers during these weeks. But there are certain indirect and, one might say, subjective interests of which the church should be made conscious as the conference deliberations proceed. The first and most obvious of these may be stated thus:

The Washington conference is affording a providential opportunity for the Christian church to recover its prestige as leader of the moral life of mankind.

Such a statement carries our thought back to the fierce period of the war itself, back to certain facts from which all of us would rather avert our eyes. But the first duty of Christian thinking is to face reality. It is only a grim and honest facing of the truth, however humiliating it may be, that can make us free and give us the power of our mighty gospel. And the humiliating truth is that, taken as a whole, the church's relationship to the war was one of weakness, of spiritual unpreparedness, and of ethical bafflement. The effect of that tragic chapter in Christian history which is now drawing to a close has been to discount the leadership of the Christian church in the moral respect of mankind. And not of the church as an institution only, but of the very ideals and principles upon which it professes to be built. The war, which laid bare the skeleton structure of all our institutions and customs, exposing their weaknesses and injustices and false assumptions, showed no special leniency toward the church. It too went into the melting pot of public judgment, and it has not come out the same as it went in. Along with our political diplomacy, our educational system, our industrial scheme, and all other institutionalized relationships of our common life, the church too was stripped of its traditional assumptions and its sacrosanct irrelevancies, so that on the one hand its indispensable function in human well-being, and on the other hand, the pitiable inadequacy of its performance of its high function, stood vividly revealed. To all men they stood revealed—to churchmen and to non-churchmen. The traditional apologetic of the church was thrown into confusion by the war experience, and the chronic cynicism of those who used to scorn the church found demonstrable support in the church's failure at the supreme test.

These are strong words to come from the lips of friendship, but it is better for our churchmanship to sit down with drastic truth that we may rise up with power, than to seek companionship with comfortable illusion and not rise up at all. The truth is that the war revealed the church as lacking both the conviction and the technique required for the performance of that portion of its mission which can only be performed on a grand scale, a scale involving the control or conversion of the mighty forces of the international secular order. The church was dumb and impotent in the face of those forces that center in the state. The state was controlled by forces that were as yet unchristianized—pagan, primitive, pre-Christian in their character. And the utter helplessness of the church in the great crisis when those forces were unleashed, disclosed how utterly Christianity had failed to change them even after nineteen centuries of Christian activity in western society. This is our humiliation today. This is the scandal under which our Christianity rests. And this is the aspect of our Christian problem which has haunted our hearts since the armistice gave us a chance to recover our moral breath. For three years the Christian conviction of thoughtful souls has remained limp and enervated, hiding its face in the folds of its garments for shame at its impotence in the great moment to rescue the nations from fratricidal madness.

Only as we break up the war event into its various phases and trace the relationship of effective Christianity to the war in each phase, can we see how sound and true is the more or less instinctive sense of humiliation under which the Christian conscience now rests. For such a purpose the war resolves itself into four phases in each of which the incapacity of the Christian church stands revealed. There was first the period of approach to the war, then the moment of the precipitation of the war, then the period of actual fighting on the battlefield, and finally the period in which the peace was being made. In all four of these phases of the war event, as we now look back upon them, we cannot avoid seeing how inept and unprepared and visionless was the Christian church in the execution of its mission on the grand scale, a scale commensurate with the majesty of its program of making the kingdoms of this world into the kingdom of God. Let us consider these four phases in reverse order, the last first and the first last.

In the making of the peace the power of the church was simply not felt at all. It was not considered. The conference at Paris shunted every question that had to do with religion. But this was not the least serious aspect of the matter. It was not merely that the conference refused to face specific problems involving religious considerations, but it nowhere displayed any awareness of religion as a force that needed to be reckoned with in determining what kind of a peace should be made. Secular considerations, national interests, economic interests, punitive reparations, division of the spoils among the victors, the establishing of barriers of force against the recurrence of war from the same source—these were the substance of the problems of peace making. And these were the same considerations that had entered into the settlement of every war in history. The Napoleonic wars were settled in the same way, the Franco-Prussian war, the Punic wars—all wars. No new point of view emerged offering hope of a settlement, not merely of this war but of the whole problem of war. Yet the Christian church holds in its heart the secret of such a settlement. The President of the United States went to the conference with a vague but well intentioned idea of lifting the conference to a higher plane so that the ideals which we had come to believe we had been fighting for might be embodied in the peace. But his efforts resulted only in the creation of an organization of the victors to guarantee the results of their victory, an organization of force euphemistically named a league of nations. No Christian principle was utilized to remove the danger of future war. Demand was made that Germany repent. But there was no hint of repentance or of the need of repentance by the victorious allies for their age-long share in maintaining the very conditions out of which Germany's colossal crime had sprung. Germany's guilt was abysmal enough. But only less than hers was the guilt of all nations. The demand that Germany show signs of repentance and change of heart can never be made effective until all the nations accompany her to the mourner's bench with a confession of their common guilt. Yet during those tense months of secret counsellings at Paris this essentially Christian message appears not to have found a single spokesman either at that diplomatic front or in our national public opinion behind the line. The whole background of the war was ignored. One can scarcely imagine a more thoroughly secular, not to say pagan, atmosphere and point of view than that which obtained at Paris and Versailles. The voice of the church was not heard. The great note of religion was not struck. The solving word of Christ—well, nobody at Paris thought to consult Christ at all!

Going backwards from the Paris conference to the actual battlefield we find the church compelled to engage for the most part by proxy in the ministry which, in accordance with the essential genius of the gospel, should devolve directly upon Christ's own body. We stand with those who thank God for the Y. M. C. A. and appraise at the highest value the service rendered by that organization to our fighting men. But the very success of the Y. M. C. A. revealed the weakness and ineptitude of the church of Christ. The work done by the "Y" in France and at our home camps was the church's work, and should have been done by the church in the name of the church and to the honor of the church's Head. Nothing in Christian history is more ironical than the picture of the church of Christ creating or adopting an extra-churchly agency to convey this ministry of pity to the wounded and distressed on the huge battlefield of our great war. Why it was necessary for Christ's body to act by proxy in a ministry so essentially his own is not at this time the point of our inquiry. There is an explanation. It both condones and condemns. But the fact is all that concerns us at this moment. Important as was the ministry of the chaplains who represented the church as such, and brought, in their degree, glory to the church, their numbers and their service were incommensurable with the magnitude of the Christian opportunity.

Carrying our inquiry back a step farther to the moment when the war was precipitated, we find the church's moral judgment at that moment flung into a state of paralysis. Its loyalties inhibited one another. In such a mental state it was inevitable that the Christian procedure would follow the line of least resistance, abandon its own high ethic and adopt the ethic of secular opportunism. This strange procedure even found an apologist in one of Britain's most influential theologians. Dr. Peter Forsyth brought aid and comfort to the stricken conscience of the Christian nations when he said: "To offer the esoteric Christian ethic for public use when national passion is rising or loose is to stroke a crocodile or tickle a tiger. The right and fit thing to do then is to fall back on an inferior ethic and make the best of it." This casuistical apologetic soothed the souls of Christian men who plunged into the confusion and excitement of the war determined to see it through on the basis of a sub-Christian ethic, leaving the moral reckoning with Christ to a later day.

So the church of all the nations, on both sides of the conflict, in Germany as in England, wheeled into line behind the state, taking its cues of moral action from the state and finding in the success of the state's policy its standard of right. Without question this abdication of the church from its position of moral sovereignty in Christendom discounted in public respect the Christian claims of the priority and intrinsic power of moral ideals. Probably our American churchmanship suffered appreciably greater loss in prestige than that of other nations because we had more than two years to deliberate, while the other nations were compelled to act instinctively. Yet in our long period of taking counsel the Spirit seemed to make himself no more clearly heard in our hearts than in the hearts of our brethren in Europe.

One cannot think of those two years and a half and of the merely sporadic and individual expressions of a Christian ethic without kindling reminiscences of Mr. Henry Ford's peace ship. After all the ridicule that has justly been heaped upon that quixotic project it will seem cruel to our Christian respectability to set that project up as a symbol of the futility, the individualism, the irresponsibility—in a word, the unorganic character—of our distinctly Christian conviction at the moment the war broke out. Yet nothing illustrates the fact so well. The picture of that ship, afloat in the unconnected distances of the great sea, representing only a single individual who happened to have sufficient money to charter her and the several score of highly individualistic minded men and women whom he invited to make the trip, must not be allowed to fade too soon from the memory of the Christian church. The pathos and the grandeur of it, its fatuousness and its glory, its abject and predetermined failure together with its infinite suggestiveness as to what might have been—the very ghost of that enterprise must still haunt the souls of all Christ's people who have not been poisoned and caloused by the cynicism that the war produced.

But suppose! Suppose that instead of Mr. Henry Ford, an individual, the organic body of the American church of Christ had chartered not a single ship but a flotilla of ships, and sent to Europe a great delegation of a thousand churchmen, not ecclesiastics merely, but Christian statesmen, including conceivably their Christian President, Woodrow Wilson, representing not themselves alone but the Christian public opinion of the American nation and speaking with the conscious and publicly demonstrated support of that public opinion—suppose, we say, that American Christianity had been just enough better than the Christianity of Europe to have created an expedition of moral appeal and arbitrament which sprung right out of the organic body of our Christian faith—what reader of these words will reply that it would have been treated with scorn and ridicule and rebuff and indifference? We speak, of course, as a fool, after the Pauline manner. It is the limit of idiocy to build a speculation upon a model so universally discredited as the Ford peace ship. Yet the fact of our moral sterility, our unimaginative conventionalism, our Christian lack of that inventive impulse that can find a way wherever there is indeed a will, cannot be brought out so clearly in any other context as that in which the Ford adventure was implicit.

As to that phase of the war event which we have described as the period of approach, our memories teem with evidence that condemns us. During the generation and a half prior to 1914 the peace movement probably spent more money in propaganda and enlisted on its behalf a personnel of interpreters and advocates possessing a dignity and public influence beyond that represented in any reform in modern times. Even the prohibition movement is not an exception to this statement. Yet the church never rose to the place where it comprehended the peace ideal as belonging to its own essential genius. Absorbed in the cultivation of its denominational loyalties the church of pre-war days too often seemed actually to resent the intrusion of the claims of the peace cause, as though it were something exotic and alien to its real business as a church. The idea of international friendship never became a churchly idea. It was a political idea, a secular idea, but it seemed to have nothing in particular to do with religion. A "popular" peace meeting was always a cold and sparsely attended gathering. Only at "retreats" like that at Lake Mohonk where "high brow" leaders came together for discussion of peace problems was there warmth and hope.

One recalls the annual conventions of the Peace Society, one in particular held in a sort of Pullman car auditorium in Chicago, addressed by men and women whose mentality and moral influence put them in the forefront of our national leaders, and attended by so sparse a group that even the chamber auditorium was not filled. The pathos of this period in the peace movement was brought out in a story of quaint facetiousness told by Miss Jane Addams at the funeral of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, whose death at the close of the war bereft Chicago of one of its most potent moral leaders and the cause of peace of a voice that had for a generation been crying in the wilderness of our Christian unresponsiveness without discouragement. Miss Addams told of a circle tour of middle west cities that Mr. Jones, Miss Julia Lathrop and herself had made in the interest of peace. One evening toward the end of the tour they saw from behind the scenes the usual scant house, and as they lined up to go upon the platform Mr. Jones, standing behind the two ladies, broke into this impulsive ecstasy, expressed sotto voce: "Jane and Julia and Jenk! Soldiers of forlorn causes! Forward march!"

Even the war experience failed to bring the peace ideal into the focus of our moral vision. It would have been paradoxical, of course, if it had. For there is an infinite self-deception about waging a war to end war. Our war-time opposition to war was passionate, emotional, irrational. It lacked ethical depth and reality. With our enemy defeated we found ourselves in the same old state of indifferentism toward peace. This was revealed at the national convention of two peace organizations which held joint convention in Chicago last May. There was no Christian public interest. Everybody present had the feeling that the apathy of 1914 and before was upon us again. A mood of depression took possession of many on account of the apparent unawareness of the Christian mind.

But now with the passing of the third armistice anniversary the signs of Christian earnestness in the reassertion of the church's moral leadership are the most heartening on the horizon. More significant, we believe, than the specific proposal to scrap 66 ships and to establish a naval holiday for ten years, is the fact, as it indeed seems to be, that the peace ideal is being woven into the very structure of Christian conviction. The great campaign for peace remains yet to be waged after the building of armaments has been restricted. Wars will not be repressed by the mere reduction of the number of dreadnoughts. The problem of peace is the problem of Christianizing the public opinion of Christendom. For America it is the problem of Christianizing the public opinion of America. That is a deep-going project. That is the Christian church's function. The opportunity the present armament conference has given her to make a substantial beginning is the measure of her stake in its proceedings and outcome. That she has already sensed the opportunity and has begun mobilizing her vast spiritual forces behind her Christian statesmen is thrilling token of her moral renaissance. It is the assertion of a leadership in the moral life of mankind that is more than the recovery of a lapsed authority; it is rather the ascending of a throne that she has never yet occupied.

The Playthings

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THE daughter of the daughter of Keturah hath Cousins, for I and Keturah we have other grandchildren. But they live in other cities, and they see each other only in the Good Old Summertime.

Now it came to pass on a day that the daughter of the daughter of Keturah and her little cousin, even the small son of my son, they played together, and for a time all went very happily. And so did it nearly all the time. But on this day they had played for a time when there arose a mighty wail from the son of my son. And when their mothers entered, behold, the daughter of the daughter of Keturah had all the playthings, and she held them high above the head of her little cousin.

And when Keturah and the beloved wife of my son inquired concerning the trouble, and the little lad made loud lamentation, the daughter of the daughter of Keturah spake with great Consciousness of Virtue. And she said: I am teaching my little Cousin to be Unselfish.

That is one way to do it, and the way it hath been done from the days of Eve down, albeit Keturah knoweth not how to do it in that way.

And I smiled much at the way in which the daughter of the daughter of Keturah taught her Cousin to be Unselfish, and I hoped that that method of instruction would not become too popular.

Nevertheless, there is something to be said for it.

When my friends who have automobiles take me driving, and I own more cars than any other man in town, then do I comfort myself, and say,

I am not wholly to be censured for thus cultivating good graces in the lives of my neighbors. Too easily might they grow Aristocrattick, and become proud of their Privilege. I am a most Virtuous man in helping them to cultivate their generous sentiments. They live the better and enjoy life the more by reason of the sharing of their good things, and I will help them in the distribution. I am teaching my beloved neighbors to be Unselfish.

Song to a Tree

GIVE me the dance of your boughs, O tree,
Whenever the wild wind blows;
And when the wind is gone, give me
Your beautiful repose.

How easily your greatness swings
To meet the changing hours;
I, too, would mount upon your wings,
And rest upon your powers.

I seek your grace, O mighty tree,
And shall seek, many a day,
Till I more worthily shall be
Your comrade on the way.

A Close-up of Russian Life

By John Ralph Voris

THE general impression made on the traveler in Russia is that the whole country is run down at the heel.

Buildings of all kinds—public, business, dwelling, church, school—all show need of repair and of paint. There are practically no newly constructed edifices throughout Russia, and no improvement under way now. In the cities the store fronts have a depressing appearance. Deserted display windows, frequently made the more uninviting by the propaganda posters plastered over the glass, give one the feeling that the city has no eyes. We are so accustomed to brightness, the appeal to the eye, we think little about it until we are challenged by its absence in large cities where we usually take it for granted. I am not discussing here the underlying economic gain or loss. I am think of the loss in civic cheer and inspiration. It must have been a picture of complete desolation up to the late spring, lightened somewhat, and yet made no less apparent by contrast, by the few store fronts which show that business has begun again. This applies particularly to a few grocery stores, and some small millinery shops, which begin to add some rays of color. However, some of the small trading places that are now open, going on the basis that they must not try to lure the purchaser, have nothing whatever in the windows, or only a miscellany of unwrapped bundles thrown into them. An American merchant would literally suffer on going through the streets of Russian cities. This situation was changing, however, even while we were there. I saw a marked contrast between the show windows in Tiflis and Batoum from the first of August to the middle of September. Undoubtedly the improvement has been greater still since then. The small towns and villages have always had their bazaars rather than stores, and the deterioration there has not been so conspicuous.

CITY LIFE AND LIFELESSNESS

The city streets, both in the daytime and at night are almost deserted. One does not get the impression of life that one has ordinarily in busy municipalities. It is depressing. The sanitary side of Moscow and the other cities is beyond criticism. The streets are conspicuously clean, everywhere their rough cobblestones being continually swept during the day by old men and women, who seem to take pride in keeping them meticulously neat. One gets a sense of life from the great buildings, devoted to the enormous undertakings of the centralized government operations, both at Moscow and in other governmental centers; in the big hotels, given over to government workers for their homes, and in the few places of amusement open to the public, but for the most part there is a feeling of lifelessness. But there is still animation to be found in the villages and along the railroads. In the villages the open air markets are throbbing with human interest, while the constant movement of the troops, who, with their families are ceaselessly transferred from place to place, with never ending energy, and the sad rush of peasants fleeing from famine, certainly give one at the stations and along the railroads a consciousness of vital masses of human beings living in these abnormal and unhappy ways.

The clothes of the people bespeak poverty of new materials. There is little or no finery to be seen. The women of the cities dress neatly, in cheap light-colored clothes, often going without stockings, or wearing cheap cotton hose, with sandals or slippers evidently made over from old ones. The men in the cities dress at somewhat greater cost, with their high boots, but their rubashkas and knickers are inexpensive. Many men are bootless, however, wearing cheap slippers or even clogs. The peasants and soldiers almost universally wear a sort of felt boot of woolen wrapping about the feet and legs. The women ordinarily wear but a scarf or nothing at all on the head.

It would be of interest to go further in all these things I have been describing, for they were of endless variation, but my purpose in mentioning them here at all is to indicate the general outward appearance of economic desolation in street scenes, housing, business and dress.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS

That the principle and practice of the government, in bringing all commerce under its control, caused the closing down of all ordinary business, is clear to the casual observer. The great buildings in Moscow and Tiflis formerly devoted to wholesale trade are either pathetically empty or else occupied by government offices. While I was there these wholesale establishments had not yet been opened. A few retail stores had been opened in the early summer. When we were there one could find a number of grocery stores, some of them of rather high grade; a few shops where one could purchase small articles of clothing, such as haberdashery; a number of millinery shops; a good many small places selling toys and home-made things; many small repair shops and trading centers selling second-hand goods. In most of the towns there was plenty of fruit to be had, while bazaars or open markets did a comparatively thriving business in both city and village. Cooperative stores which, like private concerns, had been closed, were opening up in Moscow. I went into two of them pricing the food, and learning something about the management of a system which so clearly reflected the former menshevist plan of which I had formerly read a great deal.

One would gather, both from observations of these conditions and from interviews, that the government has always been willing to permit trade, provided it represented a direct route from the producer to the consumer; as for example the millinery and toy shops. Judging from outward appearances and from talks with some small traders, there is no question but that bolshevism not only tried, but succeeded in crushing all ordinary methods of commercial transaction. And judging from outward signs, it did this without any constructive gain whatever. It is evident that the government has wished to eliminate the middleman. In the change which is now under way it will be interesting to see whether there will be a complete swinging back to the complicated system of middlemen which rides like an incubus on our commercial civilization.

DEFLATED CURRENCY

In spite of the deflated currency, which according to the exchange announced when I was there, namely, about 30,000 rubles for the dollar, prices were as high for all necessities of life as they are in the United States; so that even if there were in Russia the general prosperity which obtains here in America, communism would have brought no gain in this respect. And surely the reduction of prices is one of the most important tests of the value of the elimination of the middleman. I for one regret that the experiment does not show some hopeful aspects which could be capitalized. Perhaps it does. I did not see any or hear of any. If instead of the destruction of business, the government, with the power of control which it had, had sought to eliminate abuses, to use as much of the system which had existed as would be compatible with bringing the producer and the consumer together, it might have accomplished something constructive. As it is the apparent total failure has been such as to eliminate, I fear, any possible experiment in a thoroughgoing control of commercial development. The present regime has not developed any commercial geniuses. All of its leaders are of a different type of mind.

But this does not mean that Russians do not have business sense, or at least the ability to recognize and use the business acumen of others. One cannot see the great, beautiful structures formerly devoted to wholesale and retail business, without realizing that there was here the same kind of material equipment for big wholesale and retail business that existed in Paris. Unfortunately too many if not all of these former business leaders have been eliminated from power, and perhaps, exiled from the country. One cannot help but regret that the present regime was too narrow on the one hand to include this type, and on the other that these men were probably unwilling to try to work with the present government. Soviet leaders would say that the boycott on the part of other nations is responsible for the deplorable condition in business. I think it is partially responsible, but certainly only partially so. If there were any constructive business genius in the soviet leadership, there would not have been complete commercial failure.

TRAINS AND TRAVEL

In traveling over this great country one is first of all conscious of the transportation—its weaknesses and its strength. Without going into detail in the matter, one is impressed all the time that the Russians are great railroad builders. Roadbed, trackage and bridges, all show constructive engineering ability. The principal roads are double-tracked. Considering the destruction of trackage and of bridges by the various civil wars, the present condition is remarkably good. Despite an inadequate supply of materials, the repairs on bridges were made promptly. On the other hand the rolling stock is in poor condition: hundreds of engines have been discarded through loss of parts, and partly dismantled, their parts used to repair those in use; the best of the locomotives are in poor condition. All coaches are shabby. The trains run regularly, however, and leave and arrive on time. Express trains run at thirty to forty miles an hour. To the layman the management of the roads seems to be fairly adequate. I have no way of knowing what the technician would think. However, since the railroads were strongly organized before the revolution it is probable that most of those then in charge have remained at their posts. Railroad stations are well designed brick or concrete structures, surrounded by parks. This is no credit to the new regime, except that they are on the whole well kept.

With the thousands of unused freight cars standing on the tracks, and the hundreds of locomotives, it is impossible to move even a small part of the people who are seeking to ride on the trains. Lack of coal and oil is given as the chief reason for the failure to operate even all the locomotives that were available.

SLUMP IN INDUSTRY

One is impressed by the absence of outward signs of manufacturing. Russia is not a manufacturing nation in the sense in which Germany or Sweden or America is. She never has been. But there is very little production now going on in those factories which she possessed. The lack of raw products, and of equipment, is given as the primary reason for this condition.

Russia's mines and oil wells are potential sources of untold wealth. But she is handicapped in mining now, not only through lack of machinery, but in her coal mining on account of the flooding of the mines in the great Donet coal basin region by Denikin as he retreated. The oil wells at Baku were once the second largest in the world. Today the production is almost nothing because the wells have been so damaged and so badly used during the war that new machinery is required throughout, and this new machinery they have not been able to obtain. Most of the oil now used in the locomotives comes from Grosnaya, an oil field not very extensively developed yet.

I think it is true that the workmen are better housed than at any time before, although they are limited to three rooms, as are others, but they are not better clothed or fed.

The railway workers are at the very top of the industrial ladder in present day Russia. And yet they cannot be said to be fortunate. According to my diary record they receive 9000 rubles a month and 14 ounces of bread per day, in addition to their home. This was 27 cents in U. S. exchange. A pound of butter at Moscow cost 10,000, or two months wages! In an interview which I had with Anixt, acting commissar of labor, I learned authoritatively of the labor conditions and plans for the workers. Asked concerning unions, hours and wages, he said: "The labor unions were powerful before the new regime. They are much more centralized, more cooperative and more powerful now. The progress during the past three years has been very great. There are more than seven million members of trades unions in Russia. . . . The general work day is eight hours. Up to April first, under the old soviet law, workmen received ordinarily a pound of bread a day and three quarters each for their wife and children. In addition they received their living quarters, clothing and eight thousand rubles a month!"

DEPLETION IN AGRICULTURE

Russia is one great farm. Her vast fertile plains have been the granary of her own people and of others in the past. The Russian peasant is a natural born farmer. He works hard; takes pride in the land apportioned him by his commune; loves the soil, and animals; rejoices in bringing forth grain. While at no time in the past has he produced as much per acre as he could have produced with the intensive farm methods of western Europe, nor has he cultivated as extensively as he could have done if he had possessed modern farm machinery, yet he has had about the same yield that the United States had shown in her western prairie section of which one is reminded by the Russian steppes. He has used the steel plow. I saw no other kind of a plow in all Russia, while in Bulgaria I saw only the wooden stick for a plow. Russia is ready for the tractor. In fact the acting commissar of agriculture, Gregorovitch, told Mr. Johnson, our agriculturist, that the great need of Russia from the standpoint of agriculture is modern farm machinery and education in using these machines.

There has been a gradual depletion in Russian agriculture. It began with the period of the great war and has been accentuated during the civil wars which followed. These wars have meant a continual diminution of man power and of animals while the unused machinery has been rusting and becoming useless. Thus year by year a smaller acreage has been planted. There has been less of surplus grain and what is even more important to consider, the depth of plowing has been lessened until this last winter it was but five inches. A severe drouth would cause a more bitter famine than if there had been deeper plowing. This gradually depleting condition could hardly do otherwise than lead to destruction.

THE FAMINE

The famine has been caused by this depletion in production; by the consumption of all surplus produce, including much of seed grain in the past; by the inability to secure new machinery; by poor transportation, and finally by drouth, coming on the half plowed ground. It was not caused by deterioration of morale or ability on the part of the peasant farmers. And yet, acknowledging all these causes, it is probably undeniable that in addition the present economic system was one factor in bringing the famine about. I am not referring now to the civil wars when the present government was defending itself; nor to the general feeling of incertitude, but to the lessened production of machinery, the closed avenues of trade, the lack of incentive during the past years to produce to the fullest extent.

The famine is there. It is there in all the present and potential ugliness painted by the correspondents. There are ten million or more people affected. They will not have any food out of their own district beyond December 1, or from the remainder of Russia no help for more than a fourth of the sufferers. It is a question either of getting help from the outside or of wholesale starvation, and of the failure to plant seed next spring with consequent further famine.* My one conviction is that one of the greatest crimes of history will be the indifference of the world to the need of Russia. Sufficient grain should be supplied these starving people to keep them until the next harvest, and to seed their ground this next spring. I do not worry over any permanent breakdown of Russian agriculture. Whatever the economic system, the Russian peasant will produce if he has the land, machinery, seed, grain and peace.

TREND TOWARD CAPITALISM

I have pictured conditions as I saw them, as any one traveling through Russia would see them. I have had no personal reason to protect or to decry the present regime. I have tried to look at the situation as it is, and to describe it as I saw it. It looks bad. No government in which so much power was centered could stand up against this sort of thing without running the race of its life. I do not believe the present regime would endure through the winter were it not for the tendency toward moderation which is gradually putting business and industry on its feet, and winning other nations to friendliness.

Unquestionably the present government has been recently attempting to adapt itself to necessary conditions. It is becoming more moderate. Although we knew something about this moderating trend here in the spring, we took it like all other Russian news, with a grain of salt. I heard about it again in Constantinople through friends who were deeply interested in the Russian problem. Only they had a tendency to interpret their news Constantinople-wise, as the harbinger of the fall of the present government. We found the rumor to be fact in Tiflis, Georgia, which takes the Russian decrees seriously, although only a federated republic. Here we saw the beginning of individualistic expression. And then in Moscow we came, I believe, near to the heart of the real situation.

We, ourselves, had word as to the new methods first from Kamineff, head of the Moscow government, and director of famine relief of all Russia; then from Tchitcherin, commissar of foreign affairs. These two referred to the matter incidentally. And then we talked with Crassin, commissar of trade relations with foreign countries, and his interpretation of the changing system was clear and extended, although given with the end of assisting conclusions relative to the famine. These noted men, who stand among the first half dozen leaders of the Russia of today, made it clear and authoritative that the economic system has been changed. Of course it had been announced by Lenin several months before, but now it came to us direct. I cannot do other than believe it.

This new moderating scheme is as follows: Whereas the government had taken over all operations which had, before the revolution, been under private management and ownership, such as factories, markets, all methods of production and exchange, including cooperative projects, now by decree these fields were to be open to private operation and control. Individuals could own and sell merchandise, or operate factories or estates. While all the title to property would be held by the government, as I understand it, yet leases would be given to individuals, or to groups, either foreign or home. Instead of the government supplying the living to workmen engaged in such industries, they would have "wages." This is to state the bald fact somewhat more baldly than the leaders stated it.

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA

Crassin, who spent several months last year in England and Canada, reported personally to us that which we had already understood, namely, that England was ready to trade with Russia. Lominosoff, former director of railways in Russia, now commissar for foreign railway purchases, reported that Germany and Sweden had agreed to furnish needed locomotives and that some of these were ready to be delivered. I know that there were trade commissions at Moscow, most significant of which was perhaps the British, and that there were trade relations in Transcaucasia with a number of countries, the leading operations being with Italy.

More interesting perhaps than these official bids for outside trade are the plans within the country itself. I talked personally with the commissar of labor for an hour, an intelligent, alert, scholarly man, yet not so much a scholar in appearance as the three men mentioned above, but rather more that of a man of executive leadership. He spoke of hours, of wages, and of employment, saying many interesting things to some of which I have already referred. But nothing was more significant than his returning time and again to the "new system," that is, the method in vogue since April 1. It seemed to me that his very eagerness to prophesy what would happen under this new method, and his desire to avoid speaking of the rewards under the old, were rather pathetic proof of the breakdown of the system of the past. I wondered if they were not too hopeful in their visualization of the results from the plan now to be pursued, just as they had been in their attitude towards the rainbow benefits of pure communism.

It is probably true, unfortunately so, I believe, that a regime depends more upon its economic success than upon its educational ideals, however fine the latter may be. Unless a system is able to create prosperous conditions, maintain or increase productivity, agricultural and industrial productivity, and stabilize finances, it cannot live. A hungry Russia, a frozen Russia, will not in the long run be an educated, idealistic Russia. It has been hunger and cold and possibly ostracism—caused by underproduction, famine, boycott and wars—that have driven Russia to see the necessity of a moderate and a moderating system. But whatever the cause, it is here. Call it what she may, Russia is installing a moderate semi-capitalistic system.

INSUPERABLE OBSTACLES

Will this save the day for the present government? I presume the most friendly admirer of the present soviet leaders would admit that they have been having a close call. By that I mean to recognize that they have been up against almost insuperable obstacles: continuous war; famine; drouth; economic blockade—all resulting in a constantly falling production which spells ruin if not stopped. One could hardly expect a government to live under such pressure.

And so it would appear that the present government had come to the end of its string. It has changed its economic system. It is faced with famine so great it has appealed to other nations. It is surely all over but the shouting. The czarist and other anti-revolutionary folk at Constantinople and Paris may prepare to move in at once.

But is it all over? It is not, if present appearances throughout Russia count for anything. Lenin, chairman of the central council of soviet governments, is apparently as strong with the leaders, and the masses, as any existing leader. This is really a remarkable tribute to the strength of the man, for he has gradually led in the modification of the plans, so that the extremists would think him a deserter to the cause on the one hand—and on the other he represents to the masses of people the one who might in reason be held responsible for their troubles. The other leaders seem to be sitting securely. Perhaps it is because of the red army. And yet if there were widespread dissatisfaction no government could hold up, notwithstanding a strong army. Russia is made up of widely different peoples, many of whom have the heritage of a wild sort of freedom—the Tartar tribes of the eastern part, and the Kossacks, particularly. If there were widespread dissatisfaction there would be at least sporadic revolt.

There is, of course, talk against the present regime. We heard it occasionally from peasants, and, I understand that, contrary to expectation on our part, there are numerous groups in Moscow organized to fight the present government. And yet it stands. Whether it is the red guard, or the inertia of the people, or inherent belief on the part of the people in this experiment, I do not know. But it stands.

WHAT IS THE ALTERNATIVE?

And after all, why should it not stand? I have spoken of one side—of hunger, and hardships. There is another of which I shall speak in a future paper, namely, the social program. But look even on the economic side. Take the workers. They have low wages and little food, but they have better homes than they ever had before, and they have a sense of self-pride, of independence. They have a chance. They are no longer down—to stay down forever. They may be hungry, but so is everyone else. They are fighting together for better conditions. Take the peasant. He is having a hard time. He does not understand and he does not like these wars. But has more acres, twice over than he ever had before, and there is filtering down into his brain the idea that he is a real human being, and is recognized as such. That sounds bromidic. As a matter of fact, it is about the biggest truth I have run across.

And suppose they should rise up against their leaders. What could they expect? To whom would they look for leadership? Would they look to the men who led the armies across central and southern Russia, who fought against their own countrymen to get power; who left a trail of blood and destruction such as has seldom been seen? I am thinking as I write of the hundreds of burned boxcars, engines and other rolling stock of railroads we passed; of the bridges and stations and houses destroyed. Is that love of country? I am thinking of Lominosoff's statement that the coal mines and oil wells were rendered useless by Denikin's army. The mines were filled with water. The Germans did that in France and Belgium, with the curses of the world. Denikin—unless I am misinformed—did it in his own country. And these are the leaders France and other nations supported, including, in a sense, a moral sense, our own. Are the peasants, ignorant though they may be, going to give up the present regime for the leadership of such men? I think not, and it is not likely that the workingman will do so, anyway.

But what really would happen if the present soviet government suddenly collapsed? There would be anarchy. A hundred little principalities, tiny communes, a reign of terror, banditry, fear and blood, compared with which the terror of the red guard is as nothing.

For other nations to do anything which will thrust Russia into such a state is surely shortsighted for themselves. The present famine condition with attendant cholera, is a menace to the world, leaving out all considerations of human interest in those who will die unless they are aided. The reign of anarchy which would follow the fall of the present government, is beyond computation dangerous. Who would control the hordes of people who would wander over Russia seeking a way out? Who would control Russia within herself? What nation or nations could be trusted to send their armies into Russia to keep peace? What bloodshed would there be if armies of occupation did go in? What would happen to certain people whom the red guard now protect—the Armenians for example?

It may be a poor government, but it is the only government they have. And there is certainly no doubt but that it is recognized! I traveled from the extreme south of this government—southern Armenia, to Moscow, and back down another section through many provinces, and I am sure it is a recognized government in all of those regions.

Samuel McChord Crothers

Fourteenth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

A Nevada minister once described to me the action of a brother minister in the early days. The minister went to a certain town where he offended the lawless element, and was threatened with physical violence if he persisted in his intention of preaching. My friend described the method by which the liberty of prophesying was asserted. "He went into the pulpit, laid his revolver on the Bible—and then preached ex tempore."

The manner of narration savored of the soil. The Honest Miner under the circumstances would subordinate everything to emphasis on the correct homiletical method. No matter how able the minister might be, it was evident that if he were closely confined to his notes, his delivery could not be effective.

THESE words from an inimitable essay, "A Community of Humorists," show us the difference between the humor of the backwoodsman and that of the miner of the west—whither Dr. Crothers went from Union Seminary, driven by an illness which required the high, clear air of the mountains. The humor of the pioneer consisted in a grave, grotesque exaggeration, while that of the miner is a delicate, deliberate understatement, like the considerate notice posted by the side of an open shaft: "Gentlemen will please not fall down this shaft, for there are men at work below." But the passage has a further significance more pertinent to the matter in hand. As a fact, so I have been told, it was after some such fashion—happily without a threat of violence or the need of a revolver—that Dr. Crothers himself learned that he could preach without manuscript or notes; a discovery which added a whole dimension to his power as a preacher.

The story, as it was told me on good authority, ran somewhat after this manner. It was the first Sunday the young theologian ever appeared in a pulpit, and, supposing that he was to have but one service on that day, he prepared only one sermon. The sermon was carefully written and apparently got itself preached without mishap; but to his amazement, during the morning service he was asked to announce a second service in the evening at which he was to be the preacher. As the afternoon was taken up with engagements, and he had no time to prepare, he was obliged to preach off hand, so to speak; and he did it with such ease and joy that he has never used manuscript since. It was a fortunate circumstance, and one often wishes that something of the sort might happen—as in the case of the prophet of Nevada, who dared not take his eyes off his audience lest he be shot—compelling all preachers to speak freely, frankly, and directly concerning the things that matter most.

WHERE THE WEST BEGINS

The passage quoted above has a still further significance, as showing the wide experience Dr. Crothers has had of America, and especially of the west, which he has interpreted with so much insight and understanding. If asked where the west begins, he would answer that it begins "at that point where the center of interest suddenly shifts from the day before yesterday to the day after tomorrow." No one knows America, he insists, until he has been touched by the fever of the west, and one who has felt that fever never completely recovers, but is always subject to intermittent attacks. Indeed, his life in Nevada and his ministry in Minnesota qualify him to write that psychological-geography of "The Land of the Large and Charitable Air," which he suggests in an essay of that title. Hence a chapter on "The Lure of the West" in the best book ever written in interpretation of Emerson—the best in its appreciative discrimination, and because it treats the Sage of Concord not as an oracle, but as a comrade and "contemporary"—who did "more than any one else to redeem the New England group of authors from the kind of provincialism which was their darling sin." Like Emerson, he knows the robust, prophetic idealism of the west, and loves it the more because it is still pushing its way up through the hearty, wholesome materialism of a new country; and so long as America keeps these two things together, it will not go far astray.

WESTERN BACKGROUND FOR EASTERN MINISTER

Such is the background of the ministry of Dr. Crothers to one of the most thoughtful and cultured congregations in New England, in the old First Parish of Cambridge—where not a little of the old provincialism which Emerson sought to correct is still to be found. There, in a church mellow with history, in a setting exquisite in its simplicity—colonial in aspect and arrangement—I heard Dr. Crothers preach not far from twenty years gone by. The atmosphere and impression of that hour are still vivid in my heart, and still more the radiant and benignant personality of the preacher—his grave, quiet manner, his deliberate delivery, his chaste and limpid style, his sly humor, his lofty and logical thought. At this distance I do not recall the text, but his theme was "Three Ancient Types of Religion," the priest, the prophet, and the philosopher; and he seemed to me to be a compound of all three. It so happened that I was in the first flow and enthusiasm of my discovery of Emerson, and I felt as King Herod must have felt when he heard of the preaching of Jesus, and thought he was John the Baptist returned from the dead. Indeed, all through the sermon I felt almost as if I were listening to Emerson—not that Dr. Crothers was an echo of the sage, or even a disciple, but he had the same wise and serene elevation of thought. So much was this true that I have hesitated to describe the impression of that day, fearing that the two men were blended, if not blurred, in my mind, like a dissolving view. But since reading his book on Emerson—in which we see how much the two have in common, and in what ways they differ—I am not sure that I was so far wrong, after all; and my faith is confirmed by a letter from a great and wise man who has attended the First Parish church for many years:

The study of Dr. Crothers as a preacher presents an interesting problem; for, in the ordinary sense of the word, he is not a preacher. He uses no hortatory eloquence, or application of his theme; nothing of the "Finally, my brethren," or "O, my dear friends." He simply delivers himself of a thought, and lets it have its own way. In the details of parish affairs he is very childlike, and the simplest notice is a stumbling block to him. He is but slightly interested in the enrichment of worship, or its technical details. On the other hand, when he passes to the development of his thought, he is the finest master of logical and convincing speech I ever knew. With no shred of manuscript, and no appearance of effort, his sermon advances up the heights of insight and power with extraordinary continuity and force. In other words, he is at his best when his thought is most elevated, and least effective when dealing with ordinary affairs. He is the lineal descendant of Emerson in the pulpit, directing a transparent stream of purifying thoughtfulness. Such a method removes him altogether from the position of a model for other preachers. An earlier generation of Unitarian ministers ran much risk of being spoiled by using a method which is described as "Emerson and water." To imitate Crothers without his genius for lucidity would be a hopeless task. He is as much alone in the pulpit as Emerson is in literature. The consequences of this kind of ministry are, however, instructive. It is generally recognized in his parish that he cannot be depended upon as a mechanic or organizer. Accepting his inspiration, others do the work of organization, and his church has become distinguished for its multifarious undertakings of social service. In other words, the wheels go round because there is a quietly moving and powerful engine among them, like the Living Creatures among the wheels, whom Ezekiel saw.

Unfortunately, for the purposes of this article, Dr. Crothers is more widely known as an essayist than as a preacher; and he can never be really known as a preacher save by those who hear him. His sermons, as we read them, are essays—like most sermons in the Unitarian ministry to which he belongs—that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet Emerson:

A new commandment, said the smiling Muse,
I give my darling son, Thou shalt not preach.

But his essays are often sermons, and good ones, too, such as "The Cruelty of Good People," or the chapter in his study of Emerson entitled "Spent the Day at Essex Junction." A more helpful sermon than that chapter it would be hard to name, teaching us that we must learn how to find fullness of life everywhere, anywhere, even in "a place on the way to somewhere else." But the reason why one must hear Dr. Crothers in order to know him as a preacher is that his sermons are seldom, if ever, printed as they were delivered. Often there is as much humor in his preaching as in his essays, but the sermons are revised by him from the report of the stenographer, and he edits the humor out. This is matter for regret, not only because humor has a place in religion, but because the humor of Dr. Crothers is unique, blending the elusive smile of Emerson, the whimsical wisdom of Lamb, and the inverted exaggeration of the Honest Miner, with many ingredients all his own. Anyway his printed sermons hardly give an adequate idea of the impression made upon his hearers. How he prepares his sermons some of us would like to know, just as we should like to know what use he makes, in these arid days, of a certain fund left to the First Parish by a benevolent saint of long ago, intended "to supply the minister with tobacco and rum." Of course, a man who has access to "The Pardoner's Wallet" enjoys obvious advantages; but the matter excites curiosity.

Almost thirty years have now come and gone since Dr. Crothers published his first volume of sermons, entitled

"Members of One Body," which happily may still be had. It was made up of a series of Sunday evening addresses during his ministry at St. Paul—when he was a kind of bishop of the northwest, starting new centers of liberal faith at Duluth, St. Cloud, and as far as Helena—dealing with the different types of the religious life, Catholicism, Calvinism, Methodism, Rationalism, Mysticism, and a final address on "The Unity of Christendom." Even in those early days he was master of the same lucid style, and had the same large outlook in which many apparently contradictory qualities were joined—breadth and depth, rationalism and mysticism, catholicity and missionary zeal, the wisdom of a philosopher and the ardor of a reformer. A more sincere appreciation of the great qualities of the Roman church it would be hard to find; and so of the other types, his plea being for men of the spirit who are cooperatively minded, which requires them to get rid both of narrowness and fastidiousness. Toleration is not enough; there must be insight, understanding, appreciation. We must not simply live and let live, think and let think; we must learn that the devout life is everywhere the same, "flowing underneath the thickest ice of theory," if we try to discern and understand. What is greater than any one of our sects? All of them! Our very recognition of the truth which each contains should make us realize how fragmentary each is. As we may read:

When we assume this attitude, we begin to see through all its variations of thought the essential unity of Christianity. The most opposite types have points of kinship. Each of them is aiming to get beyond sectarian narrowness, and to build a universal church. They agree as to their ideals: they disagree as to their way of reaching them. . . . How may this unity be practically realized? I have little hope in any external power that shall compel uniformity. I think such external union under present conditions neither desirable nor practicable. When we read that different competing firms have united their interests in one great trust, we expect very soon after to find a modest item in the papers to the effect that this trust has taken measures to limit production. And, were all the churches of Christendom united in one church, the next move would be to repress the liberty of prophesying. If we cannot have liberty and union, we must cling ever to liberty. But I am one who believes that through the most perfect liberty will come at last the most perfect unity.

There is no power in any sect or church that can prevent that largeness of sympathy which every man of true religion exercises. I like the good old New England puritan who, when he was excommunicated by the church, refused to stay excommunicated. We read that for twenty years the good man came every communion Sunday, and brought with him a bit of bread and bit of wine of his own, and there, in the safety of his high pew, communed with the church, in spite of the deacons. When a man brings his own communion with him, who can prevent? Whether we shall enjoy the communion of saints depends on ourselves. The best that belongs to Calvinism and the best that belongs to Romanism is mine, if I seek it. The fellowship of the spirit, which is the only fellowship that one need care to obtain—this fellowship is ours, if we will.

From heart to heart, from creed to creed,
The hidden river runs.

A second volume of sermons, entitled "The Understanding Heart," appeared ten years later—he has published but two, though many of his sermons may be had in pamphlet form—yet one would not know that it is a volume of sermons at all. There are no texts to tell us so. There is none of the urgency or appeal that goes with preaching; no exhortation, no fervor of evangelism, such as we find in Theodore Parker. It is a book of essays for the elect, who know that the problems of the understanding heart are educational, and that only so we readjust our thought and faith to the facts of a growing, but friendly, universe. How may our religious inheritance be harmonized with our fresh experiences? How may the institutions which have purely spiritual ends be adjusted to those which serve our material welfare? How may we at the same time live according to the rules of sound reason and according to the inspirations of religious faith? Such questions are discussed with fruitful insight, a gentle and revealing wisdom, and a grace of form which marks all his work. The readjustment must not be merely formal, but must come through the multitudes of men and women doing their work with joyous and confident intelligence, following the new developments as well as recording the old—organizing the religion of freedom, as of old men organized the religion of authority.

CLOSE TOUCH WITH LIFE

However, it is an error if I have left the impression that Dr. Crothers lives aloft, writing exquisite essays in an ivory tower, aloof from the interests and agitations of his age. Not so. If to many he seems to live apart, his very detachment gives him a clearer perspective, and more than once in his own communion he has relieved the tension as much by his wisdom as by his humor. Some years ago when John Haynes Holmes proposed, in a brilliant speech, to commit the Unitarian church to a definite program of reform, it was Dr. Crothers who made protest, not against reform, but against tying the church to particular schemes. It was a picturesque occasion, and while he had to pay the penalty of being a man of humor, his triumph was due to sound sense. His protest was in behalf of freedom, and against any kind of coercion—whether by conservative or radical—and wisdom was on his side. First find your dogma, and then adapt yourself to it—such was the archaic method. It does not work theologically, and he did not believe it would work sociologically either. In other words, he did not want a new sectarianism for the old but freedom in the largest, fullest sense—liberty of prophesying, and "the liberty of not believing more than half the prophet says." He said that if he had been in Jerusalem when Jeremiah proposed to let Nebuchadnezzar punish the nation as the scourge of God, he would have voted against him. The kind of prophets he likes are "prophets that have some sense, and a prophetic fervor behind"; as if any age ever regarded its prophets as sensible! In the same address he said:

A year or two ago a revivalist came to Boston preaching the new evangelism. The ministers met together and had daily meetings to stir the conscience of Boston, to bring again the old sense of sin. He was a good preacher. As a practical application of his preaching, the evangelist said to the business men who had come to the noonday meetings, "Let us go and march in a procession to find and save the sinners." Where do you think they went? They went up into the North End of Boston. A gentleman coming out of the meeting said to me, "That ends my interest in it:

why did they not go on State street?" The ethical questions of today are like the ethical questions of the time when slavery was a source of revenue to good people. They go deep, sometimes they touch your interests and mine, and earnest men know that full well. Every attempt to found a church today on glittering generalities, where the preacher does not dare to follow to its practical and necessary issues the religion of the present generation, has no future: it has no interest for the young. . . . I believe these are great days, interesting days for the young men who are about to enter the ministry—men of clearness, of sagacity, of patience, of common sense, all mixed up with a great sense of humor. If they are patient enough and do not allow things to get too much on their nerves, they are going to win out.

Some of us think Dr. Crothers at his best in his Harvard lecture on "The Endless Life," if only because he has described once for all that of which—when the clouds are off our souls—we dare assert immortality. There he moves in a realm of moral and spiritual values, where his calm and clear insight shines like a friendly beacon. The future life, at once the polar expedition of philosophy and the polar star of faith, becomes in his hands a quest of the quality of life which reveals its own eternity. For him the final assurance is "the confidence of the simple man who stands in his integrity undaunted by death"; and while he does not profess to see "the lights o' Dover," he leaves us confident, but not curious—knowing that all is well because man brings down to the Gate of the Mist something that ought not to die.

Sectarian Disarmament

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

CONDITIONS in the realm of religion parallel closely the problems of politics, industry, and commerce. How could it be otherwise? The world in which we live is not many worlds, but one world. The same people who make our laws, conduct our international affairs, manage our industries and shape our politics, also compose the membership of our churches. Christianity, alas, has its "war party," its "jingoes," its "dollar diplomacy" and ecclesiastical Prussianism. "The Pentecost of Calamity" in 1914 was not the war itself but the tragic fact that Christendom divided and, therefore weakened, was powerless to avert the war. Crass nationalism in the state, vicious partisanship in politics, sectionalism in society, and sectarianism in the church are of one spirit and have a common source.

Every denomination has some sectarians in it, and to the extent of their number and influence they embarrass and delay the progress of the kingdom of God. Sectarianism is a crude mixture of bigotry, prejudice, jealousy and intolerance. It is the very opposite of Christlikeness. It does not speak the truth in love. It does not suffer long nor is it kind. It is captious and divisive. It is perhaps too much to hope that sectarianism can be completely routed in any one or several generations. Limitation of sectarian armament is as much as can be expected at present. Such limitation has begun—let the good work continue!

COMPETITIVE CHRISTIANITY

A reduction of unnecessary church building enterprises with the consequent over-lapping and duplication of activities is imperative. Some portions of the country are woefully over-churched, other portions are without any church privileges at all. In 1911 in Colorado, one hundred thirty-three villages were found to be entirely without a Protestant church, over one hundred of them having no church of any sort. On the other hand, in a Pennsylvania village of four hundred fifty people there are six churches, each one struggling against heavy odds and presenting to the community an inadequate, a despairing, and an utterly discouraged spectacle. In a New England village of one hundred fifty inhabitants there are six churches. In another eastern township, eighteen churches minister to a population of about a thousand. It was Dr. Earl Taylor who said—and he was in a position to know—"The great problem with the Protestant churches is not so much to get together as it is to keep apart—at least half a mile apart." Says Professor Durant Drake: "The needless multiplication of churches means half filled pews, half-hearted enthusiasm, a generally dreary and depressing atmosphere in which it is difficult to cultivate an eager spirituality; it means division of forces . . . impaired prestige . . . diminished power to fight sin and wrong."

Reflecting on an experience of twenty years in the ministry, it occurs to me that the two best services I rendered society was to organize and build a church for one community, and to discourage the organization and building of a church in another community. It is the second of these contributions that is to the point just here. It came about in this way. A committee of three women from an Illinois town of less than five hundred population came to see me in my study. I had visited in their village and was familiar with the community. There were five churches in the town—Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Mennonite and Catholic. With the exception of the Catholic, not one of these churches was able to carry on a strong and attractive work. The committee informed me that they had formerly been members of Disciples churches elsewhere; that there were fourteen of their fellow Disciples in that town, nine of whom were then members of the Baptist church and five having united with the Methodists. They had been thinking some of organizing and building a church of their own faith and order. One of their number was quite well-to-do and willing to put $3,000 in a building enterprise, should it prove feasible. Since I was the minister of the largest church of the Disciples in that section of the state and had lived there many years, they came to ask me what I thought about the project. As I recall it, my answer was in substance this: "I have no authority to tell you what to do in a matter of this kind, but since you have asked me for my opinion I gladly give that for what it may be worth. The cause of Christ in your village is already suffering and its fortunes are at a low ebb. You are already sadly over-churched. You could support one good strong Protestant church there, certainly not more than two. The organizing of another congregation and the building of another edifice in that community would be a sin—it would weaken instead of strengthen the cause. Go back and if possible unite some of the churches that are already there. Spend your money and give what talent you possess to the organizations that are already at work and you will do more for Christian unity and the prosperity of Christianity in your home town than you could possibly accomplish by adding to the number of churches already there."

The committee listened respectfully, and when I had finished the spokesman said she believed the advice was good. The others expressed themselves likewise. The church was not built and that already over-churched community was saved further humiliation and division.

NO "CHRISTIANS ONLY"

What a blessing it would be if communicants of churches could rid themselves of the idea that the only true church is the one to which they belong. There is no church that has fully apprehended Christian truth or that mirrors flawlessly the ideals of Jesus Christ. There are no "Christians only" in the fullest sense of the term. Those who are Christian are Christian plus some practices that are not Christian and minus other practices that are Christian. In a city on the Pacific coast with a population of fifty thousand, it is reported, there is a church called "The Church of God." The members of this church quarreled and the off-shoot from the original church called itself "The True Church of God." This church in turn also quarreled and a third church was formed which was named "The Only True Church of God." This is bigotry gone to seed, the quintessence of sectarianism. God has not given to any one race, any one nation, any one religion, a monopoly on Truth, or elected any particular communion to be the custodian or orthodoxy, not even my own. I rejoice in the "sweet reasonableness" of the position in the religious world of my communion, with its noble plea for Christian unity, and personal confession of Christ its only test of fellowship. I belong to a third generation of Disciples. I find a charm and interest in the history of this movement that rose within the church, pleading for the reunion of the churches. but I humbly confess that we have not received all that the Spirit has in store for us. Others have labored, and we are enjoying the benefits of their labors.

Once in a conversation with the beloved and inimitable Archibald McLean, one of the choicest spirits our communion has given to the world, I said to him: "Do you believe the Disciples have pumped the well dry?" He looked at me quizzically, smiled, and replied: "If I did I'd hunt up another well." That was a sensible as well as a witty reply.

Most of us need to pray to be delivered from the bondage of prejudice. There is a slow poison in prejudice. It affects the eyes so that one cannot see the Truth clearly; it affects the ears so that one cannot hear the voice of God distinctly; it affects the taste so that one loses his appetite for the most wholesome of spiritual food; it affects the heart so that it does not beat in response to the great appeal of love. Dr. Peter Ainslie, in conversation with Dr. Shailer Mathews asked him, "What in your opinion is the greatest barrier to the union of Baptists and Disciples?" Dr. Mathews answered, "Prejudice and history." There can be no doubt that prejudice is a barrier, although I am not so sure that knowledge of history is a factor in hindering Christian unity. I should prefer to believe that ignorance of history hinders and delays this great consummation. If the rank and file were familiar with church history, might it not be that such knowledge would open their eyes to the folly of the sectarian spirit and the chaos and confusion that ensue from insistence on theological pécadillos and creedal pronouncements? I have thought it might, until I remembered theological professors grown gray over church history who are still fiercely partisan.

There is only one cure for the sectarian spirit, and that is love, even the love of Jesus Christ. Love is the only panacea.

He drew a circle that shut me out—
Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout,
But Love and I had the wit to win:
We drew a circle that took him in!

The spirit of controversy and of bigotry is quenched and forgotten in the doing of a great service for God and man. Inward peace and a clean heart are the only guarantee of outward peace and assurance of the reign of love. In his noble prayer for the unity of all who should believe upon him, Jesus begins with the inner life, with the thoughts, with the purposes, with the will power, the affections. He begins at the beginning. He puts first things first. As a man thinks, so is he. Outward conformity cannot of itself produce Christian unity. Unity is of the spirit, it starts with the individual's relation with his Lord, and from that fair beginning it manifests itself in gracious ministries to others. "Christ in us" is not only the hope of glory, but the true basis of Christian unity. The united church of Christ cannot fully come until sectarian disarmament has taken place and the outward creeds, antiquated theological tests, and ecclesiastical enginery has been scrapped and forgotten.

Sanctuary

LET us put by some hour of every day
For holy things—whether it be when dawn
Peers through the window-pane, or when the moon
Flames like a burnished topaz in the vault,
Or when the thrush pours in the ear of eve
Its plaintive melody; some little hour
Wherein to hold rapt converse with the soul
From sordidness and self a sanctuary,
Swept by the winnowing of unseen wings,
And touched by the White Light Ineffable.

Denver Churchmen on Tramway Strike

SECOND in interest only to the Interchurch Steel Strike Report is that of a group of Denver churchmen on the tramway strike of 1920 in that city. In some ways it is a more significant piece of work in that the committee was made up of local churchmen representing Protestants, Catholics and Jews. Local prejudice against any kind of public disclosure of unfavorable local conditions is always strong, and there will always be found in the churches themselves strong opposition to any sort of an investigation of financial or industrial matters.

This group of Denver churchmen was appointed in an open gathering of representatives of the city churches, under the initiative of both pastors and laymen who believed industrial warfare on the streets of their city should be investigated exactly as a riot or any other disturbance of the public peace, and that the church had played a neutral part long enough. Several innocent citizens, including children, had been killed, scores had been wounded, the city streets had been the scene of battle between armed thugs brought in by the company and rioting strike sympathizers, and both the state militia and federal troops had been called in to maintain the peace. There was wrong somewhere, but the public, which must be the ultimate court, had been propagandized by partisan statements, and men of affairs knew there was a long and complex story of misadjustments behind the whole war. So they determined to discover the facts, analyze them impartially, tell the public the exact truth without bias or fear, and thus educate public opinion against such outbreaks of internecine warfare. Three nationally known experts on social and economic problems were called in in the persons of Dr. Edward T. Devine, Father John Ryan and Mr. J. A. Lapp. The result of this inquiry is a report of seventy pages. It may be obtained from the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches, 105 E. 22nd St., N. Y.

What Causes a Great Strike?

Strikes are not called out of hand in the morning before breakfast and they are seldom determined upon for the reasons that are riveted down upon the public mind. Such talk as that the steel strike was made by bolshevists who wished to take over the mills, and the threatened railroad strike was a rebellion against the government, may be reiterated in newspaper columns until the public mind, heated and distracted by the situation, comes to fix upon it as true. All this sort of stuff was floated during the Denver strike. As fine a group of almost strictly American wage earners as can be found were maligned as radicals and "reds", accused of disloyalty and of being the dupes of agitators, and finally transfixed under the slogan of being led by I. W. Ws.

The strike covered a long period of friction and fruitless negotiation by the local unions with their own inside leadership, and while the rioting was largely done by the tougher elements of the city, and not by the strikers, there is not one scintilla of evidence that there was an I. W. W. anywhere in it.

Up to 1917 the company was operating under a 5 cent fare and paying a wage that came to 30 cents an hour only after five years of service, and the cost of living had gone up by leaps and bounds. Demands for a living wage brought increases of first one cent per hour, then three and finally six. A 6 cent fare was allowed to cover these increases and the company attempted a 7 cent fare but the people revoked both and compelled a restoration of the old 5 cent rate. Back of the public's attitude was a long history of franchise financing and political manipulation of the type that has wrought deep prejudice into the minds of American citizens which manifests itself whenever public utility monopolies are mentioned. The War Labor Board was called in and fixed the wage at 48 cents per hour after one year's service, and the state

Public Utilities Commission allowed a fare of 7 cents. Another public utilities company was attempting to annul the commission's authority in Denver matters; and then the sword began to cut both ways. If the commission had no authority when a utility did not like its decision it would have none when it did. Arbitration was agreed to by both company and men, and the result was a grant of 58 cents an hour to meet the rising cost of living. This raise was allowed upon the express principle that "regardless of the financial condition of the employing company, it is right that it should in any event pay what may be called a minimum living wage." The company then gave notice that it would abrogate all agreements and restore its own wage rate of 34 cents per hour, and the men countered with a strike notice. It seems all might have gone well on the basis of a 7 cent fare and 58 cent wage had the public not been convinced that the company's valuation was largely watered and that on the basis of a real valuation a 5 cent fare was sufficient to pay both dividends and living wages. This was done in cities like San Francisco, Cleveland and New York where public valuations had been made and strict municipal supervision applied.

Turning Peaceful Differences Into Violence

It is easy to understand why a strike should be unavoidable under these conflicting conditions. But why violence creeps in is not so easily comprehended. The first thing that happened in Denver was a sweeping court injunction forbidding the men to strike and the company to reduce wages below the arbitration award. Good lawyers agreed that the order could lawfully apply to a franchise-holding corporation after agreeing to an arbitration, but doubted if it would hold against a walkout. For two months fruitless negotiations were carried on. Now enters, under cover, the open shop campaign, and the men became convinced that a definite and determined effort was to be made to sap their strength, undermine their organization, and then procure a dissolution of the injunction when they were no longer able to contest with their full strength. Without doubt the councils of the more arbitrary and radical minds prevailed ("radical" in the proper sense of that word, not of "red") and the employees shared the general temper of labor in this war time. At any rate they determined to strike before they were struck, so they countered the company's efforts to put wages down to 34 cents by a demand for 75 cents.

It now became a fight at bottom between the company's determination to break up the union and the more radical councils of unionism in regard to wages. Convinced that the injunction could not hold against them they struck on August 1, 1920. The company had been "enforcing discipline" in a drastic manner; this convinced the men of their determination to disintegrate and finally break up the union. There was no doubt that they welcomed the walkout; they had all preparations made for it and had carried them on in a manner to inflame the men. Next the union leaders were found guilty of contempt of court, then granted a writ of supersedeas and released on bail. Meanwhile the company brought in hired strikebreakers. Evidence points to the conclusion that they had been engaged beforehand and affidavits by the men declare they were paid $150 per month, transportation and all living expenses. The people had to walk, the weather was hot, the men had made overt demands and broken a court order, and then the floods of propaganda were turned loose. Law-abiding American citizens, the majority of them men with families, some in the company's employ as much as twenty years, were called "reds" and I. W. Ws. and the dupes of agitators. The public was told that there was streaming into Denver troops of men "that knew no law save ruin, one that recognized no spirit save that of the mob." Luridly they were described as coming from every direction

"flocking to Denver like the vulture swoops toward the carion, gaunt men, narrow eyed men, bearded men, treacherous men." This sort of stuff was manufactured out of whole cloth but it served to prejudice the public mind.

The bloodshed can be traced more directly to the imported gunmen than to any other cause. One of the first acts of the federal army officers upon arrival was to disarm them. They preyed upon the public, shooting into a crowd killing children and bystanders but no strikers, and affidavits made by two of their number show that they preyed upon the company and one another as well. Yet as over against the above lurid word picture of the strike sympathizers they were pictured as "men guided by the ordinances of the city and statutes of the state," as soldiers of fortune, keen eyed young men after adventure but with the spirit of the late army within them in their enmity to red radicalism, many of them, it was told, were college men and they were en-hallowed by a romantic halo. Is it any wonder that the plant of the paper so picturing them was wrecked by the mob? Their presence incited the mob which was made up of the hoodlums and lawless element of the city and not of the strikers themselves and thus brought riot. Behind them and with them came the labor spy. Their leader, the notorious "Black Jack" Jerome, boasted of his spies in the union meetings and proved his boast by showing minutes of the secret proceedings. The company even went so far as to get reports on the meetings of the churchmen through them. Their illy spelled and ignorantly received reports were accepted by the company and even by the officers of the law. Truth and justice had about as much chance under such conditions as it has in a blood feud. It was war to the bitter end and the real issue was that of a union or no union but back of it was a long story of friction instead of cooperation.

The Commission's Conclusions

The Investigating Commission makes interesting conclusions which are published under the committee's o. k. They find that the public deserves good transportation service, the companies adequate dividends upon actual investments, the employes a living wage plus a reasonable surplus and that the community should be more concerned about that wage than about cheap fares. They believe a living wage is the first obligation upon any employing concern instead of profits. They criticise the municipal government for not providing adequate police force to maintain order and protect property and condemn scathingly the employment of spies and gunmen by corporations. They believe an injunction against a walkout is an extreme order to say the least but that the wage earners were culpable for calling the strike in the face of it as they were later in not calling it off when rioting began. They find the company's initial trouble in the history of their mixing in politics for selfish ends and in their financial history. It is a striking story of how a great strike is made and worth any man's fifteen cents plus an hour's time to read it.

British Table Talk

London, November 1, 1921.

THERE are many of us, who, unpledged to keep church festivals, keep the memory of All Saints; its true lesson is the close of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews which deals with others also "of whom the world was not worthy." Of modern poets, none has sung of it more nobly than Lowell:

"One feast of honey days the crest
I, though no churchman, love to keep;
All Saints—the unknown good that rest
In God's still memory folded deep."

The day will be past before these words appear, but at the moment such are the thoughts of many hearts—of an increasing number in all the churches. We are thinking if we are not speaking of the saints

"that loved heaven's silence more than fame."

Ireland and Washington

At the present hour all things seem confused. The prime minister is striving gallantly to keep the Irish conference from failure. If any man can save it, he will. But there are many adversaries. Meanwhile the question whether or not the premier will be able to attend the Washington conference depends in part on Ireland. The general desire of all people of goodwill here is that he should be there. We shall certainly not be adequately represented without him. It is hard for anyone not in this country to know the tremendous power which Mr. Lloyd George wields. Everyone admits this, whether they love him or hate him. It seems hard to have any less emphatic feeling toward so vital a being. They who seek to wreck the conference with Sinn Fein may easily wreck the best hopes of the world.

The most representative women of this nation are doing their best to encourage the prime minister in his journey, if there is to be a journey, to Washington. The following appeal comes from Miss Maud Royden, who cannot be credited with a blind loyalty to Mr. Lloyd George: "The women of America are giving expression in characteristic manner to their enthusiasm in regard to the high purpose of the disarmament conference, and the women of this country have in their hearts a like enthusiasm. The depth of this enthusiasm should find expression. Lady Astor, Mrs. Fawcett, Mrs. Snowden, Mrs. Wintringham, and myself, therefore, are asking that all women who care for the cause of peace, whether they agree with Mr. Lloyd George as a politician or not, should send him, as the British representative, a 'God-speed.' We ask that each woman and every girl over fourteen should send a postcard with her name and address upon it, and the words 'God-speed to you at Washington,' and address it to 'The Prime Minister, 10 Downing street, S. W. 1' (not S. S. Aquitania, as previously announced), two days before he goes."

But will he sail? My readers may know by the time they see this. My prophecy is that he will.

Dostoevsky

It is a hundred years ago since Dostoevsky was born. When he died in 1881, our leading paper, The Times, took no notice. Russian literature had not then won its true place. But today there are few lovers of great imaginative literature who do not know Dostoevsky. To many, as to the present writer, the reading of "Crime and Punishment" marked the dawning of a new vision. It is the most terrible of books. Other tales of crime seem crude and bloodless by the side of this agonizing story. There is redemption in it. The great Russian seeing life with fearless eyes, descending into all its hells, sharing human doubt and defiances, believes in redemption through suffering love. Dostoevsky is a strange ally, but he is on the side of the Faith. Stretched on a bed of agony, he will cry out his "Amen!" to the gospels and to Jesus the crucified. One passage I should like to quote. It is from the lips of a dissolute drunkard, who pictures the merciful judge at the last dealing with men: "And when he has finished with the rest, our turn will come too: 'Draw nigh,' he will say to us. 'Draw nigh, ye drunkards, ye cowards, ye dissolute men.' And we shall draw nigh without trembling. And then he will say unto us: 'Ye are sots! Ye bear the mark of the beast on your foreheads, yet come unto me.' And the wise and intelligent will say, 'Lord, wherefore dost thou receive these.' And he will answer: 'I receive them. O ye wise and intelligent men, because not one of them thought himself worthy this favor.' And then he will hold out his arms, and we shall throw ourselves into them; and we shall burst into tears; and then we shall understand everything. All the world will understand, and Catherine Ivanovna also. Thy kingdom come, O Lord!' Poor theology! some will say; but no one has learned the alphabet of Russian character till he had read his Dostoevsky; and in those crowded, noisome, plague-haunted scenes it is never possible to escape from one who laid his hand on such possessed and fever-stricken men and women in Galilee.

for 1923

Nineteen twenty-three seems a long way ahead; but already plans are being formed for an important Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship to be held in that year. In preparation for it there must be an expert and full inquiry into "the fundamental problems of theology upon which Christian social teachings must be based." . . . "Such questions as the relation of love to freedom and to the use of force, or as the reconciling of individual with corporate obligation, or as the place of sex, nationality and race in the scheme of things, have to be investigated before we can apply our gospel to the details of economic and political life." The application will be divided into five sections: education, property, industry, politics, the attitude of Christian communions towards economic and political issues." Dr. Temple of Manchester is to be the chairman of council; and the council itself nearly three hundred strong is remarkable for its variety. Here are a few names as they come in alphabetical order: Miss Sybil Thorndike, our greatest tragedienne; Father Thornton of Mansfield, the author of "Conduct and the Supernatural," an Anglo-Catholic; Professor Frank Tillyard of Birmingham, who used to be called the Poor Man's Lawyer in Mansfield House Settlement long ago; later Father Waggett, an Anglican and Father Walker, a Jesuit, are next to each other, and not far from the great scientist, Sir German Woodhead, who is a Congregationalist. It is a council with remarkable resources, and the fact that it is in being is most significant. But when the scope of its inquiry is understood, well,—1923 does not seem too far away!

Other Things

It appears that Dr. Weston of Zanzibar, a fierce controversialist and a very great Christian, is on the war-path against Dr. Temple. A former episode in which the attack was directed against Dr. Percival has been immortalized in the rhyme:

"There once was a Zanzibarbarian,
Who thought that some bishops are 'Arian,'
So he wired off to Randall
For bell, hook, and candle,
But Randall—well, Randall's a wary 'un, a wary 'un."

Randall is still at Canterbury, and he is still as unlikely as ever to be enticed into action such as Zanzibar desires. And the archbishop is more than wary; he is a wise and courageous leader who has seen farther than many of his critics. . . . The new daily paper, of which I wrote, is to appear next Monday. Mr. S. A. Spender is to be the political editor and as he has been for many years of the Westminster Gazette, and a finer publicist is not to be found; from Birmingham Sir Charles Starmer is to come as general manager of the paper; he has been the head of a group of provincial papers, run by a company of strong and courageous public men of whom, I think Mr. Arnold Rowntree is chairman. The new paper is to be the "Westminster" turned into a 2d morning paper. He is going to get up early, but its character is not to be changed, though the familiar green color is to go.

* * *

I like to add some verses when I find them in remote places. Here are some from "The Country Heart," a quarterly magazine devoted to the exposition of the simple life, which keeps near to mother-earth and waging a gallant battle against the reign of machinery. Dr. Greville Macdonald, a well known physician and writer, a son of George Macdonald, is one of the editors and the literary quality of the magazine makes it a delight to read. But here is the poem. It is called a Socialist's Prayer by Spencer Hurst:

"Lord of Thy clemency
Give us the wit to see
Truth in simplicity.

Lord in Thy patient care,
Give the world strength to bear
Self-gotten misery.

Give our hearts grace to feel
Each for the commonweal Passionate charity.

Lend our hands skill to make
Work fair for beauty's sake,
Pardon our drudgery.

Lord of Thy clemency
Give us the wit to see
Truth in simplicity."

Through Science to Faith

By Newman Smyth

"As knowledge grows, it is true that superstitions vanish; but religion remains, the romance ever new and ever true of our human life. And the title of this book itself is the confession of an abiding belief that reason is not condemned to pursue a darkening way down a blind alley, to face at last a blank, dead wall; but evolution is a thoroughfare which leads from God to God. And all the way through, reason walks with God."

Thus does the author state the argument of this book, which has become a standard work for young and inquiring ministers especially. ($1.75, plus 12 cents postage.)

Does Not the Original Article Go a Little Deeper than this Criticism?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just been reading Dr. McAfee's article in The Christian Century for October 27 on "Some Un-Christian Aspects of Christian Missions." It makes some rather serious charges against the missionary enterprise, namely, that it is narrowly sectarian in policy and patronizing in its spirit. The charges are not true, nor entirely untrue so far as the past history of missions is concerned. But it seems to me that the general impression of the article is that these evils have not been and are not being eradicated or alleviated. This is not so. It seems to me that any fair-minded student of the activities of the Home Missions Council or the Foreign Missions Conference, or of the relations of the various denominational boards, home or foreign, one to the other, will have to admit that the prevailing spirit of these boards is one of large-minded and far-sighted cooperation in the interests of the kingdom of God, not that of petty denominationalism.

No one can of course claim that this spirit actuates all of the boards everywhere, or that it has found its perfect expression upon all fields. But to say that none of the policies that have been instituted have given any evidence of being typical of the prevailing spirit and ideal of our missionary leaders does not seem to me a fair representation of the case. The surveys and allocation of fields by the Home Missions Council and similar methods upon the foreign field at an even earlier date do not point in this direction.

There is, unfortunately, little doubt that the spirit of patronizing superiority toward the objects of missionary activity is altogether too prevalent among the rank and file of our church members. But that this is the spirit in which our mission boards are conducting their work is not borne out by my acquaintance with them or with their utterances. The emphasis laid upon the development and strengthening of the native church, the efforts that are made to encourage it to assume an increasing measure of self-direction would seem to point in the other direction. Anyone who will take the trouble to study the literature put out by the various departments of missionary education will find the strongest possible emphasis placed upon the spirit of sympathetic cooperation as the only right and Christian attitude. It takes time for this point of view to filter down to the membership of our churches, but it is none the less typical of the leadership in the boards themselves.

One further statement in Dr. McAfee's article admits of even more definite and positive refutation. He refers appreciatively to an article by the late President Howard S. Bliss of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, entitled "The Modern Missionary," which first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly for May, 1920. Dr. McAfee says that anyone who read this article would be moved to exclaim: "If this is what missions means, then I am for them." But he goes on to state that Dr. Bliss did not speak for any mission board and certainly leaves the reader to infer that his utterances did not have the approval of any such board.

Dr. McAfee seems not to be aware that this article, within two months of its appearance in the Atlantic Monthly, was reprinted by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in its envelope series for July, 1920, and distributed by the thousands among its constituency. With that reprint was a prefatory note signed by Dr. James L. Barton, the foreign secretary of the board, expressing in the strongest possible terms approval of Dr. Bliss' message and accepting it as a fair presentation of the spirit and policy of the modern missionary movement.

I have no quarrel with a frank statement of facts, even though they may be disagreeable, and I recognize the stimulating value of constructive criticism. But constructive criticism takes account of all honest efforts toward improvement and this Dr. McAfee's article does not do. In these days when the missionary enterprise is facing unparalleled opportunities at home and abroad and when its needs call for the utmost of loyal and self-sacrificing support, it would seem to deserve all that can honestly be said in its favor. And this is all that it asks.

Thank the Lord for Ignorance

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read Mr. Gallagher's criticism of the "Unchristian Christian Century," and "To Mr. Bryan's Defense," and to strengthen your courage I enclose my check for renewal of your excellent paper. I would not do without it. I am a Congregational minister, and like your paper better than any religious paper I have ever read. I think you are at least 98 per cent Christian. I have had the profit of a university course. I have studied the results of years of scientific research by men who have devoted their lives to it, and my study of science and philosophy have made my Bible seem so much more real and so much more true to me. I confess I have no desire to sit under Mr. Bryan, who presumes to speak with authority upon subjects his training does not justify his speaking upon. I thought your article on Mr. Bryan was exceedingly fair. I am reminded of the man who said to Phillips Brooks upon an occasion when Mr. Brooks had given a reasonable interpretation of a biblical incident: "The Lord doesn't need your book larnin'." "No," replied Mr. Brooks, with a smile, "and he doesn't need your ignorance, either."

"Let Us Reason Together"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just finished reading the correspondence pages of the latest Christian Century, and I note that considerable of this lively space is consumed these days by criticisms of your theological opinions. Now I am sure these attacks are productive of no little good. They do no particular harm to your publication and they certainly must afford enormous relief to your critics. There are few things the general public enjoys more than to speak its mind freely about its minister's sermons and its editor's policies. I am human, so I also derive great pleasure from this exercise. Ergo I take my place in the line and await my turn to punch a hole in The Christian Century's correspondence page.

First, let me say that this journal has been making regular visits to my mail box for several years because it is not primarily a propagandist publication. I get sick and tired of receiving mail matter which attempts directly or indirectly to "line me up" with something. When I tear the wrapper off it says, "Read me and then get into my procession." The Christian Century says, "Come, sit down and let us reason together."

Then, I read your journal because it sometimes gives me a "jar." There seems to be some who think that no religious paper which is not as mild and meek as a Sunday school sheet has any place under the sun. Some people ought by no means to subscribe for The Christian Century. The pain of thinking is too much for them. They can't stand it. Let them follow their chosen protagonist and go in peace. One would think, however, that a man who assumes to know enough to be a minister, especially if he is a college graduate, would have a judgment reliable enough and a faith secure enough to examine all things. Minds, like soil, produce best if they are torn up, tilled and pulverized occasionally.

When a man mixes the ideas of The Christian Century with his own stock and stirs them in his mental crucible the resulting product is always gratifying. Its predominant nature after the process is completed may be in your favor or his own, but in either case the mere fact that there was activity will produce much good.

My spiritual health is more robust for being a reader of The Christian Century. I arise and give thanks for this refreshing breeze which sweeps across the monotonous plains of "cut-and-driedness."

Soliciting For Missions

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Loving the Lord and all men, I arise early in the morning ready to do great things for the cause of religion. I had dreamed during the night that my church had given twenty-three dollars and seventy-five cents for missions. I had thought in the last few days of doing something for the kingdom at home and abroad. My soul is full of ardor on the subject. Go to now,—I will go out among the brethren and do something for the missionary society. Perhaps, I can raise a nice sum.

As I crank my fliver I whistle a tune from our hymn-book. By the way, I have heard Brother Tytefist whistle that tune very often. Gayly I drive forth in my 1910 model, with a small note book in my pocket and a well-sharpened pencil. I drive in at Brother Gotlotts.

"Hello, Brother Gotlotts!" And I shake hands in a pastoral fashion. We sit down together beneath the spreading maple tree.

"How did your oats turn out?" I ask. Of course, I do not care much about his oats, but you see I must get on common ground with him. Oats or hogs make a fine subject with which to start a conversation when you are after missionary money.

He informs me that he has just marketed his hogs. I knew that some of his hogs had died of cholera, and many of those shipped were exposed. But what of that? Did he not belong to my church? And did he not hold tenaciously to the faith once delivered to the saints? Indeed, yes! And besides, it would not do to interfere with the business of my parishioners. My business is religion. Then also, Brother Gotlotts pays twenty-five dollars to my salary, and when the Ladies' Aid gives a social he brings his whole family. It does not pay for the minister to upset such vast financial resources of the church.

Incidentally, I ask Brother Gotlotts how his family is. I know that they are all well, but I am sparring for time. I discuss with him why it does not rain lately, and why Brothers A and B do not come to church any more. Suddenly, by a flash of inspiration I make up my mind to press Brother Gotlotts for a generous gift for the Lord's work. But say,—how the inspiration cools as my eyes turn from the vision to the prosperous form of my parishioner. How formidable he looks. Finally, in a sneaking cort of way, I ask Brother Gotlotts if he would not like to donate a little something toward the missionary offering.

How you feel under such circumstances! Once I felt that way while I was in college when I solicited the merchants for money with which to support our baseball team, which had not won a game all season.

Well, you know Brother Gotlotts is shocked for a moment. But he recovers in another moment. Then there is a far away look in his eyes. It is not toward heaven, but toward the corn crib. My question has raised a battle in his soul. He is meditating. Ah, the great and mighty battles of the soul! After much travail he seems near a decision. I know that last year he gave a dollar.

"What did Brother Acres give?" he asks.

I hesitatingly say, "Seventy-five cents."

Hurrah for our dear parishioner! Hurrah for the power of suggestion!

"Put me down for the same." Thus does Brother Gotlotts prayerfully reduce his subscription to seventy-five cents.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Handicapped*

THE night brings out the stars—difficulties develop latent energies. Paul reached Rome—his dream came true—but notice how he was handicapped. He did not come to Rome, mount a great platform and find himself preaching to masses of men. He came in obscurely, chained to a guard. At two or three places near the Imperial City little groups of Christians met him, but the sect was everywhere spoken against. Christians were disregarded, neglected, despised. It was nothing to be a Christian! The trial dragged along; the Jews seeming not to have enough interest in it to force the issue. He was allowed to rent a house and to have comparative freedom, except that always he was chained to the solitary Roman soldier, who was often a cynical worldling, all out of sympathy with Paul and his interests. Could anyone be much more handicapped? Champion of a despised cult, anxious about the outcome of his trial, bound to a foreign guard, suffering the humiliation of such a position, compelled to rent his own church, unable to speak from the big forums, deserted except by a faithful handful, suffering constantly from his "thorn in the flesh," short of funds, and a thousand miles from home! Only a strong heart, only one who had learned to lean hard on God, could endure all that. But Paul not only endured, he triumphed over every obstacle. His burning soul converted the guards, who in turn became advertising agents and for two whole years Paul preached to a steady stream of earnest souls. They touched him and were made whole. His fire kindled them. Fire spreads, and, after a while, servants from Caesar's palace heard the wonderful story of the Saviour. The church grew. The disciples took courage from the heroic endurance of their master and withstood all scorn for the Name's sake; they glorified in their sufferings. It is stated that one misguided enthusiast went about trying to get himself killed! It was Paul who wrote in large letters, "Endure hardship like a good soldier." Paul thought of himself as a servant of Jesus Christ; "Bond-servant" the word really signifies. If a man has that conception of himself it changes his whole attitude toward life. How many of us think of ourselves as bond-servants of Christ? A servant does not expect much for himself, he will be willing to toil and endure suffering.

This lesson should breathe courage! It should rebuke the blues. Who is handicapped like Paul? You live in a congenial city, you are surrounded by friends, you may have enemies but they are few and you waste no time thinking of them (As Henry van Dyke says—"Think seldom of your enemies, often of your friends and everyday of Christ.") You have fair health, Christianity is popular, it has the seal of good form and general approval, you are free to go and come, a beautiful church provides a forum for you, a class of delightful and stimulating people come each Sunday expectantly to hear you; you may be limited in finance but you have no reasonable fear; what excuse have you for blues, fears, doubts, suspicions, envyings or anything else to mar your happiness and usefulness? Paul comes in this lesson to inspire us, to drive away our miserable dejections. After we study this story we can stand up and go a day's journey with song and strength.

Or perhaps you are handicapped. Perhaps you have suffered in health, or you have had heavy financial reverses, or you are in a strange city, or your church is misunderstood and scorned, or your Sunday school is second-rate and hopelessly behind the times, or you are surrounded by critics and narrow-minded hypocrites; some Roman guard of an elder is always by your side refusing you the slightest freedom, keeping you chained always to the blood-rusted past—well, think of Paul. He overcame his handicap. He triumphed in spite of the world, the flesh and the devil! Nothing can hold a true soul back, you can't keep a good man down. If your faith is hot enough it will burn away all bands. Cheer up and drive on.

Many ministers are discouraged today. Who has a better right to take this lesson personally? You may be misunderstood, my brother, heretic hunters may dog your footsteps, those who ought to help only find fault, small crowds may attend your faithful preaching, a small salary may cause you to be constantly anxious about what you shall eat, drink and wear, but Paul comes to drive away your discouragement. "Count your blessings." Overcome your handicap as the great apostle did his. We need this lesson. Paul rises like a great rock in a weary land. We resolve to "carry on"—to gloriously triumph!

BOOKS

THE NEW STONE AGE IN NORTHERN EUROPE, by John M. Tyler. Many years have passed since the advent of Darwinism, and many archeologists have devoted their lives to the search for the remains of early humanity, yet the question of where and how man originated is still unsettled. We know that the earliest remains of man-like animals are found in eastern and southeastern Asia, and in Java have been found the remains of a creature that was probably much like man's ancestors. From the first ape-man to the hunter of Neanderthal, made famous by H. G. Wells, is a long step; one that occupied thousands of years in the taking. From the primitive Neanderthal man to the first known homo sapiens, typified by the remarkable "Old Man of Cro-Magnon," was another long step, or series of steps, the whole history of which can never be known.

The Cro-Magnon Man was the highest product of the Old Stone age; shortly after his arrival in Europe it ended. The change from the age of chipped stone implements to that of polished ones took place from fifteen to twenty thousand years ago. Researches in Asia indicate that there the transition was of much earlier date, and that the "New Stone" men migrated westward from the region of the Iranian Plateau. As Dr. Tyler shows, they were possessed of a tolerably high culture. They buried their dead, built temples, farmed and kept numerous domesticated animals, plaited nets, and did rude weaving. Some of them erected elaborate dwellings on the borders of lakes, while others lived on the land. They appear to have fought few wars, for most of their implements are designed for hunting and other pacific industries.

The evolution of man during the New Stone age was largely one of ethics and invasions. Dr. Tyler shows how the continued influx of more highly cultured peoples from the east, bringing with them many ideas and institutions differing from those of the crude New Stone peoples of Europe made for a continual progress in civilization. Industry and activity were given high premiums, for with the crowding of the country came wars, in which the most capable won. Along with wars came the necessity for social life, pooling of interests in self-defence, and steady progress in invention and control of the inanimate. New ideas clashed with old, and thought, both philosophical and practical, was stimulated. Finally came the use of metals in place of stone, and the New Stone age gradually passed. In it was laid the foundation for the civilizations of Europe and Asia, and eventually of the world, in later ages. That foundation was struggle, war, competition of matter and of mind,—a foundation that, in the opinion of a steadily increasing number of people, threatens to destroy much of the structure that has been erected on it. Federal Council Pays Tribute to Unknown Soldier

The honors paid to the unknown soldier at Washington on Armistice Day included a special service conducted by the Federal Council of Churches. Bishop McDowell had promised to be present, but in his illness Dr. Watson read a beautiful prayer which had been prepared by him. The tribute which was brought consisted of an American flag with a white cross in the center, which was carried by the Rev. Gaylord S. White, Rev. F. Paul Langthorne. Dr. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary delivered the address. He said: "In the spirit of unity and faith, grateful to God for past guidance and protection, we, representatives of the Protestant Christians of America, bring to this historic spot our tribute of affection and pride. Center and symbol of our national life, this place is consecrated anew by the valor and devotion of our beloved dead, whom this unknown soldier we honor here today represents. In this solemn hour deep calls to deep; patriotism is answered by religion. Gratefully will we cherish, resolutely will we guard this well-loved land, our spiritual mother, home of the patriots to whose vigilant courage and unstinted sacrifices we owe our liberty as a nation. But we dare not forget, least of all at this hour and in this place, that patriotism alone is not enough. Servants of the Prince of Peace, we are called to a wider citizenship, a fellowship in which all the peoples of mankind may share. In the kingdom of God, which is the brotherhood of men of good will of every land and race, those who were once enemies may find in work for the common weal reconciliation and peace. In this faith we welcome those who have come to us from across the sea, to join with us in seeking a better way. To this larger service, this higher patriotism we now rededicate ourselves, in the unconquerable hope that in spite of every obstacle we shall attain at last the goal for which these heroes gave their lives—a warless world. God forbid that we should fail them in this hour of our opportunity."

Pacific School of Religion Has a New President

The Pacific School of Religion which operates adjacent to the University of California at Berkeley has recently called Dr. Herman F. Swartz as president. Dr. Swartz has served as field secretary of the home mission board of the Congregational denomination. He was also executive secretary of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund. The Pacific School of Religion is now operating as a union enterprise, and its faculty is composed of men from various communions. It is in quite as commanding a position on the west coast as is Union Seminary on the east.

Seminary Enrollment Increases in Some Schools

The debate among Christian leaders as to the facts with regard to enrollment for the study of divinity continues. The editor of the Christian Register conducted an investigation recently, and discovered that thirteen representative institutions of first grade had made a considerable gain in attendance. These institutions had in 1921 1,506 students as compared with 1,209 in 1914. The largest enrollment is in Southern Baptist Seminary at Louisville, where there are 345 students now as over against 235 in 1914. The Divinity School of Boston University comes next with 277 as over against 238 in 1914. The instructors in reply to the questionnaire insisted that the quality of the students has not fallen off during the past twenty-five years. On this topic there can be only opinion, of course.

Women Call Conference on Unity

A group of devoted Episcopalian women of Boston recently called together a conference on Christian unity in St. Paul's Cathedral. Bishops Lawrence and Brent were present and spoke on next steps in the cause of unity. Among the other speakers were Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Congregationalist, and Rev. W. L. Sperry, Presbyterian. The Methodists were represented by President Murlin of Boston University. Mrs. H. W. Peabody spoke for the Baptists. The spirit of the meeting was fraternal in every way and those present went away feeling that the walls between the denominations grow feebler every day.

Prospective Pastor Proposes a Creed

Rev. A. C. Dixon, who received a call recently from University Baptist church of Baltimore, attached some rather unusual conditions to the acceptance of the call. He insisted that the church should adopt the fundamentalist creed which is sponsored by the conservatives of his denomination. He also made it a condition that no pew rents should be permitted in the church, but that the church should be supported by the practice of Christian stewardship. Dr. Dixon was once pastor of Moody church of Chicago and is counted as one of the strong leaders of the premillennialists of America. Usually the churches have been blamed for laying hard conditions on the ministers in its demands for orthodoxy. Here is a case in which the minister proposes a creed that would greatly narrow freedom of opinion.

Status of Methodist Reunion

The present proposal of the Methodist Episcopal church is that there shall be a constitutional convention of the two Methodisms to arrive at a plan for reunion. The idea of a convention has not been very congenial to the thinking of the southern group, but it seems that there would be an impasse on any other plan so many leaders of southern Methodism are writing and speaking in favor of a convention. In case a convention agreed upon a plan for reunion, this plan would have to go back to the respective general conferences, and to the annual conferences for ratification. The project has not looked hopeful the past summer but it becomes increasingly evident that sectional division cannot continue to flourish.

Y. M. C. A. Works at Problem of Interracial Peace

Colored men and white men will sit down together to consider the problem of interracial peace at a great Y. M. C. A. conference to be held at Cincinnati December 1-4. Leaders of both races will participate as speakers. The keynote of the meeting will be sounded by Dr. John R. Mott. Among the other distinguished speakers will be Dr. W. W. Alexander of Atlanta, director of the Interracial Commission; Dr. R. R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute; Dr. George E. Haynes, formerly director of Negro economics in the United States Bureau of Labor. Responses have been secured from enough people already to guarantee that the conference will be a great success.

Chicago Churches Send Message to Washington

Ministers of Chicago were not afraid to speak out on Armistice Sunday. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnson, secretary of the Chicago Church Federation, has issued a report in which he says that 450 ministers representing a constituency of 225,000 members, delivered the peace message on a single Sunday. The various churches holding the services adopted a resolution which was sent to Washington. A telegram went to President Harding and Secretary Hughes apprising them of the action of the various Chicago churches.

Presbyterians Will Emphasize Giving

The Presbyterian church in the U. S. A. has been stirred up on the subject of giving by the achievements of the United Presbyterians. The latter denomination gives pretty nearly three times as much for benevolence per capita as the Presbyterians. The stewardship idea has been emphasized by them for years, and this is believed to be the secret of their success. The Presbyterian church will emulate this success, and Dr. A. F. McGarrah, church efficiency expert, is trying to induce Bible classes to study stewardship. In the Chicago Presbytery 1,115 men were in classes studying stewardship on October 16. The number grows continually.

Preacher Charges War to the Diplomats

Rev. W. L. Barth, pastor of Second Christian church of Cedar Rapids, Ia., spoke on Armistice Sunday on the ideals of peace, and his sermon was so impressive that local papers published it in full. War in his view is a product of wrong leadership. He said: "War is the unclean spawn of professional diplomats—of men whose business is war, human life is relatively of little account with them. The staggering price of war is borne by the common people, and by them alone, for the unclean tragedy of all wars is the fact that the ruling classes are stronger and richer after war than before. They tell us we shall have war with Japan. They tell us that a war with Mexico is more than a probability in the not distant future. Is there any one who can give an intelligent reason why we shall fight the Mexican people? Would there be any talk of a war with Mexico if Mexico had no booty, no oil wells or copper mines or resources of fabulous richness? Of course these considerations will never be urged. We shall piously talk about a backward people, and the blessings of liberty and civilization we shall bring them; but incidentally, when the war is over, we shall own a generous slice of her oil wells, their mines and natural resources."

New Teacher of Missions at Moody Institute

Moody Institute of Chicago has a new teacher of missions in the person of Rev. Robert H. Glover, a missionary of many years' experience in China. He will direct the missionary course of the institute, succeeding Rev. E. J. Pace, who will henceforth work in the institute's extension department. Dr. Glover received his education in Toronto University, the University of New York and the New York Missionary Training College. In his many years of service in China he pioneered an enterprise in a section that had not been previously open to missionary work. In recent years he has been supervisor of the work of three provinces of China for the Christian and Missionary Alliance.

Moderators of America Join in a Public Appeal

So far as known the moderators and presiding officers of the evangelical denominations of America have never until this year cooperated in a joint appeal to the nation on a public matter. The Federal Council of Churches called them together recently, and they united in speaking to the nation on the subject of world peace. Among the many weighty utterances in this document are the following: "A sweeping reduction of armaments we hold to be an imperative necessity. The present riot of expenditure on armies and battleships throughout the world, at a time when our resources are needed for constructive tasks, even at a time when millions of men are dying of starvation, we regard as a sin against humanity for which we all alike need humbly to repent. Worse still, competitive armaments will lead again, as in the past they always have, to the distrust and suspicion that nourish the seeds of future war. For the perplexing problem of the Pacific acceptable solutions must be found. If causes of irritation are not removed, if jealousy and fear be allowed to spread till they lead at last to conflict in arms, it would mean not only all the unspeakable evils of every war, but also the death knell of the great enterprise of Christian missions which through years of patient and unselfish service have been breaking down barriers between race and race and ministering to international brotherhood."

Rheims Protestants Lay Cornerstone

On the site of the old building destroyed by the shells of the Germans the Evangelical Reformed church of Rheims laid the cornerstone of their new structure recently. During the four years of bombardment of their city many of the members of this church lived in underground rock-hewn caves. Here they worshipped, and their children were born. In these days of reconstruction they have given heroically for the rebuilding of their sanctuary. They wish to build not only a house of worship, but a parish house as well, with a gymnasium and rooms for the various social activities which are now associated with city work. A library will be installed in the new parish house. The French people will erect the house of worship, and the Federal Council of Churches of this country has made of itself a collection agency to receive a hundred thousand dollars for the parish house.

Not a Pacifist but Opposes War

The ministers are nearly a unit in this country in opposing war. Many have been converted to a theoretical pacifism, and would go to prison rather than cooperate with another war. Others have more of the opportunist attitude in bringing in the great reform. Such evidently is the case with Rev. J. J. Castleberry, who spoke on Armistice Sunday on the problem of world

The Detroit Gathering of Methodism

A NATIONAL conference called by leaders of the Methodist Episcopal church for Detroit, November 15-17, was held in Central Methodist church. The entire official body of the church was present, and besides these many leading pastors and laymen from various sections of the country. The meeting came together with the express purpose of considering the national, international, social, political and economic needs of the world. New opportunities have come to Methodism as a result of the Centenary Movement. At the same time no provision has been made to carry on at the present high level of achievement after the present fund is all expended. Though only 67 per cent of the pledges are being paid, nevertheless Methodism has more money than it ever had in its history before, and much more than any other Protestant communion has ever had.

The devotional element was emphasized in the meeting, and near the opening of the conference the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered by the resident bishop and his attendants. Bishop McDowell brought the delegates up standing with his clear call for a larger devotion to Jesus Christ. He said: "Our first business here is to be sure that Jesus has the mastery over our lives and plans. It is easy to say 'Lord, Lord,' easy to declare our orthodoxy, easy to make a shibboleth out of the supremacy of Christ. But we shall not get through this difficult hour on a verbal statement, however sound. Deep issues are not met by easy treatment. Our first question is: Who is our Master at this hour? In the heart of us we can have but one answer: One is our Master even Christ. He has our vote. We have no compromise candidate."

The racial question was handled with gloves. Dr. Emmett J. Scott, secretary-treasurer of Howard University of Washington, D. C., who during the war was special assistant to the secretary of war advising in matters relative to colored troops and civilians, spoke on "Present Day Negro Thought." Dr. Scott said: "In all my acquaintance with the leaders and thinkers of my race I have not found even one who did not regard the discussion of the subject of the so-called social equality as a psychological makeshift adopted by some men to choke off the economic, educational and political advancement of a race which is forging ahead in spite of this paranoiac phantasy of delusion. It is social justice that the negro seeks. A great and powerful country cannot afford to assure him less. In substitution for lynchings, he wants justice in the courts; he wants the privilege of serving on juries; the right to vote; the right to hold office like other citizens. He wants better educational facilities, abolition of the 'Jim Crow' car and of discrimination and segregation in the government service; the same military training and chance for promotion in the United States army that other men enjoy; destruction of the peonage system and equal wage, better housing, better sanitary conditions and reforms in those penal institutions where men and women of his race have suffered grievous wrongs."

Dr. Lucius H. Bugbee faced in his address the problem of securing adequate leadership for Methodist enterprises. He asserted that "the church is not attracting to the ranks of its ministry young men of outstanding genius and character." In seeking for explanations for this disheartening fact, he said: "There must be adequate freedom. Young men must know that if they are entering into any form of Christian service they will not be hampered and hindered by ecclesiastic restrictions and regulations. Men are impatient just now of denominational shibboleths and incidental differences. There must be time to think and pray and experience for one's self that the Christian messages may bear the stamp of that authority which comes from individual thinking and experiences. We must stop handing down ready-made programs from church officials and encourage the individual leader to express his own initiative in his own program."

The closing session in Woodward Avenue Tabernacle was the largest of the series, for the citizens of Detroit were admitted. At this session a topic of national interest was presented called "Christ and the Nations." At this high level the conference closed and Methodism having taken stock of itself will go to the routine task once more determined to realize on its hopes.

peace. He said: "I will not take the extreme position that war is never justifiable, but to say the least it is a mighty vampire sucking the life blood out of civilization. It not only is an economic evil, but it is a moral crime. The moral havoc wrought by war is worse than the physical effect—dastardly as that is. Bridges can be rebuilt, cities restored and blasted fields made to blossom again with beauty, but the moral wreckage simply is beyond repair. Hence the inexorable laws of God are against war and the decree has gone forth: 'They that take up the sword shall perish by the sword.' The time at last has come in the evolution of civilized society when war, like slavery and witchcraft, must be done away with. It is a political and moral anachronism and belongs to the outgrown past—the age of tribal animosities and conflicts—not to the age of brotherhood, goodwill and fellowship."

Disciples Again Show
a Good Gain

For many years the Disciples were known as the most rapidly growing religious body in America. During the war the growth came to an end, and for several years a small loss was registered. This loss has been explained by many observers according to individual temperament and viewpoint. Some spoke of war conditions, others of a more accurate method of gathering statistics, while still others saw in the theological turmoil of recent national conventions a disturbance of morale. The new year-book now on the press shows a gain the past year of 30,000 as compared with a loss the previous year of 6,805. The state of Indiana reports the biggest Disciples gain for the past year, 14,000, while Kansas is second with 10,000. This year strong emphasis is being given evangelism and there is evident an appreciation of the fact that new times demand new recruiting methods.

Presbyterians Will Hold Field Days

Presbyterian field days will be held in various parts of the country during December. Dr. H. C. Swearingen, the new moderator, will speak in a number of these meetings. Few moderators have taken so many trips as Dr. Swearingen in the discharge of their duties. The Field Day campaign will open in Chicago December 5 and 6; it will be carried to Cleveland, Toledo, Cincinnati, Columbus, Detroit, Indianapolis, St. Louis and Milwaukee. All the great Presbyterian benevolent causes will be presented in these meetings, and the loyalties of the church mobilized in their behalf.

Disciples Make Progress
in Florida

The church and its work prospers with the endowment of any backward section of the country. Many sections of the southland have been in a process of rapid development in recent years, and among these is the state of Florida. Miami and Jacksonville contend for the honor of being the most rapidly growing cities of this state. Disciples churches have been erecting some very creditable buildings in this state. In Miami, under the leadership of Homer E. Sala, a building has been erected costing $130,000 and dedicated without any public appeal for funds. In Jacksonville, First church has recently raised $100,000 for an enlargement of the plant. Main Street church of Jacksonville is enlarging the plant and will soon have equipment valued at $125,000. Riverside Avenue church of Jacksonville has the plans drawn for a $100,000 edifice. The state convention was held in Orlando recently with one hundred and thirty delegates from out of town. Rev. W. A. Harp of Clearwater was elected as president.

Largest Electrical Church
Sign Now in Philadelphia

New York City formerly boasted the largest electrical sign advertising a church, but that honor is now passed on to Philadelphia. Oxford Presbyterian Community church has a sign which is built something like a monument with a broad base and a towering shaft. Reading up and down one discovers the word "Community," and reading cross-wise, the word "Church." On the base of the sign in smaller letters are the words "Oxford Presbyterian." Not only does the enormous sign give the name of the church, but it carries a message daily which is illuminated for the passers-by. One of the recent messages read: "Try the up tonic, lift up, smile up, cheer up. Pulling down your own face lifts up no one's heart." Rev. Herman B. Guhse is the pastor of this church.

Disciples Group at Northwestern Organizes

Northwestern University is no longer exclusively Methodist but large numbers of students come from the various evangelical groups. Sixty Disciples are enrolled at Northwestern this year, thirty-five of them women. The women students have organized a Women's Circle which will engage in mission study and cooperate with the Disciples Brotherhood House of Chicago. A Sunday school class has been organized for the exclusive use of Northwestern students in the local Disciples church, which will be taught by a bright young attorney.

ing. Of general interest is the action these women took with regard to the Armenian girls still in captivity. Half of the Armenian nation has been wiped out by the Turks, the most colossal crime of history some say, and thousands of the most beautiful and attractive girls of the nation have been carried away into the Turkish harems. The Near East Relief has lacked facilities on account of meager funds in the rescue of these girls. The Congregational women in a series of resolutions pledge their support to a movement for the rescue of all Armenian girls in captivity.

Deaconesses May Become Deacons

A deacon in the Episcopal church is simply a candidate for holy orders who has advanced one step on his way to become a priest. Deaconesses belong to an order of women who are licensed to serve the church in a special way. These deaconesses will be changed into deacons if a new canon to be introduced in the General Convention of the church next year should pass. The deacon under present law can baptize, marry and bury the dead. The new order of deacon will not have these rights if the canon should pass. The older communions are much put to it to placate the rising feminist consciousness of the world and this bill would appear to be one of the many sops which is being offered to placate the militant element among the women.

How Lloyd George Comes to Be Both a Disciple and Baptist.

The church affiliation of David Lloyd George has been a moot question ever since he first became premier of the British Empire. He has been claimed by both the Baptist and the Disciples communions. Rev. Ernest C. Mobley, a Disciples minister who formerly held the pastorate of the Disciples church at Southampton, made a visit to the Welsh home of David Lloyd George some years ago. He reports an interview with the uncle and foster father of the premier. This uncle is pastor of the local Disciples church. Nationality is a stronger tie in Great Britain than denomination, so when Lloyd George went to London he began attending the Welsh Baptist chapel, since the Disciples had no service in Welsh. When at home in Wales he attends the Disciples church.

Sanctity of Marriage Association

Only the most backward reforms are now without organization, and one can scarcely think of an idea which does not have a secretary. Among the newer reform organizations is one within the fellowship of the Protestant Episcopal church called the Sanctity of Marriage Association. The president is Rev. Milo H. Gates and the general secretary Rev. Walker Gwynne. During the past year the organization has published two thousand each of four different tracts on the divorce question.

Well-Known Churchman Visits His Boyhood Home

Rev. Charles S. Macfarland recently visited his boyhood home at East Boston and participated in a union meeting of the churches there. In the early nineties he was pastor of a mission in this section and president of a union of all the young people's societies of this district. The old adage about the lack of appreciation in one's home town seems to be reversed in the case of Dr. Macfarland, for he was given a great ovation by his townspeople.

Large Methodist Churches

The Methodist churches with over a thousand members are interesting to the statisticians of the church. The recent year-book shows that there are now 323 such churches as compared with 163 in 1915. The largest church in communion with the Methodist Episcopal denomination is colored. The East Calvary church of Philadelphia has 3,320 members. The second largest is North Woodward Methodist church of Detroit, which has 3,117. Ohio has 38 of the large churches and Pennsylvania 30.

Pope Will Call Council on Easter Question

The Roman Catholic church will call a council in Rome next April to consider the question of a change of method in fixing Easter. The pope will not only invite leading ecclesiastics of his own communion, but astronomers and scientists. It is rumored that the pope will invite many prominent churchmen outside the Roman communion. These will be invited, not as representatives of their churches but as individuals. As is well known to historical students the present method of fixing Easter was the result of a compromise. It is believed that the coming conference will decide to fix the Sunday nearest to April 15 as the annual date. Under the present system it is possible for Easter to come as early as March 22 or as late as April 25. Should the pope invite Christian leaders outside his own communion this fact will be rather more important than a change of date for Easter.

Unitarians Holding Evangelistic Meetings

The Unitarian Laymen's League has insisted that the program of the Unitarian churches should have less arid intellectualism and more interest in the souls of men. Under the leadership of the league the two Unitarian churches of St. Louis will each hold a week's series of evangelistic meetings in carrying out this program. Men will be invited to unite with the church "for the worship of God and the service of mankind in the spirit of Jesus." Rev. William H. Sullivan of All Soul's Church of New York and Rev. Palfrey Perkins of Weston, Mass., are the preachers. The visiting ministers will keep office hours for seekers after the truth. The Unitarian Laymen's League will be very active in publicity and personal work during this effort.

Canadian War Cripples Plead for Peace

Dramatic exemplification of the horrors of war was given the Central Congregational church of Winnipeg when the pastor, Rev. George Laughton, brought into his congregation one Sunday evening fifty war cripples, some of them without an arm and some without a leg. A few had both legs missing, and others were blind. Behind these marched in a hundred war widows. At the close of the sermon by the pastor on the destructiveness of war, a resolution was presented which had been previously passed by the Winnipeg Branch of the Amputations Association of the Great War. The resolution read as follows: "Whereas there is about to be held in Washington, D. C., a conference between the leading nations of the world, at which Canada will be represented, to discuss disarmament.

"And where as: the recent war did leave us with a legacy of widows and orphans and disabled men, and an overwhelming burden of taxation, with its accompanying depression of trade and unemployment.

"And whereas: We as members of The Amputations Association of the Great War, having each lost a limb or limbs in the said war, know to a peculiar and intimate degree the handicap which war imposes on us as individuals.

"And whereas: It is our earnest desire that the present and future generations of the world be spared the horrors of the years 1914-1918, and the subsequent handicap under which we as Amputations suffer.

"And whereas: The armistice and peace treaty did not bring about the peace we had a right to expect; but instead has left the seeds for future wars, which will be greater in their intensity, hatred and mutilation.

"Therefore be it resolved: That we, 'The Winnipeg Branch of the Amputations Association of the Great War,' whilst once again asserting our loyalty to his majesty the king, Canada and the British Empire, do strongly oppose the settling of all and any national disputes by means of war. To this end we wish to assure Canada's representative at the forthcoming conference on disarmament of our whole-hearted support of any action he may take to bring about a better understanding between the nations, leading ultimately to a peaceful league of nations."

Having read these resolutions the pastor called upon all who believed that these should be forwarded to Sir Robert Borden, with the endorsement of the congregation present, to rise. Without a single known exception that vast audience rose to its feet. The resolutions, with the account of their endorsement by the people present at that service, have been forwarded to Canada's delegate at Washington. Mr. Laughton has announced that every Sunday evening, while the conference at Washington is in session, he will discuss some phase of the deliberations. This he does at the request of the board of management.

Christmas Gifts!

TWO FOR THE
PRICE OF ONE

The most acceptable gift you can make to your friends at the Christmas season is a year's subscription to

The Christian Century

And the next best is a good book! We will send The Christian Century for a year to one of your friends, and a selected book to another — and both for the price of a year's subscription to The Christian Century ($4.00; to ministers, $3.00). Think what 52 visits of The Christian Century would mean to Friend Number One, and what a year's reading of The Daily Altar, for example, would mean to Friend Number Two!

Note 1: We have prepared a beautiful and dignified Christmas greeting card to be sent to Friend Number One a few days before Christmas asking him (or her) to accept The Christian Century as a Christmas gift from you, and another card to be sent with the book to Friend Number Two asking him (or her) to accept the book as a Christmas gift from you.

Note 2: If you prefer, you may instruct us to send the book to the person to whom you are sending The Christian Century, or we will send to you, if you wish.

Note 3: Bill for the subscription(s) (including book free) will be mailed you after Christmas.

Note 4: Get your orders in now and make sure that both gifts will reach your friends in good time.

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

THERE has never been published a book which is better adapted for gift purposes than The Daily Altar. There are several reasons for its popularity:

1. It is beautifully made. Typographically it is perfect, and the binding is superb. It is bound in full morocco ($2.50) and in beautiful purple cloth ($1.50, add 8 cents postage).
2. It carries a religious message. The Christmas season is a religious one and the ideal Christmas gift is a religious book.
3. It lasts the year round — and for many years. Every time your friend takes up the book for his morning reading he will think of the thoughtful giver of the gift.

What The Daily Altar Contains

There is a page for each day's reading. For each day there is a verse of Scripture, a meditation, a brief poem, and a prayer.

A suggestion: Send for one copy of the book at once, either leather or cloth, then make up your list of friends who are to receive this delightful gift from you, and send on your order without delay.

WHAT THEY SAY OF THE DAILY ALTAR

The Central Christian Advocate: "Cannot be too highly commended."
The Presbyterian Advance: "Excellent and beautiful."
The Christian Evangelist: "A real help toward restoring the family altar."
The Churchman: "A beautiful book."
The Christian Standard: "Beyond all praise."
The Christian Advocate (New York): "Excellent arranged."

The Life of Christ

By REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, D. D.

Vicar of Christ Church, Westminster, and formerly Minister of City Temple, London

A record of all that modern scholarship can tell of the life of Jesus, written by a world-famous preacher, who has brought to his task years of study, a striking felicity of style, and a deep understanding of the expression of a great religious philosophy in an actual life.

“THEOLOGIES may come and go, but the Jesus of Christian faith and worship possesses an immediacy independent of all theorizing about its nature, an intimacy indissolubly one with the life of the church he indwells.” Such is the viewpoint of Dr. Campbell in this new work. He continues: “Every reader knows the impossibility of conveying a complete pen picture of any personality whatsoever. You may describe minutely the appearance, manners, voice, and other peculiarities of a new acquaintance, but you do not succeed in giving to any one at a distance your own impression of the man himself, his spiritual idiom, so to speak; the thing which constituted that man’s special individuality and differentiates him from all the rest of the world is the indescribable. No matter how much you may have heard beforehand about a person or read of him and his doings, it is only when you come into actual contact with him that you receive a true idea of what he is. It is the present writer’s conviction that this has been largely overlooked in recent years in the criticism of New Testament literature. The only right method of approach to the Jesus of the New Testament is through the living witness, the witness of his continued presence with his church. No other method can yield any but misleading results.”

“We cannot regard what Jesus was,” the author concludes, “as an open question; we must assume that to be settled by nineteen centuries of Christian witness. Hence when critics of the gospel records of his ministry diverge from the accepted view of the church on this point we can only reply that they are not in a position to determine it; we know Jesus, not from criticism of literary sources, but from the unimpeachable fact that there is a continuity of Christian life which claims to derive historically from him and to be immediately dependent upon fellowship with him in the ordinances of the church and the ministry of the word.”

When Dr. Campbell went from the City Temple to the vicarage of Christ Church, Westminster, he told of his changed point of view in “A Spiritual Pilgrimage.” He really continues his story in this latest work. This is not simply another Life of Christ, but a different Life of Christ.

Price of the book $3.00, plus 20 cents postage.

EDITORIAL

The Washington Conference

THE conference at Washington has proceeded far enough toward positive performance to warrant faith on the public's part that President Harding was amply justified in calling it. Our more wary minded people will be slow to accept the initial utterances of the diplomats at face value. It is the essence of diplomacy to state one's first reaction to a proposal or a demand in agreeable and favorable terms. Acceptance "in principle" leaves room for later taking exception to certain "details" the effect of which would be radically to modify the principle. But on several of the main matters now before the conference it seems safe to speak hopefully. The reduction of dreadnoughts in accordance with the Hughes proposal is one of the results most likely to issue from the conference. Two factors operate with irresistible persuasion to force some such action. One is the insufferable taxation burden that rests upon England and Japan, as well as the United States. The other is the tacit threat of the United States that if the navies are not reduced we will out-build all others. The play of idealistic moral motives for reduction is not apparent, though one must not infer that the persuasive considerations are wholly economic. In national as well as individual action motives are usually mixed. The fact that the terms used in discussion are economic and self-interested does not warrant the cynical inference that there is no idealism in the conference. A second promising feature is the growing likelihood that the Anglo-Japanese alliance will be dissolved. This alliance is increasingly felt by American public opinion to afford undue protection for Japan in her aggressive designs in relation to the Asiatic mainland, and to menace the interests of the United States in the event of war with Japan.

There are signs that British public opinion is becoming aware that American feeling toward Britain cannot, in the nature of the case, be comfortable so long as this now unnatural alliance continues. A third hopeful aspect of the conference relates to the emancipation of China from the clutches of alien exploitation. Her ten points have been given unexpected hospitality. It is the general belief that the diplomacy of the United States is quietly bringing pressure to bear in the sub-committees to secure for China the substance of her demands, including a retroactive interpretation of them. With China free, autonomous and truly sovereign, with the unnatural concessions such as extraterritoriality revoked, the problem of the far east will be in position to solve itself. It is China's helplessness which, more than any other element, has been the occasion of our eastern troubles and fears. A strong China with guaranteed rights and guaranteed freedom to exercise them, will do more to bring peace and cooperation into the Pacific situation than any other single achievement.

Premier Briand's Heroic and Pathetic Appeal

SPEAKING for France, Premier Briand made both a heroic and a pathetic figure at the Washington conference. That his description of his country's insecurity and dread, due to an unrepentant and still resourceful Germany, is true to essential fact, no one need doubt. Mr. H. G. Wells thinks that France wants to keep a strong army and enlarge her navy, especially by building submarines, so as to be ready for what she is alleged to believe is an inevitable war with England. He holds that Mr. Briand's picture of the subtle processes of war preparation now going on in Germany is merely "conjured up" by the French premier. But such an interpretation is far fetched. Why should any one doubt that Germany is doing precisely what M. Briand says she is doing? What nation in her position would be expected to do otherwise? Did not France herself after 1870 do essentially the same? Germany, defeated but unbowed, writhing in the sense that she has been made the victim of a flagrant breach of faith on the part of her conquerors, suffering under the terms of an impossible peace for which in the main the ancient enemy at her border is chiefly responsible, could not of course be expected to show signs of penitence or reconciliation. There are only two conceivable ways that France may hope to achieve the security for which her premier eloquently pleaded in his conference address. One is to render Germany economically and militarily impotent, to wipe her off the map of Europe as a positive nationalistic quantity. This, while conceivable, would be a prodigious and, with the world's eyes on her, probably an impossible undertaking. The other course is to make peace with Germany direct. The day must come when France and Germany will have a peace conference of their own and reach a modus vivendi based upon justice, directed toward fellowship, and not implying that Germany alone is a sinner while France thanks God she is not like other nations and particularly this German publican. Both France and Germany are historically involved in guilt for their ancient feud. No such peace terms as those pharisaically conceived at Versailles will settle this feud and bring security either to France or Germany. A Christian peace, that is a peace which looks not backward to find grounds for punishment, but forward to find grounds for reconciliation and redemption—such a peace France herself must some day negotiate with Germany. In that day she will achieve real security, and in that day Europe will find peace.

Paganism Persisting in Christianity

HISTORY tells the story of a church which in its march of triumph through the earth has met various rival religions, and overcome them by the simple device of appropriating them. The result is that the Christianity of the twentieth century, in spite of various efforts at reformation from Martin Luther's day to our own, has in it large elements of paganism. Many popular conceptions of God are altogether pagan. When he is represented as seeking his own glory and as a lover of revenge, we are talking in terms of Olympus rather than of Calvary. A pagan practice of prayer still persists. For some Christians prayer is a process of getting things by much repetition. The ideas of death and the hereafter which are commonly taught in evangelical churches have large elements which are extra-biblical, and which are pagan both in content and spirit. It is this pagan residuum which offends a great many young people of a thoughtful turn of mind. College students grow cold in their church loyalties as they begin to form individual judgments of the religious teaching which they hear in the churches, and more particularly in the Sunday school classes and prayer meetings. Perhaps we have by no means recognized all the pagan elements in our religion. Will it sometime be recognized as pagan to pray for success in war? The church has been happy in the thought that her reformation is going forward progressively, and that she is today nearer the ideal of the pure religion of Jesus, but she must not be too sure. Some of the commonest things of the Christian church are still paganized. The sacrifice of the mass is a kind of idolatry. Baptism as conceived in many churches is a species of magic. Jesus used forms to set forth dramatically great spiritual truths. These forms the church still degrades. The reformation is not something long since complete, but rather something just well begun. What remains to be done is greater than what has been accomplished.

The Church and the City

SO long as the church was chiefly engaged in snatching brands from the burning, it was of course unnecessary for the minister and the official board to know anything about the city. The essential work of the church was to find one more possible convert. It began to dawn on church people a few years ago that some people are not possible converts simply because of the conditions under which they live. It was seen that not only does mass evangelism move men toward the church occasionally, but that there are other mass movements in a direction away from organized religion. Hence the modern church, either as an efficiency measure or because of a brand new conception of its program, has begun to study the city in which its work is done. An average American city has an ascertainable history. Often that history is a mere collection of facts and figures waiting some one with vision who has power to interpret. Most cities are quite unaware of the diversity in their population. The immigrant, the Negro and the oriental are to be found, and the American stock may be so diversified as to offer different problems. Every large city has the problems of poverty, vice, unemployment, radicalism, besides many others. All of these affect vitally the program of organized religion. Running a rescue mission to save a few stragglers is a laudable endeavor, but the task of making a whole city Christian in its heart is a much more formidable task. Some cities like Philadelphia have never wholly lost the glamour of a glorious past. The spirit of William Penn still broods over that city. It is possible for devoted men and women to introduce into the life of cities now in the making some such sense of idealism. It can be done only through the labors of those who, like William Penn, see the problem of religion to be that of establishing a religious community.

A Chance to Practice What is Preached

CLOSE relatives often do not like each other and the communion known as the Christian denomination and the Disciples of Christ have not always seen eye to eye. A church of Disciples was once sued in Ohio on account of calling itself "Christian," and partly in return for this there have often been slighting remarks about the smaller communion in Disciples pulpits. Recently the editor of the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the official journal of the Christian denomination, has suggested that the leaders of the two communions should get together in conference on the subject of union. Both communions have spent a century talking about Christian union. They stand in each other's presence abashed by the fact that their professions and their practice do not tally. Either they must in the future talk differently about union, or else they must act differently. The Association for the Promotion of Christian Union, an organization representing the Disciples, should see in the present situation a challenge to act. It might be that after conference and a period of better acquaintance, the line of demarkation might be wiped out.

Spoiling the American Legion

PRESS reports of the national meeting of the American Legion held in Kansas City early in November have not been over candid, but sufficient has been said to indicate that a disorderly element of the organization must be in control. Boisterousness and riotousness characterized the meeting. Groups gathered around the hotel lobbies to shoot craps on the floor, and swore at any luckless hotel official who tried to stop them. Into the rotunda of the finest hotel in the city a steer was led one evening. Liquor flowed for three days more freely than in the old saloon dispensation. Along the line of march the hats of citizens were knocked off if they were not taken off quickly enough. At last a young riot developed, and policemen were beaten with clubs for discharging their duty. When one contrasts all this with the meetings of the G. A. R., or with the sessions of the Spanish War Veterans, it is evident that the American Legion does not at all represent the 90 per cent or more of decent and law-abiding young veterans who have put off their military uniforms. The veterans of the world war were within their rights in organizing to maintain the fellowships and memories of their great adventure. Any group of men has a right to organize for any lawful purpose. But the American Legion has no right to drag the uniform of the American army into the dirt, and make a mockery of all patriotism. Either the organization will reform itself, or it is likely to get a name such that no self-respecting man will belong to it. Then finis will be written to its history. The veterans may have to create another organization which will more properly represent the majority sentiment of the men. Kansas City will not want to invite again the hoodlums who took possession of their city last month. What city will want the Legion if it remains in such hands?

Something Worth More than Radium

A GRAM of radium worth $100,000 was presented to Madame Curie at the University of Chicago on the occasion of her visit to America last summer. The presentation speech was made by Prof. R. A. Milliken. It was a curious fact that the address which dealt with the significance of radium in the scientific world should have closed with such challenging words as these: "From my point of view there are two things of immense importance in this world, two ideas or beliefs upon which, in the last analysis, the weal or the woe of the race depends, and I am not going to say that belief in the possibilities of scientific progress is the most important. The most important thing in the world is the belief in the reality of moral and spiritual values. It was because we lost that belief that the world war came, and if we do not now find a way to regain and to strengthen that belief, then science is of no value." What institution fosters this belief in ideals? Is it not evident that the church, if we are to follow the logic of Professor Milliken's statement, has the most important task in the whole world? If the church fails to work at that task, it cumbers the ground. But if it contributes ever so little to quicken conscience, and give conscience a definite witness, it has wrought mightily for the welfare of mankind. The sense of spiritual values helps us to find satisfactions that are denied to the pagan and philistine mind. Spiritual insight means a more human and sympathetic world. Certain public interpreters of religion try to make out that the man of science is an enemy. In the laboratories of the institutions of higher learning men who happen to work on physical problems are by no means materialists.

Chaplains for Army and Navy

AT the outbreak of the war one of the first causes to receive the attention of the Federal Council of Churches was the need of properly selected chaplains for the service. Almost at once there was created the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, and care was taken not only to secure properly fitted men for this important work, but a just distribution of chaplains among the various religious bodies. In this manner the Protestant denominations were assured their proportion. With the diminution of the army to a peace basis no new appointments are being made, although the work of the committee continues to be imperative. The normal arrangement is one chaplain for every 1200 officers and men. At the present rate of absorption by resignations, deaths, retirements and otherwise it will take from three to five years to reduce the number of chaplains to the authorized strength. There are now 181 chaplains in the regular army, including 41 Methodists, 39 Roman Catholics, 26 Baptists, 17 Episcopalians, 16 Presbyterians, 12 Lutherans, 9 Disciples, and others in proportion. Recently the regulations regarding reserve chaplains have been published, and 600 reserve chaplains have been appointed. Practically all these are men who served in the war, and have passed through the Chaplains' School, either in this country or France. According to denominations they are distributed as follows: Roman Catholic 165, Methodist 115, Baptist 91, Presbyterian 71, Episcopalian 54, Disciples 31, Congregationalists 23, and other bodies

23. Several special contributions have been made to the work of the committee for the year ahead, including $1000 from the Southern Methodist church, and $10,000 from the Y. M. C. A.

Faith and the New Time

CHRISTIANITY has continually reinterpreted itself throughout the centuries since it was first proclaimed. It has worn the garments of Lois of Lysitra, of Priscilla of Corinth, of Hilda of Scotland, of Joan of Arc, of Isabella of Castile, of Florence Nightingale, of Francis Willard, of Jane Addams. It has passed in its career Paganism, Shinto, Confucianism, Hinduism, Judaism, Parseeism; and is today passing Buddhism and Mohammedanism, its two chief competitors for world dominion. It has cast off in its progress the traditions, superstitions and dogma pinned to its garments by many eager partisans, and is more than ever endeavoring to speak the truth needed by the age. In this it realizes the ideal of the words of the writer of II Peter where he speaks of the "present truth." The present truth, as the writer conceived it, is the truth adjusted to the times. It is the present gospel, the good news put in the language of one's own age. Men change and doctrines pass away. Jesus Christ alone abides. And the interpretation of his life and program which best reveals him to the present time is the present truth, the faith for the time.

That faith must be biblical, intelligent, liberal, and vital. The Bible is the classic literature of Christianity. It is the description of the most impressive religious experience in history. It is the supreme book of religion. There are many sacred literatures, but only one Bible. It is a volume which must be studied in the light of the most competent scholarship. It must be granted all the values which critical study have yielded in our day. In the light of literary science, historical investigation, archaeological research, and comparative religious inquiry, it has become a new book in our time. On this book we can depend as a competent witness of the divine activity in history. We do not go to it as a level book, all parts of which are of the same value; nor as an inerrant book, guaranteed against all mistakes of historic or scientific statement; nor as a miraculous book, whose origins have been wrapped in the mystery of unearthly events. But we go to it as a luminous honest, trustworthy and inspiring manual of the religious life. It presents to us the story of a people used of God for the development of the highest pre-Christian ideals of morality and religion; it gives us a convincing portrait of Jesus and a reliable report of the impression he made upon those who knew him best; it sets forth the lives, teachings and achievements of his first interpreters; and it recounts something of the beginnings of the Christian movement in the world. It enables us to understand in some measure the apostolic faith, the apostolic spirit and the apostolic service.

The faith for the age must also be an intelligent faith. The New Testament itself is witness to the fact that in the light of increasing knowledge the early church discarded within the first century erroneous or imperfect views. The highway of Christian history is strewn with the fragments of rejected dogmas, once deemed necessary to the faith. Who that contemplates the crude theories of the divine decrees, the worship of the mother of God, angel mediation, supralapsarianism, baptismal regeneration and other curious ideas that once held sway in large sections of the church, and still survive in belated groups, can fail to perceive the widening vista of religious truth in our day, and the sincere effort now made to eliminate the useless incumbrance with which theology once burdened itself.

What would you think of an institution of religious education which proclaimed its five fundamental points of teaching to be the verbal inspiration and inerrancy of the Bible; the virgin birth of Jesus; the substitutionary theory of the blood atonement the physical resurrection of Jesus, and the immediate, visible second advent? Yet that is the published statement of belief to which assent is required in at least one such institution in our land. Two of these ideas are false and incredible, judged by every canon of modern scholarship; one is a theory which is at best highly questionable, and not one of them, in the form stated, would have found recognition as an essential truth in the apostolic church. At best they arouse question if not dissent. They do not touch the fundamental bases of our holy faith. To earnest men and women concerned with the elements of the moral and spiritual life and with no time to waste over merely speculative matters, such a confession of faith looks trivial and irreverent. Matters of this subordinate order belong only in the theologies of despair—Romanism, the darker Calvinism, verbalism, and millenarianism.

An intelligent faith must take due account of the great disciplines which have helped to make luminous the Christian religion in our day. The study of the physical universe, which has found in the principle of evolution the best explanation of God's ceaseless work in the world; the scientific study of the Bible; the light that psychology has thrown upon the problems of belief and religious education; and the social movement which has made all of us more sensitive to the needs of great classes in the modern world—all these and other inquiries have given new form and value to belief, and have helped to shape an interpretation of the gospel which is suited to the times.

The twentieth century has become very weary of the presumption and dogmatism of the fourth. It has discovered that the men who issued in such abundance the promissory notes of religious assurance in the earlier ages of the church often had no funds in the bank. The complacency with which they described their snug little universe, with its three compartments of heaven, earth and hell, would astonish the most audacious theologian today. The days for such patronizing of God are over in all but the most ignorant groups. The day of the man who backs under a half-understood text at the approach of an idea is past. The present generation of students, business, professional, and laboring men, and of educated women, must be convinced that the affirmations of religion are underwritten by certainties which can be made clear to them. Much of the older explanation of Christianity sounds remote and unconvincing. What is needed is an intelligent faith, that can suffice for an age of question and a world of sin.

The faith for the time must also be a liberal faith. That is, it must be large, generous, ample; not liberal in the sense of being thin, shallow and negative. It must emphasize the great things of religion. It must not content itself with negations and protests. That is not a liberal faith which throws away the most precious of religious possessions, and then boasts of its opulence. A liberal faith is hospitable to truth wherever found. It has love for all God's children. It recognizes all whom Christ has received. It builds on large, yet simple foundations, and rejoices in the growing city of God.

A faith for the times must be a vital faith. It must place Jesus in the center. It must accept his leadership as progressive, dynamic. It must solve its problems in the light of his experience and teaching. It must make its own the realities that to him were of first-rank importance. It will hold firmly to faith in God, in Christ, in the redemptive work of the church, in the life of trust and holiness, and the hope of the life eternal. In such an atmosphere the great problems of social redemption will find solution, the church will have a convincing message for the world, and the purposes of the apostolic builders of the new social order will find fulfillment.

The Meaning of St. Paul For Today

THE tendency in recent years has been to disparage St. Paul, in the effort to get behind his "speculation" into the purer air of the teaching of Jesus. Often the great apostle has been set forth in contrast, if not in conflict, with his Master, as if he had introduced alien elements into the gospel. Volumes have been written to prove that St. Paul was the creator of churchianity, as opposed to Christianity. All this is altogether wrong, as any one who faces the realities of Christian history must discover.

The two master facts of the New Testament are, first, the experience of God in the life of Jesus; and, second, the experience of Christ in the life of St. Paul. It was his profound, creative, mystical experience of God in Christ that made St. Paul the greatest interpreter and preacher of our faith. Yet one of the strangest things in the history of the church is the rapidity with which the teaching of St. Paul was lost to sight. This was due to many causes, chief among which was the fact that the human mind was unable to grasp the spirituality and liberty of the religion of Jesus as St. Paul taught it. Only a few here and there, even yet, enter into "the liberty of the Spirit" which he never wearied of proclaiming. Perhaps St. Augustine himself did not penetrate to the heart of the teaching of St. Paul, but he did see his greatness and value, and did much to rediscover and re-enthroned him in the church. Had he done nothing else, he would be entitled to the gratitude and veneration of all lovers of Christ.

Once again, in our own day, there are signs to show that St. Paul is being rediscovered; and as men come nearer to the Master they find that the apostle had been there before them, taking deep-sea soundings in the mind of Christ. An instance in point is a remarkable little book, entitled "The Meaning of Paul for Today," by Dr. R. C. Dodd of Mansfield College, Oxford. It is a gem of insight and exposition, as witness the thesis with which it is introduced, which is that the spiritual experience of St. Paul was a realization of the profoundest reality of our religion. Stated in briefest form it is after this manner:

"The story of the Gospels is an unfinished drama. Its historic interest is pivoted upon the conflict between the new liberating message of the kingdom and the religious system represented by the pharisees. There is, on the one hand, the Way of the Nazarene, with his startling assertions and denials; on the other, all that the piety of the time prized as the essentials of revealed religion. The plot thickens, until in the dim morning of the fatal pass-over the antagonists stand face to face—a nation on one side, the rejected prophet on the other. The clash comes, and when the earthquake and eclipse are past, the established order remains supreme. The gospel of emancipation has been added to the limbo of shattered illusions, and pharisaism is triumphant. That is the crisis of the movement. The situation holds all the elements of real tragedy: a conflict of passionate human interests in which the ancient good, become uncouth, overcomes the better that might be, and the stirrings of the human spirit after freedom are baffled by historic necessity.

"But the plot is not finished. The whole development has pointed forward, to this conclusion certainly, but not to this as a conclusion. . . . In the intoxicating joy of Easter morning the defeat is forgotten, and the divine Victor holds the stage. But the faith of the resurrection is so far a matter of personal religious experience; it is not, as yet, history. . . . Various hands have essayed the construction of a convincing Last Act. For the realist school the illusion of the resurrection is but the deepest note in a final and irredeemable catastrophe. The President of the Immortals has finished his sport with the Nazarene. This, however, is to abandon the data of the plot; for the drama is cast not for disaster, but for joy. For the school of romantic melodrama there must be a vindication of poetic justice; and the risen Christ takes his sword of vengeance and sees his desire upon his enemies. It matters here little whether the scene is a Michelangelesque Last Judgment, or whether, the venue being removed to solid earth, Christ is shown triumphing over the ruins of Jerusalem in the fatal year of Titus' victory. Such a denouement is a denial of the central motive of the drama. The character of the Hero must be consistent with itself; and the triumph of a vengeful Messiah is not the triumph of the Victim of Calvary. It is therefore no resolution of the tragic plot.

"For a convincing denouement the Hero of the drama—the Speaker of the Sermon on the Mount, the Prisoner of the Sanhedrin—must emerge, He and no other, as the conqueror by His own weapons and no other, of that unchanged pharisaism, so noble in its stuff, so pernicious in the final issue of its spirit, which had by an inner necessity of its being destroyed him. This is the denouement which history has written. The beginning of it can be told in a few words: "A Hebrew of the Hebrews, in regard to the law a Pharisee. . . . I was laid hold of by Christ Jesus. . . . I am crucified with Christ, and yet I am alive—not I, but Christ is alive in me." Was ever revenge more complete? Imagine this man, among those fanatical Jews who would not enter Pilate's hall "lest they should be defiled," yet stood without clamoring for the death of the Carpenter-Prophet who had dared affront the majesty of their hoary law. Then see him yielding utterly to the spell of the Cross upon which he or his like has fastened the Rejected. That is real conquest. That is the method of the Christian Revolution."

Here is real insight, not only into the experience of St. Paul, but into the depth of the Christian gospel, with its "strange power which men call weakness." Hence his vision, one of the most radiant that his glorified religious history, of the possibility of the universal redemption of man by mystical union with God in Christ—a vision the depth and meaning of which we have not yet fathomed. The interpretation of this vision in his teaching, in his philosophy of history, in his enlarging experience, is followed out by Dr. Dodd with consummate insight and suggestiveness. Its meaning for today is so obviously significant and far-reaching, at once so inspiring and rebuking, that it need hardly be pointed out. Jesus shall reign, inevitably, but it will be the conquest of Love.

Old Fifty-Two

ONCE upon a time there was a World's Fair in Buffalo. And there was a Railway that ran into Buffalo from the region toward the going down of the sun. And its officers said among themselves, Go to. Let us run a train against time, and peradventure we shall beat the World's Record for a Long Run.

And they took two fine new Locomotives that had been built to haul the Empire State Express, and they brought one of them to Chicago, and the other they placed at Collinwood, which was midway and nigh unto Cleveland.

And the first of these fine new Locomotives left Chicago, hauling a Baggage Car and a Day Coach and a Parlor Car. And in the Parlor Car were the officers of the company. And they had Instruments whereby to Register Speed.

And the fine new Locomotive pulled out of Chicago and hastened toward the Sunrise. And it made a good run, but when it pulled into Collinwood, it was Three Minutes under the World's Record for that distance.

And the Officers said,

This will never do. The other new Locomotive must do better.

And as they were starting to hook up the other new Locomotive, behold, they discovered a Broken Valve. And they said, We cannot use that Locomotive.

Then were their hearts heavy.

But they said, Give us an Engine of some sort, for we must get to Buffalo.

And the Yardmaster said, Behold we have only one Locomotive in the yards with Steam up and that is Old Fifty-Two, that years ago went off the main line, and hath long been hauling Local Freight on a Branch Line.

And the Officers said, Give us anything that hath Wheels and a Boiler, for we must get on to Buffalo.

So they hooked up Old Fifty-Two.

Now the Engineer of Old Fifty-Two was no longer young, but in his day he had been a Great Engineer, and he knew his Engine. And he said.

Old Girl, we will give them a Run for their Money.

Now the Officers were sitting in sackcloth and ashes, when they chanced to look out of the window, and behold, the Telegraph Poles went by like a Picket Fence. And they looked at their Instruments, and behold, they were going Sixty-Four Miles an hour.

And they began to Sit Up and take Notice.

And after a time, they looked, and Behold, they were going Seventy Miles an Hour.

And they became Greatly Interested.

And the fireman was sprinkling in the coal, and keeping the steam pressure just where it belonged, and, behold, the train climbed up to Eighty-Four miles an Hour. And when they pulled into Buffalo, the telegraph instruments along the way were hot with the reports of the flight of that train.

And the World's Record for a long distance run was broken.

Now listen unto me, all ye men who stand idly upon life's side-track thinking that there is no great place in life for you. Hauling freight on a Branch Line is no disgrace, but highly honorable. Yet are there men who are fooling away life on Short Hauls of Less Than Car Load Lots, who ought to get out onto Life's Main Track, and actually Get There.

I am no longer young, but I am running on the Main Line, with the Throttle Wide Open, and the Track Clear; and I invite other men who are no longer young, but who are capable of Going Some, to back out of the Round House, and undertake some job worth while and renew their youth.

The Armament Conference

DREAMLIKE, the tumults of the stricken world
Surge round the Council-hall; envoys who read
In one another's eyes the looming need,
Traffic to keep the proudest war-flags furled.
Down the dark waters where kings were hurled Shall follow the great swords that quelled their greed.
So the dream summons; distant is the deed;
Over the whelming waves one brand is whirled.

A mystic bugle wails across the seas;
The unknown warriors of all time rise here,
Bleeding or crowned with perilous victories,—
All that made battles brave or triumphs dear.
And with them other millions, praying still
For statesmen's minds to work the people's will.

Is Christian Theology Christian?

By Shailer Mathews

THE question is of course rhetorical. The answer will be affirmative or negative according to the definition we give the term Christian. From a strictly historical point of view, whatever is Christian is Christian. That is to say, what our religion has produced is undeniably a characteristic of our religion. From such a historical point of view there is no ideal Christianity towards which actual Christianity moves and by which it can be judged. The only question as to whether a doctrine is Christian is whether it has been held by Christians. From the historical point of view the mass is Christian just as thoroughly as is the memorial meal of the Baptists; the veneration of the Virgin Mary, just as truly as the worship of Jesus Christ. From this historical point of view the question is capable of only one answer: of course, Christian theology is Christian. It is a characteristic of the religion.

A FUNDAMENTAL INQUIRY

A comparison of the Confessions of the various branches of Christians will show a large common element of doctrine. Barring numerically small groups, Christians have accepted universally the general position of Catholicism as expressed in the Nicene Creed and that of Chalcedon. According to the first, the Son is of the same substance as the Father; according to the second, in the historical Jesus there are two natures in one person. In addition to these metaphysical agreements, Christians generally accept the Bible as the inspired Word of God, although there is no absolute agreement between Roman Catholic, Protestant and Syrian churches as to just what books constitute the Bible. There is also general unanimity in the teaching that human nature is sinful and that the sin has been derived from Adam; that Christ's death is an element in divine forgiveness, and that there is to be a resurrection of the body. As regards these general doctrines held in common, it is quite idle to ask whether they are Christian in the historical sense of the term. Obviously they are. They help to constitute the Christian religion as it now exists.

But I take it the question has back of it something other than history; that the word Christian implies something more fundamental than a historical description. It is the question whether the Christian theology we have inherited really represents the mind of Christ, and is in accordance with his ideals and life? In a word, is a theology not merely Christian, but Christlike?

I

Suppose, following good scholastic example, we assert the opposite. Suppose we say bluntly that our inherited theology is not Christlike. Even then, at the expense of appearing to split hairs, I wish to call attention to the fact that the estimate which the creators of a doctrine place upon its moral worth may very likely be different from that which later ages put upon it. The religious thinking of a brutal age is not apt to be very sensitive to the ideals of gentleness and honesty and yet can express its belief that God is loving, even if he is (as it may seem to us) unworthily described. For example, it is hard today for us to recognize any Christlike quality in the old teaching that made Christ and the Father partners to a pious fraud upon Satan. To us such dishonesty seems un-Christian. But for hundreds of years Christian people believed that Christ in his desire to save men gave himself on these terms as a ransom to Satan. The doctrine was Christlike in motive. It really did help people, unemancipated from the low morality of those centuries, to believe in the forgiving love of God.

The same can be said of many another doctrine. Each has sprung from a praiseworthy attempt to make intellectually and morally tenable the Christian message of salvation from sin. Christian thought, even when discolored by contemporary morality, has sought to set forth the fact of God's goodness and love. Every Christian doctrine is a transcript of the social mind and some political practice of the age in which it was produced. Thus the satisfaction theory of the atonement came out of feudalism, and the Calvinistic doctrine of divine sovereignty out from the developing monarchy. From the point of view of the modern man, whose political conceptions are democratic and who repudiates heartily the political and social subjection of one class to another, such social ideas are even more inappropriate in religion than they are in politics. But it would be altogether unjust to say that they originally did not express fundamental Christian belief in the forgiving love and the supremacy of God. Even the doctrine which most shocks modern sensibilities, the bald committal of men to eternal torments because they do not accept an orthodox formula comes within the field of this interpretation. For the church sought to save men from this fate by preaching doctrines showing the way of salvation. Its purpose certainly was Christlike. In so far, its doctrines were also.

THE FUNCTIONAL TEST

I think that the same is true of all the great doctrines. When once viewed functionally and in relation to their age rather than as scientific formulæ they represent the effort which successive periods have made to justify rationally the Christian trust in the love of God and the salvation revealed in Christ. It would be as incorrect to say that men who fought with bows and arrows were not warlike because they did not use gunpowder, as it is to say that the men who formulated what may seem to us to be inadequate formulæ were not Christian. Their motive rather than its instrument gives quality to their teaching.

II

But this very fact argues that a theology may become un-Christian when it fails to express a more intelligent and Christlike Christian attitude and hope. Any anachronism in religion injures reasonable faith. Only so long as a formula ministers to religious needs is it really helpful. When it ceases properly to function, it becomes a burden rather than a help. Outgrown dogma, like any vestigial organ, may become a source of danger, however helpful it may have been originally.

It is not possible to make sweeping statements about specific doctrines. Human nature and experience are so various that a doctrine which may fail to express the religious faith of one man may be helpful to another. I once knew a pastor, a member of a religious body severely loyal to a sixteenth century confession, who held to one theology for himself as a private person, but as a pastor preached another, acceptable to his congregation. I do not justify his policy, for to me it seems hypocrisy; but it illustrates the possibility that two theologies can express the same Christian faith.

Yet are all theologies equally true to Christ's gospel? The teachings of Jesus and the example of his life are altogether too plain to be utterly ignored as tests of theological statements. Yet they appear almost never in creeds and confessions. What he requires of his followers is less a precision of definition than moral sympathy and obedience. While the moral atmosphere of an age has led to interpretations of his gospel which fall far below its own ethical ideals, the purpose of his teaching has always been plain. If doctrines are to be tested by him, there will be no question as to certain conclusions. Among these are the following:

THEOLOGY AND BRUTALITY

1. No doctrine can be Christlike which justifies brutality either in man or God. There can be no question on this point. God is love. Contemporary penal practices may deaden a man's view as to what is really brutal, but so much the worse for the doctrine and human conscience. Brutality is brutality. If there is anything plain in the gospels it is that Jesus condemned anything which brought suffering to other people. He even declared that the conception of the messiah as the son of David was inferior to his own. The man who would be his disciple must take up his own cross and not compel others to suffer. God is a father, not a fearful avenger. Men are to be brothers, not persecutors of each other. Any doctrine which praises a lower conception of God, attributing to him joy in the sight of human suffering; any doctrine that, as one of its representatives says, sees Christ in the future trampling over corpses, his clothes red with the blood which has spouted from human bodies; any doctrine which denies the supremacy of the spiritual in human affairs or the incapacity of a God of love to make love a regenerating force in social as well as individual life; is not in accordance with the spirit of Christ. It may have been believed by the early Christians, it may have functioned well in the early church, but it simply is not in accordance with the spirit of him who told men to pray for their enemies and to bless those that cursed them. History discloses that suffering follows sin, and any theology that obscures this fact is in so far incorrect. But this fact cannot justify a theology that presents a God and a Saviour who rejoice in miseries which make the horrors of the battlefield insignificant, or transforms the hope of the gospel into spiritual pessimism.

CHRIST AND GOD

2. Any theology is un-Christlike which represents God as unlike or morally inferior to Jesus. The center of the morality of Jesus is that of sacrificial love. Its symbol is the cross. Authority is his, but it is the authority of a revealer and not of a politician. One cannot think of God as Jesus reveals him without thinking of him as being moved by the same sort of motive as Jesus himself. To think of him as a judge that needs to be placated, as rejoicing in the suffering of disobedient humanity, is to lower him beyond the revelation made in Jesus Christ. True, the facts which such doctrines set forth are indubitable. God is God; not the cosmic bankrupt that some writers apparently regard him. In the nature of the case his will must ultimately prevail or cause suffering. This terrible truth cannot be obscured by any person who attempts to understand the real world in which he lives. But to stand in awe before this solemn fact is not to attribute to God the vindictiveness which so often accompanies the possession of power among men. Figures of speech may be allowed a little more license than literal statements, but when they are built into doctrines they must not violate or fall below the moral standards expressed by Jesus Christ. Reconciliation through Christ must be taught, but not in terms which shock the Christian heart or threaten faith in the Christian goodness of the heavenly Father who is seen in the Son.

3. No theology can be strictly Christian that rests upon ethical conceptions lower than those which are operative in our social order. Any theological estimate of God ought certainly be as noble as ideals of government. At this point difficulties particularly arise when one thinks of various doctrines of the atonement. It is not that one finds difficulty in the fundamental truth which these various doctrines attempt to express. Functionally they may be all nobly Christian, but when it is insisted that a doctrine of the atonement is literal truth, our moral sensibilities are justly shocked when such a doctrine attributes to God moral acts which would bring impeachment to a governor of a democratic state. Here again one can allow license to figures of speech, but when even the noblest idealizations of an irresponsible oriental monarchy are lifted into dogmatic importance, they may become morally injurious to democrats. We are but carrying forward the selective process of the life of the church when, in maintaining that the love of God is neither arbitrary good nature nor contrary to the discernible moral order, we organize a theology by the use of social conceptions which are at least on a moral plane with our best political ideals.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT

4. A theology cannot be thoroughly Christian which denies freedom of thought to Christians. Freedom of investigation is a moral issue. If the Holy Spirit is to lead the believer into all truth, there must be liberty for such guidance. To say the Holy Spirit can lead only in accordance with the formulations of past ages is to exclude from such leadership modern men who believe in the Holy Spirit—i. e., a real and personal God immanent in human experience. All facts are ultimately to be harmonized. The hindrance to such harmony is ignorance. As that is removed, better knowledge of God results. Again and again ecclesiastical authorities have attempted to prevent free investigation in the interest of some theological formula; and as many times has such restraint brought skepticism and unbelief to innumerable persons who have seen in its stoppage of investigation the church's fear as to the tenability of its own preaching. Theology that refuses to adjust itself to the reasonable, accredited facts of science will not only cease to be respected by intelligent persons, but it will obscure God himself.

III

The conclusion of the whole matter seems to me very simple. The worth of a theology is functional. When a doctrine ceases to make faith more reasonable, when it represents something which must be believed in addition to a personal experience of God in Christ, when it carries over into the religious thought of one age the outgrown social morality or scientific knowledge of a past age and makes such anachronisms essential to itself, a theology is not Christian in the truest sense of that word. For a truly Christian theology will not be a set of formulæ imposed by a majority, but the intellectual apparatus by which a believer unifies his faith in God with his knowledge of other realities. In the age-long struggle between a religion dominated by ecclesiastical authority and the religion of Jesus Christ, the present-day struggle is only one phase. Today, however, as probably never before, the attempt to maintain as an unchanged and final authority even those formulæ which expressed the profoundest hopes, faith and moral ideals of earlier ages is producing widespread fatal results.

The attempt to impose a theology which makes the test of Christian life, not the moral passion and sacrificial love of Jesus Christ, but conformity with itself, is rapidly making certain branches of the Christian church enemies of modern culture. The intelligence of the community will not be in the membership of their bodies. This in itself is a tragedy, both for the church and for educated people. Such an attempt is more than obscurant and intolerant. It is breeding into a world that is coming to recognize social ethics and to devote itself to the extension of justice, a conception of God and of his relations which mocks such attempts. It is no accident that the champions of such a theology denounce the social gospel. Attributing to God attributes and motives which they would repudiate in man, they are doing precisely what the Pharisees did when they condemned Jesus Christ. In all solemnity would we remind such teachers who see Satan in the application of Christ's principles of justice and love to social and international affairs, that it was such misrepresentation of Christ that led to his warning against blaspheming the Holy Spirit. Far be it from me to be a judge of my brethren, but even farther be it from me to think that the love of a God of law, the sacrifice of Jesus Christ and the impelling influence of the Holy Spirit are to be restrained and misrepresented by theological formulæ once competent to express glorious reality, but now, like old wineskins filled with wine, incapable of serving the moral aspirations of a new day.

The Soviet and Its Army

By John Ralph Voris

EXTREME economic communism has broken down in Russia, but this does not necessarily mean that the soviet form of government is or should be in danger of discard. I see no reason why the soviet form of government should not be as democratic as that of a republic. Indeed, the federated nations are called Soviet Socialistic Republics. Sovietism is not inherently wrong, or undemocratic. There is no more reason why Americans should oppose Russian sovietism as such for Russia, than that they should oppose the special forms of democracy to be found in England or in Switzerland or in France. There are many reasons why Americans should be sympathetic with the soviet ideals as contrasted with an aristocracy or a monarchy.

What is the soviet plan? I shall here quote from notes or describe from memory the general scheme, without attempting to go into detail. My terminology may not be entirely correct. My understanding and presentation of the general scheme are true to fact. The central soviet council is composed of the presidents of all the provinces of Russia, of which there are forty-six. This central council does not include the presidents of the federated states, such as Georgia or Armenia. The chairman of this council is Lenin. The chairman has no power except such as is delegated to him from the council. This body meets at stated periods, or at call, and remains in session for only a few days, only long enough to dispatch the business in hand. The characteristic point about this council, and the similar subsidiary bodies, as distinct from the usual democratic gathering, is not so much the manner of election, although that is different, as it is this: This council and its members exercise not only legislative functions but the executive as well. That is, it is similar to forms of municipal commission government where the commissioners not only plan the immediate methods of work, but execute them as well. Or it is similar to some boards of directors who may have executive relationships to subsidiary companies, and whose chairmen are not only chairmen of the board, but the executives of their boards as well.

WHERE AUTHORITY LIES

This council makes decrees which are in authority over the whole of Russia. I understand that they are supposed to be accepted by the Federated Republics, even though these may not have anything to do with the making of the decree. But this is from merely observing the fact that plans in Moscow are at once accepted in Tiflis, or Batoum.

These decrees may be changed at any council meeting. I understand. It is not difficult therefore for this council to modify existing laws. This is at once a virtue, for it means no dead laws; and a vice, for it means lack of stabilization. With no courts it provides small basis for contractual stability, and it promises frequent miscarriages of justice. The "province" or "government" presidents (the word "government" is now used to mean "province" or "state") are elected by the district presidents. These districts are the division between the province and the local unit, which, I believe, is the village or the town. At any rate the local unit is made up of soviets, or groups of workers, organized according to craft. Since all are supposed to be workers, and all workers are organized into craft unions or guilds, this touches all industrial classes. There is only one other class,—the peasants,—and they have been organized into communes for many years.

In each case the presidents of one stratum of the organization or division elect the representative or president of the next larger district. But these leaders have been in the first place elected by and can be recalled by their draft Local or their commune. Thus Lenin is a representative of a Petrograd local union, and if it wishes it can recall him, so I am informed. This means that in theory it is a representative government in which every citizen has a vote. The voting age is, I believe, eighteen years. Both men and women have the vote. Whether it is a wise system to combine executive and legislative functions is a matter that may well be the subject of debate. In common with most other American citizens I think our system far superior. But that is not at all the question. It is whether this system will be equally fair to all the people. I believe it can be made as nearly fair as any other system of government. At any rate it has nothing whatever in it inimical to other governments and as a system it is an experiment of great potential value and of interest to all nations.

THEORY AND PRACTICE

But the next question is—Has this theoretical system been put into actual practice? It has not. But it is in process of being democratized. The government has been a dictatorship in two ways: first, it has been a dictatorship of the proletariat, with malpractice against those it has not considered proletariat; in the second it has within the proletariat been largely a dictatorship of the communistic leaders, rather than a government of all the people.

In announcing and standing for a dictatorship of the proletariat the soviet government has been following the communistic scheme—the Marxian ideal. As interpreted and actually practiced by many of the communistic zealots it is a stupid, vainglorious, monstrously egotistical ideal. In the practice of discounting and eliminating the leadership, or comradeship, of the merchants and manufacturers, the professional men, the intelligentsia, it could be equalled by but one other world's stupidity, and that is for any one or all of these classes to think they alone should rule. To believe that in some miraculous way, by a single economic and political system, men who have never had anything to do with production and manufacturing on the one hand, or governmental operation and executive work on the other, could do a better job of it than the other crowd, not to speak of following the higher ideal of a fair deal to all classes, is one of the age's amazing insanities.

But, be that as it may have been in the past, there are other and more hopeful things to be said now about the development. For one thing, in so far as an absolute revolution was needed to give the peasant and worker a square deal, history will vindicate the practices of the soviet leadership. By that I mean, where landlordism was so unhappily and so unjustly entrenched; where an ignorant and a pitifully impotent people were deliberately kept in darkness and powerlessness, where the "upper classes" had all the power and were unwilling to share it with "the lower classes"—there in the Russia of the past was needed a volcanic eruption. Picture the fact for example that hundreds of peasants had but one vote to the vote of a single landowner. It placed capitalism in governmental control. The fight against capitalism was not so much economic as political. At any rate, if the revolution was not needed, it came anyhow and that is what we face.

MANY INJUSTICES

With this eruption there were many monstrous injustices against the intelligentsia, the middle classes of people, in addition to the inexplicable hallucination that the workers were not equal, but superior to others. Probably the world need give little sympathy to rich or cowardly men and women, if any, who fled voluntarily from Russia to the soft life of Paris who long for the old czarist regime; who counter-plot against the present government. But it can deeply sympathize with the thousands of others who either in Russia are working with the government and are suffering untold hardships, or who, driven out by the zest for proletariat rule, found no place for themselves at home, are suffering indescribable mental anguish. Not only Russia as a nation, but the present regime is the loser by this. Strong though I believe her present leaders are—as strong as those who have been driven out, perhaps—they have discarded from their country multitudes of men and women who are needed there during this period of reconstruction. If purposely they keep these people out—because they are not of the proletariat—these leaders are surely strangling the future possibilities of their country and are showing their own narrowness. But the tendency as present is not at all so bad as this picture would indicate. There is a growing opinion, both among Moscow leaders and Paris exiles that the exiled intelligentsia are needed in the Russian movement of to-day.

But let us return to the question of the injustices. Grant the suffering of the intelligentsia, and the rich. Does it total one small part of the suffering of the untold millions under the old regime which fattened the few and starved the many? It is temporary. The old was age-long.

Many of those of the intelligentsia who have suffered must see in the present development a rainbow of promise. Surely if they can do this to-day it behooves the rest of the world to take a fairer point of view than it has taken in the past. As a picture, both of the suffering of the bourgeois and of the fine confidence which some of them have in the future development, I want to give, at length, the story of two incidents of a Sunday afternoon and evening in Tiflis, Georgia.

I was invited by Madame X, a Russian gentlewoman, to take tea with her and her family. I met her at one of the "dining rooms" where the children were being fed with American funds. I was told that she was the widow of a very wealthy Russian, and that they represented the older aristocracy of Tiflis. I took one of the tiny little carriages, common to that whole region, drawn by similarly tiny horses, whose bones seem to be pressing through the skin. We made our way with many jerkings of the lines, and coaxings and whippings, over the cobblestones, and finally drew up before a great white stone building that looked to me to be a hotel or an apartment house. I entered the lower hall, and thought the lower floor deserted, for outside and hall curtains were drawn close. I went up the wide marble stairs leading to a second floor and found myself amid a large number of people who evidently lived here in the room looking out on a great open court. I inquired of half a dozen where Madame X lived, managing to pronounce her name so they could not fail to understand. No one ever heard of her until the sixth person, who thought she might perhaps live below.

SOME INSIDE REVELATIONS

I went down stairs, and knocked at the door. The curtain was drawn slightly apart. I was recognized and admitted. I was in the sole living room of the family which had owned this entire house. They had been assigned three rooms when their home had been taken over by the government, the one in which we were seated about a table, which served as living room and dining room; a front room, which was the common bed room, heavily curtained off with sheets; and the kitchen. Here they lived in their three rooms and unknown in their own house. I wonder if outside of this special dispensation of our Lord, the year 1921, there has ever been anything quite like this!

I was introduced by the madame to the family. I wish I might describe them in detail, but I do not wish to characterize them so clearly that they would be recognized, although there was nothing said that would incriminate. (Even as I write this I am conscious that I must not say anything that would get any of these people into misunderstandings—and they are six thousand miles away. It shows the delicacy of the situation for me to be instinctively careful. I was in a home of culture of the sort I had not been in before. One gentleman present spoke English, much more nearly perfectly than I did, as well as German, French, Georgian, Russian, Armenian. All the ladies but one spoke English, and all of them French, Russian and Georgian.

They were apologetic, of course, for their home, their table and the food, and yet everything about the place bespoke gentility and artistic appreciation. I was shown bits of beautiful handiwork done by the sister of the madame, that rivaled professional work; an exquisite carving on old ivory; some beautiful needle work; a miniature painting. It was the kind of work which women of gentle birth, abundant leisure, and artistic instincts would delight in doing. There was talk of some national situations: The Greek-Turkish war; the Irish situation; American politics; and—carefully—the Russian situation. But the thing that stood out in that visit, and which prompts me primarily to tell this story, was the expression made first by the older people about the table, echoed definitely by the younger. It was about like this:

"We are passing through a dreadful period. It is one of hardship for us here, and for thousands upon thousands of others. But something better is going to come out of it. All this trial will be worth while. Either the present government or another growing out of it will lead us on to a greater Russia."

I left them, uplifted. I went on to a second "tea." This was at the home of a former Russian military official of high rank and great power. He was not an aged man, but he looked ten years older than he was. He was, however, still a fine looking man. He was one of the helpers at the relief garden, receiving his food and a slight wage. This home was not one of such great former wealth as the other, but it had been as full of pride in its way. I was in one of the three rooms allotted them out of their beautiful little home overlooking the business part of the city. They gave me the best they had and opened a bottle of wine, and for the first and only time in my life I felt like a cad for refusing to drink. That wine was their offering—their oblation—to America. There were two young women daughters, a son, the mother and the old father. An intelligent, alert family it was. The daughters were teachers, one of music and the other of languages.

They did not speak freely. I know that. But the old man spoke longingly of the former times, when they had plenty, and had freedom. He first spoke in French, but I did not understand him well, and then he spoke in Russian, his daughter interpreting to me in English. He did not understand English. The mother, too, with unutterable longing of a suffering soul, spoke of the good days of the past and eagerly wanted to know if I did not think that things would change. I could promise nothing. And then the young teacher at my side spoke to me in English so her parents would not understand this word:

"This is terribly hard on old people, like mother and father. They do not understand. But I am willing to go on through with it, for I believe we are on our way to something better than they ever dreamed of. We young people may suffer some, but that does not matter. It is worth while."

DICTATORSHIP A NECESSITY

That was Youth speaking. It was the young intelligentsia speaking. I bring this incident, for that word. There is something so supremely fine going on over there, I feel that I want to tell it to all the world. And yet I had only the merest glimpse, and the telling seems banal and wooden compared with the significance of it.

Again the present government frankly says it is a dictatorship. My informant who has given so many of these side-lights to me, says that it is not expected to last more than a period of five years. It "is now a weak plant, a hot-house growth. It will grow into a strong tree and then it can stand adverse winds, but not now; it would be crushed." The present government must be either a dictatorship of the proletariat, or it will die, they claim. It cannot stand the presence in Russia of a strong counter-revolution,—except it deal with it in a military way, as with Kolshak, Wrangel or Denikin. There is some reasonableness in this. Granted that the present government is in power, it is reasonable to expect it to take every necessary precaution to prevent overthrowal from the outside or inside. This we ought to grant who deported revolutionaries from our own country. Whether they are right or wrong in believing that they must have a dictatorship, they must decide. An outsider cannot.

ANTI-GOVERNMENT SOCIETIES

But this must be said: At the present moment there are in Moscow several societies organized to fight—not plot against—the present government. I saw the headquarters of three of the societies. They are permitted to exist, probably as a matter of political expediency rather than justice. But they are there, anyway. And too, as to the professional classes: we have had the idea that they were entirely eliminated; or that they were put to work somewhere—sweeping streets and ploughing fields. Granted that many who had not done active work in the world were often given odious tasks,—tasks which in the past had been done by other humans, just as surely human as they but “menials,” “servants,” who were supposed not to suffer. Yet this is the vicious outcropping of the present system, and not the main stratum of practice.

The present government not only wishes, but practically compels, all who have special gifts to work at their profession. The painter is not expected to carpenter; he paints. The singer has no manual labor. The educator works as never before at his educational task. There is not a diversion from one's profession. There is a place for the mother, and the teacher, the artist and the writer. The lawyer no longer practices law, however. He is expected to give his time to governmental operation. But all are expected to work in behalf of the greatest good for the greatest number. There are two classes which are an exception to this rule. On one hand were the merchant and the manufacturer, who had a difficult time, for there was no place in the communist regime for them. They were either exiled or put to work at manual labor or government positions, or else, as must have been the case in many instances, they may have been put to death. On the other hand was the priesthood. There is no place in the present order, even up to the present time when the merchant and the manufacturer are gradually getting a foothold, for the priest. However, the priest was permitted to remain, I am informed, but was not given a place in the economic order or a vote in political affairs.

A MENTAL DICTATORSHIP

Up to the present time the communistic party has without doubt largely controlled the policies. This is a mental dictatorship, although they might call it leadership. But the steel of the red army, even if not used, or if there is no expectation to use it, is too apparent to allow very much freedom, or opposition. And there are only about 600,000 communists in the whole land. Talk about the leadership of minorities in good causes—as we do—the minority may likewise have similar leadership in causes on which the world divides as to its goodness or evil. But this fact must not be isolated from the present practice, which is so much more democratic than this statement would indicate, and from the trend which is toward real democracy.

But there is a broadening tendency. Certainly the leaders of the general government whom we saw are brainy men of the type of the college professor rather than of the “proletariat,” men as surely representative of culture and brain power as one would wish. The workers have large influence in Russia. The acting commissar of labor, Mr. Anixt, told me that practically all the workers are organized, and through their representatives they determine all national questions of hours, wages and employment. The peasants have not yet been as widely interested or brought into the government as they should be, or as the leaders wish. Indeed there is every effort being made on the part of the workers to induce the peasants to take an intelligent interest, and to share absolutely every privilege with them. There is a hopeful spirit of democracy in this that no fair man can deny. The diligent practice of the present government is to make every worker a voter; every voter an intelligent citizen, and every man and woman above sixteen years of age a worker. (Except from 16 to 18 years when young men are in the army.)

THE RED ARMY

With few parallels in modern history, the Russian red guard is so closely related to the success or continuance of the present regime, that consideration of sovietism is not half covered without a study of the military side. How far Trotzky is responsible for that which communist friends eagerly denominate, and enemies reluctantly admit to be “the brilliant red army,” I do not know. He has, undoubtedly been one of the dominant figures of the present regime. It is undoubtedly true that had Kerensky been supported by as strong an army as Lenin has had, he would have won. The Kerensky regime disbanded the army, and anarchy followed. I suppose there were more deaths from actual massacre and bushwacking when the disbanded Russian army went home than there has been in the red guard since its organization. As we went through one town in western Azerbaijan in Transcaucasia, we saw the spot where some two thousand returning soldiers were killed by native contingents, and throughout Russia there are not a few signs of this terrible period. There was then literally chaos through the land. Even the worst enemy of Russia cannot say there is chaos now.

As a matter of fact, considering the conditions, there is remarkable order; and that at a time when any country would be strained almost to the breaking point, through hunger and flight. Take it first as to ordinary street conditions in city and village. In all Russia I did not see a fight, or a mob. The nearest to disorder I saw was when one of our small party was about to take a picture of a bread distribution center in Moscow, and a guard, not knowing of our free mandate to take pictures, temporarily stopped him, causing a gathering of the curious such as one would see in Wall street under similar circumstances.

Take the case of the hegira of famine sufferers. That was an amazing thing,—a thing of epic sadness that will always haunt me. One might as well try to stop Niagara as to stop that mass. And yet, there was not one case of mob violence, or fighting, (other than a crazed physical struggle to get on and stay on a train). These people were under remarkable control. And yet they did not fear the guards. I want to re-emphasize that thing which as I write seems more unbelievable than at the time; they did not fear the guards, although they were unarmed, while the guards were heavily armed with rifles and revolvers. And further, with reference to these famine crows,—they were at every station. Our car was the car of the apparently well-to-do. It was evident that we had food. One would expect these hunger driven people to attempt to take that food. There was never the slightest effort to do so.

Take the case of our own passage through Russia. We had our rather rigorous mandates, from the Georgian and Moscow governments. But after all each local soviet had its own officials, who to an extent were a law unto themselves. We were the first party to appear in any of these centers, except Moscow, since the revolution. And yet, though there were many times when we were not at all certain that we would not be held up, and possibly placed in the "Cheka," we were not delayed one hour in total in our entire passage through Russia. That shows a rare control. Take another rather interesting case. We found ourselves on our way down the Volga, going back, on some interesting freight trains of refugees, or of grain. But when we were on the only passenger car on the front end of a train carrying two thousand bandits just captured or surrendered, the climax was reached. However, we did not worry seriously, and certainly did not ask that our car be taken off, for we relied on the youngsters with the red-starred caps, who so casually guarded these desperadoes.

YOUTHFULNESS OF THE GUARD

I spoke of the youngsters of this red guard. It seemed to us that all of these men were mere boys, in late teens or early twenties. They were enduring hardships our armies would not put up with. Their black bread ration, their pitifully small salary,—a few cents a month,—their continual moving about crowded like cattle into cars,—entire families, for they carry their families with them, women and children—moving, moving. And yet they all seemed comparatively happy. There were no fights among them. There was frequent singing. The hum of content came from family groups. The young officers distinguished only by their uniform, which was characteristic of Russian civil life, rather than military, with boots, knickers, ruboshka, furry cap, were not arrogant or meddlesome either with their men or with civilians.

The army is not a drilling army. I did not see them at military maneuvers during the weeks I was in Russian territory. They are not militaristic in the old German sense, at all. They have a great school of young men who have been organized with the idea of accomplishing a definite purpose. This gives morale and discipline to what might be otherwise a mob. But the thing that impressed us most was the spirit of helpfulness, patience, and comradeship which these men showed toward the poor fleeing peasants. Why should they not, for they were often from pleasant homes themselves. And yet the military life usually breeds hardness and aloofness. They handled the crazed crowds with a beautiful patience and understanding. Our train was held up for ten minutes one night, and we heard the wild cries of the women and children who were being commanded to leave the bumpers of the train. The insistent patience of the soldiers, urging, imploring, then commanding these creatures to get off the train, was a fine bit of human goodness. I saw no evidence of discourtesy on the part of any officer toward a soldier; on part of officer or soldier toward civilians. But, nevertheless, though gloved, this iron hand is everywhere. These soldiers are at the stations; they guard the cities. The armored trains are frequently to be seen along the railroads.

STATESMANSHIP

Russian leaders claim that they are not interested in territorial acquisition. "We will fight only when compelled to fight in self-defense," I was told by my friend. "And if any of our sub-provinces want to leave us, they can do so without Russia's hindrance. I am compelled to take the first with one grain of salt and the second with two, but I hope that he not only meant what he said, but that he represented the will and the future practice of his government. Russia has always possessed a genius for governing difficult peoples. She has had real statesmen among her leaders in the past. I confine myself in this to impressions and contacts. A scholarly friend of mine, in Tiflis, an American teacher, said that Russia had brought the only constructive statesmanship Trans-Caucasia as a whole had had. When Russia was in control during the old regime there was peace and progress south of the Caucasus mountains. And it is certainly true that, since the occupation by the Russians in April of this year, there has been in those republics of the Near East at least a stabilization of the government and a broadening of the point of view of the local provinces. For the first time in years the republics of Georgia, Azerbaijan and Armenia are working together, with a self-conscious desire to federate. They talked about this freely at receptions given us in Georgia and Armenia.

Russia is composed of an amazing number of nationalities. Many of these people are just recently out of their primitive customs. There is no civilized power in the world which has closely federated with itself, or a part of itself, tribes which have so recently taken on the aspect of civilization. And yet Russia holds these, not so much by the iron hand, as by creating in them a loyalty to the nation as a whole. Among these provinces there is a great difference in language, custom and religion. There are Mohammedans, Gregorian Christians, the Greek Church, Jews. But there has been in the past and there is now a freedom of worship. This is so different from the attitude of Russia's neighbor, the Turk, it is well to think about it. Should the Turk all at once take such an attitude we would think him changed from an evil into a possible good force. Russia practices this now as in the past.

I want to repeat, Russia has a positive genius for making small nations loyal to her.

The Rebirth of the World

By John R. Mott

WHAT characterizes the world situation today? On every hand there is observable a rising tide of nationalism and racial patriotism. Wherever one goes today one is distinctly conscious of the thrill of a new life. Nations are springing into being, old nations are being reborn. It is a striking fact that in this, the most international period in the life of the world, there is the most marked reassertion of national prejudices, ambitions, fears and hopes. The relations between nations today as never before are those of suspicion, irritation and want of fundamental unity. Suspicion: name the nation which today trusts all elements within its own borders, still less its neighbors. Irritation: we cannot but agree with Hoover that the friction points between the peoples are more numerous than they were seven years ago. Moreover, these contacts are much more aggravated and inflamed. By want of fundamental unity we have in mind something more than the obvious fact that two groups of nations, yesterday at each other's throats, are still in reality arrayed against each other and will inevitably be for many a long year. More serious than this is the indisputable fact that in each of these groups there have come misunderstandings, sharp differences, growing ill will and strife. One need only recall the recurring racial differences in policy between France and England in world politics. We must not overlook the startling fact of the attempts to drive wedges of misunderstanding between the mother country of England on the one hand and the United States on the other, and even between Canada and the States.

ECONOMICALLY IMPOSSIBLE

Economically the international situation is an impossible one. Up to eighteen months ago the World War had cost for purely military and naval purposes over 270 billions of dollars in gold. Add the cost of the score and more of wars that have transpired since the signing of the armistice; add to these the countless political revolutions and social upheavals across the breadth of the world; and the total cost mounts to figures which cannot be comprehended. It means that the curfew will ring late, that the hours of leisure and of pleasure will be few for scores of millions of the human race, that the backs of innocent generations yet unborn will be bent low with this overwhelming load.

We must not forget that we are living also in a suffering world. I thought I saw suffering during the war in the countless hospitals and in the many prison-of-war camps which I visited; but last year in the belt of nations reaching from Finland and North Russia on the Baltic down to the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, more men, women and children died from disease and from results of malnutrition than were killed or died from disease in all the armies on both sides of the war in any one year of the struggle. Europe, yes, and Asia and other continents are likewise diseased and imperilled. Great physical diseases, such as the typhus, spread from land to land, and death is reaping its millions of victims. There are international political distempers, notably bolshevism in its most malignant form, which is still casting seams of weakness across the less highly organized nations. The moral breakdown of the youth of the nations is most alarming. And yet I do not agree with Anatole France that "all Europe is dying." All Europe, all Asia, large parts of Africa, Latin America, and other areas of the world are very, very sick, but not dying. Their sickness is like unto that which we associate with new birth. I reiterate, nations are being reborn. True the words of Christ, "Behold, I am recreating all things."

A PLASTIC WORLD

It is most reassuring that we can say that the world today is plastic. The titanic forges which have been working overtime in recent years have made the whole world molten. It is fluid, it is running, but it will soon set like plaster on the wall. The central question before the forces of Christianity is, in what moulds shall the new and plastic world set? Shall they be of the old materialistic, militaristic moulds, or the moulds of idealism, brotherhood and constructive service? If someone had asked me seven years ago what would be the last nation in Europe or in the world to change, I would have said without hesitation, Russia. And yet Russia is today the most plastic of all the nations—dangerously so, and yet, let us add, most hopefully so. Now she is in the hand of blind leaders of the blind and is being tumbled into ever deeper ditches. The other nations must furnish her true and unselfish guidance. A most hopeful sign it is that the nations today are humbled and teachable. This is something new.

In what a different attitude and temper the nations have come together in Washington from what characterized them in general as they assembled in Paris three years ago. A spirit of open-minded humility makes possible true greatness. We look out all over the world on expectant nations. While they have been disillusioned, and while many of them have come under the spell of pessimism and despair, there are vast numbers, including almost every land, who look today with hearts bounding with wistful expectation. Their gaze is fixed upon the United States of America as upon no other nation. This is true of every backward people, every depressed race, every oppressed class of human society. It is significant also that it is equally true of the aggressive and more self-contained and forward looking nations. You noticed that a few days ago the leader of the Japanese delegation in Washington publicly stated that the world looks to the United States for "light and faith."

What are the demands which such an international situation makes upon our churches? We are summoned to sound out the note of hope. This is distinctive of pure Christianity. Jesus Christ, by triumphant life-and-light-giving teachings, has shown unmistakably that light will dissipate the darkness, that good will vanquish evil, and that love will conquer hate; that among nations as among individuals, where sin did abound, grace shall yet much more abound; that He is able to make nations in their relation to other nations, just as individuals in their relation to other people, strongest and most helpful where they have been weakest and most disappointing. The churches of America must also, in line with the appeal of the Japanese leader in Washington, communicate faith. Ours is the great responsibility to generate an atmosphere in which nations come to loathe to differ and determine to understand.

The Christian churches must sound the note of reality which is the opposite of hypocrisy and formalism. The world is impatient with sham. Herein we see the secret of the world-encircling power of the truly Christian summons sent forth by our secretary of state. In every way in their power the churches must further international thinking, international planning, international fellowship and international action. It is fitting that our great international church, now assembled through its leaders in this conference, should have a large and worthy and sacrificial part in this great international mission. The churches of America and of other lands are summoned to bring to bear on international relations the principles and spirit of Jesus Christ. In a long conversation I had with Viscount Grey, he emphasized as the great need of the world "the moral dominance of international affairs." Christians have a consistent and efficient system of ethics for the individual. In the social sphere, notably in the industrial area, the fight is on, and it is reassuring to find both among employers and employes a growing recognition of the reign of Christ and his principles. In our national life we honor God. Never has there been a more impressive demonstration of this vital fact than that afforded by the deeply moving and truly Christian ceremonial conducted by our government over the body of the "Unknown Soldier."

CHRIST'S WORLD-WIDE SWAY

In our international affairs, however, we have not yet begun to attain in the sense that we stake all in our international politics and policies on the principles and spirit of Jesus. The moment has come to yield all to his sway and to trust to the limit in our relations with other nations such guiding and immutable and fully efficient principles as the infinite worth not only of the individual but of each people; Christ the Lord of all relationships of men, social, international, interracial; the brotherhood of men; the serving of other nations and peoples and not their exploitation; the nations and races members of one another and therefore necessary to one another; the golden rule; and the universal application of the law of love, even to the loving and serving of enemy nations. If these revolutionary, transforming and omnipotent principles are to become truly regnant in international affairs, then there must be an enormous expansion of Christian missions, both home missions and foreign missions. These constitute the great and true internationalism. The missionaries and the churches are the effective mediators and interpreters between nations and peoples.

The great function of the church is to create the atmosphere and the background where Christ's ideals can flourish. The forces of Christ must supplement the political arrangements of men. In vain the launching of the league of nations, in vain the repeated meetings of the allied council in Paris and elsewhere, in vain the present association of nations at Washington unless Christ's followers fill in these forms with living content. Peace and good will among the nations is not a matter of external arrangements, of national legislation, and of international agreements, but of internal spiritual changes. In the power of the superhuman Christ, man's attitude and outlook must be transformed. The springs of motive must be touched and dominated. It is first and last a superhuman work. May God help us, one and all, to go out under the leadership of Christ to serve in this day of international misunderstanding, friction and strife, and likewise in this most hopeful moment in the life of nations in their relation to each other, as apostles of reconciliation.

The Lion In His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE other day I found the Lion with three books on the little table beside his bed. All of them were by Dorothy Canfield. The first was "The Bent Twig." The second was "The Squirrel Cage." The third was "The Brimming Cup." There was a whimsical light in my friend's eye as he saw me looking at these books.

"Did you tell me the other day that I ought to pay more attention to contemporary fiction?" he asked.

"Not quite that," I replied. "You manage to get some real contact with the whole procession of brightly groomed new books. But you did say something disrespectful about a book I value rather highly and I think I did spring to its defence."

The Lion was smiling now.

"At any rate I won't say anything disrespectful about Dorothy Canfield," he said. "And for the comfort of a certain very enthusiastic American I will even admit that I think she has notable command of her materials and works after the fashion of a true artist."

He picked up "The Bent Twig," as he spoke.

"Now here," he said, "is a really significant document on the philosophy of education which manages to be a rattling good story at the same time. A good deal of education has consisted in a process of making up students' minds for them. In this tale you see some children gradually trained in those powers of analysis and those capacities to respond to the real meaning of things which prepare them to meet the days of crisis with a certain creative energy and strength. They do not have sets of rules by which to meet life. They do have vital and trained personality which can be trusted to get into the meaning of things and act in the light of it. There is no flinching. There is no evasion. And you breathe freely at last as you see the emerging of personality which can be trusted."

Now the Lion was holding "The Squirrel Cage" in his hand.

"This is a book of protest," he said, continuing his mood of analysis. "It is an indictment of the efficiency which isn't efficient, and of the nervous social intensity which is so busy living that it destroys the capacity for the enjoyment of life. 'The Squirrel Cage' is an attack on the hectic in the name of the simple and normal. It is an attack upon an over-strained and artificial life in the name of a life of quiet fullness and power. It has interest and insight and a flash of tragedy. It is a sign at the corner of the street where the railroad crosses and it says: 'Stop! Look! Listen!'

My friend lay perfectly still for a moment. Then he reached for "The Brimming Cup."

"But here is the best of them all," he declared. "Do you know I was almost afraid to read 'The Brimming Cup.' I knew that it was a study of the day when a happily married woman begins to feel the wear and strain of her home life and suddenly sees an open door leading to a life of infinite artistic and æsthetic allurements. It is the sort of book anybody could write badly. And there are so many kinds of mistakes the author might make that one shudders to think of them. The book might be merely conventional, saying the proper things without ever lifting the real problems. It might be the expression of a subtle lawlessness over-emphasizing the burdens of the life of the home and never facing the brutal selfishness which wants all the glow of life without ever facing its responsibilities. It might be an honest analysis which never leads to a true solution. It might keep the woman loyal and yet leave her with spirit clogged and heavy and without true inspiration. It might be guilty of a dozen sorts of bad taste and more sorts of bad portrayal of character. And all of these things 'The Brimming Cup' triumphantly escapes. It deals with a problem without ever becoming a problem novel. It is as honest as nature and as clean as the noble movement of a really wholesome mind. Right in the midst of multitudes of people whose emancipation takes the form of believing that the home cannot survive this book is thrown as a triumphant challenge. A woman of infinite richness of personality and exquisite play of temperament, with a strong and steady and loyal husband comes to the place where the first pressure of the years, the first thrusts of disillusionment and the first vague outcry for the gratification of taste instead of the meeting of responsibility are coincident with the appearance of a brilliant man of singularly magnetic personality, of audacious energy and of great wealth. The woman meets her problem. She has no artificial help. She is driven to face the actual realities. Even her husband refuses to ask her loyalty unless she can give her whole personality with it. Every subtle sophistry which the decadent mind has invented is brought adroitly to her mind. She is driven into a desert of lonely struggle where she must fight her battle to its very end. And there she finds that her whole growing personality demands her home and her husband and her children. She discovers that the way declared to be the way of emancipation would be the day of the death of every delicate and gracious thing in her life. She discovers that the real flowers grow out of the actual soil of every day life and loyalty. And so in the full richness of a life which has seen its own meaning and its own endless possibilities she turns from the heat of a devastating fever to the permanent warmth of wholesome living. She discovers that fresh inspiration is on the side of discipline and faithfulness to responsibility. She discovers that the great moment of love is not the hour of its first wondering adventure but the hour of its wise and gracious maturity."

I was watching the Lion closely while he talked. And the light on his face was more revealing than his words.

Student Help for Students in Enemy Lands

THE ideas that underlie the thoughts of the student class of this generation are the ideas that will control the world in the next generation. The leaders of tomorrow are in the schools of today. From among college students will come three-fourths of those who will guide both the thinking and the doing of tomorrow. Europe has received a great increase of college and university students since the war. There are now at least 250,000 in the institutions of higher learning beyond the western battle front. In Germany the increase is more than 50 per cent and in Czecho-Slovakia it is even larger. There was a student generation that went to war and came back, such of it as escaped death, to take up the studies laid down. And the new student generation was increased by the new idealism of democracy that reached down into classes not much drawn upon for college men and women before the war.

This great throng returned to schools whose equipment and income were impaired by war. They come themselves largely from those classes who suffer most just now from the inflation of money, that is, the salaried and professional classes whose incomes have increased the least. They are willing to work their way, but there is no adequate work to do in lands where there is much general unemployment, and where, of course, the skilled worker both deserves and gets the job. There is nothing else for this body of youth to do but to remain in school. If they did not do so, the nations where old things are destroyed and where reconstruction is most needed will be without educated leadership for that most critical period when the building of a new world cannot take place except through the leadership of educated men and women.

Christianity tends to go into a moratorium during war. Now that the struggle has been won for justice and humanity, its very winning has made it impossible for most of us to act like Christians even toward those who fought for us, to say nothing of keeping the divine precept to love our enemies and repay evil with good. But youth may be persuaded to do that, and the promotion of a student friendship fund in American colleges and universities furnishes golden opportunity to promote a genuine Christianity as well as to feed the hungry.

* * *

If Thine Enemy Hunger Feed Him

"Let them make bricks without straw, let them slave and starve if that is the price," said an educated man to me on ship board, "I have just been over the battlefields and I feel no mercy." "But," I inquired, "did the women and children make the war, did the youth who fought against us do more than all youth did when their country conscripted them, and besides what about 'if thine enemy hunger feed him.' The next day he said frankly, "I did not talk like a Christian yesterday, but I had just seen the battlefields." I have seen the battlefields too and I have seen the starving students of our late enemies and listened to their inmost thoughts, and I have seen the underfed children of the men who fought at the imperative demand of their war machine and I have seen the unforgettable poverty of millions of those men and their families; but I do not hate those men, to say nothing of their boys and girls: I hate war with a hatred that is bitter, and dread all imperialism as no medieval devil of theology can be dreaded. What of our own souls if we cannot feed our enemy of yesterday when, defeated, he hungers today, and what hope is there of Christianity?

Of course this Friendship Fund is not for the students of enemy lands alone. It goes to Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Armenia and to any need in the schools of our allies as well but the least of it spiritually is in the feeding of those who yesterday fought against us. In that list are included—Germany, Austria, Hungary and Turkey, with Russia thrown in for good measure. But there is Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Esthonia, Latvia, Armenia and Jugoslavia with some little need in Switzerland and Greece where war has spilled its blood over the borders.

How Deep Is the Need

In Poland there are 10,000 to be fed, there are only one-fourth enough books and 65 per cent have not enough clothing. In Hungary the need for 2,400 suits has been answered with only 500 and there are only 10 per cent enough text books. In Austria 80 per cent are living below a real subsistence level and 60 per cent had neither heat nor light for their rooms last winter. In Germany ex-Chancellor Michaelis, president of the Studentenschaft, is authority for the statement that two-thirds have incomes much less than enough for a minimum of bread and butter. Surveys revealed the fact that at Frieberg, Breslau and Leipsic tuberculosis had increased four times over 1914, and others at Dramstadt and Stuttgart confirmed the ex-Chancellor's deductions. These students come largely from the homes of salaried and professional men and their incomes increased only two and three times while the cost of living went up fifteen times.

The most pathetic class is the foreign and refugee students. In Germany there are 5,000 of them speaking 60 languages and dialects. They come from Russian prisoners of war and refugees from before the various red and white armies, from territories lopped off from the motherlands in the peace treaties, and from persons whose presence is not desired by governments, monarchical or democratic, in their native lands. They are found in Poland and Austria also in large numbers, and Czecho-Slovakia is their haven. They live in any way they can. Last winter many slept in railway stations and roomed in large vacated buildings, often twelve to fifteen in a room. They had little underclothing. Often they slept in their day garments for lack of any change, worked at any odd job offering itself, and starved and studied when there was none. Last winter the World's Student Christian Federation fed 70,000 of these students through funds contributed by the students of twenty-six lands. The need is quite as imperative for this winter and American students are asked to contribute $500,000 to help meet it. The governments of the lands to which help goes are cooperating heartily; they furnish transportation, admit goods duty free, and grant subsidies to assist. The universities co-operate in every way, remitting fees upon request of the relief agents, furnishing rooms for the work and giving whole hearted council and actual personal help to the limit of their ability.

* * *

The Larger Gifts of Friendship

This work is not a thing of bread alone; indeed it is least of all mere bread and butter help that is given. Bread is the token and a seal of good-will, reconciliation and a friendship that will help build the new and better world. It is a genuine test of the worth of Christian precepts in the building of the new world; it is a demonstration of belief in the virility of faith, forgiveness and good-will as the foundation of social progress. Through the students of today we will reconstruct the world of tomorrow upon the basis of international comity instead of international suspicion and competition, for as they become the leaders of tomorrow they cannot forget this demonstration of good-will today from those who were enemies yesterday.

Nor is help administered through bread alone; self-help is the first assistance given. Self-help through the labor of their hands is something new to continental students but they are accepting it as a means to education and for the creation of a democratic spirit. The German Studentenschaft has done the very revolutionary thing, for them, of voting at their annual convention that every student should work at least six months before graduating in order that the new German citizenship's leaders may know personally the problems of the working class and purge themselves of their former class aloofness. In Prague President Masaryck gave a large sum from the birthday fund made him by the nation, and the students, with their own hands, built ten dormitories. The novelty of it was so great that crowds came to see the students labor with their hands. The student, with good humor, put up a fence and charged an admission fee, turning the receipts into the relief fund.

The larger significance of our gifts to this fund will lie in the guidance of these students toward self-help and a consequent democratization of leadership for the new democratic world, the cultivation of international good-will among those who will guide the nations to-morrow, the saving to the war ruined societies of the continents of a leadership for the first generation and most critical period of reconstruction, and last but not least, a gift to ourselves of the experience of actually practicing the gospel precepts of returning good for evil and of feeding our enemies.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, November 8, 1921.

OUR thoughts this week are turning backward to that day three years ago when "our mouth was filled with laughter and our tongue with singing." It is not a mere coincidence that the armament conference will open at the third anniversary of the end of the war, and it is right that the thoughts of the great dead should be with us at the opening of the assembly. May we not think of them as of visitors

"Who can but listen at the gates
And hear the household jar within?"

Backwards to the undying dead! Forward to Washington! Washington is itself a scene in the Great War and all that followed upon it. There was once a society to which the words came, "I have found no works of thine finished." No work of ours was finished on November 11, 1918; no work is finished now three years afterwards. But the next task is clear, and we must address ourselves to it with all the constancy and faith that we can reinforce by our memory. Thoughts such as these will be in many minds during the great silence this week and at the opening of the conference. There has been for these and other reasons a growing concern for the prospects of the deliberations at Washington. Certainly there can be but a few who do not understand how much hangs upon it. Some who never thought before today of the Pacific are thinking of it now; and "disarmament" is being seen in its right perspective. If according to the militarists war is an extension of policy, it is no less true that peace is an extension of policy. All men would be glad of peace; but are they ready to follow the only policy which leads to it?

The Loss of an Evening Friend

For years it has been the delight of many discerning readers to come home at evening under the instruction of the "Westminster Gazette," that famous paper printed in green and respected for its fine temper and political wisdom. Now in the morning we can read a new "Westminster" but as evening falls, we have to do without our mentor. It is an experiment to change from the evening to the morning, and we shall watch it with interest and sympathy. It is a comfort to have the same wise pen still at our service; there are few journalists with the experience and judgment of Mr. J. A. Spender; and he still remains the political editor of the paper, now that it gets up early, as in former days. None the less the journey on our suburban line at nightfall seems longer and duller without our green journal.

The Congregationalists Think Together

Last Sunday all the Congregational ministers were invited to summon their people to think of the demand made by the present situation upon the churches of their order. A forcible pamphlet by Dr. W. B. Selbie was in the hands of all the ministers; in it the principal of Mansfield called the churches to awake to the perils and opportunities of the moment. It is indeed one of those hours to which God has joined great issues for human kind; and there is no society which can do the work committed to the church of Christ. Yet how pitifully weak it is! But we are beginning to know our weakness. A certain ecclesiastic is reported to have distinguished between the free churches of this country and the Anglican in this way: "The free churches are dead and do not know they are dead: the church of England is dead, and knows it is dead." If that was ever true, it is true no longer. The free churches are humbled; they know their calling, and how far short they have come. But "when I am weak, then am I strong." There is no pride among us today; and "God always tunes from the bass," as John Bunyan says.

Animalism

The War and

A company of ministers of very varied and large experience were discussing the other day the after-effects of the war upon the social life of the nation. They agreed that there was a perceptible lowering of the standard of morality; after every war there has been an increase of venereal disease, and this war has been no exception. But with that there has come an acceptance among many young men and women of what must be called sheer animalism. Some of this was openly traced to the teaching given often officials in the army which amounted to this—"Be good, but if you can't be good, be careful"; such counsels are not forgotten when peace returns; and every minister who comes into a real understanding of youth knows that the fight is desperate for those who would be true to the teaching of Christ; and knows too that many have ceased to look upon the fight as worth making. Only very foolish or very secluded observers ever use the unqualified language concerning the bracing discipline of war—language once very common. War has its victims on the field, but its victims are to be found in the life of every great city among those who are lost to honor and are "slipping down the ladder rung by rung" and saddest of all, do not know they are slipping down. A physician said to one of these ministers: "It has come to this now: the old terrors which kept men back, are no longer feared; there is only one power which can save men today—that is Christ."

Westhill,

Birmingham

To the five colleges, grouped together in Birmingham, I have made reference before; they are an interesting group. Woodbrook, for social and religious study; Kingsmead for the training of missionaries; Ficroft, a residential college for working men; and Carey Hall, a missionary training college for women. They are independent and yet they work on inter-collegiate lines; and some of our best scholars are in their service. It is to Westhill in particular I wish to refer. Its purpose is to train men and women to take their places in the moral and religious education of childhood and youth. Its founder, Mr. Archibald, and his colleagues believe that in the future there will be a growing demand for directors of Sunday school work, boys' clubs, welfare workers, scoutmasters; and with courage and foresight they have planned a course for those who have a call to such a great life-work. Their program is before me; and both from that careful scheme and from all I have seen of past Westhill men and women, I am sure the college comes at the right time and when the hour arrives for churches and other societies to call for such men and women—the hour is near—they will not look in vain to Westhill.

The Unknown Tagore

Another volume of Tagore's poems has been published; but it seems clear from a little and admirable book upon the poet by Mr. Thompson of Bankura, Bengal,—the head of a Methodist college in India—the real Tagore is still hidden from us. True the poems translated into English by the poet are beautiful; the English is the poet's own; and yet through the demand of the public in this country and in America, it is chiefly one side of the poet's work that is rendered in English; and the poet has many sides. He is not so constantly dwelling upon the ford of the river at eventide as he seems to be in the English volumes. He has ranges of vision hidden still in Bengali. Mr. Thompson, whose book, I believe, has the warm approval of Tagore, declares that the poet is not a Christian as when he wrote Gitanjali he had never read the Bible; and yet the poetry of his nature has not expanded without the sunlight of Christ now shed abroad in India. The poet is a theist without adjectives; often in his poetry he has a most vivid sense of the personality of God; he cannot be called a pantheist; but as yet, though he may be near to the realm of Christ, he is not within.

Other Matters

The festivities at St. Martin's-in-the-Field are in full swing this week. It is two hundred years since this great church was formed and now with trumpet and sound of cornet it is proclaiming its praises. . . . Mr. George Moore wrote some years ago in "The Brook Kerith" about our Lord's life after Calvary on the theory that he was in a trance and resumed his life among the Essenes where Paul found him. He has now told in the preface what he thinks of the death of Paul in Spain. It seems strange that men of letters will not keep their hands off these records. There are enough subjects without choosing these for the theme of their romances. Some of us dislike intensely all such romances, whether from orthodox writers or such unbelievers as Mr. George Moore. They seem to lack the first essential of true literature, reverence for the things by which men live. . . . Dr. Gore has published the first volume of his proposed theological studies. "Belief in God" is the title; it has in it many interesting confessions. Here is one: "I have always thought that the only very difficult dogma of the church was the dogma that God is love. But deeper than any difficulty has been the feeling that at the roots of my being I am confronted with God, from whom I cannot get away, and that the God who confronts me there is the living God of the prophets and of Jesus Christ."

CORRESPONDENCE

"Out of a Job"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The spirit moves me to write a few comments upon Professor Taylor's article, "Out of a Job." Professor Taylor has the faculty of stating things that are true, and that need to be stated, in such a way as to imply an untruth, and not be quite fair to a part of the people under discussion.

Take "Out of a Job": It is pitiful to see men standing idly in the marketplace because no man will hire them. The moral loss of unemployment is greater than the economic loss. The present situation does contain features which threaten our civilization. Society does owe its workers the right of employment; so far as this is possible. Capital has taken too large a portion of the earnings of industry. We must join hands in seeking some solution for this serious problem. The weakness of Professor Taylor's article is its apparent implication that our principal hindrance to accomplishing these things is the greed and heartlessness of capital.

Strictly speaking, capital cannot be greedy, because capital is only a thing—a thing in the hands of all sorts of men,—good, bad, and indifferent. There are capitalists and capitalists, as there are workingmen and workingmen. Some are greedy and heartless. Some are generous and fair. Some are receiving insufficient return from their investments.

In a rough way, capitalists may be divided into two groups: a limited number of very wealthy people, whose wealth is not of their own earning; and a much larger number of people who have saved a little from their earnings to provide for the needs of old age or misfortune. If some method could be devised for laying upon the shoulders of the former a larger portion of the burdens of society, it would be both just and wise. The progressive income tax has accomplished something in this direction. A progressive inheritance tax would also assist.

The implication that as corporations lay aside sums to insure dividends to their share-holders in lean years, they ought to do the same for labor, is more specious than practicable.

There are three parties to industry; capital, labor and management, though the fact that capital and management are often merged in the same hands somewhat complicates the case. In the larger industries the factors stand fairly distinct. It may be assumed that management, whether right or wrong, usually secures both capital and labor on the most favorable terms. In the case of capital, a moderate return, unvarying in fat and lean years, is often considered a better inducement than a more fluctuating return, even though the average of the latter might be slightly higher. Hence such a corporation as the one mentioned in Professor Taylor's article attempts to equalize its dividends. If management were convinced that the same method would secure labor on more favorable terms, the method would soon be employed.

Taking the case as it is, a fund to insure against unemployment would need to come from one of three sources; the earnings of capital, the earnings of labor, or the enhanced price to the consumer. Doubtless any of these three methods would be an improvement upon the present situation. But if capital is now being obtained upon the most favorable terms possible, it cannot be secured on more favorable terms. If labor were asked to bear the cost of such insurance, Professor Taylor would be among the first to cry out against "big business" for keeping back a part of the laborer's hire instead of giving him the privilege of investing it as he sees fit,—or spending it as he sees fit. Such a fund in the hands of corporations would be a powerful weapon against strikes, and as such would be sharply condemned. To take the cost out of the consumer would perhaps be more fair. But would the public submit? The probability is that when insurance against unemployment comes,—as come it will,—the cost will come from all three of these sources, and all will submit with some grumbling.

The moral is that we are willing that something shall be done if some Moses will show us the way. Capitalists are no more greedy and heartless than the rest of humanity. We all want all that we can get legitimately; and some of us want more. Indiscriminate criticisms of capital are more indicative of jealousy than of a sense of justice.

We have grave problems calling for solution. Their solution will require hard thinking, fair play, and broad-mindedness. We shall make more progress if we recognize that people are pretty much the same whether they wear white collars or blue overalls; that most of us look at things through glasses which magnify our own interests; but that most of us are willing to do right, once we are shown. My experience as a minister is that capitalists are usually as willing to be shown as the rest of human folk. We reformers must rise above class prejudice if we would make any material contribution to the solving of these vexed questions.

Moral: Get Your Subscription in Early

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have had the pleasure of reading the issue of your able "journal of religion," dated November 17 of this year. I have heard many of my fellow ministers commend your paper so highly, besides having read several copies of various issues, that I have almost concluded to treat myself to a Christmas present by becoming a subscriber. So much for my appraisal of the paper of which you are the honored editor.

Permit me to give my opinion of a part of the article from the pen of Alva W. Taylor, one of your contributing editors. Mr. Taylor's article on "A Second Report on the Steel Strike," contains food for thought,—that is taken for granted. I read what Mr. Taylor had to say with an open mind, until I came to the last paragraph, where he writes: "All sorts of 'answers' have been assayed, from the silly stuff put forth by the Rev. Mr. Bigelow to the labored effort presented to the senate committee on education and labor."

Now, sir, it occurs to me, an utter stranger to Mr. Bigelow, that the fine Christian thing for Mr. Taylor to do at the first opportunity, is to write another article for The Christian Century, showing to darkened minds like mine, just in what way Mr. Bigelow's production is "silly stuff." Until Mr. Taylor does this very thing, I shall be inclined to think his reference un-Christian, and it is possible many of your readers will be of a similar mind.

O. W. Holmes wrote: "Talking is one of the fine arts—the noblest, the most important, the most difficult—and its fluent harmonies may be spoiled by the intrusion of a single harsh note." I ask Mr. Taylor, through you, if his words "silly stuff" do not resemble harshness, especially when not a word of explanation was forthcoming. Would Christ have used that word in that way? In all kindness and in the spirit of fair play, I challenge Mr. Taylor to explain to your readers just what he meant when, as with a wave of the hand, he brushed Mr. Bigelow's opinions and conclusions aside with such unbrotherly and obnoxious words.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Why a Social Gospel?*

IN this book of Philemon a social note is struck, the institution of slavery is dealt with. Slavery was wrong. Paul laid down the doctrine of brotherhood between master and slave—a teaching which was bound to annihilate the system. We have not yet followed that idea to its full and logical end. What will happen in department stores when brotherhood is dominant? What will happen in railroad management when we not only have a Brotherhood of Engineers, but a brotherhood of officers, clerks, firemen, shop-men and bond-holders, yes, and the public? What will happen on farms when owners and renters behave like brothers? What will happen to middlemen when they realize that when they raise the price of milk, unduly, they starve babies in cities? What will happen to owners of reeking tenements when they look upon their tenants as brothers? What will happen to denominationalism when, suddenly, it dawns upon the stand-patter that the Baptist, Methodist, Congregationalist, Lutheran, Episcopalian, yes, and Catholic are all children of God, all saved by Jesus Christ and all brothers? Do you think we shall have separate quarters in heaven and that the Methodists will all be in one section and the Presbyterians all in another? I want to be able to go visiting and to have visitors, for some of my dearest and noblest friends are in the other camps!! It appears, you see, that even the church has not yet grasped Paul's revolutionary doctrine of brotherhood. When you say "Brother Smith" do you mean "Brother" or is it only pious twaddle, unctuous nonsense? Jesus and Paul agree upon this fundamental concept of brotherhood. It will solve your factory problems. It will settle the Irish question. It will solve the matter of disarmament. It will form a "League of All Who Love in the Interest of All Who Suffer." It will take care of famine relief. It will settle housing problems. It will care for wage difficulties. It will finish the liquor business. It will abolish prostitution and its attendant evils. It will settle the race question for good and all. It will dissolve caste in India, in your church!! Burns dared to hope it was "coming yet, for 'a that, that men to men will brithers be for 'a that." It was his tender heart that sung again, "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless millions mourn." When you can say, "My brother" not as a pious fraud but as a Christian gentleman, there will be an end to heresy hunting, mark that!! You don't hunt heresy in anyone you love, you hunt heresy in someone whom you would like to blast, someone that you envy because he is brighter than you are; someone who can preach rings around you; someone who studies while you sit at home and eat your heart out. No, you can't say that heresy-hunting is a lover's job; it's a mean, low, contemptible business. It's a good job for the man who hates himself and his neighbors!! (Think of that—it may do you good.)

But why a social gospel at all? Why not confine our efforts to individuals? Now we admit that there is need of balance here; you cannot ignore individuals. You have your duties to your own children and to your own neighbors. But your duties do not end there because each individual is socially conditioned. I have a friend who teaches in a great university who insists that each one of us is hopelessly the victim of social conditions. He can make out a strong case. He can out-argue me because he is better versed in his field, but he never convinces me. After he has proved his case—to his own satisfaction—(as we all do) I still say, "But I am not altogether the product of social forces—I have had something to do with it myself—and one or two individuals, with no social concepts at all, have had a lot to do with it." These one or two others he promptly claims as social forces and we start all over again. We can easily see, however, how powerful these social conditions and forces are in the molding of life. If you are born in Gopher Prairie—what chance have you!! If you are born on the Lower East Side of New York what chance have you? If you are born in Russia, what chance have you? If you are born a Presbyterian—well—it's all settled—or have we gotten over that notion? We do follow the crowd. We have crowd ethics, crowd opinions, crowd manners, crowd hopes and fears. There is no doubt about that—. "All we like sheep—have gone astray." That's the way we do, go astray—like sheep; if the bell-wether jumps through a barbed-wire fence—God pity us!! If the banker's daughter smokes cigarettes—but why go on—we simply must leaven the lump, change the mass, we are socially conditioned to a large extent.

JOHN R. EWERS.

BOOKS

THE HUMAN COSTS OF THE WAR, by Homer Folks. There may be some well-informed persons into whose hands this unique book has not yet fallen, although it received attention in several notable reviews last year. The book gives an account of the author's experiences and observations in the performance of the extraordinary mission which was given him on the signing of the Armistice, following his work with the Red Cross in France. He was commissioned to make a survey of the needs of the Allied countries which had been most severely devastated by war. The concrete evidences of disaster which the book portrays mount up to an almost unbelievable total which are summed up as "civilization's indictment of war." Ten million homeless, forty-two million subjected for longer or shorter periods to the life of enemy subjects, nine million of soldier dead, fifty million manless homes, ten million empty cradles, continental reconstruction and nobody to do it—these are among the terms of this terrific indictment.

"War," says Mr. Folks, "is indeed the great disaster. Earthquakes, floods, tornadoes, explosions, may harm the whole population of a locality; alcohol or vice may injure a percentage of the people of whole countries, but war can be compared only to all these things combined and sown broadcast over a continent. We may select from all these other enemies of human life their worst features, combine them into one quintessence of horror, intensify this to the nth degree, scatter it continent-wide and that is war. War is the negation of all the race has striven for through all the centuries. It denies that life is worth while. It is the enthronement of unreason and coercion. It is the supreme skepticism, both of man and of God.' And he sharpens this denunciation by adding that "this picture should surprise no one. It is of the essence of war to produce such results. Each side was trying to do just these things to the other, and both measurably succeeded."

Mr. Devine, reviewing Mr. Folks' book in the Survey for June 26, 1920, said, "His book will be of value a generation hence as a presentation of a cross-section of the social conditions of western Europe at the moment when the greatest war of history ended." In the year and a half that has elapsed since "The Human Costs of the War" was written, America has done little by way of accepting the challenge with which it concludes. The tremendous trade undertakings between this country and the devastated nations of Europe which are necessary in order to rehabilitate their economic life, have not been provided for. Foreign credits have had less attention than the making of a protective tariff to exclude foreign commodities. Mr. Folks' message is exceedingly timely, as the great conference is assembled at Washington. (Harper. $2.25.)

Says
Edwin Markham:

"I consider The Christian Century one of the most progressive, if not the most progressive church paper, in a social sense, that I have ever read. I want its editor to know that I am back of him with all the power I have."

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

A Journal of Religion

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON and HERBERT L. WILLETT, Editors
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR

Says
Dr. Charles E. Jefferson:

"I regard The Christian Century as one of the very best religious journals published in this country. Wherever I go, among men who are wide-awake, I find they are reading it."

The New Voice for the New Time!

THE WELCOME that has been given The Christian Century during the past two years by the leaders of thought throughout the nation is one of the most encouraging signs in the history of religious journalism. For such a day as this, the leaders are saying, The Christian Century has come. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists and other Christian groups are enthusiastically interested in the service The Christian Century is rendering the entire religious world in interpreting religion as directly applicable to the solution of the problems of today.

BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL,
Methodist Episcopal Church, Pittsburgh.

"I regard The Christian Century as the greatest journalistic force working for social and international righteousness coming from any press of the Christian church. Personally I watch for the arrival of The Christian Century with the utmost eagerness. I never lay down an issue of the paper without feeling a new stimulus for the wider application of the gospel."

PRES. W. H. P. FAUNCE, Brown University.

"I read every paragraph in The Christian Century every week with constantly growing satisfaction. Religious newspapers frequently put us into an irreligious mood, but here is one which, whether we agree with its specific opinions or not, has the horizon of the New Testament and the boundless sympathy of the Nazarene. Here is a journal that puts first things first and leaves the petty things far out on the circumference."

PRES. OZORA S. DAVIS, Chicago Theological Seminary.

"There are some things that a man cannot get on without in these days; The Christian Century is one of them. I do not subscribe to all that you write or include in your columns, for sometimes you make me wrathful. But I have never detected a cheap or insincere note in the paper. You are fearless and constructive and are leading the way. I have found your journal on the tables of men from the Atlantic to the Pacific in a somewhat wide cruise this year."

PRES. CHARLES M. STUART, Garrett Biblical Institute, Chicago.

"You give us from week to week, in The Christian Century, wise and helpful guidance to the Christian interpretation of the times in which we live."

SHERWOOD EDDY, missionary statesman and prophet.

"The Christian Century holds a unique place in American journalism. Among the few journals that have stood for complete social justice and a full social gospel I believe The Christian Century holds a unique place. It is fearlessly sounding forth the truth that America in general and the Christian church in particular need to hear."

JOHN SPARGO, famed socialist-philosopher, New York.

"Of all the religious journals coming to my desk the one that I regularly and carefully read with the closest attention and interest is The Christian Century. I admire its editorial policy for its courage, its forcefulness and its devotion to fundamental Christian ideals. It is a great American journal."

PROF. HARRY F. WARD, Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.

"I consider The Christian Century the most promising venture in the field of religious journalism in the English-speaking world. It is on the way to create a common mind among the leaders of Christianity in this country, because it is leading them to think about common problems in the spirit of the Gospels."

REV. CORNELIUS WOELFKIN, Fifth Ave. Baptist Church, N. Y.

"The Christian Century is the one publication coming to my home that gets a reading straight through upon its arrival, and I always anticipate its coming."

MISS JANE ADDAMS, Hull House, Chicago.

"The Christian Century is a happy departure from the conventional church paper. It displays unusual editorial judgment. Many of us have felt the need of a religious journal which shall intelligently treat of current political and social matters from a spiritual viewpoint."

LOUIS F. POST, formerly Assistant Secretary of Labor.

"The Christian Century emphasizes the principles of the golden rule, the second great commandment and the Lord's prayer, and inculcates their application not only to life for the next world, but also to life in this world."

REV. CHARLES E. GILKEY, Hyde Park Baptist Church, Chicago.

"I have been reading religious periodicals during the last ten years, but not one of them has contributed either to my thinking, preaching or living, anything like the wealth of guidance and inspiration that I find in The Christian Century."

SCOTT NEARING, sociologist.

"The earnest social message of The Christian Century should gain a hearing wherever men read, think and love truth."

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Bishop Thinks the Clergy Are Reckless in Speech

Dr. Hensley Henson, Bishop of Durham, recently delivered himself on some of the characteristic sins of the ministry. He thinks some of the men go too far in their utterances on the social question, seeming to prefer revolution to evolution. Even more significant was his indictment of the cloth on another count. He said: "In the second place, let us be on our guard against exaggeration. I am sure that great harm is being done at the present time by the reckless denunciation of the existing social order often by men who have no special knowledge either of the history of society, or of the present situation. Hypnotized by their own enthusiasm, they allow themselves to use language which is not only altogether excessive, but also highly inflammatory. I am bound honestly to say that I think some of the clergy are great offenders in this respect. Having created or stimulated popular discontent by such rhetorical exaggeration, they point to the discontent as itself sufficient proof of the existence of social oppression. They are immersed in a fallacy."

Noted Social Student Speaks on Conference

Dr. Francis G. Peabody, who is widely known through his book on the social teachings of Jesus, was the speaker at a union meeting of the churches of Cambridge, Mass., on Armistice Day. Dr. Peabody is a practical idealist, insisting that a piece of a loaf is better than none. In his address he disclosed his attitude to the conference in Washington in these terms: "These questions must be approached, first of all, not with precipitate or excessive expectation, but with patience and candid self-restraint. If it is faithless to expect too little of the Washington conference, it is hopeless to expect too much. An outright demand by the churches for universal and immediate disarmament would not only excite reactionary measures among cautious diplomatists, but would justify the common reproach that pious people are apt to disregard practical possibilities and cling to a utopian idealism. President Harding has gone so far as to reply to a letter of inquiry, deprecating the plea for universal disarmament as representing 'a widespread misapprehension of the aims and scope of the conference,' and adding, 'If we can get a reasonable limitation, we shall think that great things have been accomplished.' 'By reasonable limitation,' he has said in another letter, 'I mean something practicable, that there is a chance to accomplish, rather than an ideal that there would be no chance to realize.' Limitation, as has been recently remarked by President Eliot, may be regarded as a more promising word than restriction. It carries a suggestion, he says, of continuity. Restriction may be removed when convenient; limitation seems to propose a permanent principle. In either case, however, President Harding's warning is a chastening rebuke to imprudent idealism. The way, he intimates, may be obstructed by the zeal of those who see only the end. The idealist, fixing his gaze on the stars, may stumble over the facts at his feet. The first business of the idealist in these critical days is, in our common phrase, to 'watch his step,' and to welcome any definite turning of the way which may, even slightly, lead to the desired end."

Money Raisers Sit in Conference

The professional money raisers of the various evangelical communions were called into conference by the Federal Council of Churches at New York recently. Those communions which had put on national campaigns for large sums were represented. These are the Northern Baptist Convention, the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., the Congregational church, the Protestant Episcopal church, the Methodist Episcopal church, the Disciples, the Friends, the Reformed church in the U. S., the United Brethren in Christ, the United Presbyterian church, the Seventh Day Baptist church and the Christian Denomination. The conference had as a major aim the quest of methods by which the new standards of giving in the churches may be made permanent. The matter on which there was most difference of opinion was the question of the relationship of the missionary boards to the "forward movement" organization in each denomination. After this had been debated at length it was at last decided to refer it to a committee. This committee is headed by Rev. A. E. Cory, a Disciple, and has for additional members Rev. William Hiram Foulkes, of the Presbyterian church; Rev. R. J. Wade, Methodist; Rev. William E. Lampe, Reformed; and Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert, secretary of the Federal Council. This committee will iron out the differences of opinion and report at a future meeting.

Federal Council Has a Program on Peace Issue

Not satisfied with the demonstrations made in behalf of world peace at the time of Armistice Day, the Federal Council of Churches has issued a bulletin to the churches outlining a program of cooperative activity during the remainder of the winter. It is proposed that the prayer meetings and mid-week study groups shall come together to study international questions this winter. The Council will issue shortly a pamphlet on the problems of the Far East with a suggestion for a study of these problems. The churches are asked to continue every Sunday their prayers to God in behalf of the conference in Washington. In the larger cities a committee on international justice and good will will be organized on an interdenominational basis in order to mobilize the peace sentiment of the entire community.

Presbyterian Secretary Makes a Record

Rev. James H. Speer, D. D., Presbyterian New Era secretary for the Pacific coast, has made a record in the strenuous life. During October he traveled 4,605 miles by rail, and 400 by automobile. He faced 31 different audiences all the way from San Luis Obispo to Oregon. He has attended meetings of presbytery, addressed Sunday schools and served the Presbyterian cause in a wide variety of ways. In addition to these labors his office duties have been performed every day with the aid of a portable typewriter on which the multitudinous letters are written.

Employers Meet to Consider Christianization of Industry

Some employers have resented the interest of the church in the human side of industry. That this point of view is not shared by all employers is seen by the fact that the Federal Council of Churches was able to secure recently a conference of employers in New York for the purpose of considering the application of Christian ideals to industry. It was agreed by these employers that the church has the duty of taking an interest in the welfare of men in the various industries. Mr. B. Seeborn Rowntree of England made a telling address on the industrial methods of England. He spoke especially of unemployment insurance.

Armistice Sunday Is Rally Sunday

The Sunday schools of Macomb, Ill., have for two years utilized Armistice Sunday as a day in which every citizen of the town is urged to go to Sunday school in honor of the soldiers of the late war. The door knobs of the town are tagged, and a most vigorous campaign put on to bring out the total population. How successful this effort is may be seen by the fact that this year a city of 5,000 had 3,000 in Sunday school. Prominent among the promoters of this idea have been Dr. W. T. Rodgers, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, and his loyal helpers. The Presbyterian Sunday school had 900 in attendance on Armistice Sunday this year.

Dr. Macfarland at the Disarmament Congress

Washington is crowded these days with observers of the great disarmament congress. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, has been following events there very closely. Realizing as he does that the popular expressions of opinion in America must modify in some measure the discussions in the congress, he has been watching for opportunities of further service in giving expression to church opinion. In a recent communication on conditions there, he says: "Our people must not be misled. The happy issue of the present moment was clearly the result of popular feeling expressed over the entire nation without reserve. It comes mainly from three sources—the churches, the workers and the women. Most observers put it in that order and point to the widespread religious tone of the press, the religious sentiment evident in the congress, and above all, the fact that everywhere the issue is treated with religious tone and sanction. The delegates I have met have remarked the influence of our churches and the extent to which 'a free church in a free state' gives evident power and boldness to the church. One said, 'It is not so in Europe; we do not look or listen to our churches. It might be better if we did.' There are many dangers if our people fall back into apathy or indifference. Strong, constantly sustained interest and wisely formed and directed public opinion must continue and must be in readiness for any moment or event."

Community Church Makes Large Success

The community church at Atascadero, Cal., has been of great interest to forward-looking religious leaders all over the country. It is the only church in the community and in addition performs the functions that usually pertain to the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. The new $75,000 community house contains a library, swimming pool, bowling alley and club rooms for various groups. The church receives members from all communions on the basis of a simple pledge of loyalty to Jesus Christ and the New Testament. The present minister is Rev. H. J. Loken, formerly a Disciple minister at Liberty, Mo. Mr. Loken was trained at Harvard and has carried his liberal training into the task at Atascadero. The community church hopes to have a $250,000 plant when all the units are complete.

Presbyterian Church Gives Our Visitors a Lesson

The Presbyterian church has been giving our visitors in Washington an opportunity to consider the vastness of the missionary enterprise as a factor in the world's life. The Presbyterian exposition has been held at New York Avenue Presbyterian church where President Lincoln and about two dozen other presidents have worshipped. Dr. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the board of missions, and Dr. H. C. Swearingen, moderator of the general assembly, have been in attendance at the Exposition. Dr. Brown said in a public address: "Today, the foreign missionary enterprise is the vastest work of the church. Statistics are said to be dry, but who can think unmoved of such statistics as these; that 24,000 missionaries and 109,000 native workers are preaching the Kingdom of God in 16 different countries and 4,000 cities of the non-Christian world; that 4,467 congregations with 2,500,000 communicants and 1,500,000 catechisms have been gathered; that 39,- 500 schools are training 2,000,000 young people for Christian life and service; that printing presses distributed last year 200,000,000 pages of Christian literature and of the Word of God; that 703 hospitals treated in the name of the Great Physician 9,000,000 patients; sheltered the insane, cared for orphans, taught the blind and the deaf and dumb, sought out fallen women, promoted moral reforms and in various ways made the gospel of Christ a living force among multitudes of people. All this was done last year at less cost than a single battleship."

National Reform Association Wants Federal Divorce Law

The variety of marriage and divorce laws in various parts of this republic has made it very difficult to establish right standards of home life. An effort was made in 1905 to get the various states of the union to adopt uniform laws but New Jersey was the only state which acted. The National Reform Association through Dr. Richard Cameron Wylie recently argued the case for an amendment to the federal constitution before a sub-committee of the senate. Among the interesting facts quoted in his argument was the statement that President Roosevelt in his annual message to congress in 1905 urged a federal amendment making marriage and divorce a matter for congressional action.

Union by Denominational Trades

That something has to be done in the villages of the nation to eliminate church competition every well-informed person admits. The question of method is the only thing under discussion. Shall the new order bring in union churches, federated churches, community churches, or shall a method be found to operate denominationalism on broader lines? In many states the denominational leaders are trying to solve the problem by trades. A Methodist executive will abandon one field to the Presbyterians if the Presbyterians will abandon a field to the Methodists. The single denominational church remaining on the field will endeavor to serve the entire population. The difficulty in this process is the lack of ministers with interdenominational acquaintance and catholic feeling. Recently the Presbyterians took over the Methodist property at Frankville, Iowa, and will be the sole evangelical force in the community. With two buildings on their hands, the Presbyterians will use one for social and recreational purposes. Eleven thousand dollars will be expended on the two properties at once.

Churches Cooperating in a Sunday Forum

The Protestant churches of Salem, Massachusetts, are directing a most interesting experiment. They are holding a series of six successive Sunday afternoon meetings in the Central Theatre. The meetings are organized under the chairmanship of Rev. W. H. Spence, D.D., pastor of the Central Congregational Church,

Wholesome and Inspiring

Harold Bell Wright's

NEW NOVEL

HELEN OF THE OLD HOUSE

Unquestionably the best book by the world's most popular writer of fiction. A fine, big romance of people who live decently, think deeply and act normally. "Helen" is a character who grips your very heartstrings with her clear and sympathetic understanding of humanity.

The New York Herald says: "The appeal of this novel is the appeal of the Psalmist, of Spencer and of Whit-tier. Wright has the poet's eye, with its heaven-to-earth and earth-to-heaven range."

The Boston Globe says: "A story remarkable for its insight into present-day American life, filled with beautiful character drawing and stirring incidents."

The Kansas City Post says: "His principal character exemplifies the truest type of American womanhood. It is a beautiful love story."

A book to be read aloud in the family circle. Adventurous and exciting, but driving home great moral truths that will be keenly felt by the rising generation.

and such speakers as Dr. Albert Parker Fitch, Dr. Clarence A. Barbour, Dr. Herbert L. Willett, and Dr. William Pearson Merrill are on the program of the different Sunday afternoons. The enthusiasm with which these meetings have begun is indicative of the high value which they will have for the entire city. On a platform of that broad and cooperative character, it is possible to discuss with directness and force the deepest questions of religion and the most impressive phases of the social and redemptive movements of the present time. Moreover, the very fact that these churches are meeting together and that practically every Protestant group in the city is included augurs well for the continuance of some permanent form of cooperative work like a Church Council or a Federation, which can undertake religious and civic tasks for which no single congregation or denomination is adequate.

Disciples Church Is Strong

The Disciples church of Cynthiana, Ky., has 1,100 members in a town of 3,200 white population. The church has recently engaged in an evangelistic enterprise which brought into fellowship with the church 64 new members. The pastor, Rev. J. D. Armistead, was given a year in Yale last year, and his ministry is even more popular than before. The church building was recently redecorated and equipped with modern electric lights. Nearly every person of an age to understand the gospel is a member of some church in Cynthia, a very remarkable situation indeed.

Minister Makes Printer's Devils of Elders

Necessity is the mother of invention. When the Third Presbyterian church of Cincinnati found out it had to have a weekly house organ, and was not able to pay for it, it installed its own printing plant. The minister, Rev. William Cross, sets all the type for the Weekly Chat, one of the elders does the press work on a job press, and two of the trustees distribute the type. The name of the journal was chosen after a lively competition, in which many of the members of the church participated.

Presbyterian Minister Thinks Catholics Set a Good Example

Protestants are usually embarrassed at the loyalty and devotion of their Roman Catholic neighbors. Sometimes this embarrassment is water on the wheel to grind Protestant grist as the following clipping from the Messenger of Flatbush Presbyterian church will indicate: "Our Roman Catholic neighbors on Beverly Road asked for $100,000 for a new church and received $160,000. They know how to contribute. We congratulate them upon it. It is all very well for us Protestants to talk about fear and compulsion as motives in the Catholic church, but even such motives are preferable to the lack of any motive whatever on the part of tens of thousands of so-called 'Protestants' who give nothing by way of money, interest, prayer or service to the church. It is a rare thing to see a disloyal Ro-manist, whatever his motive, high or low. The gratitude accorded the Protestant church for the liberty it has given its members is the indifference and disloyalty of very large numbers of them."

Men's Bible Classes Bigger Than the Lodges

The average town in the United States has more men going to Bible classes than to the lodges. While a lodge of two hundred members usually has not over thirty-five people present at an average meeting, Bible classes with a hundred men present every week are a commonplace. An unusually successful class of this type is the McClelland class of First Presbyterian church, Clarksburg, W. Va. It has an enrollment of 700 members, and had the distinction of winning the "four square" contest of the International Sunday School Association last year. The class has a fund for loaning money to its members. In six years fourteen thousand dollars has been raised by this group of men.

Print Christian Messages in Newspaper

Newspaper evangelism is one of the new ideas among Christian leaders of Chicago. Every Saturday a Christian message is printed in the Chicago Evening Post, a journal of admittedly high ideals. The messages belong to the older order of evangelical interpretation, relating to individual sin and personal salvation. In spite of the limitations of viewpoint in the messages it is evident that much good has come from them, as reports from different parts of the city indicate.

Prayer for Union Women's Colleges of Orient

Ten mission boards in the United States and Canada unite in the support of certain union Christian colleges in the far east which are educating women. The women have been pressing into these institutions until there is no more room. The Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial Fund has offered a million dollars for these colleges on certain conditions. The colleges that would participate in the fund are Gingling College of Nanking, China; Yenching College of Peking; Woman's Union Medical College of Peking; Woman's Christian College of Madras; Union Missionary Medical School for Women of Vellore, India; Isabella Thoburn College of Lucknow, India; and Woman's Christian College of Tokyo, Japan. November 27 has been set apart as a day of prayer for these institutions, and a communication sent to ministers asking them to observe the day.

Disciples Develop Reading Plan for Ministers

Methodists have for a long time had a reading plan for their ministers, and the present course of study is quite creditable. Though the Disciples cannot enforce anything on their ministers by authority, the state secretary of Ohio, Rev. I. J. Cahill, has laid out a course of study with the approval of his organization, the Ohio Christian Mission Society. The course includes such interests as History of the Disciples, Missions, Religious Education, Social Welfare, General Literature, Preachers and Preaching. Six books are prescribed each year for a period of four years. These books are furnished by the state organization at a flat cost of five dollars a year. The state secretary hopes to bring purposefulness and system into the reading of ministers and to provide books for them at a cost which will enable them to buy.

Congregationalists Do Unselfish Work in South

The work of the American Missionary Association in the southland is paid for by Congregationalists, but four-fifths of all the Negro students who profit by the educational service are either Methodists or Baptists. Thousands of alumni are to be found in prominent business or professional positions. Booker T. Washington was an alumnus of Hampton, an institution founded by this organization. The diamond jubilee of the American Missionary Association was celebrated recently, and on this occasion many interesting facts were brought out about the work of this society.

Missionary Circulates Tract on China Heresies

The missionaries in China have been under fire in a number of the communions owing to the labors of a conservative organization in China in which missionaries of the Christian and Missionary Alliance are very active. Rev. Charles W. Rankin of the Methodist church of the south returned from China some time ago and has been circulating a tract attacking the doctrinal soundness of many of his colleagues, including Bishop Lambuth. The death of the bishop has caused the returned missionary to withdraw his tract.

Fellowship for a Christian Social Order

While Roman Catholics and Protestants each have vigorous organizations working for the inauguration of a Christian social order, there has been no platform where these might meet. Recently an initial meeting was held in New York at which a fellowship was organized on very broad lines so that Catholics, Protestants and Jews might cooperate, or indeed people without religious affiliation. It was agreed that the fellowship should be for information and inspiration, but that resolutions should come up in the various denominational groups. Work done should be inaugurated by these groups. The interest of the group is made manifest by the following statement of "problems": "In seeking the realization of these ideals—the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth—we must endeavor to change or abolish such unchristian aspects of our present social order as: vast wealth for a few and insufficiency for many; monopoly of natural resources and excessive concentration of power and privilege in the hands of the few; autocratic control of industry; sabotage, restriction of output, graft, and violence, whether by employer or workman; selfish competition for private gain instead of cooperation for the common good; production for individual profit and power rather than for social use and service; dishonesty and unfaithfulness in public life; class, national and racial arrogance, antagonism and greed; war, with its inevitable waste of human life and its utter denial of the gospel of brotherhood."

Admirable Work by a State Federation

Increasingly the cooperative movement among the churches takes form in progressive programs in various states, counties and local communities throughout the country. One of the most aggressive of the state organizations is the Ohio State Federation of Churches, which has in the last year inaugurated an admirable system of surveys, is carrying on evangelistic activities, is making a demonstration of the efficiency with which cooperative work may be done in one county, which will probably be imitated in many other parts of the state. Interdenominational county conferences are being held in 38 counties this year where nothing of the sort has previously been done; and in 50 other counties where last year such conferences were held, a second meeting of like character is to be conducted. On the basis of these conferences the organization of County Church Federations is proceeding energetically. Pastors Conventions, both for town and county pastors, are also a part of the program. A Federation of this kind is an encouragement to greater efficiency in Christian work, and its resolutions on questions of public policy and national responsibility are freighted with an authority which grows out of effective service performed. The movement for State Federations is progressing both east and west.

Oklahoma Baptists Would Deport the Negro

Though more Negroes are Baptists than are members of any other denomination, it has been made the work of a group of white Baptists located in Oklahoma to present a petition to President Harding for the consideration of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments proposing that the Negroes of America be deported. J. R. Lamb is national president of the True American League. The point of view of this organization is set forth in a recent bulletin published from Eufaula, Okla.: "It is estimated that there are 5,000,000 Negroes in America, who desire to migrate to their native Africa, but are dependent on government aid and protection for the exodus. A large per cent of this number are Baptists. Our proposition is not to 'hog-tie the Negro and set him down in the jungles of Africa to die,' but to engage the federal government to transport the Negroes who 'desire to return to their God-given Africa,' at its own expense, and to aid and protect them there until they become self-supporting under their own government. This is the proposition which we are endeavoring to have President Harding put before the World Conference while in session at Washington; the proposition to be introduced to that body by the reading of our Declaration of the rights of Races, as found in our book entitled 'Bible Account of the Origin of Races,' page 57. No Negro can fail to appreciate this national charity toward his race, whether he desires to go or stay; and no self-respecting white man will withhold his aid in giving liberty to this weaker element of our population."

Presbyterian Church Wages War Against Narcotics

Miss Helen K. Strain is the agent of the Presbyterian church in New York to engage in the reclamation of drug victims. In an address in Olivet Presbyterian church of Utica, New York, recently she told some very remarkable stories of people who had been reclaimed from vicious drug habits through religious influence. It is the belief of Miss Strain that the use of drugs is making a rapid increase in New York City.

Invisible Witnesses at the Disarmament Congress

The sermon themes of the country indicate that no subject has been so much to the fore this month as that of world peace. The ministers have poured out their finest talents in the exposition of this topic. Unusually striking was the treatment given by Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones of Central Christian Church of Detroit. He said: "Ten million dead who fell in the great war—forming a veritable 'cloud of witnesses'—will attend the disarmament conference this week in Washington, unseen by the selected delegates, but nevertheless there to see that they are not forgotten. That multitude whose lungs were seared and shriveled by gasses, whose flesh was tortured by shrapnel and exploding bombs—they will be there. The spirits of the dead, slain in the beauty and pride of youth—sons, brothers, lovers, husbands, geniuses like Rupert Hughes, Alan Seeger and Joyce Kilmer, rare and glorious spirits like Donald Hankey all will be there watching that 'ye not break faith!' Disillusioned and disappointed, humanity is hopeful once more and roused like a strong man after a sleep. Present also will be the specters of the living dead, the maimed, mutilated, blinded and shell-shocked. Those wrecks of their former selves who live in a world apart from their fellows, those pale ghosts of athletes that were, the once strong men who returned from the war broken forever—they will be there to witness against war. The five million starving children of Europe will be among the unseen at the conference. The three hundred and forty thousand shivering children of Vienna, the hollow-cheeked, sunken-eyed babies of Budapest, the army of innocent victims of war's calamity—have they not earned the right to speak on such an occasion and say: 'We children were never enemies; we did not make the war, the war has robbed us of our youth. We have never been young, we have only been little!' Motherhood will be represented in that cloud of witnesses. Who has a better right to be there than the mothers of the dead, the maimed, and the starving children? Who can speak with more insistence and reality than the women who went down into the valley of the shadow to bring men children into the world? Motherhood's strong indictment of war's horrors leaves nothing more to be said. Will he who said—They who take the sword shall perish with the sword—will he too be numbered among the unseen guests at this momentous meeting? Aye, he will be there. He will be at the conference in power if he is wanted, and he will make the place of meeting a temple of prayer, a court of justice, a house of good will."

Some Figures on the Work of the Unitarian League

The Unitarian Laymen's League is a success. Recent statistics issued show a membership of 11,703 men in 251 chapters. This organization recently put on laymen's Sunday in the churches, and the ministers sat in the front pews and listened instead of preaching. At Syracuse, N. Y., the league supplied the pulpit a whole winter while the minister was away recruiting his health. One of the big objectives before this organization of laymen at the present time is the recruiting of young men for the ministry. The Unitarian ministry is made up almost wholly of men who have left some other communion. It is recognized by the laymen that the Unitarian churches can never succeed unless they have a ministry that has come up within the movement. Among the objectives of the league is a twenty-five per cent gain in membership and the development of the Sunday schools of the denomination.

Canadian Church People Establish School of Missions

Rev. J. Lovell Murray, formerly in the service of the Student Volunteer Movement, has been called to become the director of the new Canadian School of Missions which is to be located at Toronto. This school will be maintained by the mission boards of Canada. The theological seminaries of Toronto will make available their courses which would be of service to the new institution. Dr. Murray served a term as missionary in India, and his contacts with student life eminently fit him to become the head of so important an enterprise. This enterprise makes the Canadian churches more advanced in their program than are the American churches. The Disciples have a College of Missions of graduate rank at Indianapolis, but this is the only institution of its kind in this country. There is none that is upon a frankly interdenominational basis.

Disciples Commend Work of Women Preachers

Women preachers are not allowed in many denominations, and in some where their work is permitted they are treated with coldness. The Disciples organization in Illinois recently took cognizance of the considerable number of women who serve as pastors in the state, and passed the following resolution: "Be it resolved, that we commend heartily the work of our women preachers, pastors, assistants and other worthy religious workers and seek to encourage them in every way. Be it further resolved, that a more urgent appeal be made to our young women for the preparation of themselves for the many places of Christian leadership which are open to them."

Parish House Indicates Development of Church Program

The parish house has come at last to a definite place in the program of the evangelical church. A large new parish building is now being constructed by First Baptist church of Evanston, Ill., and another will be started by Hemenway Methodist church in the early spring. Central Methodist church of Detroit has a staff of workers, and the parish program includes gymnasium classes and club meetings. One of the most remarkable of the community programs of the nation is that of the Washington Park Community church of Denver, where a church under Methodist auspices supplies the religious needs of people of thirteen denominations.

Young People Protest Public Dances

The Christian Endeavor Union of Omaha recently sent to the board of education a protest against the promotion of dancing in the public schools. This union is a very vigorous one with quite a wide variety of activity. On a recent Sunday the people of Omaha were tagged to attend a Christian Endeavor prayer meeting on the evening of that day. The various denominations of the city are in close accord in the direction of the work of their young people.

Archbishop Accused of Restricting Free Speech

Mrs. Margaret Sanger, the well-known advocate of voluntary parenthood recently undertook to hold a public meeting in New York, but the meeting was broken up by the police. The radical press of the country is charging Archbishop Hayes of the Catholic church with an improper use of ecclesiastical authority in inducing the police to act against Mrs. Sanger. The chief opposition to her propaganda is to be found in the ranks of the Roman Catholic church.

Christmas Gifts!

TWO FOR THE
PRICE OF ONE

The most acceptable gift you can make to your friends at the Christmas season is a year's subscription to

The Christian Century

And the next best is a good book! We will send The Christian Century for a year to one of your friends, and a selected book to another — and both for the price of a year's subscription to The Christian Century ($4.00; to ministers, $3.00). Think what 52 visits of The Christian Century would mean to Friend Number One, and what a year's reading of The Daily Altar, for example, would mean to Friend Number Two!

Note 1: We have prepared a beautiful and dignified Christmas greeting card to be sent to Friend Number One a few days before Christmas asking him (or her) to accept The Christian Century as a Christmas gift from you, and another card to be sent with the book to Friend Number Two asking him (or her) to accept the book as a Christmas gift from you.

Note 2: If you prefer, you may instruct us to send the book to the person to whom you are sending The Christian Century, or we will send to you, if you wish.

Note 3: Bill for the subscription(s) (including book free) will be mailed you after Christmas.

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

THERE has never been published a book which is better adapted for gift purposes than The Daily Altar. There are several reasons for its popularity:

1. It is beautifully made. Typographically it is perfect, and the binding is superb. It is bound in full morocco ($2.50) and in beautiful purple cloth ($1.50, add 8 cents postage).
2. It carries a religious message. The Christmas season is a religious one and the ideal Christmas gift is a religious book.
3. It lasts the year round — and for many years. Every time your friend takes up the book for his morning reading he will think of the thoughtful giver of the gift.

What The Daily Altar Contains

There is a page for each day's reading. For each day there is a verse of Scripture, a meditation, a brief poem, and a prayer.

A suggestion: Send for one copy of the book at once, either leather or cloth, then make up your list of friends who are to receive this delightful gift from you, and send on your order without delay.

WHAT THEY SAY OF THE DAILY ALTAR

The Central Christian Advocate: "Cannot be too highly commended."

The Presbyterian Advance: "Excellent and beautiful."

The Christian Evangelist: "A real help toward restoring the family altar."

The Churchman: "A beautiful book."

The Christian Standard: "Beyond all praise."

The Christian Advocate (New York): "Excellent arranged."

EDITORIAL

World's Unrest Not Due to Pessimism

THE year slowly coming to its close has been the unhappiest that our world has known in, perhaps, a century. The years of the war had in them the thrill of mighty events and high flaming hopes. But during 1921 humanity became conscious of the terrible price it had paid for a little breathing spell of peace. Travelers tell us that they see only sad faces in London and Berlin. The breakdown of conventional morality throughout Europe is accompanied by a sort of hysterical cheeriness which, however, is sad at its core. Even the crowds at theaters are stoical. The police are breaking up mobs which gather on the streets of many cities to make their protest. In America where optimism has been a chief national characteristic we are not so sure that everything is going well. The public is in an ugly mood, and politicians are walking warily, knowing that these are days when sudden reverses may come to the most trusted leaders. This mood of anxiety and dissatisfaction has been harshly denounced. To some it seems a kind of weakness following the war. They say that all we need in America is to "restore confidence." Keener observers tell us that this unrest is a good token. If we were satisfied with the world after the failures of the past century, there would indeed be no hope for us. Ten million men have recently lost their lives through war, the colossal tragedy of all history. We do well to mourn their loss and to despise the system that makes such loss possible. The property of the world is in few hands. Grinding poverty and wasteful and immoral wealth stare each other in the face. Innumerable hates separate humanity into groups and cliques. The man who could look out on such a world every morning and feel that it was "the best possible world" would indeed be blind. We have a clearer vision today of the failure of our upstart civilization than men ever had. Our pride is tamed and we are ready to be taught. It is for such an hour as this that God has waited. In our unrest and discontent is his opportunity to give fulfillment to his larger purposes.

Can Christianity Be Both Popular and Pure?

THE churches are taking stock of themselves today. Probably in no age has there been made so keen a study of the problems of the church as is now being made. One hears sharp attack and spirited defense of the institutions and traditions which still linger from past generations in the church's scheme. The very success of the church creates a problem which has been publicly recognized by Bishop Gore, one of the outstanding religious leaders of England. He said on a recent occasion: "I hate established churches, because whenever Christianity becomes an established religion and a man must belong to it as a matter of course, you eliminate the necessity of a personal choice and adopt the method which is exactly the opposite to the method of Jesus. So long as Christianity was a persecuted religion, so that nobody could join it without risking his life, its principles were kept pure on the whole and its practice corresponded with these principles." Church leaders in America know how true these remarks are. When Mr. Brown joins the big church of the town to have a larger market for pianos, or Mr. Jones thinks the demand for big motor cars will be in the successful church which he joins for business reasons, one begins to feel the drag of materialism and practical unbelief. The "social" argument has been too frequently used by ministers in personal evangelism. It has hurt the churches. When some lady joins a church because "the best people" are in that church, she probably has but little appreciation of the spiritual meaning of the religion she professes. It is possible for the churches to be persecuted for righteousness sake once more. They have only to become active in their opposition to industrial injustice or in their hatred of war, or in their championship of Debs or the conscientious objectors, to find themselves suspected and boycotted by a section of the community. The Christian way of life is none too popular today but that an intelligent espousal of it will invite all the opposition and suffering one may wish to take care of.

The Use and Abuse of the Bible

IT is not wholly without significance that a considerable number of daily papers carry a verse of Scripture prominently on the editorial page every day. These verses are usually chosen by some minister in the local community and are continual incitement to meditation upon spiritual themes. The sermon subjects announced by ministers have a much larger amount of biblical teaching than during previous years. Evidently there is an audience once more for expository preaching and for various kinds of studies that will illuminate the Bible. Along with this fresh interest in rational Bible study comes also an increase of the superstitious and hurtful. Recently a man has devised a method of using the Bible as an ouija board. He has arbitrarily adopted the word "the" as meaning "yes," and the word "and" as meaning "no." He asks questions of the Bible which can be answered with the affirmative or the negative, and then starts reading at random to be guided by the first "the" or "and" to which he may come. This is all very simple, and it has been expounded in a tract which is now ready for circulation in that section of the public which has a perennial interest in the occult. Great treasures are locked up in the Bible because foolish theories about the Bible keep us from understanding it. The man who sets out with a theory of inspiration with which everything must be squared is under a great handicap. The man who will treat the Bible as he would treat any other ancient book and read it diligently will be apt to form his own theory of inspiration. Such a theory will be high enough. It will allow Bible writers to bring him their messages without the handicap of theological prejudice. A great revival of Bible reading waits upon the death of certain theological dogmas about the Bible, and the beginning of a humble and sensible approach to this great body of religious literature.

Popular Taste In Books Is Changing

REPORTS from librarians in many cities indicate that popular taste is turning aside definitely from the mass of fiction that was once the daily diet, and people are now reading more serious books. A wise observer among the librarians notes that this is due to the change that has come into books of all sorts. The better fiction is now so loaded with propaganda and psychology that it is quite serious in tone, while on the other hand good writers have made biography, history and many other kinds of books quite as interesting as the old time fiction. A great many readers think H. G. Wells is more interesting in his "Outline of History" than in, for instance, his "Soul of a Bishop." The most significant change in public demand is the new taste for books bearing on international topics. This was to be expected of course. Today is the very day when Will Irwin's "The Next War" would have its psychological opportunity. Less easy to explain is the demand for good biographies. The story of Roosevelt's life has been told by many writers. One can see him as statesman in the authoritative two volume set by Bishop, or one can see him in the much more human and attractive light of "My Brother, Theodore Roosevelt," by Mrs. Corinne Roosevelt Robinson. Strachey's "Queen Victoria" is in great demand at the public libraries. One would hardly expect so much interest in a nineteenth century queen, but the story of her life and times is done with literary finish and with the vividness of a work of fiction. Mr. Wells in his "Salvaging of Civilization" has made a great idea popular. All of Wells' books have taken on new popularity since he began reporting the armament conference. He has several million readers every day, and this makes new friends for him. If the mushy neurotic novel is passing, and people are not over-excited about the big doses of psycho-analysis they get in much of the current fiction, there may be after all a chance to get some real ideas into the heads of the hoi polloi.

Where Practice Nullifies Profession

THE Protestant Episcopal church has been very active through one of its commissions in forwarding the cause of Christian union in recent years. There can be no doubt of the sincerity and warmth of the union proposals which have been broached by a number of the eminent ministers of that communion. The World Conference on Faith and Order, the proposed concordat with the Congregationalists and the Lambeth conference are all evidences of the spirit of what The Christian Century is pleased to believe is a majority opinion of the men and women of the Episcopal church. Yet these various overtures have not been received with very much warmth by the evangelicals of this country. There has been courtesy in the replies, and a studied avoidance of anything offensive, but nothing that looked at all earnestly toward closer fellowship. A recent issue of the Churchman with great frankness diagnoses the reasons. It is admitted that the Episcopal church has a skeleton in its closet, no longer hidden to the Christian public. A noisy and conservative minority nullify every effort to bridge the gap between the Episcopal church and the non-Episcopal churches. Some other communions know and understand. They too have skeletons in their closets. When the Churchman makes a specific demand on its constituency that they favor Episcopal cooperation with the Federal Council, it but speaks in the open what many have said in secret. Good friends of the cause of Christian fraternity have long wondered at the anomaly of a communion making the most distinct proposals for Christian unity and yet failing to cooperate in a practical organization that gives a definite, albeit an inadequate, degree of unity to the various fellowships of the American church. The Churchman further demands that the interchange of pulpits which is even now permitted under a special canon shall be made a more frequent practice. If the evangelical ministers have been blessed of God as the Lambeth conference asserted, then no harm can come to an Episcopal church from listening to an evangelical minister once in a while. What is needed in every section of the church is more practice of union, and less abstract speculation about it.

The Church As the Fountain of Generosity

WHAT wrecked the Interchurch World Movement was the theory that there existed a great unchurched element in America which would be generous in giving if approached rightly. It was discovered by those who carried the blue cards around in that memorable campaign that the number of altruistic people outside the churches is negligible. In the great philanthropic campaigns that have been necessary to aid China, Armenia and other peoples since the war, all sorts of devices for raising money have been tried out. In the long run these great treasuries wait for contributions upon the activity of the ministers. The churches have given three million dollars for famine relief in China. A large section of the money for Armenia is money secured in churches, and the amount contributed by churchfolk probably forms the major portion of the giving. The philanthropic spirit is the product of education as is every other virtue. Lodges and clubs with fixed membership charges are based upon the principle of a quid pro quo. The churches on the other hand teach the virtue of giving where no return is expected. It is upon Christian men and women trained from infancy in the habits of making sacrifices for others that the great unselfish causes of the world wait for support.

Admirable Work by a State Federation

REFORMING adults is a difficult, some say an impossible, task. John B. Gough spent an arduous life reforming drunkards, but the gin mills made them faster than he could save them. There was no temperance reform until through the activities of the W. C. T. U. scientific temperance instruction went into the public schools. The traffic paid no attention to this move, but in this they showed their fundamental ignorance of human nature. A reform taught to little children is the one that some day will really come to pass. On the other hand the reforms that we still confine within the conventions of the grown-ups have not a chance in the world. Do we hope for a warless world? Hope is vain so long as history is taught in the grades in the old-time jingo fashion, and the world is made to swing about military heroes as major pivots. The new way of conceiving history must enter the public schools of all the nations before there will be any world peace. Many a modern minister hopes to emancipate his people from irrational religious ideas. Yet some girl teacher in the primary department is building up reactionary theology a good deal more thoroughly than a modern minded minister can construct the more reasonable view. There will be no through-going emancipation of religion from medievalism until we teach modern views in our religious schools from the primary department up. The socialists have recognized the primacy of the child and every large city now has a socialist Sunday school in which the Marxian documents are used as a sort of Bible. One rather pities the children, but the thing is being done. Meanwhile the churches go right on constructing their church buildings for adult audiences. Instead of putting the child in the midst as Jesus did, they put the old deacon in the midst, and arrange the program for his comfort and satisfaction. The church must be in much larger measure a school. It must plan definitely to inculcate its big ideas by an educational process that is modern and adequate. When this is done, we may hope to have a Christian world in which justice and brotherhood will dwell in the hearts of all men.

Angels and Devils

ONE can no better discover the fundamental changes that have gone on in religious thinking than by observing how certain words and ideas have dropped out of the religious vocabulary. A small boy was asked the other day who the seraphim were. His reply was that they were the wives of the cherubim. His idea was not less accurate than that of most people one might catechise. The notion of intermediate beings was once very important in religion. Cardinal Gibbons believed that we should pray to angels. Many modern Christians would assert that they did not believe in angels at all, as a special order of beings. The devil used to be a very real objective person. Martin Luther is said to have thrown an ink bottle at his satanic majesty. Not very many people would expect in the twentieth century to run across a figure with a black body, forked tail, and horns, and cloven hoofs. From the Persia of long ago these notions were imported. They may have been corruptions of the original Hebrew religion. A people with more poetical minds than ours were able to retain these words and turn them to moral and spiritual uses. The Anglo-Saxon mind must materialize everything with which it comes in contact. First angels and devils materialized, then they ceased to exist. In the old universe with a flat earth and seven disc-like heavens, the angels were the messengers who made the arduous ascents to the presence of divinity. An immanent God needs no such helpers. Modern religious faith thinks of a God who is nearer to us than breathing. In China many still believe in devils as the authors of diseases of various sorts. The treatment is noise and red-hot needles. In America we have for the most part developed other theories of disease. We do not even lay our sins on the devil, knowing full well that when we are tempted we are led away by our own lusts. The Persian religion as it has survived in the Hebrew religion and been handed down with the Christian is still useful in religious allegory. It is dangerous only to unimaginative minds.

The Resurrection of Faith

HOW deep and devastating are the effects of the war upon the moral life of the world we are only now beginning to realize. And our most sensitive and comprehending realization falls far short of adequate understanding. Of a truth, and very literally, only God knows what havoc the war has wrought at the roots and in the structure of our moral life. While the war was on, a favorite argument for bolstering up morale was to point out certain gains that were apparently being achieved in the personal character of both soldiers and civilians, as well as in the social character of the community and the state. Such by-products of the war as thrift, temperance, courage, the habit of obedience under discipline, intense patriotic feeling, the spirit of sacrifice and the consciousness of national solidarity were dwelt upon as measurable gains in character which, we were led to believe, would surely persist into peace times and be conserved as a permanent enrichment of the moral capital of mankind.

These aspects of the war experience were the themes of much preaching calculated to stiffen the insecure conscience of Christian folk whose misgivings and doubts otherwise would have seriously weakened their patriotism. Naturally the obverse side was studiously avoided. The profanity, the vulgarity, the coarsening of moral fiber, the mood of hatred, the shrivelling of that mental sympathy which is the tap root of culture, the weakening of individuality through the power of military discipline and intense mass opinion, the breakdown of the power of criticism which left the people dangerously susceptible to propaganda—this side of the shield was carefully kept turned the other way in those fierce days when every ounce of emotion and every strand of conviction was necessary to keep a united people behind a united soldiery. But now that everything may be told, it is important to take stock of the consequences of the war in the moral sphere as well as in the economic and political spheres.

We are now not only vividly aware of the direct injuries wrought by the war upon character, but we have been disillusioned with respect to many of the moral benefits which, while the inexorable stimulus of war necessity was upon us, seemed to afford some measure of compensation for the great cost we were forced to pay. The more than two years' reign of prodigality following the war wiped out the moral benefit of war thrift. Likewise the supposed gains in temperance and continence were shorn from us. The sense of social solidarity and team work gave place in politics to the most flagrant and unashamed exploitation of the common good for partisan ends that our American history affords, and in practical economics to the determination to "make a killing," each man for himself, while the tide of prosperity was high. As for the spirit of sacrifice which had been not merely applauded but interpreted in thousands of Christian pulpits as of a piece with that holy thing which reached its immortal expression on Calvary—one may only say that having caught our moral breath we are now beginning to sense the sacrilege of such an interpretation. A new ethical conviction is forming. The wartime ethics which justified the war as the lesser of two evil courses, is giving way before the first gleams of a new insight. With Studdert-Kennedy, whom Mr. Shillito quotes in his British Table Talk in this issue, the Christian conscience is beginning to ask, Why were there only two courses open and both of them evil? Was it not the business of those who had stood at Calvary to have opened up another course, a righteous way of redemption in which men of good will could walk?

Thus go glimmering the moral glories of war and all the opportunistic apologetics which we devised to support it. If the economic fruits of victory are ashes, as Norman Angell now has the undisputed right to say, Christian intelligence must also see that of a tree which brings forth evil fruits such as war brings forth, not one good thing can be said. Of all the poisonous effects of the war upon the spiritual life, none is more fundamental and serious than its destruction of faith. For a time, in the early months of the fighting, our moral leaders seemed to think that the war experience would exalt religion and rehabilitate the church. But this illusion was soon dispelled. The churches were utilized at the beginning to make the war holy and they were attended by unwonted throngs in England, France and Germany, as well as in America; but this apparent revival of public devotion soon passed and the church, having already abandoned its prophetic function, had little use for its sacramental function after exercising it in launching the war, so it made itself increasingly an agency of the civilian practicalities in support of the state and the army.

For the first time in the history of warfare ethical religion found itself embarrassed. The spiritual interpretation of life was a hindrance more than a help in the task of practical morale. The modern conception of Christ, as a lover and brother of women and men, which had been growing up in the minds of his followers for more than a generation, like Noah's dove found no resting place for its feet in a world inundated with hate. The idea of God suffered such violence at the burly hands of reality and fact that the very roots of faith were shaken loose. What good is religion at all if it is helpless to cure the evils that issue in war? men asked. Religion, our generation had come to feel, is not a thing that can justify itself within a special compartment of life. It can claim reality only as it shows itself applicable to the whole of life. And if—so men's thoughts ran on—if religion is impotent in so basic a violation of its own ideals as this thing called war is, then these religious ideals are illusions. They simply will not work. They decorate life, but they do not determine its character. If one wishes to deal with realities rather than with fictions let him consign religion to the limbo of forgotten things.

Inevitably, this reasoning opened the seams and crevices of men's souls through which the poison of cynicism and practical atheism seeped in. Faith could no longer be supported by metaphysical arguments as in former days; it could be defended to men of our generation only by objective demonstration. If God is unable to demonstrate his existence and his power in a matter so elemental as the repression of war, why should we expect him to avail anything in the more subtle and refined needs of our human experience? So the "limited cycle" concept as applied to human life displaced the concept of indefinite progress under divine providence. There is no such thing as progress, many persons reasoned. What seems like progress is only an illusion. Our humanity, starting in the jungle, goes up so far toward the ideal; then, presto! something happens, and back to the jungle it goes, to begin all over again. Again it ascends from the jungle, painfully making apparent progress up the steep path of moral achievement, when at a certain point something happens, and back again to the jungle man goes. The endless tale repeats itself. History is the record of this illusion of progress, which in reality is a succession of futile cycles. The world war marks the end of a long cycle during which hope and faith found more bread to feed upon than in any other period of human history. But now, man, disillusionized, has returned to the jungle, to barbarism. No doubt he will begin another cycle of emergence and ascent, and there will be those who in the name of religion and of ideals, in the name of God, will create in his heart the illusion of progress, but we, at least, will not be deceived!

It was by thus blighting faith, which is the very root of character, that the most serious moral damage was done by the war. Habits of passion and moral delinquency are grave enough, but they are incommensurable with the loss of that capacity for faith from which religious aspiration and moral dignity are ever derived.

The successive phases of war emotion disclose how formidable and cumulative was the attack upon this citadel of the moral life. The emotional reaction to the war event on the part of churchly Christendom passed through five distinct stages. There was first a mood of disenchantment and dismay. When in 1914 we became at least convinced that an actual world war was upon us, the shock was so profound that everybody found himself asking whether Christianity had failed. Magazines and newspapers were flooded with articles on the subject of the collapse of civilization, the failure of the church, the futility of religion. Pro and con the discussion went on, the apologists for conventional faith and piety often betraying by the irrelevance of their argument as ominous a lack of faith as did the church's critics. To those who will take pains to recall the current literary expressions of the first two years of the war this phase of our war emotion will renew itself vividly. We had developed a snug sense of security based upon our world-wide interdependence in commerce, in culture, in science, in finance, in labor and in social idealism. All these interwoven forces we conceived of as the secular structure of which Christian faith was the vital spirit. The name of the whole was Christian Civilization. That this mighty structure could be wrenched and disjointed was inconceivable. For a generation our sermons had grandiloquently pointed to it as a demonstration of God's providence and as not only a cause for gratitude but a very ground of faith. Then suddenly that ground gave way like quicksand under the feet of faith and men's souls were sucked down into it.

Then we entered the war, and our emotion passed into a second phase, that of consecration to a group of glorious ideals. President Wilson's interpretation of our war aims came to our despair like life preservers to a drowning man. He set moral goals ahead of all our fighting. We grasped at his formulas—a war to make the world safe for democracy, a war to end war, a war to annihilate Prussian militarism, a war to give small nations their rights, a war to clear the way for international friendship, a war to bring justice to the under-privileged classes in all nations—we grasped at these ideals with religious fervor and consecrated our blood and treasure to the high adventure of translating them into fact. We were in no mood to discriminate, to use our critical faculties. Our despair at a Christian world torn with bestial strife made us peculiarly susceptible to so lofty a moral appeal, and our response to it was partly in the interest of recovering our spiritual and ethical self-respect. In such a mood we could not humanly be expected to take account of the fact that war as a means by which to attain these lofty moral goals was irrelevant and antithetic. The war channel seemed to be the only practical outlet for our enthusiasm, so we clapped our pacifists and conscientious objectors into jail where their voices would not disturb and distract our ardor.

The third phase of our emotional reaction began with the period of the armistice. It was marked by the exultation of victory. "All that we have fought for has now been won," declared President Wilson in his armistice day proclamation. It was the universal belief that we were about to enter a new world. All Europe was aflame with hope, not alone the victorious nations but the vanquished as well. The armistice had been agreed to on the basis of Mr. Wilson's statements of the war aims, particularly the fourteen points. Never had human expectation gone to such lengths. Mr. Lloyd George made his election campaign in the early winter of 1918 on a platform of four planks—to hang the kaiser, to make Germany pay for the war, to solve the housing problem in England by providing every householder a decent habitation, and to abolish poverty!

Then came the awful mood of disillusionment and emotional relapse. Following the treaty of Versailles in which the allies demonstrated a capacity for perfidy second only to that which they had imputed to Germany as an inherent characteristic of her imperial policy. Humanity waked as from a wild dream. Not a single moral aim of the war had been accomplished. All the sacrifice, all the faith, which men had put into the war as a means of achieving certain spiritual goals and preserving the moral character of the world had left them with these goals yet far off. The world was no safer for democracy than before; Prussian militarism had changed its habitat from Brandenburg to France; international friendship even among the allies themselves, not to speak of the healing of enemy relationships, was still an abstraction; and every nation, including the United States, was engaged in a policy of preparation for further war on a scale in comparison with which ante bellum standards were contemptible. Manifestly we had on our hands an unfinished war. Disillusionment developed into cynicism. The League of Nations became a byword and a football of shameless partisanship. Our press openly taunted "idealists." The ethics of real politik became the apologetic of our statesmen. The principle of self-interest alone was insisted upon as affording the point of view for international arrangements. The doctrine of economic determinism was taken bodily over from Karl Marx by the most respectable and conservative moulders of public opinion, and ideals of brotherhood and world-wide friendship were waived on one side as pious fictions which, however good they might be in their little corner of life, were decidedly out of place in adjusting the inter-relationships of nations.

This is the point at which our churchmanship stands today. Religious leaders never faced so radical and penetrating an opposition as they face just now. It is no mere opposition to our creeds. It is no mere impatient criticism of our ecclesiastical habits and procedures. The public mind of the moment is not sufficiently interested in our creeds and our ecclesiastical ways to so much as oppose or even criticize them. The Christian problem of this day and hour is that of resurrecting faith. Men cannot believe in God unless they can believe in brotherhood. There is no place for providence unless there is reality in progress. If war is inevitable, atheism is inevitable. If religion is to continue publicly impotent it is doomed to be privately impotent also. Unless Christ's kingdom is to stretch from sea to sea it cannot long live within any individual breast. And if the living Christ himself is not competent to solve the problems of the Pacific east, and even to heal the ancient Franco-German feud, he is doomed to become a mere

. . . dead fact
Stranded on the shores of the oblivious years.

There is no other alternative. The Christian church has a stake in the Washington conference incomparably greater than that of any other world institution. If the appeal to the constructive and friendly forces of peace does not issue in an objective demonstration of the responsiveness of our human social order to the ideal considerations that are implicit in the purpose for which the delegates have come together, we shall be in for a further slump—God only knows how deep!—into the hell of cynicism. It is cynicism that is the arch enemy of religion, not criticism. The greatest thing the church can do for itself, for the sacred cause that is entrusted to it, is to forget its internal differences over creed and theology and organization and bring to bear all its power upon the public opinion of the nation to make sure that at Washington some positive and substantial beginnings are made which exhibit this world life of ours as amenable and congenial to the control of spiritual forces. If such a demonstration can there be made, there will come such a world-wide revival of faith and hope that God can open up before his church pathways of service and of progress which else will be kept closed for generations to come.

Roller Skates and Riches

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THE daughter of the daughter of Keturah came unto me, saying:

My little playmate, Willis, hath a grandpa, and his grandpa hath bought for him a pair of Roller Skates.

And I said, The grandpa of Willis is President of a Bank.

And she inquired, saying, What is the President of a Bank?

And I answered, He is a man who doth accommodate his friends by borrowing their money without Interest and Loaning it back to them at Six Per Cent.

And she asked of me saying, Grandpa, is the grandpa of Willis as rich as you?

And I said, Nay, my dear; for he hath not so many children or grandchildren.

And she said, Shall we go to where they sell Roller Skates?

And I said, We will surely go there, and we will stay not on the order of our going.

So we went to the place where they sell, and we bought the skates.

Now in the days of my youth, when there were no Movies, and there was no Jazz, there were Skating Rinks, wherein the youth did congregate, and roll around on an Hardwood Floor. But Concrete Pavements were there none, and the young folk did not skate all over Creation as now they do. But I remember that wheels under the feet of youth feel fine.

And as we walked toward home, the little maiden thought much of How Rich she was with her Skates, and How Rich must be her grandpa to buy them, and she remembered that I had spoken of the wealth of the grandfather of her playmate. And she inquired, saying:

Grandpa, is any one in the world more rich than you?

And I thought of my Home and my Health and my Friends and my Children, and my Children's Children, and my Books and my Job. Yea, I remembered that my Check is as good at the Bank for any sum that I have need to draw as that of John D. Rockefeller or the grandfather of Willis, and I said:

No, my little girl, there is no man in the world more rich than thy grandpa.

Succession

GOD the Great Astronomer looked out from His high Heaven

And saw below Him in the void Earth's little struggling spark,

And even as He watched its course as it plowed on in ether
It shuddered, suddenly, and sank, and then grew dimly dark;

And God the Master Architect turned with a passing sigh
To launch another planet in the ocean of the sky.

Gold Lace and Gray Facts*

By Joseph Fort Newton

IT is now well nigh twenty-seven hundred years since the prophets of old foresaw, from the heights of Hebrew vision, the end of war. Seers set no dates, but they do discern the moral order of the universe and the ways of "that Power not ourselves which makes for righteousness." Almost as long ago Plato reasoned of a time when the rule of Force would give way to the reign of Reason. Faint and far off such visions must have seemed in those far away centuries; but it meant much that men dreamed such dreams. Wars many, wars horrible have come and gone since Isaiah preached and Plato lectured, the last war more horrible than the rest; but the vision still glows and abides—proving in its last crucifixion its immortality.

Today, as I look into my own heart, I find myself asking this fundamental question: Are such visions idle dreams, or divine inspirations? They must be one or the other, and it makes all the difference which they are as to how we labor for the good of humanity, and what hope we have for its future. If these visions are only fancies, born of the ferment of the human mind, and revived in our day by our present distress to soothe a world weary unto death, and weary of death—torn, shattered, and gray with grief—let us face the fact, though it open before us a vista of endless and increasing strife, each war more frightful than the last, with interludes of bicker, bargain, and balancing of powers. In that case let us follow the blunt and brutal honesty of Ludendorff, and repudiate our Christianity, as a thing too fair to have been true in the past and too frail ever to be true in the future. For, if Christianity is as vain as all the vain things proclaimed of Solomon, it is time we should know it.

THE BITTER REALITIES

Here on this consecrated ground, and gathered as a Christian community, we must ask such questions, facing the bitter, old and haggard realities. If war be an essential part of civilization—if there be something inherent in nationality that makes it necessary—our late enemies were not only right, but as relentless in their logic as they were ruthless in its execution; and we must admire their scientific efficiency. But if there be a God above man, a God who dwells in man, and if humanity exists for other ends than trade, tariff, and strife, our former foes were fatally and tragically wrong; and we are wrong by as much as we worship the gods that smote us. According to our faith in this ultimate reality of God or no God, according to our choice—each in his own heart—between spirituality and materialism, so it will be unto us, whether war is to be eternal or reason shall rule in the affairs of mankind. For it is faith, after all, on which the whole matter turns, faith in God, faith in humanity, faith in moral forces, in the power of ideas, in the might of spirit to rule flesh, of light to dispel darkness, of sympathy to overcome suspicion, of the future to set us free from the blood-rusted fetters of the past.

The mighty prophets, at least, did not believe that they were following a forlorn hope, duped by delusive phantoms and vague impossibilities. Nor did that glorious succession of apostolic federalists and peace-thinkers who succeeded to their vision, from Dante to Grotius, from William Penn to Victor Hugo, to name only a few of those who shine like stars in the crown of humanity. No; those who walked with God of old saw afar the triumph alike of reason and of righteousness, as Tennyson, in our own day, foresaw "airy navies grappling in the central blue"—as I have seen them in fact—and beyond that horror "the parliament of man." They refused to admit that the past is a measure of the future, holding that man exists to surpass himself; and that God, who has put such dreams into our hearts, is himself working in us and through us to fulfill in our human world his creative purpose of goodwill. Where others saw only the human factors in the situation, they saw other influences at work, and it was upon their faith in God that they based their final hope. They knew that there are reserves of divine help on which man has not yet drawn, and springs of power in human nature yet to be tapped, and they trusted the increasing purpose of goodwill running through the years.

THE NEXT WAR

Down to this deep foundation we must dig anew, remembering the bitter bereavement of the last three years, and the blighting of the fairest hope that haunted humanity. So, and only so, can we rise above the half cynical, half pessimistic mood into which we have fallen as the result of the great war and the little peace. Already men are talking of the inevitability of the next war as glibly as they forget the horrors of the last, at the behest of a vague, pervasive fatalism, as paralyzing as it is pernicious, as if the earth were to be a perpetual jungle of jealous states snarling and snapping at each other, and ever so often plunging into war. It is faith, and yet again faith, that alone can save us from anarchy, be it organized or otherwise, which threatens to drag all the hard-won inheritances of the ages into the bottomless bog. Where such a faith is real and active all things are possible; where it does not exist, or is feeble, disruptive forces have full play, working their will.

Three years ago today, the air-raid guns sounded in London—bringing back unhappy memories—but we knew it to be a signal that the armistice had been signed. London went wild with joy. Reserve melted away, suppression exploded in an outburst of song in which there was the undertone of a sob. Men knew not whether to laugh or weep, and so they did both. They danced. They prayed. The old gray city seemed like a cathedral, its streets aisles, its throngs worshippers. On their knees men thanked God that the killing of boys had stopped, vowing that such a horror should never happen again. It was the same in New York, in Paris, in Rome, for the whole world had been drawn together in a community of peril and disaster. Everywhere joy was tempered by the memory of the gay and gallant lads by whose suffering and sacrifice victory had been won. We were not our own; we were bought with a price. Through the hearts of men of all lands swept the wild hope that now, at last, the "desired, delayed, incredible time" had arrived when war would be no more.

THE LAPSE OF HOPE

But, alas, reaction followed swiftly, tragically, ruthlessly, and the vision became as dim as a taper in a London fog. Such idealism as had stood the strain of the war seemed to evaporate, and the moral solidarity of the world dissolved in a welter of swinish selfishness, to an accompaniment of a mood of jazz, justifying the words of Alfred Noyes which cut like whips of fire. At times, in those dismal months, one felt that man had learned nothing from the war save a new brutality in the old game of grab—so much land for so many dead—until the spirit of sacrifice which won the war seemed like a dim memory of a previous state of existence. All the anger, hate, disillusionment and revenge burning in the public mind found focus in Paris, making a horrible psychology in which goodwill could not live. Anyone who saw the conference, or tried to breathe its atmosphere—surcharged with bitterness—knows that no just treaty could have been devised. No wonder a British officer, writing to me, quoted the lines:

The devil's kingdom is come,
Ill is the news I tell,
The devil's will is done
On earth as it is in hell.

Working in such an air, the result of the conference was amazing, albeit contradictory, embodying the tragic dualism by which the world is torn—a league of idealism and a treaty of imperialism, each making the other null. Thus, what promised to be a moment of omnipotence, ended in failure and futility.

All of us can testify to the mood first of sorrow, then of helplessness, and finally of apathy and indifference that settled down upon us. But consider what this state of mind has meant, and what has happened during the last three years. First, we have had no enthusiasm and cooperation for peace corresponding to our solidarity and sacrifice for war. Second, at the end of three years we find our peace-loving America spending more for old wars and new than Germany ever spent for its war machine—a strange outcome of a war against militarism! We actually spend ninety-three per cent of our national income for wars past and future. If a corporation spent that much of its earnings for insurance it would be regarded not only as insolvent, but imbecile; and the more so if the insurance did not insure. For the price of a front line battleship we could build and equip five state universities; a dreadnaught becomes obsolete in ten years, while a university grows old, gray and mellow with time—a city of the mind protecting the holy things of humanity. Third, the burden of debt and taxation bows us low, while the menace of industrial chaos and world bankruptcy stares us in the face. Millions are unemployed, and starvation stalks over vast stretches of the earth, leaving trails of skeletons in its path. Surely, by no stretch of words can such a situation be called practical!

A BETTER DAY

Happily a better day has dawned, a better mood, and, let us hope, a better mind. Today in the Arlington cemetery we lay to rest the body of an Unknown Soldier, symbol of all the anonymous heroism of the common people by which the war was won, and who now demand a stable world in which to live. Tomorrow a conference convened by the President to consider proposals for the limitation of armaments will open in Washington. Once more, in spite of disappointment, our hearts beat high with hope, and the old hurt and heartache of the world is felt anew. The sky is less cloudy; the world is more reasonable and less troubled by party rancor and personal revenge; the whisper of grief is subdued from a sob to a sigh. No doubt there will be cataleptic fits of nervous and excited nationalisms, but the pressure upon us of world facts gives hopes that something may be done to limit the competitive piling up of ships and guns, and the suspicions which such insanity excites.

For, behind the gold lace of the conference, behind its pomp and ceremony and parade, grim gray facts will stand in stolid array, and they must dictate the decisions. First is the fact that the world war cost the lives of ten millions of young men! No blurred cynicism, no diplomatic rhetoric can hide that terrible and terrifying fact. If only by some art, some power of insight and imagination, that procession could march before the mind of humanity! In August, 1917, I took part in the burial of five hundred and twenty-seven boys in one day, reading the Scriptures in the beautiful ritual of the English church. Today, if I close my eyes, I can see that picture—the long rows of silent figures, each with a cloth over it—and the scene will live in my heart as long as memory keeps its throne. Of course, we are bidden not to be sentimental about such "practical" matters, but I somehow think that those boys ought to have something to say today. A Danish historian estimates that forty million would now be living but for the war—among them those dream-children never now to be born, because their fathers gave their bodies to the shells on a thousand battlefields! If, like the writer of the Apocalypse, we could see "the dead, small and great, standing before God," surely, the hesitations of diplomacy and the fanaticisms of nationality would be forgotten!

ECONOMICS AND RIGHTEOUSNESS

Facts are the presence of God—physical facts, economic facts, no less than moral facts. If men will not listen though forty millions of the slain rise from the dead, it is permitted us to hope that they will take heed at the loss of two hundred billion dollars. Of course such figures mean nothing to us, because we cannot realize what they mean. They are like the figures employed by astronomers to estimate the bewildering distances of the heaven; but all mankind begins to feel what they mean in the economic prostration of the world! Thus, as is always true in the long last, by a divine pragmatism, the financial facts confirm the moral demands—the moral sense cooperating with the pocketbook—and that is the great hope that something may be done. As in the fight against intemperance little headway was made until the business world—first the railroads, and then other concerns—turned against the liquor trade, so today the fact of universal financial ruin commands attention. After all, it may be the mission of economic determinism to teach righteousness, as it is the function of religion to reveal values and meanings.

What do we expect from the conference—what is practical and possible? No one wishes to see the nations all at once disband their armies and scrap their navies; it would be dangerous and absurd. When the covenant of the League of Nations was signed by the King of England, I made the event the subject of a sermon in the City Temple. A member of parliament wrote me a letter suggesting a text, from the seventy-fourth Psalm: "Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." It was a perfect text, and I used it. So long as the corners of the earth are the habitations of violence, it would be folly to disarm entirely, leaving the city of man unfended. We must not expect everything all at once; but the greatest of all wars will have been fought in vain unless some move is made toward a common mind and an honorable understanding among nations. This is manifestly the will of God, if it is possible for man to read that Eternal Will in the facts, forces, ideas, and events of today, as the seers of old read the will of God for their times in the courses of history and the exegesis of its events.

OUR MINIMUM OF HOPE

Some of us will humbly thank God and take new heart if two things are done at the Washington conference. If more is proposed our gratitude will be the greater, but two things agreed upon will make a beginning worthy of thanksgiving. First, that in the matter of armaments we stop where we are and lay no further plans for increase. Surely we have guns enough, gases enough, ships enough for sea and sky. Second, if we stop the private manufacture of arms and ammunition for purposes of war. The second proposal is quite as important as the first, and if it is adopted it will surprise you to see how quickly many amiable men will lose their faith in war as a permanent factor in civilization. It was Mr. Asquith, in a memorable address in the Royal Albert Hall—speaking in his lucid, lawyer-like way—who first put his finger on this vital spot in the whole matter, and it needs to be emphasized. If his wisdom is obeyed, much of the poisonous propaganda—the most terrible weapon of the modern world—will be hushed, as it will no longer be profitable for "the few whose impious weal depends on the public woe" to fan the fires of hate and play upon the fears of men.

How can these things be done? It is not enough that a few high-minded men should assemble and confer. That is necessary; but their plans and programs will ultimately depend for their realization upon the moral, spiritual and economic pressure coming out of the heart and life of the people. It is impossible to overestimate the importance of this psychic background and atmosphere, if we are to counteract and overcome the subtle, brilliant, and tireless propaganda now so busy trying to create in Washington a psychology not unlike that which surrounded the Paris conference. Churches, colleges, the press, and all the agencies of righteousness must muster the moral insight and power of the nations, and bring an intelligent, vigilant, organized, and articulate public opinion to the service of sanity, goodwill, and practical proposals, if only to give the will to fellowship an opportunity to breathe. Without goodwill we are lost. The appeal to self-interest, to fear, to hate has shown itself to be futile and impracticable. Above all, by the grace of God, we must shake off the mood of apathy, born of dismay and despair, in which we have been living, and make the public law and peace of the world our personal concern. Things do not happen, they are brought about, and each of us can help to the measure of his influence and power!

THE CLOUD OF WITNESSES

When I am tempted to be cynical, I take down a book from a precious little library which I brought back as a treasure from England. It is made up of the poems, essays, and letters of the men in the trenches, and the brief, blotted memoirs of those who fell. The letters of Harold Chapin to his little boys tell of the aching homesickness of the men who foundered in the mud of Flanders. The essays of Donald Hankey reveal the unconscious religion of the boys in khaki, and as I turn his pages I recall the day we had tea together in July before he was killed in October. His winsome personality, his soft voice, his hesitating courtesy of address, his quiet words of faith—the very thought of whom is like "a foot-fall, always light, of one untimely gone away." Alan Seeger, who kept his "rendezvous with death" in a flaming town at midnight, Brooke, Sorley, Kilmer—to call their names is like reading a rosary of genius—these and other poets died fighting, and today we have no great poet to interpret and transfigure our tragedy, casting over the awful tide of human circumstance the white light of the Eternal! But, dying, they left one shining phrase, "Carry On," which should be the first command of the living! They were not cynics. They did not fear, or falter, or fail—how can we bow to the mud gods of fear or greed or hate in the presence of such a cloud of witnesses!

No, no! The opportunity is unequalled; the alternative is appalling. In letters of fire it is written before our eyes: Either we must learn or perish. Surely it is time to make a step forward, a gesture of goodwill, if nothing more, the while we make our own the old Greek prayer, which might have been written this morning: "From the murmur and subtlety of suspicion with which we vex one another, give us rest. Make a new beginning, and mingle again the kindred of the nations in the alchemy of love, and with some finer essence of forbearance and forgiveness temper our mind." But it must be only a beginning, for we dare not cease our "mental fight" until our humanity lives, or soon or late, as God meant that it should live, in a "frontierless and unfortified world," ruled by moral intelligence and practical goodwill.

If the conference in Washington fails—what then? If the isolation of America, the imperialism of Japan, the militarism of France, or something else not now predictable, should make agreement impossible or unfruitful—what then? Shall we sit by and see our civilization go down in blood and fire and ashes, as it surely will unless in some way we can stop the madness of the age? No! There is a way out. If worst comes to worst, the great English-speaking commonwealths must join hands and hold the world together! Together they can give a hand to Germany and lift her to her feet, bringing her wonderful genius once more to the service of the common good. Together they can stabilize Russia. Together they can save China from chaos. Together they can stop the slow crucifixion of Armenia which, next to the great war, is the most ghastly crime in modern history. If they join hands, no pirate can sail on any sea anywhere. Thank God we have one family of nations that love liberty, respect law, and have kept the peace between them for more than a hundred years!

Is Evolution Anti-Christian?

By John M. Coulter

THE belief that science is antagonistic to the Christian religion was very general among church people of a generation or two ago. The accumulating facts of science, and especially various conclusions based upon the facts, were thought to contradict established inferences from the statements of Scripture. This attitude toward science in general became most outspoken when Darwin announced his theory of organic evolution, for among the organisms involved was man, whose physical origin had been settled in the minds of the majority of Christians by the plain statement of Scripture.

Gradually the situation changed, and the hostile camps have become allies in a great cause. Religion has discovered that science is honestly searching for the truth, and science has discovered that the Christian religion has a scientific basis. It seems to us strange now that two groups, each searching for the truth in its own way, should ever have come into conflict. It was certainly unscientific to deny religious truth, just as it was irreligious to deny scientific truth. Truths are not contradictory. If claimed truths are contradictory, then the truth is not clear.

When I say the situation has changed, I do not mean to imply that all the representatives of religion and of science have declared an armistice, for in certain localities and with certain temperaments the old notion of the incompatibility of science and religion persists. But these are merely "hold-overs" from a former general situation. The whole tendency today is toward the cooperation of religion and science. When some "hold-over" flares out against facts that have been demonstrated, it is interesting psychologically, but not important from the standpoint of either science or religion.

RELIGION AND THEOLOGY

The first thing to make clear is that the impression that science and religion are in conflict arose from the confusion of religion and theology. In a certain sense, theology may be called a science, the science whose subject is God, and the great body of whose literature is the record of men's conclusions concerning God, which may fairly be called philosophical speculations. That such speculations have developed great diversity of opinion is evidenced by the existence of different church denominations. In the midst of clashing theologies, religion remains the same, for it deals, not with speculation, but with character, and its measure of character is conduct. That belief in the speculations of one theology rather than another is not essential to religion, is evidenced by the fact that from all these beliefs there have emerged lives full of pure and undefiled religion. It is evident, therefore, that the relation between science and dogmatic theology is in mind when science is thought to be in conflict with religion. If in their search for truth scientific men now and then discover facts that contradict certain conclusions of a speculative philosophy, is it to be wondered at, and are they to be regarded as irreligious, or even as attacking religion? About all there has been to the so-called conflict between science and religion is the setting of a discovered fact over against a speculation. This is no reflection on theology, for it is the noblest of subjects; but its speculations must stand or fall by discovered facts, just as do those of any other science.

The thoughtful Christian certainly appreciates the fact that the presentation of his religion must be adjusted to the increasing body of scientific truth. To hazard religion upon the issue involved in denying matters of definite experience is not to be thought of. In a scientific age the result would be to alienate the increasing thousands who have breathed the atmosphere of the modern laboratory, and to convert a powerful and helpful influence into a serious obstruction. One of the fundamental blunders of the old theological regime was its assumption of authority in connection with details of scientific thought. Grievous injury to the cause of Christianity has been done by ex cathedra statements in reference to the methods and doctrines of science by those who are recognized to be qualified to speak upon such subjects. For one to pass upon matters that belong to specialists in another field of investigation is to imperil his real message.

SUSPENDED JUDGMENT

It matters little what scientific theories are advanced or withdrawn. They are certainly never withdrawn because of ignorant opposition, but only on account of advance in knowledge. The overthrow of any scientific hypothesis that has been opposed by representatives of Christianity is never a vindication of that religion, but a triumph of scientific investigation. We must hold judgment in suspense, assured that if an hypothesis is false it will come to naught, and that if it is true no amount of opposition can withstand it. Any opinion based upon ignorance is essentially prejudiced and worthless, and must react unfavorably upon the cause it is claimed to represent. As Christians we must recognize in scientific investigation a very special field of work, whose announced results are to be received with respect and caution, and concerning the truth of which only further scientific investigation is competent to decide.

Having developed as a background the attitude of mind that Christians should maintain toward scientific investigation in general, we may consider the special subject of organic evolution, which has aroused more opposition from the representatives of theology than any other scientific subject. Since Darwin's name seems to be the only one associated with this field of investigation in the minds of the uninformed, it is important to correct this misapprehension.

DARWIN'S THEORY

There had been theories of evolution before that of Darwin, notably that of Lamarck, but they had not been taken seriously by the representatives of religion. Darwin's theory, however, came at what may be regarded as a psychological moment. The scientific world was ready for it, and took it up with such enthusiasm that it attracted universal attention. As a consequence, a so-called "warfare" between science and theology began, and the verbal conflicts were often sharp. There have been other theories of evolution since, but the name of Darwin is so associated with the original conflict that the theological opponents of evolution seem to think that he is chiefly responsible for the idea. Moreover, when the later theories were announced, the conflict had subsided, and science and theology seemed to have entered upon amicable relations, each convinced that the other was honestly searching for the truth. For some reason, however, the old conflict seems to have been revived in certain quarters, and we are hearing again that evolution is anti-Christian. The most obvious fact to one who believes in both evolution and Christianity is that there is an entire misunderstanding as to the facts and claims of evolution as it has been developed by the more recent work. A brief outline of the history of evolution may serve to correct this misunderstanding.

The idea of organic evolution is as old as our record of men's thoughts, for the old mythologies are full of it. No modern man, therefore, is responsible for the idea. Until a little over one hundred years ago, however, organic evolution was simply a speculation, with no basis of scientific work. Then observations of plants and animals began, and the facts uncovered made some thinking men conclude that evolution might be a fact, and not merely a speculation. As a result, they began scientific work, and evolution became a science. As observation became more critical, such facts as the following became obvious.

In the original classification of plants and animals, men had rigidly defined the different species. When more extensive observations were made in the field, numerous intergrades began to be found. The species, as defined, seemed to intergrade freely. In other words, the pigeon-hole arrangement, with rigid partitions, did not express the facts. It became evident that species had been defined by man rather than by nature. Some were distinct, but many intergraded. It ought to be realized that a species is the conception of man, and fluctuates as do human opinions.

The next observations suggesting that evolution might be a fact had to do with what was called the "power of adaptation." It was observed that plants and animals respond to changes in environment, often in a striking way.

As technique developed, and the internal structures of plants and animals became known, it often happened that rudimentary structures were found, which never developed to a functioning stage, but which occurred fully developed in related forms. For example, it was found that in the developing parrot a set of embryo teeth begins, but never matures. The inference was natural that those structures had been functional in the ancestors, but had been abandoned by some of their descendants. In these days it has become the habit to call these rudimentary structures "vestiges." Plants and animals are full of these vestiges.

After this succession of facts, there came a revelation which convinced more men that evolution is a fact than any evidence that preceded. The geologists had begun to uncover that wonderful succession of plants and animals from the earliest geological periods to the present time. They saw in the oldest periods forms unlike any now existing; they saw gradual changes with each succeeding horizon; they saw a steady approach to forms like those of today, until by insensible gradations the present flora and fauna were ushered in.

Finally, men began to realize what they had been doing for centuries in domesticating animals and plants. They had been changing them so much by the methods of culture that in many cases the wild originals could not be recognized.

THE FACT OF EVOLUTION

In the presence of such an array of facts is it to be wondered at that certain men began the serious, scientific study of evolution? The so-called "authors" of the idea of evolution were really the men who attempted to explain the fact of evolution. Their explanations were not demonstrations, but inference based on observation. This method reached its culmination in Darwin's explanation.

As facts multiplied, however, the current explanations were found to be inadequate to explain some of them. This led to a general misconception of the situation by the uninformed public. For example, more intensive study developed the fact that Darwin's explanation did not always explain. His name is so identified with evolution in public thought, that this criticism of the universal application of his conclusions was taken to mean that the theory of evolution was being abandoned. The real situation is that every proposed explanation may prove inadequate, and yet the fact of evolution is to be explained.

At the beginning of the present century, however, the science of evolution entered upon a new epoch. This was ushered in by the work of DeVries, who introduced the experimental study of evolution. The problem was to discover whether one species actually produces another one. It had been inferred that it does, but inference is not demonstration. As a result of experimental work, many species have been observed to originate in this way, both in plants and animals. That one species can produce another is no longer an inference, but it is a fact that has been demonstrated repeatedly. Evolution, therefore, is a fact; it is quite a different question whether the proposed explanations are adequate. It must be remembered, however, that while the fact of evolution is established, the whole story of evolution remains an inference. It is clear that our conceptions of religion must include this fact.

ORGANIC EVOLUTION

It is interesting to note that inorganic evolution did not arouse serious theological objection. Continual change of the earth's surface through geological time was accepted because it was obvious, a fact that could not be contradicted; and yet it taught that progressive evolution is the method of nature in developing the world. Even organic evolution might not have aroused much opposition, if the inferences in connection with it had not included man. When inferences in the field of evolution were the only results, it was natural to extend inference to the evolution of the plant and animal kingdoms, and this involved the origin of man. In these days there is no such attempt, for experimental demonstration of the evolution of the whole series of organic forms, culminating in man, is clearly impossible. Biologists, therefore, are no longer interested in the whole story of evolution, but only in discovering experimentally how one species may produce another one.

The conclusion of the whole matter is that since evolution is an established fact, it cannot be anti-Christian. The alternative need not be considered, for it is just as clear that Christianity has a scientific basis in the nature of man, and that its results have been demonstrated as clearly as those of experimental evolution. The fact is that these two great fields, so far from being contradictory, are mutually helpful. In this way the revelation of God in nature has supplemented his revelation through Christ. I find nothing more helpful to the student and leader of men than a clear appreciation of the working of evolution as exemplified in plants and animals. Evolution teaches that progress is gradual; that a better is progress toward the best; that sudden radical changes are not to be expected; that the future has its roots in the present. It teaches that revolutions are not the ordinary way of working, and that reformation may be very slow. It forbids unreasonable demands upon the individual or upon society, and discountenances the usual type of reformer. It shows that there have been no universal catastrophes and new creations, but that the present has gradually evolved from the past, and that the future will appear in the same gradual way. Furthermore, it shows that advance in a certain direction may not be uniform, for there are periods of apparent recession, as well as those of more rapid advance. The results are only apparent in the large view over long periods of time, when the tossing back and forth of surface waves disappears, and the steady advance of the slow-moving current becomes apparent.

SWEEP OF HISTORY

Perhaps most important of all, it teaches that man is a poor interpreter of individual events, and has no means of deciding whether they contribute to advance or not. Hence it must lead to cautious and charitable judgments; but at the same time it supplies a strong ground of confidence that there must be eventual progress. Some of the minor details of evolution may be useful to the pessimist, but its whole sweep justifies broad optimism. It is certainly true that the message of Christianity must not be imperiled by an ignorant contradiction of demonstrated facts.

It is the Christian claim that God has revealed himself to man not merely in the words of Scripture, but also in the works of nature. It would seem likely, therefore, that the revelation of Scripture is supplementary to that of nature, containing further but not contradictory revelation. It would seem more logical, therefore, to read our knowledge of nature into our interpretation of Scripture, than to interpret nature by our conceptions of Scripture. The frequent attempts to interpret natural phenomena by conceptions derived from Scripture have so often ended disastrously that a reversal of the process might be suggested. That these disasters do not involve the Scriptures simply demonstrates that the conclusions were unessential.

As an illustration it might be cited how common and painful were the efforts to show the perfect adaptation of everything in nature. The most trivial anatomical parts of plants and animals were held to be perfect, in the sense that they could not be better adapted to the work immediately at hand. Since it has been found that there is no such thing as perfect adaptation among organisms, and furthermore, that perfect adaptation means stagnation, for it removes the essential factor in progress, not only have the old views been corrected, but a very large new thought has been introduced.

Again, the argument from immediate design was once very strongly urged; but when it was discovered that the vast majority of "designs," so far as plants and animals are concerned, are failures, the old argument was dropped; but in its place there came evidence of a design so noble and far-reaching that those once cited seemed trivial.

The statements made in reference to evolution illustrate the attitude of all the sciences. They show how a man trained in science can look past the surface ripples of religion that seem to be running in every direction and getting nowhere, and can recognize the deep oceanic current that moves steadily onward. He disregards the ripples and realizes that it is the deep current that is destined to modify the temperature of continents. In short, the scientific mind, so far from being irreligious, is open to the truth; it seeks for trustworthy evidence in reference to it; if necessary, it strives to strip off the husks of human opinion that it may get at the kernel; and when found, it accepts it with ardor.

Russia's Experiment In Vital Democracy

By John Ralph Voris

ONE cannot spend six weeks in Russia without becoming conscious that there is a driving power there of some kind. A strong, almost fanatical interest is taken by the leaders, whether they are in Moscow or in the provinces, not only in their own special work but in the soviet project as a whole. They work at all hours of day and night, apparently never resting. The legal day for office workers is six hours, but the leaders with whom we came in contact were to be found at their desks from eleven until five and in the evening until four a. m.

This is not due to the fact that these leaders receive high salaries, or rich food, or luxurious quarters. They are not driven to do their work by special gratuities of this kind. The young official with whom I became particularly well acquainted was acting commissar of an important bureau. Yet his salary was but 120,000 rubles per month, or about $3.60 in our money. He had a room in a good hotel where lived many other office workers, for this hostelry, taken over by the government, as were all others, was devoted to the living quarters for the workers in the labor department. His room was similar in size and furnishings to the average room of an American office man in a Y. M. C. A. dormitory. In addition to his salary and his room, he receives one meal a day, bread, a little butter and a tiny bit of sugar, some tea and coffee and occasional other small supplies. He was supposed to receive his clothes. But he was wearing the suit he had worn when he returned to Russia from England nearly a year before!

A KIND OF MISSIONARY ZEAL

The acting commissar of labor, whom I saw in his own home late one Saturday afternoon, was living with his family in three rooms assigned to him in an apartment in a large "hotel." Although a leading official, he lived no better as to housing than the average skilled laboring man in America. As to food, no one has sufficient food, according to American standards. That these people are living in luxury is a myth. It is not what they get out of it in material rewards that makes them interested. Nor is it the spirit of the game as in a big business concern in America. It is more like missionary zeal.

There is a moral earnestness, a sincerity of purpose, and an intensity of desire that comes very near to being real spiritual idealism, or I am far from the mark. It is different from the enthusiasm that the usual office holder in America has for his job. He is proud of doing it well as a matter of professional technique. But he is not a zealot. In Russia they come near being zealots. While this state is possibly not so normal or wholesome, yet if we are seeking to be fair we will find something very fine in it. It gives to their leaders, no matter how shabby or hungry they may be, a consciousness of dignity. I felt this to be particularly the case with the presidents of two of the famine-stricken provinces with whom I talked.

One of the interesting phenomena that soon makes itself apparent to the understanding mind, is the attitude of most of the leaders toward social and educational ideals and methods. This is one of the significant things in the present regime. In America we have certain professional workers who are specialists in social work. In national, state and municipal organization we have these educational leaders, who know the technique of their profession as no similar workers do in the world, I assume. And there may be much voluntary work in behalf of the various causes. But the officials are usually interested in this kind of work because it is their job. In Russia all officials seem to be interested in social ideals. It is not a departmental fad or task; it is a governmental devotion. Especially will they wax eloquent over their present and their proposed work for children.

SOCIAL IDEALISM

I should venture the guess that this expression of social idealism on the part of government officials is to be similarly found nowhere else in the world. I do not want this to be a smoke-screen to hide the faults of economic organization, nor do I believe that enthusiasm for social ideals can take the place of efficiency in simple educational management. But there is something quite fine, nevertheless, and all who place moral earnestness above materialism cannot afford to sneer, even though they may pity. Let me say it again. That which in America is a departmental and professional development in social service, education and philanthropy is in the mind of the Russian government the dominant thing, towering above political organization, military development, and economic failure or success. Here in America it is efficient and highly technical; there it is only in the kindergarten stage. There it consists of plans and hopes, not achievements. It is so thoroughly a dominating zeal that it is a weakness. There is a tendency to rely upon social idealism and education rather than basically and immediately upon economic soundness.

Judging from the practice as I observed it, I should say that the theory in Russia is this: Every person should have and must have the right and opportunity to receive the best possible training for citizenship and personal development the nation, that is, the government can give. One gets the impression that education is placed first in the mind not only of national commissars but of local officials as well. This ideal seems to be trickling out into the furthestmost regions of the country. Since the government is "social," all educational plans are tinged with the social flavor. Since the system of organization is centralized and paternalistic, educational efforts are throbbing with propagandist conceptions. Since the en-ture leadership is overfond of the new, the radical and the theoretical, the schemes are marked by a divergence from conventional methods. There has been little money to spend, and few school supplies have been available. It seems raw and inefficient.

EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM

On the other hand there have been sufficient achievements to make possible a partial valuation of the scheme as a whole. Raw, crippled, inefficient though the whole program has been, yet it is big, tremendously big in its potentialities. To understand this program sympathetically and to criticise intelligently one must keep the background of the Russian educational problem in mind—the ignorance of the masses of workingmen and peasants. This problem, which is the center and core of the educational task, stands out above all other problems of the Russian people, when one once grants that the people must be clothed, housed, and fed. With this almost insurmountable problem in mind, we are ready to face the fundamental and immediate educational ideal of the present regime, namely, to make Russia a literate instead of an illiterate nation. The fundamental ultimate task is to make Russia an intelligent nation. To make her intelligent she must first be able to read and write. But in the meantime, while making inroads into illiteracy as fast as possible, there are some ways of bringing enlightenment to those who cannot read.

There are many tools which the government has set itself to use at this task—including books, lectures, exhibits, classes, posters, etc. The most apparent and the most effective superficial method of reaching the people is through the medium of the poster. People can read posters when they cannot read books or papers. So apparently the country is poster mad. At first blush one exclaims that the cause of her poverty is right here—Russia has spent all her gold on printers' ink! They are everywhere—these posters—throughout the country. They thrust their glowing messages at you from every vantage point—station walls, inside and out, empty store windows, public buildings. They are usually done in screaming colors, with red a dominant note. Many are crude and extreme, with little appeal to the cultivated æsthetic sense, but others are of rare strength and beauty. Indeed some of the great artists of Russia have been drafted into this field. In its better aspects this art rises higher than anything of its kind I have ever seen. The messages are so clear that he who runs may read. Most of them will penetrate into the most limited mentality.

POSTERS, POSTERS EVERYWHERE

They cover many themes, the mention of some of which will not only indicate the value of this medium, but will show the social intent of all the other educational mediums as well. One's first and superficial impression is that this visual propaganda is in behalf of the present form of government. Many of the posters deal with the downfall of the capitalistic regime, and the necessity of workers and peasants uniting to overthrow the bourgeoisie. Probably most of the earlier posters dealt with this theme.

There are fewer now. But there is one constructive note even in this destructive propaganda, namely, the unity of workers and peasants. This idea of unity still runs through most of the publicity.

As one begins to study these flaming messages (we brought many home with us) one begins to see what my soviet friend in Moscow insisted upon—that most of the present effort has nothing to do with the bolshevist propaganda as such. It is now the education of the people in essential facts relative to their every day life. The first essential is health. There were dozens of printed posters at every station appealing to the people to drink only boiled water (of which there is plenty at every railroad station) to kill the fly, beware insects, keep clean. There were painted posters ten feet high warning against methods that breed cholera. The people are compelled to see and understand. In a land of cholera, tuberculosis and malaria, the question of sanitation and of personal cleanliness is all important. This nation-wide effort of the government, which so evidently had the cooperation of local soviets, is very similar to our state and national Red Cross, and other health campaigns. By placing a new valuation by the government upon the individual, it causes the individual to value himself and others. Life has been terribly cheap in all that region. One of the basic efforts of all education is to value life.

CONCILIATORY IN TONE

With the intent of saving life, and at the same time of assisting transportation, there were posters urging the people not to ride on the tops of or under railroad cars, and not to travel unless necessary, because it was dangerous to themselves and injurious to the nation's welfare. It seemed rather futile in view of the vast multitudes of fear-driven, gray-clad droves of beings who were fleeing from the famine region, but it was an honest effort anyway, and of course had been there before those famine floods had come. And, by the way, those posters told in their tone, a whole story. They were conciliatory and friendly. They were comradely. Nothing of the autocratic, "the public be damned" policy—with the exception of damning capitalism! They respected the power of the people.

A third group of posters urged personal education, showing that the peasants and workers must be enlightened in order to rule, and explaining how they could learn to read and write and thus begin to secure knowledge. A fourth class, exceedingly well done and interesting, urged the workers to conserve and develop the natural resources of the country, its forests, mines and farms. These posters urged work, and cooperation in work. They showed how the peasants must produce in order that the workers may manufacture. Still another lot of designs featured the care of children. Here they are at their best. There were old posters which had called the nation to support the government in the conflict against Wrangel and against Deneikin, while new ones begged the peasants to conserve grain and give it to the famine-stricken districts.

A second method of popular education is the newspaper.

Russians ordinarily never had newspapers, even though they could read. In the past the villages have been without news, except such as came through word of mouth. But now the newspaper goes to every tiny village, which means that their messages can reach the whole people, for all live in cities or villages. The chances are that there is someone in every village who can read. The papers are posted on a public bulletin board where all can read without cost. We saw these public papers first in Tiflis and Batoum; then in Moscow, and at every railroad station.

LIGHT THROUGH NEWSPAPERS

These papers are all printed by the government, either at Moscow, or at a local center. They are not "free." Their news is inspired. There are probably no opposition papers in the whole land. They are filled with biased propaganda. But nevertheless they do take news to the peasants and workers who never had such an opportunity to learn about things outside their villages before. These papers, like the posters, deal not only with happenings, but they seek to stir the minds of the people. They treat of social and educational ideals. They tell, for example, of what the various provinces are doing in their work for children. They call upon the people for their support in aiding the starving Volga region. The most heart-breaking appeal I have read was not at all the appeal of Russia's committee to other nations, or the stories of our writers, but the plea to Russians along the railroad from Rostov to Moscow to help their brothers in the famine areas. It was a call to the "hungry to feed the starving," to use out of their context the words of Kameneff. It needs little imagination, and a small bit of fairness, and a recalling that Russia's villages have been in darkness, to recognize the vastness of this project of spreading light to the people by means of the printed page everywhere in that great nation. One can almost see the expansion of the minds of people who have hitherto been limited to the small happenings of their tiny world as they read about the rest of their great federation, and realize that they have a place in that nation's work.

TRAIN EXHIBITS AND OPEN FORUMS

A third educational method is the train method, and with it the presentation of dramatics and lectures. We passed many trains of this order—a dozen such, I should say. They were usually painted on the outside with wierd, futuristic designs, after the fashion of earlier radicalism. The full trains would cover many subjects: health first, agriculture next, the care of children never omitted, then self-development through reading, or art or the drama. Ordinarily these trains carry a bath coach, taking them into the smallest towns along the railroads, and they have movies, and a library. Lecturers accompany the exhibits and they, with the dramatic companies, give entertainments in the meeting centers of the towns. The aim is, very evidently, to take the best that science, art and education have now to give to the humblest workers or peasants.

Another method, combined much of the time with the train exhibit, though not dependent upon that highly specialized endeavor, is the conducting of open forums and lectures in the villages. Our party attended one of these gatherings. It was held in the town-hall of the village, the total population of which would not be over three hundred. Possibly two hundred and fifty well-behaved people were present. They sat perfectly still during the evening. There was no evidence of disorder. Our Russian doctor, who followed the exercises with keen interest, said afterward that these same people had formerly to be watched and almost compelled to be quiet during any meetings of this kind during the old regime. Now they came with no disorder. No guards were needed. Their hats were off. There was no smoking! They owned this themselves, our doctor pointed out. The lecturer spoke for half an hour. He told of the way in which the government was trying to carry on its work; why cooperation was required; what was needed to solve the famine problem. He introduced one of our party as a visitor from America. Then came a play given by a small party of dramatists whose car had been attached in front of ours. All of this in a tiny village of perhaps sixty huts, in the very heart of Russia.

SOLDIERS AND STUDENTS

It is the ideal of the educational department to establish libraries throughout the country, but lack of print paper is one good excuse for the failure to go far with this to date. However, there have been published by the government printing press many very cheap editions of classics of all nations, and these have been sold at cost, or have been used widely in class work. It is rather a "high-brow" list that they are planning to print, covering as it does history, science, anthropology, art, music, fiction, etc. It indicates either an extraordinary hunger for good things, or an extraordinary desire to feed the masses on the best. I don't know which it is—perhaps both.

But the greatest opportunities for the use of books and the giving of lectures, are with two groups: the soldiers of the red army and the students in the colleges and schools. Of these two, the first field is infinitely more important.

The educational work in the red army is the present hope of Russia. The department of education (not the military leaders, so much as the educational) has deliberately set out to make a literate army—and is succeeding. Here are the youth of Russia, to the number of perhaps two millions. They, like their fathers, have in the past had no hope of an education. Now they are getting it. It is absolutely compulsory. They cannot evade it! The red guard on our train—an educated boy of gentle birth—was enthusiastic over the system and its achievements. We talked with high officials about the process. I saw class after class at Moscow, gathered for lectures. We were proud of our effort in our own army, both before and after the armistice, and the need was inconsequential as compared with the illiteracy in Russia. Here in Russia is a national effort, in an immense army, deliberately to train the youth of the nation to read and to write.

This is one of the most interesting and valuable pieces of constructive educational work in the world today. It is an achievement of which the most advanced nation could be proud.

Although many of the college teachers have been drafted into the army schools, yet the colleges are open, and crowded with students. But the emphasis here at the present time is upon the simpler needs. Presumably the higher educational institutions have temporarily suffered. If so, none would regret it more than the educational leaders of Russia. But they have their eyes on the broad education of the masses of people, rather than upon specialists. The education of children is a part of the general work for children to which I shall later refer.

CONSTRUCTIVE SOCIAL EDUCATION

If the soviet government accomplished nothing other than this educational achievement and then passes away, history will give to it credit for one of the most astonishing pieces of constructive social work ever accomplished on a national scale. The greatest fundamental need of any people is enlightenment. The secret of a democratic government is likewise intelligence. It looks as if the soviet leaders were not trying to keep themselves in power by maintaining an ignorant people. This educational plan is the most important of the social schemes of the government, aside from the children's homes. There are no societies for charity in a plan that seeks to discard the idea of charity and philanthropy. But there are many schemes for the socialization of the people. Of these the most apparent now is the establishment of social centers, or club rooms, in nearly every railroad station and in many towns. We saw many of these social rooms at the railroad stations. They remind one of the temporary club rooms for our soldiers during the war, possessing a piano, tables for writing, some books, chairs; a place for loafing and a study. The walls are covered with posters.

Moscow has many similar clubs, of various kinds. The many departments of the government have their social organizations, each of which has its social center. The members take great pride in their organizations and their meeting places. The artists boldly announce their club with painted poster effects covering the walls outside. We saw the meeting place of the "imaginationists"—the futurist group of poets—who come together daily to read their writings aloud. Each department group is to have its cooperative store. The government is seemingly seeking to encourage fraternal relationships, projecting a doctrine of social self-expression rather than inhibition. There are many more nearly fundamental plans along the line of what we would call national social service, such as old age pensions, steadiness of employment, stated periods of service to municipality or state, and the like, but the failure to develop economic soundness has left these schemes in an abortive state, and I am more concerned with actual achievements that I could see than with the merely theoretical program of the government.

THE CHILD AT THE CENTER

Now, turning to the care of children, to which I have referred a number of times. We came in contact with this social fact on every side. The leaders unconsciously let it slip into their plans, even though they were talking about foreign relations, or the causes of the famine. The province officials told us of their efforts to feed the children of the famine districts, of which there were 59,000 in Samara alone, or to transport them to other provinces. We saw children's soup kitchens in Samara, Syzrin and Moscow. We passed many "children's homes"; in fact at Czaritzen we noticed "Children's Home No. 32," and learned that there were nearly a hundred here. One of the Friends' mission workers, a young woman from Australia, who had worked in central Europe all winter, but had been studying their operations in Moscow for two weeks, could scarcely talk about anything else, even there at famine stricken Samara, than the "remarkable work" for children in Moscow, as she had seen it and had learned of it from other workers. These Friends' mission representatives assuredly possess a deep, human, non-professional love for children. The only glimpse I had at Samara of another Friends' worker was in a box-car filled with little "kiddies," packed in like sardines. Disregardful of vermin and disease, this woman, a professional social worker, endured whatever hardships her children underwent. Lest I may not refer to the matter again, let me say that any funds which the American people give to the Friends' mission in Russia are well invested.

Indubitably the present Russian regime in its social plans is making the children the very center. First of all as to their housing: The largest and best homes in every city, and the "dachets," or summer places outside of Moscow and the other large cities, have been commandeered, not for the officials, as we have surmised in America, but for children's homes. We saw this first in Tiflis, Georgia, and we noted it in every city we visited. The idea is evidently to give to the children the very best protection possible. Take the question of food: The children are to be fed, whether the adults have food or not. In Moscow the children alone had milk. Not even prominent government officials were an exception to this provision. The children were given all the milk available. Their sugar ration was greater than that of adults.

TEACHERS OF ABILITY

The children are given the best possible leaders. These are usually women who have been teachers, or others who have talent and education. Many young women who under the old regime led lives of luxury and ease, are now doing something useful, for all are expected to work. The Australian Friend, referred to above, told me an interesting incident in this connection. She had been in contact with one of the children's homes in a former summer residence of a wealthy family. The daughter of this family had been placed in charge of the children when the home was taken over for the purpose. She had never done anything of the kind before. But she was wildly enthusiastic over her work. She would not let one of her children be transferred to other leadership. She was happy that her home could be used for this purpose. She was decidedly angry at the government, however, because it had taken so many of her pictures down to the central museum. It was an outrage to take them from her walls, for the children needed them! My informant said that this young woman did not want to go back to the old regime.

That the education of these children is not scientific and thorough must appear on the surface at once. For one thing the teachers are all hungry, and they cannot do good work with no reserve energy. This fact the Australian girl pointed out. And then they lack books and other supplies, and training and supervision. The whole plan is new. But my own observation at Tiflis, where the Russian women are showing a teaching talent that led our larger commission to extravagant praise, bears out my general impression that the children are being taught to read, write, and speak correct Russian and French, and often English; to sew and model and paint, and make things with their hands; to play together and to know something about the simpler facts of history. They are under good, even brilliant leadership. They are gay, filled with life and charmingly dressed in the cheapest of made-over clothes.

The Russian children that I saw were a source of wonder to me. Light-haired, beautiful little creatures, with sparkling eyes and dancing feet, they impressed one as coming from a long line of favored people. But these children were of the bourgeoisie, largely. Yet the little children of the peasants, undernurtured, ragged, unkempt though they were, were children, after all, just like average children from the foreign sections of an American metropolis.

Practically all the children in the cities are now in these homes. First, there are the orphans, who live in the homes all the time; then those who remain in the schools, as they would in boarding schools, returning home occasionally; and then those who come in daily from their homes. We have had the story that all children are taken away from parents and become the property of the state. This is untrue. The germ of fact in the canard is this: the homes are there, available always for the children. Parents can place their children in the schools for as long or as short a time as they wish, without cost.

A BOLSHEVIST VIRTUE

In addition to the homes, there are recreation centers in the country (as in the mountains outside of Tiflis), playgrounds, hospitals and clinics. I recall seeing an exhibit in one of the windows of the educational departments at Moscow, showing pictures of actual work of this kind in behalf of children at various points throughout the country. The village children do not yet have these advantages, but there has been for them no retrogression from past privileges, for they have had none. In a land of hunger and cold, of economic desolation, there is something worth while in this achievement in service to little children. If the bolshevists have any virtues whatever, or if all their characteristics but one are vices, here is one virtue—their ideals for children. Here again we see the giving of value to the individual life, especially the life on which the future of the nation depends.

Unless I am misguided by my impressions, the Russian people are inherently responsive to social idealism. They give themselves to cooperation, to the feeling of solidarity, and to social sacrifice as few other peoples do. They are not individualists. The cooperative societies promoted for years before the revolution, and represented in the early revolution by the menshevist movement (so derided by the bolshevists in their rawer stages) had been developed further in Russia than in any other country. Those of us who have been interested in this expression of the democratic instinct have for years looked to Russia, rather than to England, while in the United States we were far behind in this development. The soviet government frowned upon the cooperatives as savoring of too mild a brew for them. But there has been a change in their attitude, and the cooperatives are coming back again. When I was in Moscow there were numerous cooperative stores, and others were opening up.

I have referred previously to the communes in the Russian villages. Russia has been communistic for generations. Her people in such villages own their land in common. They find it not at all difficult similarly to own cattle, horses, or tractors. The Russian people seem to be willing to give up their individualistic independence for the sake of the small group, or the state, as do few other civilized peoples. I found examples of this characteristic in the housing, the food, and the dreams of the present leaders.

It seems to me that the people over there are more willing to serve the state than most of us are here. Perhaps I am giving more credit to all classes over there than the conditions would warrant. Possibly my necessarily superficial contact leads me to a roseate view. But unless I am decidedly wrong, there is at least a modicum of truth in my view, and if there is that little, even, it helps us to understand how Russia may be able to give the world an example of vitally social democracy.

The Seeker After God

THERE was a dreamer once, whose spirit trod
Unnumbered ways in thwarted search for God:
He stirred the dust on ancient books; he sought
For certain light in what the teachers taught;
He took his staff and went unto the Wise,
And deeper darkness fell about his eyes;
He lived a hermit and forebore his food,
And God left visitless his solitude;
He wrapped himself in prayer night after night
And mocking demons danced across his sight.
Resigned at last to Him he could not find,
He turned again to live among mankind,—
And when from man he no more stood apart,
God, on that instant, visited his heart!"

THE night when heaven bent low
To kiss the earth,
And, lo, a child was born.

ARTHUR B. RHINOW.

Is France Militaristic?

A CORRESPONDENT writes as follows: "I am firmly convinced that distrust and fear of Germany—which I believe are well founded—are at the bottom of French policy, and that if France had assurance of safety her apparent militarism would vanish. It has been reported that the Germans are not paying such heavy taxes as are the French and English, that the wealthy class is not paying its share, that the government is carrying a horde of unnecessary employes and deliberately heading toward bankruptcy, while huge individual fortunes are being piled up. We read that the medical faculty of the University of Königsberg, on the occasion of the Tannenberg celebration, bestowed the title 'Doctor Honoris Causa' on Field Marshall Leudendorff as the hero "who with the sharp blows of his unconquered sword protected the German people from the crowd of booty-hungry enemies." Until this arrogant spirit gives way to a sincere desire to make reparation for wanton injury, can the German nation be trusted? I should like very much to believe that the German nature has so changed as to be worthy of trust."

* * *

Is the German Government Sincere?

A fundamental question involved in the above is that of the sincerity of the present republican government of Germany. We were convinced by our investigations last summer that it is a sincerely republican government, convinced that the only way to get a start back into the confidence of the world lay through honest efforts to live up to the stipulations of the treaty of peace. Our convictions have now been confirmed by no less an authority than Premier Briand of France who certainly cannot be accused of much bias or tenderness toward them. In his great address at the Washington conference, defending French policy, he said: "There is a Germany composed of noble, disinterested workers, who want to be fair and re-establish Germany among decent nations. This Germany we want to help." Just before sailing for America, he said he had found Chancellor Wirth a sincere man and declared unequivocally that "the undertakings entered upon by the present German government have been fulfilled." Again in his conference address he said: "We have one part of Germany that is for peace, a part who have had enough of this war—who have had enough of war altogether—and who want to settle down to the pursuits of industry and peace."

Dr. Rathenau, minister of reparations, said to the writer in August that while the Germans regarded the total assessment as indemnity rather than reparations, they accepted the debt of reparations as just and asked for the present at least no repeal of the total assessments but only for the ways and means whereby they could make payments without bankruptcy. He added: "We can never hope for any revision of the total indemnity until we have proved to the allies that we are honestly attempting to pay." Chancellor Wirth said to the German people: "A nation which honestly and sincerely displays its good will, and a government whose word can be absolutely believed, must regain the world's confidence."

* * *

Is the Old Germany Dead?

Premier Briand, as does our correspondent, pointed to the old Germany, saying: "But there are others who learned nothing from the war—they keep all the ambitions of the Hohenzollerns. That Germany we live beside"; and he added, "We have witnessed several attempts to return to a certain state of things." It is this old German war party that France fears. It is in Germany, unconvinced and unshriven. The major question is whether or not it is a menace and if so how best to deal with it.

We believe it is a menace. During our recent visit we found that it is powerful in its influences, but we believe also that the first mainstay against it lies in supporting the present republican government. In other words, if the old spirit attempts to come back it will not be by an attack upon France but by an attack upon the present government. The renewal of an attack upon France could come only after Germany had gone through another internal revolution. That revolution would be prolonged and possibly bloody, for the working classes are determined that it shall never come back, and the Sparticides would welcome its coming as a means of bringing on a radical revolution. They say frankly that it would bring millions to their banners for "a real revolution" and that they would welcome it.

There is just one danger, said men of several parties to us, and that is in such economic ruin and industrial chaos that the people would turn to the "man on horseback," as they have always done in other revolutions toward democracy; look back into French history, they say, for illustrations. It is possible that the very terms of the treaty may bring on such disaster and give the old party of "blood and iron," of which Leudendorff is a leader, its chance. Many of the officers of the late armies, many men in the civil service, a large number of the men of great wealth and the professors who taught German youth the philosophy of Kultur are for a return of the regime that "made Germany great," as they call it; but the working class, who compose one-half or more of the entire population, and millions of the farmers, professional and business men are against its return. Both the militarists and the communists cast smaller votes in the last election than in the first after the war.

Is France Militaristic?

Woodrow Wilson is quoted as having recently said to a friend, "Another war will soon be upon us. It will be caused by the policy of France." The Italian daily, "Epoca," says: "There is only one threatening army in Europe—namely, the French." It calls M. Briand's picture of eight million trained Germans and untold millions of Russians a fantasy and reminds us that "France has a monopoly upon the iron of Europe" and that she has a half-million mobilized men in the Polish army as well as her own half-million. From leaders of all parties in England we heard nothing this summer but concern over France's militarism. One man who is a favorite with many for the next premier said frankly that if France continues her present policy it is quite within the possibilities that there may be an alliance between England and Germany within the next fifteen years. Another, a member of Parliament and a frequent representative on continental commissions, said: "The seat of militarism has moved from Wilhelmstrasse to Quai d'Orsay, and militarism looks the same to us in the one place as the other." "The French people are in a state of trepidation," said a keen Englishman in Paris whose business it is to interpret French events for an English daily, "and the military party are taking advantage of it to thrust their policies into the government."

"Vorwaerts," the spokesman of the present German government, warns that France's "heckling" of Germany is strengthening the militarists and says that if it continues there is a possibility of a monarchist revival that will overthrow the republic. It says, "the only real disarmament is a disarmament of the spirit, and this applies particularly to the French," and adds, "the German workingman never wants to see war again, but injustice and a search for vengeance is a false foundation upon which to base a peace structure."

France is acknowledging her own overt military precaution in claiming that she is rapidly demobilizing her army and in promising to cut down the period of military training. If Germany is building up, as the Germanophobes claim, then she should instead add to both. The fear of the French people can be readily understood after five years of such shock and ruin as she has experienced, and it can also be comprehended how those who believe in force and nothing but force can take advantage of that fear. A French poilu who had been in the fighting army for four years remarked to me, "Our government is the real danger of Europe."

* * *

Has the German Changed His Nature?

Our correspondent says he would like very much to believe that the German had so changed his nature as to be trusted. Germans are just like other humans. Many of them were against war before it came but the power they tolerated was for it; many millions are against it now. They have learned from a terrible lesson. On the second anniversary of the Revolution, 60,000 persons marched in Berlin under the banner "Never War Again" and hundreds of thousands looked on the procession. We wonder if such an anti-war demonstration could be held in Paris. The old military party has not changed its nature nor its purpose. The Leudendorffs call the republican government weak and cowardly because it signed the treaty and denounce all democracy as such. They denounce the republicans for attempting to pay the reparations and promise that they will not if given power. Nor has the French militarist learned. He wants to take Germany to the Rhine and believes in nothing but force. He has already denuded her of iron, denied her raw materials, insulted her with colored troops of occupation and taken Silesian territory in spite of the plebiscite and the promise to abide by it. Of course the German would have done the same—that is the spirit of militarism, but it wrecks the world without respect to nationality.

It is not possible to say "the German thinks this or that." There are all sorts of opinions and parties in Germany. The militarist thinks one way whether French or German, and that is in the terms of force only. The peace-maker likewise thinks one way whether in France or Germany, and that is in the terms of justice. "It is impossible to say that every one of the sixty-six millions of Germans are guilty," said Dr. Rathenau, in making frank acknowledgment of the guilt of the German militarists. "The German common soldier fought just as I did," said a poilu to me, "he had to go and he believed it was for his country; he had no choice."

Our correspondent is wrong in his fears regarding taxation. An English parliamentary commission, sent over to study the matter, reports that the Germans will pay this year 43 per cent of their entire income as taxes. The French are paying less than one-third as large a percentage, the English a little over one-half as large. There are profiteers there, just as in France and England and in this country. "The Adlon and the Continental are full of men who are making money out of their country's misery," said Ex-Chancellor Michaelis, "and they keep double sets of books to evade their share of the taxes—they are traitors." You cannot collect excess profits and large income taxes, said Secretary of the Treasury Mellon the other day; the rich always evade you.

Our plea is not in extenuation of the German crime in making the war, nor for their exemption from paying the reparations, but for repaying evil with good by giving them an honest economic chance to pay, thus building a new world on the basis of peace and the ways of peace instead of on war and the ways of the man who makes war his business.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, November 15, 1921.

IT is always well to be wary of the success of proposals when all men speak well of them. At present all men speak well of the daring move which has been made by America. It has awakened a remarkable hope among us at a time when hope had become a little hard to hold. The vested interests among all the nations will not take this splendid proposal "lying down." They will fight, not of course as interests, but disguised as noble principles; but they are none the less likely to fight. Still some of us, who do not ignore the interests which profit by armaments, believe that they who are on the side of peace are more than they who are against it. At present there is only one voice to be heard. It is the voice of thankfulness that so bold a challenge has been flung down to the nations. We were giving last Sunday in our churches to the enforcement of the theme that the only complete memorial of the war must be laid in a world-peace; and for that we look westwards.

The Churches and Peace

In many places united assemblies of Christians from all the churches were held on Armistice Day. In one at which I was speaking, there was a remarkable unity of spirit among the various groups of Christian people. They gathered quite definitely on a Christian basis: they started with Christian premises; they were prepared to listen to the values of Jesus as final; and in this way they agreed that war was not only waste and folly—it was sin against the word of Christ. There have been many forcible words said of late on this matter. Mr. Studdert-Kennedy, well known to the soldiers as "Woodbine Willie," has declared in public his penitence for the part which he took in urging men to fight. Others who still think that in August, 1914, this country chose the less of two evils, are busy asking why there was only a choice between two evils? Why was there no good to choose? Altogether there is a strong enthusiasm at the moment for peace; and if before this letter is printed other voices are heard, my readers must not doubt that the plain man everywhere is longing for the end of war.

A Good Way of Thanksgiving

There are in London city after nightfall a mere handful of inhabitants, chiefly caretakers; but in the daytime there are hundreds of thousands. Some of these city workers in 1919 resolved to show their gratitude for victory by forming a choral society called the "St. Michael's Singers" to give renderings of great church music. This week they are giving a festival under the conductorship of Dr. Darke, one of the school of musicians who are leading the churches back behind the music of the immediate past with its cloying sweetness, to the noble work of the past. I spent an hour and a half in St. Michael's, Cornhill, last evening on my way eastward; it was a sheer delight to listen to this choir, admirably trained, as they rendered Purcell's Te Deum and other works. The church, one of the city churches, condemned but reprieved, was full to the doors. It seems an excellent way of thanksgiving—to keep before the memory of the city the noble strains wherein the great in other ages praised the eternal Lord.

The Death of Dr. Forsyth

After a long and painful illness Dr. P. T. Forsyth, one of our greatest theologians, has died at the age of 73. He had been delicate all his life, but still the spring of this year he was able to do his work. His death does not remove from us one whose work belonged to a past day, but a living voice, and there is no one left to speak his message with his force and brilliance. At the first Congregational Assembly I attended, in 1896, I arrived a day after the opening to hear on all sides of a remarkable sermon preached by Dr. Forsyth on "Holy Father!" That sermon marked his emergence into his true place of influence. Before his Leicester days he had been among our "heretics." (If a man is a heretic long enough in Congregationalism he is generally elected chairman!) He never changed so far as I know, his views upon biblical criticism; but he had some fresh experience of the truth of the Christian redemption which altered the emphasis of his preaching. He once said that in his ears the words kept ringing which were spoken to another Peter: "Thou, when thou art converted, stablish thy brethren." It would have been unlike him to speak more of such things; but sometimes he hinted at the nature of the fresh insight which came to him; and always it meant for him an emphasis upon God's redeeming act—the cross, and upon grace, faith, judgment. Indeed the heretic of former days became the trusted leader in the evangelical school, and he would not have rebuked any of his friends who classed him with Goodwin and Owen. He was like Dr. Denney, with whom he had much in common, a great Puritan divine.

* * *

The Man Himself

Of Dr. Forsyth, the man himself, it would be possible to write much, but those who knew him would be conscious all the while of his searching and scornful criticism of all personalities. This much, however, may be said: Dr. Forsyth was a man with a remarkable range of knowledge and interest, a brilliant talker with a quick wit, a thinker, who took into his range the whole modern scene, and a man of singular kindness. It is true he never endured fools gladly, and the shallow he never endured at all. But always there was in him, as all men recognized, the right to speak upon the big things. Among them in the years when he was neglected and in the period of his recognition, he had spent his days; and his judgments came from a mind well stored and a conscience which had been brought under the discipline of the cross.

The Missionary's Devotion

"What are our pittance of money," asked Dr. Forsyth once, "our fits of sympathy, beside long, lonely devotions like these multiplied over all the earth? Their voices haunt us from graves baked in African suns, or soaking in malarial swamps, or watched by the lion and the lizard that cannot break their sleep. They demand that we shall not let their work be wasted, or their blood be like water spilt upon the ground, or their quiet resolve choked in the dust that stops their mouths. This work has cost too much to fail now. It is a sacred investment that we can only save by investing more. The mission field is a great Aceldama and field of blood. It is the cemetery of the Lord's vanguard." EDWARD SHILLITO.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Motive of Disarmament

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In the universal hubbub about the abolition of war, one hears little mention of the pacifists. I mean the real pacifists, the Christian pacifists, who denounce, renounce, and abhor war because it is contrary to the will of God and to the spirit of Christ. Of those professed pacifists who do not object to war when it is a fight between capitalists and laborers, I say nothing.

Only three or four years ago, the pacifists were ridiculed, denounced, hated and persecuted. Some were hunted by the government, others by the mob, while others were harassed by ecclesiastical and educational authorities. Today, even the newspapers and the magnates are denouncing and trying to outlaw war. But there is a difference of motive.

The cover of a recent issue of The Literary Digest contains an illustration which shows the difference. War, which is personified as an old pagan, is being "fired." Who dismisses him? Not God, or the Lord Jesus Christ, or angels, or saints, or the church, or even humanity. He receives his orders to go from a business man who is the head of a small American family! It appears to be a question of taxes, as we are so often told in the press! That the American business man should desire to spend more money for his family and less for military and naval purposes, is both natural and laudable. Nevertheless, the conspicuous absence of the higher motives is disconcerting. It would appear that many Americans, journalists and others incline to be atheistic in their interpretation of events. As during the war, so now, they look for occasional causes and natural explanations.

The Christian pacifist realizes that God can use the weight of governmental extravagance and of taxation, to weaken the hold of war on the popular imagination. In such a case, high taxes become one of many instruments which divine providence is using to remove war between states and nations from the earth. But the pacifist does not believe that this removal, in the absence of higher motives, will bring in the kingdom of heaven or the era of divine peace. War between classes, between families, individuals, and groups of individuals, unseemly conflicts of various kinds, enmity, suspicion, jealousy, envy, wrath, hatred, and uncharitableness will continue to curse the world until it is recognized that these are contrary to the spirit of Christ and to the will of God, and that his will must be accepted as the supreme law and rule of conduct. War may be abandoned as too high priced and too destructive, but Satan will find some other way by which to keep us embroiled, unless we renounce all his works.

The Meaning of Baptism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just finished reading your book on "The Meaning of Baptism." I am not sure that I have your meaning and position clearly in mind. Is this your position? In the New Testament text the Greek word used is baptizo and it was rendered "baptize" in the King James version. Its original meaning was to immerse. But words change their meanings—in the Greek language and in all languages—as a result of the usage to which they are put. For example, the word psallo, which originally mean to "pluck" as of the strings of the lyre, took on a new meaning from its use in music, and came to signify to "sing." In a similar fashion "baptizo" took on an additional and specific meaning as the result of the use of immersion in the initiation of Gentile proselytes into the Jewish church. From meaning to immerse it came to mean the initiation itself. So that by the time of John the Baptist it signified not merely the physical act of immersion but the social and moral act of initiation into a new status. The New Testament meaning of baptism, therefore, is not to be determined by the classical use of the word baptizo. This meaning must be determined by its etymological history just referred to and by its use in its New Testament context. To translate the word in the New Testament as denoting only the original meaning of the word is to make the New Testament say sometimes absurd and sometimes incredible things.

Instead of being a physical act—immersion or any other physical act—the word baptizo came to have a "social" or "spiritual" significance. Immersion, sprinkling, pouring, are not competent translations of baptizo in the New Testament meaning. "Immersion was the sign by which the baptismal act was carried out." (page 175.) In the New Testament the word continued to mean to "initiate" or to confer upon one the status of a Christian. Essential baptism may therefore take place regardless of the particular physical mode by which it is performed. People who have been sprinkled at their baptism are, in the essentials of the baptismal act, just as truly baptized as are people who have been immersed at their baptism. You, however, as I understand you, prefer the use of immersion only, both for yourself as a candidate for baptism and as an administrator of baptism. You believe that immersion is the historical mode by which Christian baptism (initiation into the Christian church) was performed in primitive times. You believe that the symbolic value of immersion is more apt and expressive than affusion. And while you hold that baptism itself has the sanction of New Testament authority, you do not believe, as I understand you, that immersion is in any sense commanded by the New Testament or based on the authority of Christ.

Any light you may suggest on this position I will appreciate very much. With every good wish, I am, sincerely yours, Crockett Mills, Tenn. J. E. GORSUCH.

[I could wish that all readers of my little book on baptism might have gained from it so clear and satisfactory a conception of the author's view as the above. Whether the position is right or wrong and whether the reader agrees or disagrees with the author it is a primary consideration that author's and reader's minds shall meet in a common understanding of what the book is talking about. This, alas, has not been true in the case of all readers of "The Meaning of Baptism."—C. C. M.]

The Higher Pacifism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your able editorial of November 24 on "The Church's Stake in the Armament Conference," suggests the difference between the pacifism of Jesus and the current pacifism. Both recognize mightier forces than violence to establish peace and righteousness on the earth. But the pacifism of Jesus is positive and aggressive unto the uttermost. For the cause of peace it suffers and dies. Its power is the Cross. If the thousand ships desired for Mr. Ford's peace errand had invaded Germany before the war, to declare through the length and breadth of it, regardless of the laws of Germany and their penalties, the falsehood of its unholy ambitions, that would have been the pacifism of Jesus. Or if, when the war began, the passengers of those thousand ships had charged the German lines, with no other weapon than His readiness to die, that would have been the pacifism of Jesus. If this seems a wild, irrational dream, it is no greater madness than His invasion of Jerusalem seemed to every wisdom less than his own. Or if one asks how such things could have been done, it is love's business to find the way, even as he found the way. Or if this seems beyond the possibilities of human devotion, it was not beyond the devotion of many Christian soldiers. Until pacifism outranks their devotion and becomes the sacrificial pacifism of Jesus, its appeal is too deficient in spiritual energy to move the conscience of humanity.

A Fighter to the Very End*

PAUL, like Roosevelt, was a fighter to the last day of his career. It was in his blood. God had in him an aggressive personality, completely devoted to His cause. It is difficult to measure the achievements of such a man. As Abraham's course was marked by a series of altars, so Paul's was, by a string of churches. There they were in Asia Minor, in Greece, in Rome and some think, in Spain. How one man, wholly surrendered, can multiply his life! When Moody was a young man he read, in a book, that God had never yet had one man entirely consecrated to his work; Moody rose up and, lifting his eyes to heaven, vowed: "God, you know that I am not much, but all that I am or can be, belongs to you." Then he went out to fashion society by his remarkable meetings in our country and in the British Isles. Henry Drummond was melted into passionate service by Moody, and at Yale and Harvard, the very centers of culture, no one was more acceptable than this former shoe-clerk. It just shows what can happen when a plain citizen gives himself entirely to God. The trouble is that most of us only give a fraction of ourselves to Him. We have too many reservations! We reserve certain sins all for ourselves and they sap us of self-respect and ruin our power. We reserve certain times for ourselves when we might be doing the most effective work, as many men are now playing golf during church time and many women are playing bridge on prayer-meeting nights. We reserve certain opinionated ideas to ourselves, which rob God of His majesty and Christ of his place.

Paul comes down to his end scarred and broken but with his spirit up. Looking back over his untiring life he says, "I have fought a good fight." He had stood up and taken all the punishment and given better than he got. He had not run away. Ship-wrecks, prisons, whippings, painful journeys, were all in the day's work for him. His conversation had been complete, he had held nothing back, his life was not dear unto himself, he entered, in fellowship, into his Master's sufferings, he wanted to do that so that he could understand him better—brave old lion, noble old hero. "I have fought a good fight." Ask those who had opposed him! Look at his foes whom he had worsted. The devils crawled into their holes when they saw Paul coming by.

As a boy his father probably took him to see the Grecian games. An indelible impression was thus made. Afterward he found one of his best sermon illustrations in that event: "Lay aside every weight and the sin, which does so easily beset us—run with patience the race set before us—looking unto Jesus the judge. . . ." Now at the end of his day he sees his life as a strenuous race—stripped of family pride, of religious prejudice, of personal likings, straining every fibre, breathing hard and fast, driving ahead with all his indomitable will, looking for the crown which the judge holds for the winner. "I have kept faith." The article may misguide us here. Paul did not keep "the faith" in the sense that he remained true to some creed or some section of truth; Paul kept faith. He kept faith with his friends, he kept faith with all men and above all he kept faith with God. The men who break faith with God are the ones who bring discredit upon His cause. Not only is the cross before his closing eyes but the crown. Yes, indeed, there is a place for rewards!! When life has been poured out like a libation, when years have been spent in sacrificial toil, when faith has been kept, hope held in spite of dangers and love maintained in the midst of hates, the crown is proper and right. Paul got his crown; he wears it now; the battle-scarred hero is one of the decorations of heaven!! "Bring my coat, my books and particularly my papers"—he flares up as he remembered the coppersmith—"God will fix him" . . . the old fighter is the same to the very end!! "God will deliver me, to whom be glory for ever. . . Amen."

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Methodists Find Successor to Dr. Taylor

The retirement of Dr. S. Earl Taylor from the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist church was a severe blow to that organization. It has become evident that the health of Dr. Taylor is permanently impaired, his condition compelling him to live in Arizona. The board of bishops has been looking for a successor and has finally chosen Dr. Titus Lowe of Omaha. Dr. Lowe studied at Ohio Wesleyan and at Western Theological Seminary. He spent five years as pastor of Thoburn Methodist church of Calcutta. In more recent years he has held prominent American pastorates and has served on the Board of Foreign Missions of his denomination.

Death of Veteran Baptist Theologian

Dr. Augustus H. Strong died last week at the age of eighty-five years. He is known through the length and breadth of the Baptist denomination as its leading theologian. His work on "Systematic Theology" was first put out in 1886, and in 1903 it was revised and republished. More recently Dr. Strong has been publishing in the pages of The Baptist a short statement of theological truth. He is also the author of a number of books, the best known of which are "The Great Poets and Their Theology" and "American Poets and Their Theology." Dr. Strong was educated at Yale, Princeton and Rochester, besides taking courses of study in Europe. He became president of the Rochester Theological seminary in 1872, and continued in this position until 1912, a period of forty years.

Much-Abused Puritans Find a Defender

It has been popular in this country for nearly a generation to abuse the Puritan fathers. Many ancient canards have been peddled, some of which have been nailed by the virile pen of Dr. William E. Barton, congregational pastor and author. Prof. George Herbert Palmer, teacher of ethics in Harvard University, recently took up the defense of the Puritans in an article in the Atlantic Monthly. While admitting their defects in the early New England days, he finds much more to their credit in later years. Of his Puritan home he says: "I was brought up in it, am profoundly grateful for its discipline, and feel that I owe to it more than half of all that has made life beautiful and rewarding."

Dr. F. E. Clark will Winter on Mediterranean

The veteran leader of Christian Endeavor is finding opportunity in his declining years for some of the pleasures of travel which he has so richly earned. This winter he and Mrs. Clark will spend most of their time in southern Europe, on the Mediterranean shores. Dr. Clark wants leisure to do some writing, for which he has not had opportunity in busy America. He is also being importuned by Christian Endeavorers in Germany and in Czecho-Slovakia to pay them a visit. This he may do before the winter is over.

New City Has Grave Religious Problems

Seattle is one of the great cities of the Pacific coast. Its rapid growth has resulted in many grave problems for religious institutions. In that city of 315,652 the evangelical churches show a membership of only 40,222. The total enrollment for all religious societies is only one-third of the population. During the past ten years the most striking growth has been made by Disciples and Baptists, though the Presbyterians are strong there, having one-fourth of Seattle's evangelicals in their churches. It is difficult to promote co-operation among the denominations in Seattle owing to the strong individualism of a few leading ministers of the city. This lack of cooperation prevents evangelical Christianity from making its most effective appeal in that community.

Ministers of Boston Do Manual Labor

A number of ministers in Boston have responded to the challenge of the labor union people of the city. It was intimated by some labor leaders that if the ministers would put on overalls and do a day's work they would learn some things about labor that they did not know. Some of the ministers put on overalls and on the following Sunday introduced some of the labor leaders in their pulpits to present their side of the labor issue. A good many labor journals are recognizing, though timidly, the service which ministers all over the land are rendering to their cause. While ministers cannot agree in advance to take the labor side of every controversy, they are trying to be fair and to do the work of reconciliation between capital and labor.

Passion for Unity Finds New Expression

Current interest in Christian unity is producing a good many new religious movements. In Big Run, Pa., is a church called "The Church in America." The name sounds pretentious, but it is the professed belief of the members of the church that all Christians are in reality members of the church. This local group seeks by such a name to make denial of sectarian division. A newspaper has been started which will circulate through the county and perhaps in wider circles; it is called the Jefferson County Press. The editor of the paper and minister of the church is Rev. Martin Luther Weaver. The paper takes the position that no solution of world problems will be found until local communities are united in the fellowship of Jesus Christ.

Corner Stone Will Be Unlocked in Hundred Years.

It will be a different world when First Christian Church, of Abilene, Tex., unlocks its strong box in the corner stone of its new church building one hundred years hence. As the new building enterprise has proceeded, contributors have been encouraged to obtain posthumous fame by having their names placed in the cornerstone. The Abilene papers are requested to publish these names at the time of the opening of the strong box in 2021 A. D. The box also contains the complete officary of the local organization. The key to the box is to become the property of the pastor and he is charged with the duty of transmitting it to his successor at each pastoral change until the time comes to open the box. Some of the contributors are insisting that the period be only fifty years.

Stewardship Rallies Meet with Success

The workers of the United Christian Missionary Society are touring the country and are instructing leading Disciples ministers and laymen in the meaning of stewardship. It is thought that many hundreds of churches, by practicing the self-apportionment plan, will come this year to new standards of responsibility for the missionary cause throughout the world. A great deal of stress is being laid upon the tithing method which is new to most Disciples churches.

Presbyterians Inaugurate Department of Humane Education

The Presbyterian denomination is the first to establish a department of humane education. This is being carried on under the auspices of the Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare. In order to emphasize the duty of humane treatment of animals, a modern version of the ten commandments has been prepared. Each of the ancient commandments has been rewritten to have some reference to the humane duty of kindness to animals. For instance, commandment five reads: "Honor and respect thy guardianship over the animals which have been faithful servants, and desert them not in an evil day; for by so doing thou mayest prolong thy days and increase thy joys in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Presbyterians will be urged henceforth to "speak kindly to animals as well as to people." According to the new manual, tying a tin can to a dog's tail is now a forbidden amusement in the circles of this communion. Cats are to be turned over to the Humane Society for euthanasia at the time the birds are nesting. Steel traps and air guns are condemned as inhumane instruments for the capture of game. If living things are taken for food, they are to be dispatched as quickly and mercifully as possible. A long list of prohibitions and positive injunctions make up the complete teaching. They are largely the product of years of experience on the part of the Humane Society, and are now being taken up for the first time by a religious organization. We have here an illustration of the contention of Professor Ross that in each new age, new sins arise. Docking a horse was no sin a hundred years ago, but it is now regarded as sin by most intelligent people.

Presbyterians Expose Girl Cigarette Smokers

In Lansing, Mich., the high school girls organized several cigarette clubs. These doings came to the attention of Rev. Arthur F. Southwick, associate director of the Department of Drugs and Narcotics of the Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare of the Presbyterian church. A community campaign was launched with the aid of many good people of all communions, and fourteen dealers were fined for selling to minors. In the same community a campaign is to be launched against Sunday movies.

Timely Topics for the Week of Prayer

The Federal Council has issued the list of suggested topics for the Week of Prayer, January 1 to 7, 1922. The first day will be a day for a series of sermons on the subject of prayer. On Monday the topics will be "Thanksgiving and Confession;" Tuesday, "The Church Universal;" Wednesday, "Nations and Their Leaders;" Thursday, "Foreign Missions;" Friday, "Christian Education and the Christian Home;" Saturday, "Home Missions." The Federal Council is prepared to furnish the instruction sheet in quantities. The devotional week following the holidays is coming every year into wider observance.

War Supplies for the Needy Russians

The United States government did not expect the end of the world war so soon, and when it came, there were on hand enormous stocks of every kind, including food, clothing, drugs and other necessities. A bill has been introduced into Congress asking that a portion of these goods be used for the relief of the suffering in Russia. The bill has met with opposition, however, and Christian people over the nation are being asked by the Federal Council to write or wire their congressmen during the first week in December, lending their encouragement to this humane proposal. Unless pressure is brought to bear from the religious portion of the population, it is feared the bill may fail of passage.

Church People Told How to Work More for Peace

The fight for peace is no more a guerilla warfare, but a well-organized campaign. The Commission on International Justice and Good-will of the Federal Council has issued a manual on "Working Toward a Warless World."

This manual is sold for fifteen cents, and contains a program for Christian people who wish to aid in the abolition of the iniquities of war. There are directions for church action, and further directions for individual action. Without doubt this manual, which is so timely at this hour, will have a large circulation.

Large Chicago Church Finds a Pastor

Since the death of its pastor, Rev. Austin Hunter, last spring, Jackson Boulevard Christian church of Chicago has been seeking a pastor. This congregation has recently called Rev. C. R. Oakley, of Portsmouth, O., to its leadership. Mr. Oakley has been known as a most successful church administrator, and a very ardent promotor of the missionary idea. Jackson Boulevard church is in the midst of a section on the west side of Chicago where the churches have been in a continual retreat. It is the largest Protestant church in the section, having listed about a thousand members. It is hoped that a social program may be developed for the church and an endowment built up.

Catholics and Protestants on School Issue

Practically every Protestant denomination is a loyal supporter of the American free school. In the camp of the Roman Catholics one finds many lay minds who are also favorable to public schools, but the official attitude is one of uncompromising opposition. In Michigan, it was the Protestant vote which prevented the closing of the Catholic schools, for Protestants believe in religious liberty, and would not knowingly infringe on the liberties of their neighbors, the Catholics. This attitude has not always been reciprocated by the Catholics. Certain Catholic teachers in Evanston, Ill., have embarrassed public school pupils who have sought to take optional studies in the week-day religious schools supported by the Protestant churches. In Farley, Ia., a particularly unpleasant neighborhood situation is to be found. The public school building burned down, and the Catholic majority in that community has four times voted down a bond issue to rebuild the school building. There is a parish school in the town, and this is declared by some to be sufficient for the need. Were the attitude of Farley Catholics to spread, it would mean an unpleasant situation in many communities through the land, and in the long run a limitation of a Catholic liberty. If this result is not prevented by the interference of the bishops, it will be due to a lack of statesmanship.

Kansas City Churches Perfect new City Organization

The churches of Kansas City have perfected a new city organization. It is called the Council of Churches. A budget of eight thousand dollars has been adopted, and a large part of this budget is already pledged. Dr. Fletcher Homan, pastor of Trinity Methodist church, was elected president. Dr. R. H. Miller, pastor of Independence Boulevard church, is one of the vice presidents. A number of prominent laymen of the city are on the board of management, and it seems that Kansas City is to have real church cooperation after a number of unsuccessful attempts.

Kansas City Minister Sees Good in Faith Cure Movements

The strength and the weakness of modern faith cure movement was assessed in a recent address by Rev. L. M. Birkhead, pastor of All Souls' Unitarian church of Kansas City. Some significant statements in the course of the address were these: "The message of mental healing cults and faith cure movements is the message we all need. They say to us, 'Talk health instead of disease. Stop talking about your ills and stop thinking about them. Replace your morbid ideas by more wholesome ideas. Cultivate a more cheerful attitude toward life. All leaders in the field of medicine are now recognizing the tremendous place that mind has in the treatment of disease. The taking of medicine for every little ailment is going out of practice. The value of commonplaces such as fresh air and sunshine is being recognized. Though most of us can never believe that mind is all and matter naught, we all ought to believe that mind is ruler and matter is servant.'"

Dr. Gore Wants to Unite Catholics and Unitarians

Catholics and Unitarians are not too far apart to be united in the application of Christianity to moral and social problems, according to Dr. Gore, a leading theologian of England. Though Dr.

GREATEST RELIGIOUS POETRY

Collected and arranged by Caroline M. Hill, Ph.D.

There is no adequate anthology of the world's greatest religious poetry. Our shelves contain anthologies of almost every other kind of poems. This collection of over seven hundred pages of religious poetry contains the finest thought in the English language on such subjects as Inspiration, the Search after God, Comfort in Sorrow, the Nature of the Future Life, including the great hymns and the most recent verse which shows religious feeling. It is most interesting and inspiring as poetry aside from its religious significance. Such a book will be wanted at once by all poetry lovers, and will be indispensable to libraries, ministers, educators and public speakers, as well as in every home.

The bookeller's price will be $3.00. Advance subscriptions will be $2.50 if orders to reserve copies are sent promptly to

CAROLINE M. HILL

Gore is opposed to interchange of pulpits between the Anglican church and the free churches, and is usually regarded as a conservative on the union question, his views of social reform are advanced. He advocates getting the leading Christians of every city together in one organization to work on the task of applying Christianity to the problems of modern life. He suggests that Unitarians, Friends and Roman Catholics are not too far apart to cooperate in such an enterprise.

Bishop of Zanzibar Becomes a Separatist

The Bishop of Zanzibar is such a straight churchman that he leans backward. He has long been known as the most uncompromising Anglican bishop in the world. He recently wrote the Archbishop of Canterbury asking that his name be removed from the list of bishops who receive invitations to the Lambeth Conference and who share representation on its consultative committee. The reason for this radical action which, if insisted upon, makes him the head of a distinct communion, is that the Bishop of Manchester has invited several non-conformist ministers to preach in his diocese during the Advent. This incident helps free churchman to understand the clog on the wheels in the Anglican church.

Will Drive for Funds for New Building

The Community church of New York, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, minister, made a drive for funds for a new building the last week in November. The building of this church was destroyed by fire the past year. A total of $217,000 will be sought. The church has on hand a little over fifty thousand which is regarded as an endowment fund. Sixty-five thousand dollars of the fund will be applied to the erection of a parish house in which the social activities of the congregation will be carried on.

Unitarian Evangelists in Massachusetts

The Unitarians of Massachusetts, and they represent a very large part of the denomination, are cooperating loyally with the national movement of the denomination to increase the membership of the churches by twenty-five per cent. Recently 160 ministers representing 109 churches, within twenty-five miles of the Boston State House met at the Boston City Club to perfect arrangements for the drive. The leading speaker on that day was Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, of the Boston Association of Ministers. Rev. Minot Simons, representing the national membership committee, was also present at the meeting.

Successor Found for Dr. Manning of Trinity

The richest parish of the Protestant Episcopal church in America is Trinity church, New York. When Dr. Manning was made bishop, the rectorship of this parish was vacant and it has taken some time to determine on a successor. It is now settled that Dr. Caleb R. Stetson, rector of St. Mark's church of Washington will assume the duties of rector of Trinity church at an early date. He was formerly a Vicar of Trinity church. The salary attached to this position is said to be $25,000 a year which makes it one of the greatest ecclesiastical preferments in the world. Trinity church has a number of missions and carries on a social service work. The administration of its vast endowments is a great responsibility.

Disciples Conservatives Hold Congress

Since the national convention at Winona Lake, the conservative minority which protested the adoption of the committee report on the China mission have been seeking opportunities for expression, and they have arranged another conservative "congress" to be held in Louisville this week. At these congresses only those in sympathy with the leaders of the congress are permitted to speak save by special privilege. The promoters of the new congress are reported to be at variance on a number of important items of policy, some wanting a rival missionary organization. A few of the conservatives in theology are satisfied with the decision of the China question, and will oppose any effort to reopen the question.

Faith Healing is Catching on in England

The faith healing idea which has been so prominent a feature of American religious life is catching on in London. Within the church of England at least two such movements have been organized. There is a Guild of Health, and also the Spiritual Healing Fellowship. Rev. H. Anson, head of the former organization insists that ministers should be healers as well as preachers. He holds that courses in psycho-analysis and psycho-therapy should be included in the courses of every up-to-date divinity school. Dr. Montague Lomax at a meeting of the Spiritual Healing Fellowship recently ascribed some forms of insanity to demon possession. He is a well-known spiritualist.

Missions Councils Schedule Meetings for January

The missionary leaders of America will start for New York soon after the holidays. Most of the home mission societies are now coordinated through the Home Missions Council, and this organization will hold its annual meeting in the Marble Collegiate church of New York, Jan. 9-11. The Foreign Missions Conference is an even older organization. Its annual meeting is so arranged that it does not conflict with the meeting of the Home Missions workers. It will be held at Garden City, Long Island, Jan. 12-14. At these meetings the plans and methods of the various organizations are brought under review. Many pieces of research are carried on jointly, thus saving large amounts of money for the various constituent boards. The harmonious cooperation of these leaders of Christian propaganda is rapidly removing from the Christian church the stigma of unchristian rivalry on the mission fields of the world.

Disciples and Congregationalists Hold Joint Meeting

The Congregational Ministers' Association of Chicago recently engaged Prof. Alva W. Taylor to speak on the steel strike. Remembering that he is a member of the Disciples Communion, the officers of the association invited the Disciples ministers' association of Chicago to the meeting, on November 21. Professor Taylor defends the Inter-church report on the steel strike. He has just returned from a trip in England, France and Germany and says with regard to the Steel Report: "The steel report is pretty well known in England and was rather startling to the leaders there. They contrasted conditions in the American industry with the universal 8-hour day in the British steel plants and said that there were no great steel employers there who refused to recognize the workmen's right to organize or who did not deal with organized labor. No such church report had been made in England although it is quite common for leading churchmen, including several bishops, to be members of the British Labor party. The opinion commonly expressed was that the steel report was epoch-making as an expression of Christian ethics."

Will Aid the Unfortunate Russian Clergy

On account of the present distress in Russia a number of Russian bishops and priests of the Orthodox church are living in other lands in great distress, having fled from persecution. Their needs have been brought to the attention of the Protestant Episcopal church of this country. Bishop Darlington of Pennsylvania has called for a fund of six thousand dollars with which to relieve the immediate needs of these men. Some years ago a similar appeal was made in behalf of the Serbian clergy, and it was generously responded to. The appeal in behalf of these men has been favorably received.

Bishop Manning will Study Unemployment

The Episcopal church of New York hopes to aid the thousands who are now suffering in that city from unemployment. Bishop Manning has called a conference of the clergy at the Bowery Y. M. C. A. The various churches of the diocese will be called upon to aid in meeting the serious problems of the present hour. The bishop will call in social service experts to make concrete suggestions to the clergymen in order that they may be well advised in the measures which they adopt to meet the emergency.

Recruiting Leaders for Home Missions

The task of foreign missions has been interpreted to the young people of the colleges through the Student Volunteer Movement and home mission leaders have long wished for some agency by which the home field could in like manner be idealized. Recently the Home Missions Council and the Council of Women of Home Missions have joined in the employment of Miss Jessie Dodge White as Secretary of Recruiting for the Home Field. Miss Dodge was formerly dean of women in Des Moines University. She is a graduate of Oberlin college and Union Theological Seminary and in addition has had training in the Y. W. C. A. Training Schools. Her wide experience in connection with student life makes her a valuable worker in the new task.

Fifteen Thousand Hungarians Become Episcopalians

Fifteen thousand Hungarians, members of the Hungarian Reformed church, have been received in a body into the Protestant Episcopal church. Their ministers will be reordained, though with the stipulation that this does not repudiate their previous ordination. The baptism and confirmation of the lay members will not be questioned by the bishops. These Hungarian churches will be organized into a classic with a dean over them, but the bishop of each diocese will have authority to administer confirmation. This represents the plan of the Episcopal church for accomplishing Christian unity, and the leaders are greatly pleased to demonstrate a successful operation of the plan with even a small group like the Hungarians who have been recently received.

Mono Indians Transformed by Home Mission Work

The Mono Indians of central California suffered many things at the hands of the whites and they were at last reduced to the lowest level of poverty and misery. They traded away all their property for boot-leg whiskey, and even sold their daughters into moral slavery. Their superstitions were kept alive by the medicine men at whose behest all twin babies were condemned to death. After fourteen years of mission work by the Baptist denomination, they are now happy and prosperous with a decent home life. Their money is now going into tools and animals for the farming operations, and they have built some good houses.

Speaker Urges Admission of Women to Ministry

The admission of women to the ministry of the Church of England was one of the interesting themes considered at the recent congress of the Church of England. While the majority opinion is still opposed to the ordination of women, it was interesting to note that Canon Guy Rogers, chaplain to the King, was in favor of the innovation. He asked that the congress face the question whether the desire of the women to enter the ministry was a result of the operation of the Holy Spirit or not. He asserted that those who would exclude women attach an importance to sex not warranted by the facts of life.

Unitarian Speaker Deplores the Extremist in his Denomination

At the recent national meeting of Unitarians at Detroit, Rev. Abraham M. Ribbany spoke on "The Unitarian Attitude of Jesus." In this address he paid his compliments to certain radical spirits who have no theology of their own, and are concerned chiefly with destruction. He said: "But like other denominations, we have our extremists. If orthodoxy has the man who is all memory and no imagination, we have the liberal who is all imagination and no memory. If orthodoxy has the 'moss-back' we have 'the rolling stone which gathers no moss.' Perhaps between the two there is not much choice. Yet if I were to choose between these two pitiable objects, I would choose the 'moss-back.' To me of all desolate things on the earth a rolling stone is most desolate. It is bare, bruised, and horribly stained with the life-blood of the insects and the vegetation it has crushed in its ruthless course. * * * We should continue to accept the leadership of Jesus as the first citizen of a spiritual democracy because both by inheritance and voluntary choice we are a branch of the Christian church. Like other forward-looking Christians, we are continuers of Christian history. This is a heritage we can ill afford to forego. Ours is this great historic institution with all its vast wealth of devotion, philanthropy and scholarship. It is the more ours because we are free to renounce, and if need be to denounce its errors."

Catholic Position on Union Question

The Roman Catholic church will consider no such thing as the corporate absorption of the Protestant sects. This would be to recognize them for a moment even just before they ceased to be. The doctrine of union was recently stated editorially by the Catholic weekly, America: "The Catholic position on reunion is clear, 'Charity in all things,' but for heresy one has no terms except terms of condemnation. Reunion, yes; but not at the cost of peril to the deposit of faith. The sooner our separated brethren learn that they must come, one by one, as little children to a great and tender Mother, and that the only conceivable basis of reunion is submission, full and unconditioned, to the see of Rome, the sooner shall we realize that blessed vision of peace, one flock and one Shepherd."

Universalists will Build Church in Washington

The various religious communions are realizing the importance of having commanding church buildings in the nation's capital. A large number of these buildings enterprises are under way, being supported by funds gathered from the nation at large. Among the most recent to determine on a new building for Washington is the Universalist denomination. Though there are only 75,000 members of this communion in the United States, most of whom are to be found in Massachusetts and New York, they are ambitious to be well represented at Washington. There has been some talk of moving the national headquarters of the denomination to the Capital City, but no decision in this matter has been reached.

New Testament Scholar Becomes a Missionary

Dr. Albert Schweitzer of Strassbourg has been widely known in the Christian world as one of the most radical critics of the new testament. His work in this field must everywhere be taken into account. The latest announcement with regard to him will be received with surprise throughout the Christian world. He has volunteered for service in Africa as a missionary. This does not mean that he has in any way given up his critical positions, but that he wishes during the remainder of his life to work constructively in Christianity. He finds no discrepancy between his theology, and the consecration of his life to the work of the Christian missionary on a foreign field.

Lambeth Appeal Gets Consideration in Various Sections

The Lambeth Appeal for Unity issued by the Anglican bishops has now had consideration by ecclesiastical bodies in various sections of the world. It has been translated into Latin, Greek, French, Italian, Portuguese, German, Russian and Esperanto. Various religious assemblies in England, Scotland, Ireland, Canada, South Africa, Australia, India, China and Japan have given attention to the appeal. At the present time it cannot be said that any communion of Christians is willing to accept the terms of union involved in the statement, though the overture has been received with respect in almost every communion. Even among Roman Catholics the appeal has been given attention. Probably in no ecclesiastical communion more than in the Orthodox church of Russia is the appeal being considered favorable. Meanwhile Canon Headlam, Regius Professor of Divinity of Oxford, makes the following statement: "The Church of England is called I believe, to take her place in building up the religious unity of the world, but she will fail in her mission unless she is prepared to lay aside her exclusiveness and is ready to go out humbly to meet other Christians. You cannot be the heralds and harbingers of the great Catholic ideal unless you lay aside Anglo-Catholic narrowness."

Disciples are Seeking More Missionaries

Though the largest number of missionaries ever sent out by the Disciples in their history went this year, a group of missionary leaders are touring the colleges and universities looking for fifty more. It is reported that in eastern institutions nearly half that number have been found who will be sent out next summer provided they pass the necessary tests. Meanwhile the missionary support is being built up by an appeal for a more spiritual motive in giving. Stewardship institutes are being held in various parts of the country.

Mission Work in Santo Domingo a Success

It is but a little while since through union effort an evangelical program was set up in Santo Domingo. A number of lines of work are being carried on. The Sunday-school flourishes with ever increasing classes. Dr. Taylor reports 85 patients in the first two weeks of his medical work and $52 turned into the mission treasury in fees from those who are able to pay. An appeal is being made for a Ford car to be put at the service of Dr. Taylor. A book store has been opened in the capital where the books advertised in La Nueva Democracia are sold. Among the various educational enterprises is that of educating young men in the English language, and of instructing them in the ideals of pan-Americanism.

New Books on Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-taking on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The Continent says of this work:

"It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples' church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that 'the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.' Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity."

The Christian Advocate (New York) says:

"This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his 'Baptismal Regeneration' in 1856."

The Congregationalist says of it:

"A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus 'had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.'"

China and the Pacific Peace Pact

THE Christian international mind will not be wholly satisfied with the treaty entered into by Britain, France, Japan and the United States, which was announced last Saturday. There is one vital omission from the agreement: that is China. China herself should be a signatory to the agreement. One of the most ardent hopes with which Christian democracy has invested the Washington conference relates itself to China's plea for the explicit recognition of her sovereign independence. And it seems clear that it is the purpose of the conference, in the long run, to emancipate China from the nondescript status in which she now stands and which renders her a helpless and inviting object of exploitation for any nation, and particularly her powerful island neighbor. That exploitation must be stopped, so the conference has already decided by its adoption of the Root resolutions. But in drawing up the four power pact for stabilizing peace in the Pacific east the conference missed a unique opportunity to carry out its good intentions toward China. China is the only interested power not included in the pact. But if the conference is in earnest in its purpose to give China a sovereign status with real autonomy, nothing could signalize and help to realize that purpose like treating her as an interested equal. The best way to stabilize peace in the far east is to remove China from the status of a mere ward of other nations, dependent upon their good intentions, and to invest her with the dignity of a sovereign nation. The moment China's sovereign autonomy is universally recognized, the necessity for other nations entering into pacts to prevent one another from exploiting her will be greatly reduced. A practical act of recognition such as the inclusion of China in the present agreement, would go far toward unifying and stabilizing the internal affairs of China herself. And if the powers are in earnest in wishing to inhibit any act of aggression tending to disturb the peace, China's participation in the agreement would much more effectually guarantee that any such hostile act would be brought to their attention while it was still in the bud. What China needs is not international charity, but justice. Her destiny cannot be imposed upon her either by the good will or the concerted abstinence of outsiders, but only by her responsible inclusion in all good faith in whatever international arrangements affect her welfare or that of her neighborhood.

A New Spirit in World Affairs

QUALIFYING its enthusiasm only by regret at this omission of China, the Christian conscience cannot fail to welcome the agreement of the four world powers as a positive and long stride toward the peace ideal which Christmas celebrates. It begins to look as if the Christmas bells of 1921 will have cause to ring more joyously than in any year of modern times. The Washington conference is bringing a new method and a new spirit into world affairs. The objections to the new treaty that are bound to be voiced in terms of the George Washington tradition warning the young republic against entangling alliances will not hold when applied to our full grown republic that has now become the creditor nation of the world. Attempts will be made to draw a parallel between this far east treaty and the rejected league of nations. But such attempts will be futile. The treaty of Versailles was a punitive instrument devised in fear and vengeance to humble and mulct a defeated foe. The league of nations which was woven into the structure of the treaty provided many features and embodied an essential purpose that strongly appealed to the Christian conscience. But admirable and hopeful as it was in many aspects, it was vitiated by being inseparably interwoven into a treaty against whose terms and temper the Christian conscience recoiled. If America could have taken the league without the treaty we would have done so. The Washington pact for peace in the Pacific has none of the objectionable features of the Versailles treaty. It is conceived in a Christian temper, has reference to no enemy, specific or potential, does not attempt to create a balance of power against another group of nations hostile or likely to become so. The Washington covenant is an agreement of self-control. Each nation within the agreement simply declares its purpose to abstain from certain forms of mischief or menace toward the colonies and islands of the far east. This is the exact opposite of the Versailles method which, as Mr. H. G. Wells has pointed out, used the concept of mandates as the thinnest camouflage for annexation and exploitation.

Disarmament and Rearmament

WITH some degree of clearness the Washington diplomats seem to see that curtailing armament is not sufficient to achieve peace. Peace-making, true pacifism, is a constructive, not a destructive process. Something must be put in place of the war spirit if the scrapping of battleships is to avail anything. A spirit of cooperation, of moral understanding, of world-wide fellowship is necessary or the state of the world will grow from worse to worse. Our Lord and St. Paul spoke certain great words on which all Christian congregations ought to hear some persuasive and enlightening sermons preached before the conference adjourns. Take Jesus' utterance first: "When an unclean spirit leaves a man, it roams through dry places in search of refreshment. As it finds none, then it says, 'I will go back to the house I left,' and when it comes it finds the house clean and in order. Then it goes off to fetch seven other spirits worse than itself; they go in and dwell there, and the last state of that man is worse than the first." And now take Paul: "Put on all the armor of God. . . . Stand your ground then with truth for your belt, and with righteousness for your breastplate and with the firm foothold of the good news of peace as shoes for your feet. And besides all these take faith for your shield . . . and accept the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit which is God's Truth." This rearmament doctrine must go hand in hand with disarmament. Pacifism is not passivism. Peace-making is a program of action. Wherefore with all our disarming with respect to the carnal weapons let us see to it that the nations are re-armed with the weapons of the spirit.

Is Beer a Medicine?

ADVOCATES of nullification have lately been attacking the prohibition laws of the United States along the line of making beer and wine medicines. Meanwhile there are very few physicians who so regard these beverages. There is no mention of beer as a medicine in any materia medica. The spirituous liquors are listed as medicines, but the prohibition act makes very inconvenient their use. It is evident to those who give the matter a little thought that the demand that beer be made a medicine is a demand not of the reputable physicians of the United States, but of those inconsolable wets who see in this method a new loophole by which the law may be violated. Every profession has its black-legs, and even in so honorable a profession as that of physicians one will always find unworthy men who will do anything to turn a dishonest dollar. Making beer into a medicine is only an excuse for bringing the constitution of the United States into ridicule. Meanwhile it is encouraging to find some newspapers that have been among the irreconcilable wets now taking the position that the majesty of the law demands unqualified respect. If the great majority of Americans want prohibition, in the long run there is no way to keep them from having it. If prohibition is wrong there is no surer way to bring a reaction against it than to have bone-dry prohibition. In other sections of the Anglo-Saxon world there is no topic so engagingly interesting as that of prohibition in the United States. The peoples wonder how it is going to work. A few years of successful demonstration in the United States will put the whole world on a prohibition basis. And President Harding's prediction that liquor will some day cease to be even a memory will come true.

Cooperation is the Important Thing

DOCTRINAL diversities in the various denominations tend to increase. While the progressive-minded group are working continually to bring their religious opinions into more complete accord with a new world view, conservatives are with continually greater consistency adjusting themselves to the dogma of verbal inspiration and biblical infallibility. In one camp God works through laws and by century-long processes. In the other, the only satisfying manifestation of God is in miracle and cataclysm. These differences mean that one kind of Baptist or Presbyterian is more unlike another kind of Baptist or Presbyterian than either is unlike a Roman Catholic or a Christian Scientist. The same could be said of any of the denominational groups. Meanwhile large tasks are being left undone by reason of the wideness of doctrinal diversity. Shall men solve the question of present-day miracles before they proceed to the task of jailing bootleggers? Shall the world wait for the gospel until theologians in rival camps agree to a nicety on a definition of the gospel? Must hungry men stand in line while we debate the nearness or remoteness of the coming of the Lord? To ask such questions is to answer them. Were men never to cooperate until they agreed completely, this would be a world of unorganizable individualists. It is not only absurd for differences in theological opinion to prevent cooperation for men in the same denominational camp, but the wider cooperations are hindered by the same differences. Protestants and Catholics and Jews are agreed in the main as to what religious men should think with regard to social problems and industry. Why should they not seek to realize these common opinions by cooperative activity? Even though Episcopalians do not wish evangelicals in their pulpits, why not sit with them in the Federal Council? The cause of Christ walks haltingly because men set intellectual agreement above the doing of the will of Christ.

The Religious Program of the Y. M. C. A.

THOSE who are unfriendly to the Y. M. C. A. have liked to remark sarcastically that the word "Christian" in its name no longer means anything. The development of the social program of the association, the coming of larger financial resources and the wider extension of membership has threatened to dilute somewhat the spiritual zeal of an organization which at the time of its birth was chiefly concerned with conducting prayer-meetings and staging gospel talks. No one who attends a great national meeting of the Y. M. C. A. can doubt, however, that the organization is sound in its leadership. The danger of secularizing the movement is recognized by the leaders and guarded against, just as wise churchmen view the expansion of the social activities of churches and the launching of extensive financial campaigns as a spiritual hazard. The association in its local program has rendered a great service in the organization of its "Hi-Y" clubs where young men who at that age are usually out of touch with the church are brought together for the planning of definite religious work. The church has never properly appreciated the service of the association in the recruiting of men for the ministry and the mission field at the great conferences which are held in various parts of the country. One of the newer features of the work of the association is the closer coordination of its religious work with that of the churches. The boy expert of the association is now often put at the service of churches. Working in and through the churches the boys of the community are reached by this program. With relations of continually greater cordiality, the association and the churches should go forward to solve the man problem in religion during the next generation.

A New Type of Lay Organization

TEN years ago the evangelical denominations were racing with each other in building up men's brotherhoods intended to parallel the societies conducted by women in the local church. These brotherhoods came to sudden grief. In some cases they died the death, and in others they had only a name to live. Nothing will more surely bring a smile in some denominations than to suggest "reorganizing the brotherhood." Meanwhile the Unitarians and Universalists, particularly the former, have actually brought into being successful lay societies. The lesson of this success as compared with the evangelical failure is not to be lost on keen observers of church method. The Unitarian Laymen's League is an unbossed organization. It does not make up its program with long talks by ministers. While seeking always to aid and strengthen the pastor in his work, this organization insists upon the rights of independent judgment. It has found some really worth while things to do and has gone about the doing of them in a most worthy way. The sending of a great number of ministers of the denomination to summer school at Harvard year before last overcame the isolation of several hundred widely scattered ministers, and brought new virility into their thinking. The ministers go of their own accord, now that the thing has been pointed out to them. The laymen in the Unitarian camp have not hesitated to criticize where criticism is needed. They are sponsoring some evangelistic enterprise for the denomination this year. Unitarian evangelism may sound like a paradox, but the laymen are proving that the evangelic impulse is not alien to their faith. Were evangelical churchmen to get into a convention without a single minister around they might arrive at some very important conclusions as to what is wrong with Methodism or Presbyterianism, or what the Disciples and Congregationalists lack. The women of the churches have worked out a technique of association by means of which they enjoy a fellowship that is still to be realized by the masculine portion of the church.

Romance and Mischief in Home Missions

IN recent years great changes have come in the spirit and method of home missions. The Home Missions Council has helped to bring a certain measure of coordination into the efforts of the various denominations, and to eliminate some of the worst of the competitive features which were once the scandal of this department of Christian activity. Home mission leaders have felt the need of a certain romance with which the work of foreign missions is invested. This has sometimes led to an over-emphasis upon certain features of home mission work to the neglect of others. For instance in Alaska there is a fluctuating population whose size is variously estimated but which Dr. Anthony of the Home Missions Council says is at the present moment right around the fifty thousand mark. This population is about evenly divided between whites and natives. In this population 171 missionaries are at work. Religious work is carried on by Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Friends, Swedish Evangelicals, Lutherans, Moravians, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Greek Catholics and Roman Catholics. Less than fifty ministers serve the religious needs of Rockford, Ill., and the town is often thought to be over-churched. Alaska is probably not over-churched, but is it not possible that some coordination of effort could be made that would save some of the $200,000 spent there for the millions of neglected folk in the great cities of America? In the cities the romantic task is evangelizing foreigners. Meanwhile many sections of just ordinary American working people who are too poor to keep up their churches are quite neglected by everybody. Home missions still has a long way to go to match the foreign mission program in its effort at eliminating the vices inherent in our denominational system and in wisely conserving its resources for the greatest good of the kingdom of God.

The Ministry of Labor

IT is not surprising that labor's cause should present a strong appeal to the spiritual prowess of the age. The cases multiply where ministers of churches demit their office and espouse leadership in the labor movement. Those types of students from which the idealistic and altruistic causes have drawn their recruits show a disposition to professionalize this task. There have appeared announcements of a labor college whose aim is a scientific and thoroughgoing preparation of young men and young women for the calling. Demands, some wise and some not wise, are being made by organized labor for a recognition of their interests in public school instruction.

The industrial question ranks second to none among the practical concerns of our society. Western civilization has an economic soul. Its spiritual concerns are properly defined in the terms of the order wherein lie its distinctive contributions to human history and achievement. Official spiritual agencies in this civilization cannot blindly mistake the nature of this soul. During the past twenty-five years our churches have awakened at least to the extent of displaying alarm over the persistence with which vital social currents flow on, leaving them to one side, though they clamor never so fervidly for official recognition. The most vivid labor consciousness has long ago reached the conclusion that the industrial movement can do without the churches, its spiritual impulses being generated and seasoned under other auspices.

During the period named the attitude of the churches has varied from that of defiance, through degrees of petulant and tearful solicitude for the wayward, to that of surrender to labor domination. Throughout the attitude has been one of an outsider. Sometimes the demand has been that of a haughty mistress of sacred mysteries, whose forgiveness for neglect the wayward must first contritely seek as the condition of reinstatement in the divine graces. Sometimes the resort has been to "sob stuff," lachrymose pleading that the wayward return to folds willfully deserted. Some church folk have been fortunate or unfortunate enough to live so apart from this central issue of our civilization that they could allow themselves to disregard it entirely, and even to deny that there is any such issue. They have found it convenient to assert that working people have not been alienated from the churches, that the church need not concern itself with the "labor problem," that the sole and single issue is the depravity of "human nature," and that a "simple gospel" will adequately meet all of our social ills and insure a complete social salvation.

The one outstanding demonstration of this quarter-century of experience in the relations of church and labor is that official religious agencies, standing aloof and self-sufficient, cannot supply the solvent of our industrial civ-ilization's spiritual problems. Nor have "concessions" on the part of the churches sufficed. Ministerial delegates to central labor unions have proved of significance in the degree in which certain personal charms or their lack in the particular ministers functioning in this capacity have cemented or failed to cement personal friendships. By way of bringing about approachment between the church as the official sponsor of religion and organizations recognized as the sponsors of class-conscious labor, such devices have profited society not one whit. They have not approached an appreciation of the real issues involved. Class-conscious labor is willing to use tender-hearted ecclesiastics to advance its interests, and is quite as willing to repudiate the alliance when it conflicts with those interests. Class-conscious labor takes precisely the same attitude as does class-conscious capital. The latter has notoriously patronized the churches so long as their preaching and practice buttressed its cause. It has quite as notoriously administered its rebukes to churches esteemed to be refractory, and has freely wielded its most direful weapon, the withdrawal of financial support, in the extremity. Few and bold indeed have been those churches which have braved this extremity. And of those a large proportion are dead or have "reformed."

These years of shifting and dodging, now in one direction and now in another, are abundant and conclusive demonstration that the spiritual interests of an industrial society are not being adequately served by the spiritual agencies now accorded official recognition. It is hardly to be wondered at that intelligent young people, after studying our industrial situation, should so rarely choose the ministry of the conventional church as a field for vital industrial leadership. Great numbers of our youth who in former generations would have chosen the ministry are turning elsewhere. Many of them choose the field of labor organization, not because such a resort offers a permanent or far-reaching solution of our industrial problems, but because it seems to them to make a nearer approach to reality. Labor lacks spiritual vision. Nothing is more manifest. Vision cannot be arbitrarily thrust into labor's ranks from the outside. Capital finds that labor cannot be mauled into docility, and the church has surely gained sufficient experience to know that labor cannot be patronized into any kingdom of heaven it has to offer. So far as class-conscious labor needs spiritual vision or can profit by it in contributing to the solution of our industrial problems, it must spring from insight, not oversight; its own leadership must see. An appreciation of this necessity, more or less clear, prompts recent numerous efforts to tone up labor leadership.

The high-up leaders of labor unions have displayed a skill and intelligence, and, in a degree, a moral quality, which has compelled recognition even from many unwilling. Of the lower ranks of this leadership there are both pitiful and exasperating tales to be told. Extreme generalizations which condemn all walking delegates and labor leaders as bums and grafters are one with all extreme generalizations; they are false. But here is the next to the greatest weakness of the cause of organized labor. Perhaps if this can be removed the more fundamental weakness will pass with it. Working people have been and are still yielding themselves to degenerate and unprincipled leadership. This may not and usually does not betoken confirmed depravity or lack of intelligence. It is only a demonstration that class-conscious labor will stagger along behind a bum and a grafter who is unequivocally identified with its cause rather than yield to the patronage or wiles of alien sponsors, of whose betrayals it has had all too painful and abundant experience. In a more or less isolated region a few days ago two official labor leaders were observed loafing, and if their bloated faces confirmed half of what they appeared to reveal, boozing, the livelong day in a cheap hotel. Hour after hour they fumbled a pack of greasy cards, playing games which required just enough attention to forestall connected or serious thought. During that period they were observed to turn not one leaf of a book, nor to give evidence of the slightest inclination to independent study of the far-reaching questions which officially engage them. At nightfall willing messengers brought an automobile to convey them to packed halls where, by the modest confession of one of them, they delivered "the greatest speeches which have ever been made" on their particular subjects of radical propaganda.

Is it true that American working people are yielding their allegiance to such leadership? It certainly is. Have they lost all conscience or intelligence? Neither. None is more acute to discern the loafer, the bum, the grafter, than is the man who is himself slaving at hard labor, who knows where the dollars come from through the contribution of which these disreputables are supported. Instead of arousing the wrath of those who stand outside, this spectacle should rather shock all thoughtful citizens into a realization of the seriousness of our industrial problems. Certain disreputable elements in the humbler ranks of labor doubtless admire the skill and shiftiness of these leaders whose cunning has lifted them out of the grime and grind of toil, and enable them to lounge, smoking and drinking over a pack of greasy cards in a tenth-rate hotel all day, in preparation for a brilliant flight of red propaganda oratory in the evening. But everybody who knows anything at all understands that the rakes and grafters in the humbler ranks of American labor are few or remain very briefly. They do not dominate there, however relatively numerous they may appear in labor's leadership. The rank and file of organized labor are not deceived as to the character of their leaders. They trust them because of qualities which they esteem more highly than they do the graces so conspicuously lacking. For the most part they can count upon their class loyalty. Blows which have most weakened the cause of labor in recent years have been dealt by disloyalty rather than by the sottishness and petty grafting which our religious journals and the capitalistic press have so glaringly magnified. Even the leader who has sold out for his own personal profit has been brought into less disrepute than he who has deserted the class and its cause. American labor has less and less admiration for the industrial magnate who has "risen" from the ranks of labor. He is rather a deserter, and ordinarily the more he has profited by his perfidy the more flagrant is considered his offence.

This is manifestly an impossible condition of affairs. The church as it is now organized and motivated is helpless before it. Capital is the more impotent the more it rages and presses its "open-shop" campaigns. Society cannot survive under this organization of its interests. But such spiritual insight as can now be claimed, is with those high-minded, pure-spirited men and women who are espousing the cause of labor as their own, and are seeking to furnish the working people with a leadership which shall truly express their best aspirations. Democracy must be bought thus dearly. By whatever avenues we may approach a social status from which class jealousies and greediness are banished, it cannot and will not be by way of a betrayal of the cause which American working people have espoused. They cannot be patronized into the kingdom of heaven under the auspices of institutions alien to their life and dearest purposes. They cannot be brow-beaten or cajoled into submission to overlords. They can only be led, and they will surrender their class sanctities to that holiest of all, a social order where a genuine democracy controls, only as a leadership raised up from among them shall see the vision and point the way.

Waiting Without Watching

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I WAS about to travel, and I went to them that sell Tickets and bought a Ticket and a Lower Berth. And the Number of the Berth was Eight, in Car 294. And when the day arrived, I boarded the Train, and found my Space, and sat me down. And the Train was Very Full.

And there came a Red Cap bearing baggage, and he was followed by a Lady. And she stood in the Aisle and said, My berth is Lower Eight in Car 294.

And I said, There hath been some Mix-up, and the Ticket man may have Crossed his Wires. Sit thou here until the Conductor comes, and he will straighten things out.

And she took the seat without any Thanks to me, and dismissed both me and the Red Cap with equal solicitude for our future well-being, save that she tipped the Red Cap.

And I went where men smoke, and I sat where they sat, though I smoke not.

And when the Conductor came through, I said, There is a woman who seemeth to have a Ticket for the same space. If it be so, give it to her, and do for me the best thou canst.

And he said, I would there were no Ticket Agents, for I have a sad Mix-up through their carelessness. Yea, the diagram showeth not a Lower nor even an Upper Berth, and I have a long waiting list.

And I said, I know not how thou wilt adjust it, but I have faith in thee, even as in the Old Woman who Lived in the Shoe. Do for me what thou canst, and meantime I am not Worried.

And when I said that he thanked me, and he said, That is the way to take it; for many people do act as if the fault were mine. And now, behold, thou shalt have a berth if I have to make one on the pilot of the Locomotive.

So I sat with the men for a long time, and learned much from their conversation. But the Conductor came not to me for a long time.

And the men inquired of me, saying, Hadst thou not a Lower? And wherefore didst thou give it up?

And I answered, I gave it up for a woman, who, knowing herself to be man's superior, desireth also to be man's equal.

And they said, That kind of dame may sit up for all of me.

For she had not appeared to consider that I had on the face of the returns as good a right to the space as she, and in addition the precious legal power of Possession.

But I worried not.

And shortly before Bed-time the Conductor came, and said, I have waited until the very end of the day, for I desired to do something for thee; and I had not even an upper. But now, behold, a party who had a ticket hath failed to Show Up, and I have for thee a Lower.

Therefore do I commend to men not only the wisdom of Watchful Waiting, but sometimes the policy of Waiting without Watching.

For all the time that I waited, my train was going straight toward the place for which my ticket read; and at the end of the day there was rest.

Wherefore, beloved, be not too fretful in things temporal or spiritual; for this well-filled train of human life is in competent hands, and there shall be for every man who waiteth and trusteth, progress through the day, and rest when the night falleth.

VERSE

A Christmas Wish

I COULD not wish thee better than to pray
That there may come to thee this Christmas day
A vision of the star that sent men on
With trailing light to where a new Light shone.

The night is dark—let thy illumined face
Bring light and cheer to bless thy day and race.
Pass on the angel song of hope and peace
'Till self be shamed and bitter hatred cease.

God rest thee, faithful heart, this Christmas-tide!
May Christ himself by faith with thee abide.
And lead thee through the New Year's swinging gate
To high emprise—the master of thy fate!

CHARLES L. GOODELL.

Light

LOSING my way, I groped, with fears beset;
Dim grew the day; on came the blinding night;
Hopeless, I knelt and closed my eyes to pray—
Lo, all about me streamed the Light!

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

Corn

OF ancient lineage am I,
Sister of the forest,
Daughter of primeval summer.
Memories of scudding buffaloes haunt me,
Red men flit across my vision.
I can tell tales of old massacres,
Of voyageurs lost but for my succor.

For me forests fall,
Railways extend themselves,
And monster shipyards arise.

For me peoples wage war
And the rivers run red.
I am astounded at the slaughter because of me,
And stand aghast at the mighty holocaust of commercial greed.
But for me all might have been peace,
With quiet fields and rustling grasses
And love songs and sunset musings.

Woe is me! They have bared me
And set me up as a queen of lust
In their drunken feasts, though my days have known
But the crystal dew and the sunshine.

Woe is me! The streets are full of crying
Because of the strife of the traders,
Who have stripped and ravished me
Who am first-born daughter of summer.

Woe is me! Before the nations arose
Children played about me,
And I mingled my laughter with their singing;
Women went out to the harvest with their mates,
And there were merry-makings
And songs of ingathering.

Alas! that men have stripped me and ravished me
And have gone forth to battle for my beauty.
God will avenge me. He will strike them.
With fiery bolts from heaven shall he stop them;
And again there shall be quiet fields
And rustling grasses and sunset songs
And sweet night crooning.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

"I Did Not Understand"

I HEARD the human heart's most bitter cry
When death had left its utter silence there;
Remorse was in it—an abandonment of grief,
Regret had her dark share
In that lone cry of anguished love and loss,
Which grief, regret, remorse to utterance fanned,—
"Not understood"—was this love's cruellest cross?
Nay, it was this:—"I did not understand."

A Personal Experience

By Sherwood Eddy

IN the midst of our comparatively peaceful and ordered life in 1914, there was a violent interruption—"then came the war." We have seen the world and all our life revealed in the lurid light of that terrible ordeal. Our modern civilization has been passing through the fires of destruction. Over much of our life there is written in the flaming judgment of war: "Weighed in the balance, and found wanting." Those of us who saw service at the front, or who were with our young men going through this terrible ordeal, had to face overwhelming problems. Some of us had to re-think our position on many of the fundamentals of life, and deeper than our conscious processes of thought, down in the realm of the sub-conscious, changes were taking place within us. The writer desires to make a personal confession and speak quite freely regarding a transition which he finds has taken place within himself.

For myself, I find that the war has wrought three changes in my own life. It has given me a new vision of ideals, a new vision of human need, and a new vision of possibility. As a result, I find a new and larger view of the gospel, embracing two hemispheres of its full-orbed reality, or two poles between which life moves in a full current of power, that is, the individual and the social gospel.

NEW VISION OF IDEALS

First of all, I found at the end of the war a new vision of ideals. It was not that the ideals themselves were new, but they were lit up with a new light; they had become central, focal, and dynamic. These were the three ideals for which the world professed to have been fighting in the war: Democracy, Freedom and Right. We claimed that we were fighting for Democracy against Autocracy, for Freedom against Militarism, for Right against Might. Gradually these ideals—not as mere catch words or phrases of a narrow and exclusive nationalism—came to represent three universal realities of life. I found a new conception of Democracy, not only as a protest against Prussian autocracy, but against all autocratic privilege that crushed, repressed, or hindered the full development of every common man. I found that democracy had come to mean not only government of the people, for the people, by the people, but that all of education, all of privilege, of wealth, of leisure, of culture; in short, all of life under God, was meant to be of the people, for the people, and growingly to be administered by the people. It must be no longer for the favored few, but for all men; not for Belgium alone, but for all backward and exploited nations, small or great; not for the white race alone, but equally for the darker races; not for one class alone, but for all classes and conditions of men. I found that this desire for life, and life more abundantly for all my brother men, had become a purpose and a passion which could not be put by or laid aside. It now possessed me.

The war left me with a new vision of freedom; not alone freedom from Prussian militarism, but from all militarism, from all the coercive force of merciless competition that would exploit, or crush, or repress men. There must be freedom as an inalienable birthright, in the sense of an equal opportunity of self-realization for all men, all nations, all races, and all classes alike. Hegel tells us in his "Philosophy of History" that the orient had conceived that one is free; that the Greeks had believed that some are free; but that we must now realize that all are free. And this freedom cannot be limited to certain water-tight compartments, but must be extended to all spheres of life—religious, political, social, and industrial. As Lincoln showed that we could not have a nation half free and half slave, so we cannot have a world divided between free nations and enslaved nations, free races and exploited races, free classes and repressed classes. We must be free not only from the kaiser, but from all tyranny, and the blind cry of the war, "Kill the kaiser," must be extended to that spirit of autocracy and of coercive force that lies within our own land, within our own industry, within our own hearts. There is something of the spirit of the kaiser and of the czar in all of us, whether we belong to the ranks of capital or of labor. It must be dethroned if all men are to be free.

The war had given a new vision of the ideal of right, or righteousness. Not only must we assert the right of men against Prussian might, but against all organized oppression, against all injustice whether it was Prussian, or British, or American; whether autocratic, aristocratic, or plutocratic. The war forced men not only to fight, but to think. It showed that it was not Prussia alone that lacked these ideals. As we had said to Germany, we must now say to ourselves that there could be no peace that was not based on right; no crying of "peace, peace!" to cover a monstrous wrong; and that nothing could be settled until it was settled right. The war had raised the abiding issue of righteousness.

VAST HUMAN NEED

The war left me with a new vision of human need. As on those battlefields at night, I now saw the world in the lurid light of war; it was lit up in that vast conflagration, it was revealed in that piercing searchlight. It was not a war of heroics, of dress parades, of patriotic speeches when seen at the front. It was a thing of horrible and hellish reality.

But the light of that great conflagration revealed not only the war, but the world that had caused it. It showed the failure of the system that had produced it. It revealed a mercenary commercialism, a grasping greed, a merciless competition, an autocratic capitalism, an unhealthy congestion of privilege, of power, of wealth, in the hands of a few,—a vast power over the many. It forced one to examine anew this whole system of commercial war that led to military slaughter. It forced one to ask, "Is it right to grow rich in a poor world, to possess a monopoly of privilege, such that we would employ organized destruction and the mass murder of warfare to maintain it?" Was the system itself right that had caused this war?

The conflagration showed that our present social order is slaying humanity in time of peace, as well as in war. In favored America alone, nearly a million persons every year are injured in industry. Even in normal times, two million are unemployed much of every year. Ten millions are habitually living in poverty in America. In this one land, ten millions now living will die prematurely of preventable diseases, a number equal to the entire mortality of soldiers in the world war. The poor are dying at three times the death rate of the well-to-do, and seven times our death rate from tuberculosis. The war taught one to feel a new sympathy with suffering humanity, exploited in war and peace alike. Summing up the situation in Europe, Mr. Hoover showed that four hundred millions had toiled and worked to support a leisure class and to intrench their privileges by armies maintained by a forced draft from these toiling millions.

Thus, at the end of the war I had a new vision of human need and of suffering and exploited humanity, toiling, fighting, living, dying—for what, and for whom? Was it for this that the sons of God were made? Was humanity merely the raw material to supply the demands of commercialism, competition, and militarism?

A REVELATION OF HOPE

And all this brought to me a new vision of possibility. There came a conviction that these ideals could actually be realized, that this human need could be relieved, that the conditions that produced the war were not natural, normal, or inevitable. There was a new sense of possibility of accomplishment. There came a new identification with Christian ideals on the one hand, and the need of men on the other. I now found that I was one of them. I had always taken a certain academic interest in social and industrial problems. I had read the books of Rauschenbush, and had felt the need of helping the poor, but after the war it was different. I found that my interests were bound up with theirs, inseparable from theirs, that I was hungry, thirsty, sick, a stranger, and in prison. There came some sense, at least, of what our Lord must have meant when he said, "I was hungry, and ye gave me meat."

I could not possibly go back to the old life. I could not approve the old social order, just as I could not have walked back from the cross in unbroken fellowship with the men who had driven the nails into the hands of the Master. I could not now accept an unchristian social order that has war at its very heart, that is founded on a merciless competition which is itself incipient war and leads on to military destruction. I saw that we must get a new world, or else there would be a new war. We had fought to make the world safe for democracy. But was it safe now for democracy, or plutocracy? Was it safe for all men, or for a privileged few?

There had come a new sense of social solidarity, a new sense that we are members one of another, that we are our brother's keeper, that we suffer together, that we are guilty together, and that together, with the social mind and will, we can achieve unmeasured accomplishment, limited only by the perfect will of God.

SOCIAL SOLIDARITY

And now the war is over and the world is in the making. We are in the midst of one of the great migrations of the human spirit. We stand at the beginning of a new epoch in history. The tides of democracy are sweeping round the world, and we face three great problems caused by the common awakening of humanity in three spheres of life. There is the problem of national strife, of race strife, and most serious of all, of class or industrial strife. There is no stable equilibrium, no lasting solution, save in democracy, in freedom, and in righteousness for all men. We cannot maintain a balance of power and dominance of privilege for a single nation, or a single white race, or a single class. There must be life more abundant, life and love for all, or else privilege for a few and war for all,—war that must ever go on killing to maintain privilege.

Do we worship a living Christ to whom all power is given in heaven and on earth, or a dead idol? Do we believe that the ultimate power of the universe is behind the man that dares to do the will of God? The stars in their courses are fighting for us. We are in league not only with the stones of the field and the powers of nature, but with the moral order of the universe. God is for us; then nothing is impossible. There is no evil so deep or so high, so strong or so intrenched, that it cannot be overthrown. There is no good so great that it cannot be achieved. If militant love does not take the field, war will be upon us again. At the end of it all, we believe in God. We believe in humanity. We believe in good. We believe that God's in his heaven, and if all is not right, it yet may be and shall be right with the world. We can do all things in him that strengtheneth us. And God is marching on.

Creation

MAN in the making! God watched him with pride, Striving to shake off the marks of the clod.
"How can I make him more splendid," he sighed,
"Shape him still more in the image of God?"
Then as his thought, like a flame, lit the sky,
God turned and spoke to the angels that wait,
"Lo, he shall thrill with it, even as I;
He shall be godly, for he shall create."

Thus was the furious measure of bliss
Kindled in man, an insatiate fire,
God's very joy is no wilder than this
Lust of creation, this grappling desire,
The passion that surges like wave upon wave,
Imperative travail, this hand at the heart,
Aye, He was God when He lavishly gave
To the mother her child, to the artist his art.

LOUIS UNTERMAYER.

What is a Liberal Christian?

By W. R. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's

I SHALL try not so much to state my own views as to give some account of the positions of the school of thought to which some of my friends belong and with which I am in partial sympathy. I wish first to say one thing. We constantly hear from laymen that a clergyman is a man who is paid to say certain things, to advocate certain views, and if he feels that he cannot honestly advocate those views or say those things he ought to choose some other profession. Within certain limits that is true. If a man does not believe in the divinity of Christ, he has no right to be a clergyman; if he does not believe in the morality which Jesus Christ came to teach and the standard of values which He came to reveal, he has no right to be a clergyman. But we clergy are not cheap-jacks who are paid to sell certain wares, whatever we may think about the value of them. We are not hired advocates whose business it is to speak to our brief whether we believe in the rightness of our cause or not. No; we are servants of the Spirit of truth whom Jesus Christ promised to send, who was to guide us into all truth, and to teach mankind by degrees, as they were able to bear it, certain things, which Jesus Christ said "ye cannot bear now."

A FREE PULPIT

Just reflect for a moment what the result would have been if these gentlemen had had their way, and if all expressions of free thought had been stifled within the church. The church would now be committed to the belief that the sun goes round the earth, that heaven is a place over our heads which we might reach in an æroplane if we knew the way, that hell is a place under our feet, and as the mediæval theologians suggested, volcanic eruptions are caused by overcrowding in the infernal regions. We should be committed to the belief that the world was created six thousand years ago, and many other things which no educated people can or do believe. I say quite deliberately that if all liberalism and all free thought had been crushed within the church there would be no room in the ministry of the church today except for fools, liars and bigots.

Now there is no unity or uniformity in the results at which the so-called modernists or liberals have arrived. Some are orthodox, and others hold views which nearly all Christians would repudiate. But they are united in the belief that the church is called to face all difficulties and to attempt to solve them by unfettered inquiry. They do not hold that authority or tradition has settled everything, so that we have only to accept the formulas drawn up in the early centuries. They think that we must take into account recent developments in philosophy, in history, in criticism, and perhaps above all in science. They think that all knowledge is in various degrees a divine revelation, and that we are bound to consider how it affects traditional doctrines. They do not see any unfaithfulness in this; rather they are profoundly convinced that honest and reverent inquiry cannot lead them far from Christ, and the honest mistakes which they are quite prepared for are a necessary stage in the proving of the truth.

EARLY CHANGES IN CHRISTIANITY

It is only lately that we are in a position to realize the enormous changes which Christianity passed through in the first centuries of its existence, changes far greater than any which it is called upon to make now. It is not certain what Christ told his disciples about himself. If he told them that he was the Messiah what did he mean by the word? They thought apparently that he was come as the Messiah designate, as his own forerunner so to speak, and that before very long he would come again in glory and establish a theocratic kingdom at Jerusalem: "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" was a question asked by the disciples of their risen Master. But on the whole the Christology, the doctrine of Christ, in the first three gospels, is rather one of apothecosis than of incarnation; and in St. Paul we trace the gradual decline of the Messianic idea, and the growth of an incarnational theology. And finally, in the author of the fourth gospel, whom we call St. John, who carried the doctrines of St. Paul to their logical conclusion, messiahism is practically abandoned, and the incarnation, with the gift of the Holy Spirit, takes the place of the expected second coming. The kingdom is spiritual, not political, and eternal life, as St. John plainly teaches, is a state, and not a place or time. "We have passed through death unto life because we love the brethren. This is life eternal, that ye should know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent."

That, I say, is a greater change than has taken place ever since in the Christian religion. Christianity was then still fluid, like molten metal. Then after that there followed a cooling process during the long controversies about the Person of Christ. At last the creeds were fixed, not so much because the final truth had been reached as because dogma had hardened and congealed. Next followed the rigid dark ages in which all thought, so far as it existed at all, was shadowed and dimmed. After that came the age of the schoolmen, St. Thomas Aquinas and the others, who built up a really great Christian philosophy based on Aristotle and Plato, whom they Christianized: a philosophy which is still valuable, only at that time science and history and criticism could hardly be said to exist.

DARWIN AND GALILEO

The modern theory has added enormously to secular knowledge. The most momentous discovery was not that of Darwin but that of Galileo long before, the discovery that the earth goes round the sun, instead of being the center of the universe. Now the other theory, that the earth was the center of the universe, is the framework of all traditional theology, with its local heaven and hell, and its bodily resurrection and ascension; and although we have given up now the notion that the earth is the center of the universe we have not most of us realized what great difficulties that change puts us in about the resurrection of the body, whether Christ's body or our own. If heaven is a state not a place, what are we to believe about our bodies there, what use could we have for our bodies? St. Paul's belief seems to have been, as he says in First Corinthians, "Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God," but that what he called a spiritual body, not of flesh and blood, not the same body we have here, is being prepared for us, to enable us to live under the conditions of the spiritual world. It is a spiritual conception, and that was what he believed, that a spiritual body is being prepared for us, and that is not quite the same as the popular teaching of the church later.

Of course, the philosophical problems about time and eternity were quite familiar to the old theologians and the mediæval schoolmen. It has always been quite orthodox to say that God has his center everywhere and his circumference nowhere: a saying which of course disposes of the idea of a local heaven. Thinkers like St. Augustine fully recognized that eternity is not an endless succession of moments of time, that it differs from time qualitatively and not quantitatively, and there is a real chasm between this Christian philosophy which, as I have said, is orthodox, and the rather crude picture of theology which is ignorantly supposed by many to be the only view of the last things which is tenable by Christians.

DISAPPEARANCE OF MIRACLE

Then another great change has come about insensibly, I mean the disappearance of miracle from the world of common experience. The time is passed when every Christian felt obliged to maintain the literal historical truth of Balaam's ass, Jonah and the whale, and the standing still of the sun in the valley of Ajalon recorded in the Book of Jasher. Indeed, if we take representatives of the more faithful of the orthodox theologians we shall find them willing to take an agnostic view, or even to deny all, or nearly all the miracles of the Old Testament: only they wished to hold fast by the bodily resurrection and the virgin birth of Jesus Christ. Their common argument is: Christ was wholly unique, and therefore it is reasonable to suppose that wholly unique events attended his entry into the world and his leaving it. Granted that such things are impossible, or at least that they do not happen to anyone else, that is no argument against their being true of Christ, who was not as other men.

I do not wish to impugn that argument at all, but I do wish to remark that it is not catholic orthodoxy. The catholic doctrine is that there are two orders, the natural order and the supernatural order, which are dovetailed into each other; they are two systems of actually existing and operative law. According to this catholic orthodox doctrine, the miracles in the creeds are, as miracles, anything but unique; they are only striking examples of the supernatural order, a class of phenomena which are frequently set in motion by persons of unusual sanctity, or when there is any special reason for a divine interposition. Indeed in the Bible and in the church it has been usually supposed that diabolical agencies are also capable of working wonders, and that doctrine is still the doctrine of the great Roman Catholic church. To this day no one can be canonized as a saint in that church without having three miracles placed to his credit. I am told by a man who is generally very accurate that at a recent canonization two of the three miracles that were put down to the credit of the saint were as follows: The saint found a fishwife weeping because her fish had gone bad. The saint made the sign of the cross over them, and they became fresh again. The second miracle was that an ox had been stolen from the monastery, and the monks suspected that it had found its way to a butcher's shop. The saint went to the shop where a large number of joints which belonged to the stolen ox jumped off their hooks, the missing portions of the carcass were miraculously restored, and the ox walked out of the shop after the saint. Those are the kind of miracles which were officially regarded by the Roman Church as the necessary condition of anyone being called a saint.

NO LONGER BELIEVED

Now that is the theory which none of us believes in, and it is also the theory with which science can make no terms. If the same event can be caused in totally different ways, either by natural or supernatural causation, the whole presuppositions of science are upset. That is the catholic doctrine, that is a doctrine which no educated man in this country believes in. And you will see that this increases the difficulty in asserting dogmatically the truth of the miracles in the New Testament. We value them as unique, but the catholic orthodox doctrine is that their value is not unique, and their unique occurrence in the past has not very much value because it proves no law, although it may be the normal accompaniment of some unique fact. A comet may have passed through the sun's orbit a thousands years ago never to return; that is a fact, but it is as unimportant a fact as any fact can be because it is unconnected with anything that goes on now. Therefore to thoughtful people today, as far from the truth of the Christian revelation depending on the miracles, it is the miracles which must depend on the revelation.

My liberal friends, without in any way denying the miracles of the creeds or of the New Testament, feel that we ought not to build upon them. If we accept them we ought not to accept them as being the consequences of that incarnation, the divinity of Christ which we believe on other grounds, and many of them would say the evidence for these wonderful events is not sufficient to make them certain, because they are quite unique; and therefore they would say, if we believe in the divinity of Christ, we do wish to be allowed to suspend our judgment to a certain extent about these miracles; we do not feel quite certain whether they are part of the order or not.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE

Now that is, I think, the main difficulty which the liberal churchman feels in accepting the orthodox position, and I do agree with him so far as this, that we must come to some reconciliation between religion and science. I quite admit that science is an abstract study, that it cannot give us a complete, true view of the world as it is, because science is obliged, for its own objects, to neglect very important aspects of reality. Science neglects and puts on one side all values which it cannot measure, but religion is bound to attempt a wider and a more comprehensive synthesis. Religion must aim to satisfy all the wants of human nature, and bring together so far as it can all kinds of knowledge, so far as they affect man's higher interests. Therefore we may fully admit that the catholic scheme, including all the miracles, is an attempt at a deeper and higher truth than science can ever arrive at. But at the same time it is brought into very sharp conflict with scientific truth, which is, in itself, a divine revelation, if only a partial one; and we shall never have peace until that great difficulty is somehow solved. It has not yet been solved. There is still that very grave contradiction between the world as it appears to science, and the world as it appears to orthodox Christianity. I hope that will show why it is that the liberal churchman feels bound to continue to say his say and to work towards the solution of a difficulty which he feels very deeply.

Liberal Christians are by no means all of one school. There are really three kinds of them. The first, with which I have far the most sympathy, is the school of Christian philosophers, Christian Platonists. That has been a very old and perfectly legitimate position in the church, in our own church among others. Secondly, there are the Liberal Protestants, chiefly in Germany, who have given great attention to the teaching and the morality and the example of Jesus Christ. They are very strong on that side, but they are weak on the institutional side. Some of them have no eschatology, no real belief in a future life. Some of them may be said to worship a dead church. On the whole they bid us to come back to the original gospel as if everything that had happened since was rather a falling off and declension from the purity of the first revelation. Still, on one side, they have a great deal to teach us. Harnack's "What Is Christianity?" is as good a book to set forth that view of religion as any I know.

THE MODERNISTS

Then on the other side we have the modernists, properly so-called, the Roman Catholic modernists, of whom Loisy, until he left the church, was the ablest representative. They go very much further in subversive criticism than the liberal Protestants. They represent our blessed Lord as a mere prophet, really almost in the same class as Judas of Galilee, who believed that the world was coming to a violent end in a very short time, and that God was going to establish his miraculous kingdom for which Christ was come to prepare us. They fully admit that those prophecies were not realized, but what they say is that the church has grown historically out of that brief teaching of Christ, and that as the church presumably was meant to exist, so all the chameleon-like changes which the church has undergone are justifiable because they were necessary. It seems to me that they really cut the connection between the institutional church and the historical Jesus of Nazareth. If you read any of their books I think you will see that they really do, and Loisy himself, who has ceased to call himself a Christian, has admitted that his views are irreconcilable with those of the church.

So I want you to consider that we have these three very different kinds of liberal Christian, and the two last, the liberal Protestants and the liberal Catholics, are each strong where the other is weak. If we could put the two together, which we cannot do, we might get something like the full Christian scheme. What I feel myself is that the time is ripe for a new Christian philosophy, something which will take up those very able and subtle speculations of the mediæval schoolmen and bring them up to date, taking into full account and giving full weight and value to all the recent discoveries that have been made. It is only in this direction that I see any hope that the church will reconcile the very great intellectual difficulties which confront it, and I think that in doing that we shall not be breaking out into any new line but following up that orthodox tradition which really goes right back to St. Paul and St. John, and was taken up after them by the best of the Greek fathers, men like Origen and Gregory and Basil, which was revived as soon as European thought began, at the time of the schoolmen, and which has never been without witness at any time when Christianity has been faithfully preached and honestly thought out. It is in that school, and not either in the liberal Protestant or the liberal Catholic, that I see hope for the future. However, I did not mean to tell you about my own views but just to give you as shortly as I could an account of what the position of the liberal churchman now is; and although most of you will not agree with them I hope you will not go away saying that they are dishonest, bad men. They are doing their best.

What is a Gun?

By Scott Nearing

DIPLOMATS, assembled in Washington, are attempting to decrease the number of big guns on the sea. The Federal Council of Churches, through its commission on international justice and good will, has issued "a creed for believers in a warless world" in which the first point is: "We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments." The millions everywhere are hoping, praying, yearning that something may come out of it all. The people want peace! What chance have they to get it?

The world still believes in guns.

The diplomats are not proposing to abolish navies and armies. They are merely proposing to decrease the number of armed vessels.

The Federal Council of Churches is not proposing to abolish armament, but to reduce it. Neither the state nor the church is willing to give up guns.

What is a gun?

A gun is the lineal descendant of the club, the spear, the bow and arrow, the sword. It is the modern weapon of defense and offense. It has many uses in many hands. Perhaps it will not be amiss to name a few of them.

1. A gun is a weapon used by the strong while they exploit and rob the weak.

Guns were the weapons of the British Empire when, in the course of two bitter wars, she forced the detested opium on the Chinese; guns are the devices that she now relies on to keep the natives of India in subjection; guns were the means by which Cortez conquered and plundered Mexico; guns were our weapons in Hayti; guns, in the hands of the hired thugs of the steel companies and coal companies are used to drive the workers back to their jobs. The ruling class uses the gun to guarantee its right to continue ruling. If it were not for the guns in the hands of the police and the military, how long could the profiteers continue to live like stall-fed cattle while the workers sleep in the parks and beg for jobs?

2. A gun is the means of avenging wrong and punishing the guilty.

The Germans were held to be a guilty nation. Therefore the allies took guns in their hands and went out to destroy them. A few years before, the Spaniards were supposed to be treating the Cubans badly, and, after the sinking of the Maine, the United States went gunning for Spaniards. The gun is the weapon of vengeance.

3. A gun is the means of winning freedom and of protecting liberty.

General Washington led soldiers, whose purpose it was to free themselves from the tyranny of the mother-country. Bolivar, Mazzini, Aguirre, Cromwell used the gun to punish the tyranny.

4. A gun is a means for defending the weak and the innocent against the strong and the tyrannous.

When the hearth of the settler is threatened, he takes a gun in his hands to defend himself. The enemy, approaching the shores of the country, is met by the guns along the sea-coast. The robber, jimmying open the window, finds himself looking into the muzzle of a gun.

Whether as a weapon of offense or of defense, a gun is the chief reliance of them that kill the body,—either to perpetuate injustice or to establish justice. The gun is today what the sword was yesterday, the instrument of man's might.

But—

"The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit."

"They that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

"Vengeance is mine. I will repay."

"Thou shalt not kill."

Throughout the teachings of the gospels there is no such passage as: "Kill in self-defense" or "Use swords to preserve law and order." On the contrary, the command is explicit: "Love one another," even "them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

Were these the words of a coward? Quite the contrary, they were the words of a man who showed extraordinary courage in the face of the most terrible suffering. They are not the counsel of a person who believed in running away, but of one who felt that there were better weapons than swords. "Fear not them that kill the body," he counseled. "Love your enemies!"

It is of no avail to reduce "the number of guns in the community." So long as people believe that human difficulties can be met and settled by guns the damage will be done just the same. Even if there were no more guns, while men still believe in the use of violence to achieve their ends, some other weapon of destruction will be found—if nothing else is available, a stone or a club will do the work.

The world is divided into two camps—gun-men and love-men. The gunmen believe in and use guns. The love-men believe in and use love. Which is the mightier? In the end, which will prevail?

The Republic of God

By John Andrew Holmes

IT is more expedient to combat the ideas of men than to contradict their phrases. Israel had come to love the expression, "the kingdom of God," and Jesus did well to adopt it. Moreover, his times afforded no more fitting name for the divine project so close to his heart. Yet if he were entering upon his mission today I think he would change one word. He would announce the Republic of God. Democratic in fact is the society Christ came to establish. To set up a kingdom would have been the work of a moment, but he chose, however much time it might take, to build a more spiritual order.

A kingdom is a thing of this world: that order is not of this world. A kingdom comes by martial weapons: that order comes not by violence. A kingdom comes with outward pomp and splendor: that order comes not with observation. A kingdom always fails to become world-wide: that order is destined to fill the earth. A kingdom comes by revolution: that order evolves. A kingdom rises and falls: that order shall last forever. A kingdom is set up: that order is sown. A kingdom comes over men: that order comes within them. A kingdom comes by power: that order comes by prayer—"Thy kingdom come." There is a deeper distinction between the two terms. A king is essentially one who seizes or inherits power, and who exercises it to suit himself, rather than one whom the people elect to rule as they would like.

Kings, of course, are now almost extinct, except in name. George the Fifth, for instance, is not a real king; he is only an ornament, with which the English people love to deck their plain democracy. Most "kings" of today have been rendered harmless: they are lions still, but only social lions, whose drink is not blood, but frappe. A genuine king—of the sort that flourished in Jesus' day—scorns constitutions and popular votes, working his own will regardless of others. And this is what God does not do. Never has there been a day when the crown of the world was beyond his reach. Never has he been without the power to rule the world as he should. Yet never has he used such power. Always has he stood for democracy. Not as his helpless subject, but as a free citizen of a self-governed world, has he preferred to look upon every one. To the good man and to the evil alike, to the wise and to the foolish, has he said: "I give you freedom: you may do as you please."

A startling fact when one stops to consider! God saying to weak and erring man: "I do not insist upon having my way. You may choose that way if you will, but your will be done. God is and was the world's first democrat. Men are to have their way, both in their individual lives and in their common affairs, so long as it remains their way.

Yet out of this poor democracy of men he is evolving, however slowly, the democracy of God. As Jesus abdicated the throne that men had prepared for him, preferring to sit at the teacher's desk and to stand in the preacher's pulpit, so God will not drive his people at the point of the sword, but will evermore persuade them to make his will theirs. The "kingdom of God" is rather a sublime democracy, in which men are not required to surrender their sovereignty, but in which their wills rise to unison with his. His sway is by virtue of the votes of men, and it awaits the hour when the Lord of Heaven shall be elected to rule in all human domains.

"It is a vision waiting and aware,
And you must draw it down, O man of worth;
Draw down the new republic held in air,
And make for it foundations on the earth."

The Worst Thing in the World

By Thomas F. Opie

"WHAT is the Great Evil of our times?" This was the query the Lawyer put to the Parson as they sat in the latter's study, discussing affairs in general.

"That's a poser, Mr. Solon," I replied. "Let's have your opinion first. You have been giving the matter some thought, else you would not have asked the question."

"International disharmony and disruption, is the answer to my own question," said the Lawyer.

I knew that my friend had what I call the universal mind, the world-wide outlook, and so I was not greatly surprised at his reply.

"How farcical it seems," he continued, "for nations and peoples to vie with one another in pursuit of commercial and financial advantage, for example. How ridiculous and perilous for one country to envy another its territorial possessions and advantages! These things always lead to trouble and often to war, as the blood-red pages of six thousand years of history attest. Is it not strange that nations learn so little from the past? Is not the most colossal evil of the age international greed, cupidity and dishonesty?"

"Now, Mr. Solon, if you had said slavery, liquor, immorality, the subjugation of talent, of soul and body to commercial greed, or else the oppression of the Armenians by the Turks, or some such concrete evil as these, or perhaps the world war; if you had advanced one of these as the greatest tragedy of the age, I would possibly be able to argue with you. But still I am not disposed to accept your rather abstract 'world-wide lack of national and social accord' as the day's greatest evil. I have been thinking of something concrete which to my mind is worse than slavery; worse than commercialism; worse than war; worse than any of these things which we have cited. This thing that I think of makes all the others possible, and alone, I believe, keeps the world from reaching a high ideal of brotherhood and harmony."

My legal friend flicked his cigar, looked thoughtful, and asked, "What is this essence of concrete damnation that you have in mind, Parson?"

"Well, sir, I do not expect you to agree with me, but in my humble opinion denominationalism is the crying shame of the age—the world's great tragedy of today. The church's sectarianism is the cancer on the body of the world."

This was my reply, but I had not the least idea that the Lawyer would agree. I looked for an argument, as it was plain my unexpected reply had put my Blackstonian friend to thinking.

"I understand you to contend that the fact of a divided church is the most appalling fact of the present generation," said the Lawyer. "Well, that's going some. Worse than individual immorality; worse than subsidized politics; worse than the liquor evil; worse than slavery; worse than international strife and war! Is that your contention, Parson?"

"Yes," I replied, holding my ground, and trying to be convincing, because on the surface, this condemnatory pillorying of denominationalism did seem rather rash hyperbole. "My friend," I went on, "a heartily united church would reduce individual and social sin a hundred fold, I dare say, it would make wholesale political and industrial injustice a dangerous business for its promoters.

"It would make war all but impossible. Why, man alive, six hundred million real Christians, bound by a common oath, a common brotherhood, a sanctified and uniform purpose, ecumenically operated upon and directed by the Holy Spirit of God, could literally shame the world into universal peace and amity."

While I was getting my breath after this delivery of what had become a fiery obsession with me, the Lawyer sat thinking, and the Doctor came in.

"What are you high-brows quarreling about?" asked the Medico. "You look like a pair of funerals."

"Just talking about the hundred and fifty-seven varieties of sectarianism in the land," I answered. "I say denominationalism is a colossal crime, a cancer on the soul of the world—the defeater of its own exalted purposes, a mockery on the Fatherhood of God and a travesty on the Brotherhood of Man."

"Well, that's some diagnosis," said the Doctor. "I knew it was a bad case, but didn't know it was as bad as that. But coming down to the concrete, I'll say it is a curse to this community."

"There you are, Mr. Solon," I cried—"a curse to this community! Yes, and to every other community in the land. No religious solidarity, no unity of spiritual purpose, no economy of effort, nor time, nor money! I tell you, it is impossible to create a mass consciousness, much less a mass conscience—and as for a national or international concert of will, or an effort for the good of the human race, such a thing is utterly impossible. And why? Denominational jealousy, sectarian rivalry—so-called Christian little-mindedness, and lack of social sense."

"Parson, you are getting abstract, I fear," put in the Doctor. "I came in here to discuss this very thing you are talking about. There is no organization in this city whose efforts I can enlist in a community-wide health and hygienic campaign. As far as the church is concerned, men, women and children can literally roll in filth and wallow in germs, so long as 'Brother So-and-So' has a successful revival, or so long as 'Sister So-and-So' manages to get together dollars enough to put in a new church organ, or a new carpet, or something or other, the health of the town can go hang."

"That reminds me," followed the Lawyer; "a committee waited on me yesterday to ask if I would head a movement for a public library. Why shouldn't the church get behind movements of this kind? What is religion, anyway? Is it an individual fire insurance on the soul against the day of judgment, or is it something social and world-wide in its outlook? If the church were consolidated it could foster all kinds of efforts for physical, cultural and religious betterment in a community, and in a chaotic world."

"Yes, and a united church could redeem the world from physical destruction, intellectual prostitution and spiritual chaos," I said, taking up the Lawyer's idea; "God is one; this universe is one; the world is one; the human family is one—'God has made of one all nations.' We live on a sphere, not a hemisphere. Even the geographers have this divisive spirit!"

"But does not denominationalism foster wholesome competition?" asked the Lawyer.

"Competition may be the life of trade," I replied, "but I question if it is the life of the church. It engenders friction, illtemper, jealousy, pride and numerous other ills that are not compatible with a true Christian spirit. This, I believe, is why the church has lost her hold on the masses. We know what competition between denominational bodies does; we do not know what splendid results would accrue to the church and the spiritual status of the world if the church were really one. The community church, as an experiment, has shown in a limited sense what can be done in the way of practical unity. It works."

"Parson, you will have to kill off a lot of folks who think their church is the best church or the only church before you have Christian unity." This from the Doctor. "And you will have to overthrow the whole fabric of Christian organization. The general body of each denomination is dependent upon the several local churches in every community. This creates a problem hard to solve."

"Yes, Doctor, that is true," I replied. "As a diagnostician you have put your finger on the sore. Selfishness is the denominational disease. Certain men and women do not want God's family to worship as one, for fear the particular nature of that worship may not conform to their individual or several tastes, or opinions. Well, they must be converted from the sin of selfishness or else we shall have to wait until they die and go to their appointed place. Meanwhile we must use every effort to enlarge the outlook and broaden the mind of coming generations. If we do not take definite steps now, ultimate unity must be delayed by fifty or a hundred years or more. Ultimate Christian unity was foreseen by Christ and was his desire and earnest prayer—that they may be one, even as we are.' St. John asserts that Christ definitely announced, 'There shall be one fold and one shepherd.'"

"I was talking to a Banker on the needless waste of funds in the churches," continued the Lawyer. "He said that no business in the world could have survived the divisiveness and lack of method and economy to be found in denominationalism. Take the average town and small city, he said. Think of Christ running five or six separate churches with the same purpose in a town of from 3,000 to 15,000 people! Salaries for five pastors instead of for one or two. Cost of five different buildings with costly upkeep, five sextons, five heating and lighting plants, five costly organs and furniture and equipment! Now if these five churches were flourishing, well-supported, well-attended, harmonious and actually effective, it would not be so ludicrous; but as it is, it is unchristian, uneconomic, senseless and absurd."

"Banker is quite right," I ventured. "Trust the financier to see the business end of the travesty. Think of four-fifths of the money now required to church the average town, multiplied by tens of thousands of such to be found in the land, being released for missionary and benevolent and educational and sanitary and social purposes! Little wonder the world has not long ago been won to Christ! Little wonder that no funds are available adequately to supply and equip the Christian army in foreign fields. I tell you it is a colossal spiritual tragedy, a crime committed in the name of the Savior!"

"Ever read Dr. H. S. Coffin's 'Lyman Beecher Lectures at Yale'?" inquired the Doctor. "In one of them he says, 'Denominationalism leaves home missionary societies too straitened to supply in many places the sort of church adequate for local needs. . . . There ought to be a saving in the cost of operation that would be a substantial gain to the church's power to contribute to foreign missions and benevolences.'"

"Proper economy at home would insure proper support abroad. Is that it?" asked the Lawyer. "Well, it would seem that after nearly two thousand years the church ought to have carried the gospel of the Savior to the teeming millions in India and to the hundreds of millions in China, whose mere fringes have just been touched. Too much rivalry and extravagance and selfishness at home. Is it true that the devotees of oriental cults greatly outnumber the followers of Christ, Parson?"

"I blush to admit it," I replied. "How the very civilization which we enjoy should shame us when we think of conditions in the east, even in the very country where Christ lived and wrought his works of love!"

"But getting back to our own community, which is, I take it, typical of thousands of cities all over the land," put in the Medico, "Dr. Coffin is right when he contends that rival churches give the community no sense of religious solidarity, that fundamental oneness from which other much needed harmonies will spring. Social vision leads men to view a city or a rural region as a unit, but denominationalism prevents any unified plan, as Dr. Coffin puts it."

"Fact is," said the Lawyer, "when we consider the way the church has been mismanaged; how it has fought bloody wars in its own household; how denominationalism has made religious education in the schools impossible; how it has divided families and confused the unchurched; how it has reduced itself to mere pious individualism—I think the humorist was right when he said, 'The righteous are like a green bay mule standing by the rivers of water!'"

"Well, it's a pity to convert the psalmist's botanical analogy into an assinal bit of biological absurdity," I plitudinized. "But there is something in it. Stubbornness, self-interest and recalcitrant behavior under pressure are common to both animals—the so-called 'righteous' man and the 'unrighteous' mule!"

"You men are lapsing into transcendental philosophy, I'm afraid," interjected the Physician, "and leaving the realm of practical religion. Let's get back to seriousness and end this discussion. A prominent preacher has said, 'God craves social incarnation in a united church, a dedicated business community, a servant nation.' I would add, 'Yes, and in a God-serving, brother-loving family of nations, a unified world,' 'collective consent to the living God.'"

"Amen!" I said with feeling, "and may we get busy in the spirit of broadminded Christian charity and do what we can to dissolve denominational barriers and bind men and nations into a real familyhood. By the way, wasn't it General Bliss, of the United States army, who said, 'If we have another war, it will be the fault of the Christian church'? Well, that is tantamount to saying it will be the fault of sectarianism! A divided, disgruntled, disaffected church could never forestall a great war; that has been proved. But a united church could make it highly improbable if not impossible."

"You are right," agreed the Lawyer. "Why was the threatened division of the government of this country in the sixties sufficient cause for internecine war, when the actual division of the government of the very church of God is looked upon with no concern—and with actual favor by many narrow sectarians? Is political and government divisiveness (in which the alleged welfare of fifty or a hundred million people and the alleged safety of the national government are concerned) a greater crime than the repeated disruption and schism of the church in which the physical, mental, social, moral and spiritual well-being of over six hundred million Christians is involved? I just ask the question. Can't say that I know the answer, but this thing is a matter affecting directly one-third of the world and indirectly the entire population of the earth. Slavery never involved more than three million slaves at one time, I imagine, and of course it was a terrible crime, unchristian and inhuman. Was it worse than this thing which stays the spiritual freedom of the world and the Christian idealism of governments and peoples everywhere? On the present basis of denominational increase, we may almost look for a private little church for every individual in America—or at least a church for every family! The possibilities are appalling!"

"Yes," I answered. "Ever hear of the man who died and went to heaven, and wanted to be 'put with the Baptists'? St. Peter said, 'They are not here!' 'Well, put me with the Methodists,' said the new arrival. 'They are not here,' repeated the keeper of the celestial gates. 'No Baptists and no Methodists in heaven? That is a shock! Well, put me with the Presbyterians or the Roman Catholics, or the Episcopalians,' continued the neophyte. 'Not here,' said Peter. The astonished man then went through the other denominations one by one. Finally St. Peter smiled, and said reassuringly, 'My friend, representatives of all the denominations are here, but they are United Brethren now!' 'Thank God for heaven!' cried the relieved man, in an ecstasy of feeling. 'Thank God for heaven!'"

Mobilizing for Peace

UNLESS we mobilize public opinion for peace there will never be peace. War has built up its traditions and its machinery and its vested interest is great. A small organized army can control a mass of unorganized people; just so can an organized, well-rooted, long-held idea or custom. President Harding said we want less armament and no war. But why armament at all if no war? For what other purpose is it but for war-making? Of course the effort to discard all armament at once would defeat the project of limiting it at all at this time, but that illustrates the contention that an old idea, well entrenched in history and custom, can be maintained against even a universal desire for peace. These vested ideas and customs cannot be easily overthrown; indeed they cannot be overthrown at all except as we mobilize the peace idea. It can never be done by merely agreeing to a ten-year holiday in naval building. That will leave us all of like comparative military strength and enable us to fight on the same relative grounds as we now hold.

Men fought with sticks and stones before they invented guns and they do it yet when anger waxes hot and guns are not at hand. Changing the weapons does not affect the will to fight. The invention of nearly every more destructive weapon of warfare has brought a demand for its banning as too terrible a weapon of death. Declaring gas outlawed by the rules of war did not prevent its use. The submarine is now most ardently advocated by French, American and English military experts. We have invented more diabolical instruments of war since the Great War than were invented by our enemies in that conflict. Roosevelt once said there was no rule of warfare that would hold in the midst of conflict; it is now amply demonstrated. If we go on making war at all we will go on increasing its terrors and inhumanities. There can no more be a humane war than there can be a virtuous adulterer or an honest thief. The only cure for war is no war.

The "Christian" War Idea

Bernhardi argued that Christianity had nothing to say about international relations. He called it the noblest gift ever made to the human race because it taught the virtues of sacrifice and service. But those virtues were limited to the individual and we must therefore discover the object for which men should sacrifice. He finds love of country the greatest and therefore sacrifice for it the supreme end of vicarious service. Then, if God speaks through history, war is a holy thing for it has always been made, and there is no other way to keep nations virile and give those most civilized power to impose their culture on the less progressive. Therefore to suffer hardship and to die for the fatherland is the loftiest expression of Christian faith and zeal. But the gospel has nothing at all to say to the fatherland about the making of war; there God leaves it to express his will through continuing the historic struggle of peoples for dominance in the faith that in the end the best culture, the finest science, the most progressive civilization will win.

General Roberts, affectionately called "Little Bobs," was the idol of England before the Great War. He was a very zealous churchman and called his household to prayer before breakfast every morning. He was ready to die for English civilization and gave many years of hazardous service to impose it on lesser peoples. He campaigned in Britain a few years before the Great War striving to arouse his fellow-countrymen to a more martial spirit and a larger army. He told them frankly that war was a national necessity, that it made for character and virility and that the people who forsook their martial ways became a weak and flabby folk.

Marshal Foch too is a devoted worshiper. He allows nothing to interfere with his attendance at mass on Sundays and he was found often in prayer during the war. But the great general does not believe in the least that the things said by Christ in the sermon on the mount can now be applied to the two-century strife of France and Germany. He argues consistently for occupation of the Rhineland permanently because military strength alone will make his nation safe. Thus safety for France lies in the Rhine as a barrier against Germany and in the submarine as an eternal warning to England. Thus panoplied, war against peace is made hazardous and Frenchmen can live like Christians with one another. This is to cast no reflections on these great captains; it is to point out the philosophy of the Christian military mind. It is the same conception of the gospel as is accepted by many captains of industry and leaders of labor. It is the interpretation of the gospel that has prevented the church having anything to say about war and strife.

* * *

The Swing Toward Peace

When the war closed the military mind had full sway. It dictated the terms of the Versailles treaty, repudiated the great ideals of the war in the elections immediately following and sought to fasten conscription on the lands that had fought to end the war. Time defeated the campaign for universal military training and time is softening the attitude everywhere toward the terms of the treaty. The Washington conference meets in an auspicious time because it catches the public mind at the turn away from a war state to a reaction against militarism. It opened with a dramatic declaration by Secretary Hughes that served to startle people out of the slothful inertia that accepts whatever is as right. The wise knew there were diplomatic resources in the "acceptance in principle" and the most we hope for still remains to be achieved. Japan will not hold out against the 5-5-3 ratio in naval equipment but no ratio in naval strength means more than a saving of taxation for a time unless there is a change in the relationship between nations that makes war always possible. Certain military men are saying "let them scrap the battleships—they will be in the discard anyhow before the next great war comes; it will be fought with the finer weapons of the radio, in the air, etc."

In a recent address Hudson Maxim declared war would always be so long as human nature was human nature. It is such unfaith as this that must be demobilized; men of that mind would fight with axes if we disarmed altogether. He said the next war would be fought with gas, thin-shelled high-explosives, and perhaps with disease germs. He pictured New York being attacked almost without warning by a fleet of airplanes and said there was only one way under heaven to be safe and that was to have so powerful a fleet of planes that no air-navy could ever develop above an American city. That kind of talk was much listened to a year ago; it is now much less popular than that describing the horrors of such warfare and asking for judicial means to avoid it. There is a distinct swing toward peace in the public mind and there is nothing in all human experience that so much needs to be taken at its tide as such swings in public opinion. The governments of the world today are not idealistic; they are almost without exception conservative in temper, party-minded, much more eager to follow public demands than to create and lead public opinion. Therefore public opinion is the hope of peace in these critical events that hold so much of the future at their immediate disposition.

Making Moral Ideals Effective

It is easy to preach in the abstract, but abstractions count only as they are reduced to concrete, practical, working effectiveness. It has been well said that the church has always been against war but for every war. Barbusse described the airman who, flying over the lines, saw prayers for the success of each of the opposing armies going on back of their respective fronts. This is inevitable once war is on, but the church is not limited to that function in times of peace. General Tasker H. Bliss declares that "if another war like the last should come, they (American Christians) will be responsible for every drop of blood that will be shed." Such a declaration may sound radical; but is it too radical? The church mobilized the moral sentiment of the nation to abolish the saloon. It is no greater task to mobilize it to abolish war, but other nations are involved. If America will play her part in international affairs for the next decade she can effectuate such relationships and set up such effective machinery for the settlement of disputes as will make an end to war.

When the league of nations was proposed the sentiment for it was practically unanimous in the church. The pulpits of America never rang with a more universal note and ninety per cent of the ministry is today for the principle involved in the league of nations. Party-ism made it impossible for pulpits to campaign for the present league but it is not a question of the present league or none—it is only a question of what kind of modifications does America want to make the league acceptable. Europe will scrap Article 10 or anything else that will not destroy the judicial method of settling disputes and holding off the dogs of war until public opinion can exert itself. It is up to America. The league itself will not be scrapped; it is a union of fifty-odd governments; it has vested interests in peace already and it has a vast working organization. Millions who voted for Harding did it because they believed he would have the league covenant modified to suit the great majority of Americans. His vital responsibilities have led him to make many declarations that show his mind open to public pressure on the matter, but he follows public opinion rather than leads it. This is the greatest moral opportunity of the church; let it make a moral crusade and, with America's help the league will make our ideals of peace effective in a working program.

A naval holiday will not insure peace; a permanent league of nations will. It alone can possess the machinery to translate peace principles into effective judicial action and provide a continuing court to make effective a peace program. It is up to America—and it is up to the churches to determine what America will do.

British Table Talk

London, November 22, 1921

OUR eyes are still westward; in the main we are encouraged by the mind of the conference, as it has revealed itself; we held up both hands for the bold proposals of President Harding, but "some doubted"; and unhappily here as elsewhere there are multitudes who do not care:

"The lightning glares and reddens
Across the skies;
It seems but sunset
To those sleeping eyes."

That is the last enemy to be dreaded—the indifference of the crowd. Sometimes one begins to wonder whether we in the church do not need some more startling words wherewith to rouse men. Someone said that we need a moral equivalent of war; sometimes it seems as though we need a moral equivalent of the hell above which our fathers in the faith would suspend the sinners. Were not the prophets of Israel sensational on occasion? Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel—all were driven to boid, and to our sober judgment, sensational methods. Today, if I may quote Dr. Edward Lyttleton's words, "one of the most pestiferous devastating delusions that has ever taken captive the human mind is now rampant in the British Isles. It is that nothing matters very much." Once more that is the real danger on this side. So far as the awakened are concerned there is no lack of faith and hope, but many of us are asleep.

A Mission and the Prophets

My dear friend former colleague Dr. Horton is conducting a series of special services this week in his own church. He has sought to avoid all the traditional associations of an evangelistic mission. The bills simply invite people to attend at certain hours when an attempt will be made to remove the barriers between Christ and men." The entire church has been called to help, in particular, the magnificent clubs of boys and girls, which would be a source of pride to any church. The very subjects show the originality of the plan; on Sunday last Dr. Horton preached on Hosea, and each night of the week he will take one of the prophets of Israel. The sermon on Hosea was, I am told, deeply moving; at the close the Communion of the Lord's Supper was observed and the bread and wine were distributed by eight of the members of the boys' club, who are also members of the church. Lyndhurst Road church was one of the wise churches, which did not forget its boys during the war, and made ready in good time for their return. It has its reward.

The English Bible

A remarkable book can be had from A. M. stationery office at the price of 1s.6d.; it is the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed by the president of the Board of Education to inquire into the position of English in the educational system of England. The leading member of this committee is Sir Henry Newbolt, a fine poet and a discerning critic. There is one recommendation concerning which the Times Literary Supplement has some significant words; they would not be surprising if they had come from a pulpit; but they represent the judgment of those who have a great concern for literature: "It can be truly said that we are a people of books, even of many books, though perhaps no longer of one Book. In that last confession lies one of our present misfortunes, for nothing has in the past kept the nation together so closely uniting all its members in a common language, common thoughts, and common culture, as our English Bible. The Bible used to be easy reading, and in a sense it is easy reading still, for in style and diction it is above all a native product. It was always serious reading, because it was never approached but in reverence and with the desire of instruction, admonition, comfort; and, differently appealed to by different bodies, its word was yet literally and implicitly believed. More than that, it was the common and immediately accessible source for the ordinary English people of a humanism different only in degree from that of the classics. As the practice of reading the Bible, regularly and religiously, at home has decreased, by so much has the nation deliberately impoverished itself."

A Mission and a Drainage Scheme

At Ipswich as elsewhere the problem of unemployment is acute. In that city, as my readers may remember, a mission of a striking character was held recently. It was a mission not to set the claims of the unemployment before men, but to set Christ before them; but because it set Christ faithfully, the other claim was heard also.

"One concrete result has been that the mayor summoned to conference the clergy and ministers, the employers and the trades council, and that, thanks to their meeting, a large drainage scheme upon which an adverse report had been presented, has been accepted by the town council and is to be taken in hand without delay. Unemployment has been relieved almost without having been mentioned; for the town has seen that a first corollary of discipleship is the bearing of one another's burdens." The moral of this seems to be, first that the supreme need of mankind is to know the love of Christ, and second, that when that love is known it should find expression at once. The danger comes when there is a long pause between impression and expression.

Babes at Washington

"For in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven."

Among the mighty who are these
This cloud of shadowy witnesses?
These guests unbidden, with no name,
No speech but wistful eyes that plead
The undefended ages' need?

These are the babes from everyland
Whose angels in the Council stand;
As, undismayed before God's face
They keep their own appointed place;
And they for born and unborn peers
Through all the unpredestined years
Are praying there; that happier days
May come, and long unbroken ways,
That they beneath a brighter sun
May finish noble works begun.

Above the babel of the wise
These pleadings of the babes arise;
Their still small voices never cease,
"Give peace, O man, on earth, give peace."

Other Things

The United Free church of Scotland has chosen the Rev. Donald Fraser for its moderator; he is the well-known missionary in Livingstonia, who has been leading a great missionary campaign in his church. The honor done to him is also a recognition by the church of the place of the missionary service in its life.—That same missionary campaign has appointed the Rev. J. M. E. Ross to have the oversight of its presswork; this again is a significant fact; a church claims the service of one of its most gifted writers for the press side of its campaign; and the press in Scotland is proving most responsive.—Like Mr. Studdert-Kennedy, at least in this one thing, the dean of St. Paul's has been making recantation in a new preface to his Outspoken Essays: "These essays," he says, "contain a few outbursts against the Germans which I know to be unjust but during the war we all sinned together in vilifying our opponents. We now feel that the nations all went stark mad together and brought upon themselves and each other a calamity as unnecessary as it was disastrous. Our plain duty now is to restore the solidarity of European civilization."—A new novel of outstanding power is "The Way of Experience," by Wilfred Ewart, a new writer in this field though not unknown in others; it is like so many modern novels, almost brutally realistic, and it deals with some most vile and degraded beings, but it has imagination and energy of thought which lift it far above most novels of the war. It is not a "nice" book; but it gives a picture of certain phases of life in this land; and it makes the reader think that such a civilization had strands of which Corinth and Pompeii might have been ashamed. But whether these were as they are described in this book, or how large they were, I have no means of knowing.

Advent

On Sunday next we enter a new Advent season. Across the intervening years, few or many, the faithful look to the end; it is described in strange symbolic language; but in the heart of it the Hope is one. There must be an End and a worthy and utterly satisfying End to the long process. Christ must come. But how? In his scholarly essays Mr. Edwyn Bevan wonders whether the answer may not be along lines like these. In the New Testament there are stories of the appearance of the Risen Lord to Saul of Tarsus and Stephen and John; if it came to pass that we in this human scene had such experiences as part of our common life—if at any moment we might see him with the eye of the spirit, would not that be a coming of the Lord? "Even so come Lord Jesus."

BOOKS

RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. First translated from the original Persian of the astronomer-poet many years ago by Edward Fitzgerald, this work seems to grow rather than wane in popularity. This new edition is a complete edition showing variants in the five original printings. As is well known, Fitzgerald made changes in the succeeding editions of the poem, and all such changes are here indicated. The book contains four illustrations in color by Frank Brangwyn. (Crowell.)

NAPOLEON. By Harold F. B. Wheeler. Even in these days of a reaction from militarism, one can not but admire the commanding qualities of the great Napoleon, whose story is here retold for lovers of history and biography. An unusually attractive feature of the book is the large number of reproductions of famous paintings of the great warrior. (Crowell.)

THE TRUCE OF GOD. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. A prose idyl for the Christmas season, most attractively printed and bound. (Doran. $1.50.)

IF WINTER COMES. By A. S. M. Hutchinson. From all reports one of the three or four really big novels of the year, with a war background. Full of humanity, and a true mirroring of life. (Little, Brown. $2.)

THE WASTED GENERATION. By Owen Johnson. A strong and impressive story which asks some questions concerning modern American life, some of which are answerable, and others to Mr. Johnson unanswerable. (Little, Brown. $2.)

JUVENILE BOOKS

THE BOYHOOD OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN. By J. Rogers Gore. The boyhood of Lincoln as pictured to Mr. Gore by the emancipator's youthful chum, Austin Gollaher, still living. (Bobbs Merrill. $2.50.)

PEMROSE LORRY. By Isabel Hornibrook. A campfire girl story for girls of intermediate age. (Little, Brown. $1.75.)

THE WINDY HILL. By Cornelia Meigs. A mystery tale that both girls and boys will appreciate. (Macmillan. $1.75.)

THEN CAME CAROLINE. By Lela Horn Richards. A splendid new story for girls by the author of "Blue Bonnet—Debutante." (Little, Brown. $1.75.)

THE STORY LADY'S BOOK. By Georgene Faulkner. A group of stories about animals, flowers, people, etc., told by a writer who knows children and what they like. (Small, Maynard. $1.75.)

THE LITTLE MAN WITH ONE SHOE. By Margery Bailey. A book of new fairy tales, attractively illustrated. (Little, Brown. $2.25.)

A RIOTOUS TERM AT ST. NORBERT'S. By May Baldwin. A story of school life brimming over with youthful enthusiasm. (Lippincott. $1.75.)

CORRESPONDENCE

The Price of the Ministry

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In his paragraph about the inertia of churches (in "The Price of the Ministry" in your issue of October 27) Mr. Scotford, whether intentionally or not, opened up the fallacy not only of the eight-hour day but of the twelve-hour day and every other time measurement in his calling. I fully agree that the minister's work is varied enough not to be limited to eight hours, but to take all he has. But his weariness is due not half so much to the number of hours he has worked as to the conscious or unconscious resistance of many to whom he looks for cooperation. As Mr. Scotford says, "They do not want to be stirred up." The pastor's perpetual duty is to rouse men who would prefer to sit quiet, to supply moral energy, stimulate spiritual discontent, inspire new ardor, among the reluctant. The proportion of such varies in different parishes, but in the nature of the case resistance is never wholly absent.

This is not the same sort of nervous strain as is involved in day after day of bookkeeping or hour after hour at the deadening monotony of a machine, but it is a strain from which there is little relief save by flight from the parish. Hence the fishing trip and the summer vacation—and not a few resignations. On the one hand the minister is driven by his own conscience and by the needs of the world, as well as by his denominational officers and all the books and articles on the ministry, to apply himself more earnestly to his task and to strive for more significant results—conversions, contributions, activities, reforms, enlistments in high causes—without limit, because of the limitless reach of the Christian ideal. On the other he encounters in the church and out of it the inertia of which Mr. Scotford so justly speaks.

"The pastor is the key man; if he is interested in such-and-such the church will be." So? "Now if you pastors will just go home from this convention and set all your people at work at this . . ." All! Will some one please produce the magic formula by which all the people can be interested in anything aggressively Christian? It is to create that interest, somewhere, somehow, in somebody, that the minister preaches, and studies, and organizes, and visits, and lies awake nights. And between the hammer of demand and the anvil of passive resistance his soul is battered till it is no wonder that he sometimes gets into as blue a funk as the prophet Elijah, and finds himself wishing for a calling, if there is one, in which (to change the figure) he need neither goad nor be goaded. A confession, that, that he is only human, like his congregation! Let it be set down to his credit that he still turns up smiling nine times out of ten and reaffirms his belief in the greatest calling of all.

I cannot close without adding one more voice to the chorus of thanks for the "Letter to President Harding," Dr. Merrill's communication in the current number, and many other good things "too numerous to mention," as they say in auctioneer's handbills.

Delighted!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have received several sample copies of your splendid paper. I cannot tell you how delighted I am with it. Besides the new impetus it gives to a man's thinking, it is a wonderful encouragement to a minister, who is doing some thinking, to be assured of a wider spiritual fellowship than he would sadly conclude was his, judging from the abuse he knows he is receiving from the seventeenth century Christians who abound in every parish. It is a balm to the spirit to be called a heretic and a disgrace to the Christian ministry in such splendid company.

My only reason for not sending in a subscription after that eulogy, is that I am getting the paper every week through the kindness of another enthusiastic friend of yours. But I make up for that defect by recommending you right and left among my ministerial friends, only a few of whom have yet heard of you from one who knows your merits.

The article by Shailer Mathews in this issue is a masterly putting of the case for progressive orthodoxy.

More strength to your arm!

A Good Kind of Millennialism

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I admire The Christian Century and enjoy it with my whole heart. It comes every week with stimulation for my mind, joy for my heart, and blessing for my soul. I do not see how you are able to make every issue so intellectually brilliant, so thoroughly and spiritually religious, so delightfully satisfying to the modern minded, so courageous in dealing with all vexed questions, and so thoroughly expressive of the very best religious thinking of our times. May you live a thousand years and never fall down from your present standard. Here is renewal of my subscription. Yours joyously,

The Limit of Disarmament

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Apropos of your article on The Church's Stake in the Armament Conference, the question obtrudes itself, How far shall disarmament go? What is the limit, or is there a limit? Wars in the past have grown out of ambition, greed, lust for power. No self-respecting nation today would attempt any justification for war on such ground now. The only cause that would be asserted and for which any plea would be made would be as a "defense." It was on this ground that many consented to dreadful scourge in the late war. There is an implication running through your article that in so far as men consented to this they were denying their faith in Christ.

It would help many troubled souls if it could be shown to them how they could be true to their trust and have done otherwise.

War is not caused by armaments; it is caused by the vicious passions controlling a portion of the people. An aged woman, living alone, over eighty years of age, was murdered recently because she was supposed to have some money in her house. Would she have been un-Christian if she had resisted the fiend in human form? Shall we dispense with our police force, open the doors of our asylums for the insane, release the criminals?

Is it un-Christian for Postmaster General Hays to appoint marine guards to protect our mails and faithful employes from violence? War in the last analysis is the resort to force. It was war that silenced the inhuman voices of the pirates from making men "walk the plank." If we disband our forces, what security will our coasts have from such attacks again? If ninety per cent of the community are law-abiding, peace-loving, and the other ten per cent are vicious, thieving, murderous, the ninety per cent are likely to be destroyed without protection. If we resort to any force, how and where shall we stop?

Was it un-Christian for the United States to forcibly prevent Spain from oppressing Cuba? Is it wrong for a strong man to protect by force another man from doing violence to a child, the weak, or helpless? The church worked for and accepts prohibition by statute, which is exercising force, and this not so much to make people good as to protect society. Does it not seem as if it is not so much a question of disarmament as of making all people Christian. Paul appealed to Caesar, which was of course an appeal to authority, authority resting on force; what else should he have done?

War is horrible, devilish, but as long as men act like brutes, as long as men are subject to insanity, as long as lust and the spirit of robbery and murder prevail in even so small a portion of the people, how is security to be obtained?

What shall we who believe in peace, who sense the horrors of war, who are praying with great hope concerning the great conference at Washington, what shall we say to those who raise these queries? The message of the church must recognize all phases of the question, all the facts of the case.

A Moral Challenge

[The following letter was received by Dr. Harry F. Ward, professor of Christian ethics in Union Theological Seminary, New York. It is published herewith not as affording a problem in ethical theory but a challenge to moral and patriotic, not to say, humane, action.—THE EDITOR.]

Prof. Harry F. Ward,
Union Theological Seminary,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir: I am a prisoner, serving a five year term. I was found guilty at Sacramento, California, January 17, 1919. I laid in jail almost a year awaiting trial. That time doesn't count on my sentence. At this time, there are twenty-four ten-year men here, and three five-year men. Two four-year men go out this coming February. I was convicted for espionage. I was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World—"I. W. W." Most people speaking of these I. W. W. cases think only of the Chicago case. When they think of class-war prisoners they think only of those that can write a fine poem, and those that have publicity as writers. Most of the Sacramento men are organizers, on the job, and know what it is to be the victims of paid thugs and company gun-men, and tar-and-feather parties, in their efforts to organize their class.

I have been advised to write to you and give you just a few facts of my own conviction. I make this appeal in hopes that you can do something to get the time that we waited trial credited on our sentence. I am just making an appeal for this jail time for the three of us that have a five-year sentence, as it would turn us out in a few months. The ten-year men would want more than jail time to do them any good. They will rot in prison if appeals cannot be sent to Washington in protest at the methods used to get this conviction. The same ring that is holding Tom Mooney and many more in prison will use all the power of heaven and hell to hold these men in prison. I am not a writer, and for that reason it makes it hard for me to explain, as I would like to. I have no schooling, and if you will excuse my poor grammar I will do my best to give you the facts of my conviction. The whole story is too long to give it all at this time. I will at this writing just hit on a few high spots on California conception of justice.

I am a working-man, not a leech. In 1918, while working at Olympia, Washington, I wrote a letter to Chris A. Luber at Sacramento, Calif. He was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, and was in jail at the time of writing. This I did not know at the time. In fact, he had been in jail almost two months before I wrote my first letter. My letter was the ordinary kind exchanged among workers—working conditions, etc. This letter was not delivered to Luber. The department of justice got it. They answered it and forged Luber's name to it. This letter was indeed very bitter against the government. I thought my friend Luber had gone "bugs." How was I to know that a department of justice agent was writing to me? They had Luber's name forged to the letter, and I did not know he was in jail at the time. They wound up by asking me to pull off something violent, just anything would do. I will now make it clear just how they played the game. Unknown to me at the time, fifty-five members of the I. W. W. were in jail at Sacramento, California. And they wanted to get evidence to convict them. This is one of the games they played to get said evidence. They were willing to pay me my price and they cared not how they got it. In the letter I wrote this forger I refused to agree to commit a crime and I roundly scored this forger, thinking I was scoring my working friend "Luber" for his d—m foolishness. Letter after letter came. Bribes, and big ones, please offer, etc.

I denounced such doctrine again and again. In those letters I would agree to the declaration that we were being run over by military hysteria, and that men were using the war frenzy to stifle legitimate discussion. Then I would denounce the writer for his plan to cure such things. Now get the infamy of their trick. The parts of the letter which spoke of military hysteria and such terms were photographed so as to leave every declaration of my own out entirely. Then I was arrested, and taken to Sacramento, California, and thrown in jail. What do you think of their court records now? Some way to get evidence?

The letters this forger wrote me were secured and destroyed. I then found out my friend Luber had received no letters from me and knew nothing about any letter writing to me, as he had been in jail since December 5, 1917. And my first letter to him was in January, 1918. Luber was the first one arrested before the raid on the hall on December 22, 1917. Note dates carefully as they prove my innocence. I then knew the characters that were being employed to destroy American citizens. But I did not fear trial as I knew my own letters should clear me, if read as they were written. Every scheme imaginable was resorted to in order to force me to lie and perjure myself on the other men in jail. I told them I had no price to commit such crimes to convict any innocent man.

I was wine and dined at first; I was offered freedom and a round sum of money to say something. I knew nothing and I refused to be a perjurer. Then they tried threats and abuse. I was put through the "third degree" in a most brutal manner. I would not give in. I had nothing to tell. I then told them I would spend the rest of my life in prison with clean hands before I would fasten upon my heart the slime of perjury, and the blood and tears of innocent, helpless workers whom I did not know anything about, much less anything against. Failing to bribe me, that ended it. They now feared to release me after what I had found out. With these true facts before the attorney general he said I was justly convicted.

Imagine my feelings when the trial day came for those workers to find I was indicted with them. Then, if you can further imagine, do so, when I tell you that three or four short extracts from my letters were presented from photographic copies, so as to identify my handwriting, and three extracts, admissions of what had been sent me, and true in every word, yet torn out of all connections; and I was convicted and sentenced to a five-year term for espionage and for having an opinion of my own. Since coming here not a mark or blemish has been put against me. I never had a mark or stain against my life and have always worked for a living.

Yet when I asked for parole I was denied at Washington—not here. Counterfeiters, post-office burglars, white-slavers, and the worst kind of degenerates ever found have been paroled, but not me. (The above are not making it any more; it was in the past). I wish to be honest to the very word as the truth will stand. I can see now that I made a mistake at that time in ever asking for parole. At that time parole was for those that were guilty of some of the above crimes. My crime was, I was a working-man. I am a conscientious pacifist socialist and I was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, that is all. I never gave any man, woman or child a moment's grief in my life, and I have tried to live clean and honest, and as near as I can find out I am in prison because a department of justice agent committed forgery on a worker in prison, lied to me, and then failed to get me to carry out the crimes they were willing to pay me for. Only I did not fall to their level. That is why I am serving five years in prison.

Before the great arbitrator, whose knowledge can weigh all truth, I swear I write the truth. This in America, too, that is, if California is in America! I am not alone in blackened and ruined men here who have been honest and are now victims of the espionage law. I will now give you the proof of the above statement. They don't even try to deny it; let me tell you why.

Take the date of my arrest. Take the date of Luber's arrest. Take the address the forger gave me to write to, and you will find it was the department of justice office, Room 703, Peoples Saving Bank Building, Sacramento. Take date of my letter to the forger (in Luber's name) and it proves what I say. What is more they don't deny it.

The above proves all, yet I am in prison. There are some facts about the fifty-five men that I was brought from the state of Washington for in hopes I could be bribed to help them in getting a conviction, that I want you to know about. On December 22, 1917, these men were arrested after a raid on their hall. They were put in a drunk tank, or cell, in the city jail. They were each handed an old worn-out, vermin-infested blanket. They had no bed to lie on. And for want of space they had to take turns at lying down. On this floor, in the middle, too, they laid for sixty-five days. There was a little barred window that let in a faint ray of daylight into their cage or cell. No chance to bathe; soon they were swarming with vermin and their bodies all covered with sores. One toilet for all, and that was out of order. No chance to shave, their beards grew long. With their long beards, and they were so thin, they were a sight to look upon.

There they laid day after day. No friends were allowed to see them; incommunicado all the time. Two went insane, and one kept trying to kill himself. The jailor in charge agreed to buy food if they would pay for it. When the food arrived, they would not let them have it. They set the food just beyond their reach outside their cage or cell and let it rot.

There is so much to tell, and I must cut this story short. I get ahead of my story. I will now let you know how these men came to be released from the hell hole in the city jail and turned into the county jail where it was just a little better, as they could at least take a bath and kill off the vermin and heal up the sores on their body.

One little woman, sick herself, moved by the suffering of these men, went before the court and with tears in her eyes pleaded for the very lives of these men. She told the court what was going on right under their very nose (just as if they did not know). She told them of the shame of it. She told them not to forget that this was America they were living in, too. What was her reward for this? Let me tell you. She was indicted with the rest of us. They even had to show their spite on one poor weak little woman, that had pleaded with tears in her eyes and in the name of justice and humanity, to save the lives of these men. I was arrested about the time these men were turned into the county jail. I was kept apart from them the first two months after I arrived. I did get one chance to see them a few days after I arrived. Never will I forget the sight of these men, they were so thin and the sores had not yet healed on their bodies. After failing to bribe me to commit perjury I was turned in with them.

Later on the "flu" struck Sacramento. In our weakened condition, we were soon all victims. We begged them to let our friends in to help, as we were all sick. They just laughed at our suffering and kept us incommunicado. They would not even let us have a doctor, till the organization sent one in and paid the bill, too. Five soon died. We were up day and night trying to help those in the worst shape. We were all sick, falling all over ourselves, each trying to help others. Words fail to describe it. It was hell! I must stop for space. I could write on and on about what was put over us.

Will you try and do something to get the time I was waiting trial to count on my sentence? Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. MURPHY, Reg. No. 13586,

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A New Visit of the Wise Men*

TODAY is Christmas. What music lurks in the old, old story. What sacred memories crowd in upon us as we think of all the happy Christmas days that we have known. The air is full of angels and vibrant with the tones of mellow church-bells, the children sing carols—the Christ-child is born—the new life has come to the world. "Peace and Good-will."

Around the cradle of the Christ knelt the wise men. The scholars came and humbly bowed down worshipfully before him. It was a beautiful symbol—the students, the scholars, the wise-men, the high-schools, the colleges, the universities, bowing down before the Saviour of Men.

Would to God such a thing might happen at this Christmas time! The church is largely to blame if the students and scholars do not bow before the Master. The church has been tolerant, hopelessly conservative and often vicious toward scholars. Latimer and Ridley were burned to death just outside the windows of Balliol College, Oxford. Andrew D. White's book on the "Conflict of Christianity" shows how the church has persistently fought every great movement in advancing scholarship. Do not forget Galileo; no ignorant pope, bawling "Recant!" can stop the march of science. Darwin was ridiculed by churchmen. The stale monkey-joke has tickled thousands of lazy auditors. Ridicule is the cheapest tool on the market—remember that. Men, with no training at all, stand up and blast the evolutionary theory, to their own vast satisfaction and to the delight of their ignorant hearers. It is far easier to laugh raucously than to study!! Such laughter often denotes the empty barrel. I am not defending any particular evolutionary theory, I am only asking that we know what we are talking about. "Comparative Religion" has been scoffed at by those who assume that we know it all, over here in the west. Psychology, biology, and biblical criticism have all been pooh-poohed by the "hoi polloi." It must be humiliating to the crowds to note that after all the truth at last prevails and the careful work of devoted scholars is finally generally accepted. The pope roared at poor Galileo—but the world now accepts Galileo's thesis!! Just consider that a bit before you explode!! What I am trying to say here is this: that if the church now feels the sadness of not having the colleges and universities bowing at her feet as servants she has only herself to blame. False ideas will fade out; "truth crushed to earth will rise again." We gain nothing by ridiculing scholars out of court and in the end we suffer terribly.

But not all of the professors and so-called wise-men are ideal. I find many of them who are sore at the church and many of them are selfish and flippant. Safe in a comfortable "chair"—they may forget any duties to society. Freedom often has been abused—no doubt of that. The case is not one-sided and so I am pleading for the wise-men to come back to the Christ and worship him on this Christmas day. Two things are necessary (1) A church receptive of all truth (2) a scholar, humble and feeling the need of God. "We cannot exist half slave and half free" . . . the churches and the higher schools must come together—for if the churches teach boys and girls one thing and the schools teach quite another, the young folks will accept the schools. Thousands have thus been lost to the church. We need, on the one hand, an open-minded church and on the other a reverent and Christian set of teachers. If church and school could get together a new epoch would come upon us. The situation, now, is very tense and very harmful, as I see it. The issues are confused; two sets of truths are being taught; the Sunday-school and the day school must agree upon God and how he works, upon Christ and how he is Master. We need a new visit of the wise-men to the Christ.

JOHN R. EWERS.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Lutherans Will Hold Early Christmas Services

The Christmas customs of the various denominations vary widely. The Episcopalians stay up on Christmas eve to hold a service at midnight. The Roman Catholics meet for early morning mass, in many parishes attending mass at four o'clock. It is impressive to find a church filled to overflowing at this early hour. The Missouri Synod Lutherans have had no custom, but are at this time trying to establish one. The churches of this order will be urged to hold a six o'clock service on Christmas morning. At this service a special offering will be taken for Wheat Ridge Sanatorium of Colorado. This sanatorium has been built at an expense of $1,000,000.

Want to Inquire Into College Teachings

Some southern Methodists are following in the wake of the Baptists in seeking to put shackles on their teachers. The North Mississippi conference passed resolutions recently directing its delegates to memorialize the coming General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, to appoint a commission to inquire into the teachings of the various colleges of the denomination. The resolution expresses the fear that in these colleges the evolutionary hypothesis is being taught as well as biblical criticism. The former theory is regarded as "destructive of the whole Christian plan of redemption." These Mississippi Methodists want the commission to inquire of the scientific men what they believe about evolution, and demand that the teachers of the Bible submit their textbooks for an examination. Should these textbooks show that they are written from the critical viewpoint, they are to be rejected. The whole document produced by this conference indicates that in the view of the petitioners a college or university is not an institution to seek the truth, but rather one to carry on propaganda.

Disciples Divinity House Publishes Building Plans

Work will begin in the spring on the new building which is to house the work of the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago and the University Church of the Disciples. The following description of the unique building to be erected is interesting: The plan of the church is suggested by the old moot halls of England rather than by any recognized ecclesiastical form. It is simply a rectangular room, with a raised platform at one end and a great window at the other; there is no transept or chancel effect, and no chancel arch. Separated from the auditorium by tall columns and arches, is a long gallery with a huge fireplace, visible from every part of the chapel. This will be a meeting place for the congregation, and, filled with chairs, will add materially to the seating capacity. Technically the building is in perpendicular gothic, of warm cream—gray and yellow limestone with Bedford stone trim. The timbered ceiling will have some color on the beams and the oblique walls of the bays offer an opportunity for mural painting and rich color. Dr. E. S. Ames is pastor of the church, and Dr. W. E. Garrison dean of the Disciples Divinity School.

Churches Canvass City for Charity Funds

The approved community projects in Dallas, Tex., are now budgeted and the various churches of the city are assisting in raising the budget for these various causes. More and more the various philanthropies depend upon the church for their success. The charities of Dallas which are included in the approved community list are the United Charities, Dallas Tuberculosis Association, Dallas Kindergarten and Nursery Association, Dallas County Humane Society, Infants' Welfare and Milk Association, Dallas Baby Camp, Dallas Street and Newsboys' Club, Cumberland Hill Nursery, Empty Stocking Crusade, Hope Cottage Association. The budget for these causes this year is $169,603.24. The canvass was made the first three days of December.

Fundamentalist Group Meets Opposition

The Fundamentalist movement in theology which means a revival of reactionary religious views plus the new element of premillennialism has won a great many successes in the west, and some in the south. On the Pacific coast this point of view is thought by many observers to command the majority opinion in the churches of most denominations. Those churches that do not follow along are quite pronounced in their opposition. The bulletin of First Congregational church of Santa Barbara, Cal., contains "peppergrams" every week, of which the following is a sample: "Judaism had its Pharisees. Romanism had its Jesuits. The task of combining the two is being tried out by our modern so-called 'Bible Fundamentalists'."

Military Organization Comes Into Church

Churches are products of their environment in large measure, and the wonder is that the militarism of the past decade has not influenced their methods more than it has. An interesting example of that influence is to be found in First Presbyterian church of Hastings, Neb. In the church are 175 men, and these are divided into four groups. Each group has a colonel and over the colonels is a general. When the minister wants to promote any project he has only to get the general to issue an order. Reinforcements can be brought to a prayer meeting that is in danger of ending in defeat, or to a church dinner which on a rainy night may be about to fail. The chief use of the new device is to support the Sunday evening service which is no more virile an institution in Hastings than in other cities when it is left unsupported by organization.

Large Leakage in Unshepherded Denominations

In many denominations there is an increase in lay ministers who preach on Sunday while they are engaged in secular business through the week. In these same communions there is a decrease in the number of settled pastors. Figures for the Disciples, United Brethren and many other communions show this tendency. A journal of the Southern Baptists states that "southern Baptists have nearly 20,000 churches in which very little real pastoral work in the fuller sense is done, and our general neglect of shepherding the flock as our Lord requires accounts largely for the fact that we are losing to the world and to false faiths one-third of those we baptize."

Sacrifices in Behalf of the Gospel Ministry

Large numbers of the ministers of the country face the fact every year that a change of occupation would give them a largely increased income. A secular paper tells the story of Rev. Charles F. Anderson, M. D., who gave up his practice as a physician in which he was earning $15,000 a year to become pastor of the Baptist church at Louisa, Ky., at $1,200 a year. He has since resigned to carry on some theological studies, but will soon return to the pastorate when he feels himself completely equipped for the work.

Church Puts on a Free Lyceum Course

St. Mark's Methodist church of Detroit has such a large constituency that it can afford to put on a free lyceum course, and pay for it out of the free-will offerings. The result of the course has been to bring many new people to the church this season. The pastor is preaching a series of book sermons to his Sunday evening audiences and on a recent night announced the theme "If Winter Comes."

Federal Council Executive Committee in Chicago

The annual meeting of the Federal Council of Churches will be held in Chicago this year December 14-16. The meetings will be held in the New First Congregational church, and hotel headquarters have been established at the LaSalle Hotel. The program committee for this meeting is composed of Rev. John A. Marquis, Rev. Rufus W. Miller, Rev. Robert A. Ashworth, Rev. F. S. Ideman and Rev. S. M. Cavert. The reports for the past year will be given, and plans for the new year formulated.

The finances of the Federal Council are in a most unsatisfactory condition, it being reported by Dr. R. H. Crossfield that the income for the entire year would not pay two months' expenses. The various constituent denominations have been generous in resolutions, but rather slow with their checks. Meanwhile the Federal Council has given the best account of itself this year of any year of its history.

Methodist Church Establishes a Book Table

More and more the up-to-date churches are reinforcing the pastor's message by the circulation of good books. Foundry Methodist church of Washington, where Rev. Herbert F. Randolph preaches, has a book table from which worthy Christian books are sold. Among the books exhibited recently were the following: "The Next War," "The Sword or the Cross," "The Daily Altar," "Introduction to the New Testament," "The Outline of History," and "The Proposal of Jesus." The church papers are also given a wider circulation at the book table. By this device the minister leads his people to read the books that he himself has found stimulating.

Women Work Among Cannery

The canning industry is a seasonal work that employs many thousands of young women in the United States. This year the Council of Women for Home Missions secured a number of the very finest college students and put them to work among the women who are employed in the canneries. Three distinct lines of work were carried on in each factory. A specialist in day nursery, one in play ground work and one in domestic science made contributions to the comfort and well-being of the workers. Religious work is carried on at most of the factories as well. Daily worship, Bible drill, Christian literature and other exercises were readily welcomed by the workers.

Catholic Social Reformers Are Attacked

The Protestant organizations are not the only ones that have met with persecution on account of economic and industrial heresies. The National Catholic Welfare Council has also been the target of attack. Conservative interests in the Roman Catholic church have made bitter and vigorous assaults on Father John Ryan and Dr. John Husslein. The hierarchy, however, has stood by the side of these bold spirits, and supported them. While Roman Catholicism resists all change in the field of theology, it is fully as modern in its social attitudes as the Protestant organizations. Were it possible to coordinate the religious reformers of the country in a single organization, the result would be an irresistible instrument of progress.

Arthur Nash Gratified With America's Challenge

Arthur Nash, well-known clothing manufacturer of Cincinnati, recently spoke before Newton Hill Baptist church in Massachusetts on "The World's Challenge to the Church." Mr. Nash is in hearty accord with the American attitude at the Disarmament Congress. He said: "It is not possible for any true American to read the news now emanating from Washington without a tingle of pride, yes, without a great wave of thanksgiving submerging him, that he is an American. The eyes of the world are again upon the Prince of Peace, and we behold him anew as he proclaims the blessings of the beatitudes and tells us to pray for heaven to come to earth and the will of the Father to be done here as it is in heaven, tells to seek the Kingdom of God and his righteousness here on this earth, and summarizes all his teachings in the climax of the sermon on the Mount, when he says: 'Therefore all things, whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets.'"

Columbus, Ohio, Has a Strong Community Church

During the war many people reacted from the idea of a denominational church. Grandview Heights Congregational church of Columbus, Ohio, became the First Community church. This organization has met the problem of missionary work through correspondence with former classmates of the pastor. In every mission field there is work that ought to be done by an undenominational missionary, and the Grandview Heights church is sending out such a missionary to the Near East. The creed which was adopted by this church is also a matter of interest outside Columbus. It reads: "I believe in the Living God, the Father of all mankind. I believe in Jesus Christ as he is revealed to me in the scriptures, as the Lord and Saviour of my life and of the world. I accept as the guiding principle of my life and conduct the teachings of Jesus, who when asked what the great commandment was, said, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind,' and the second is like unto this: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'" The pastor of the church is Rev. Oliver Clyde Weist, a graduate of Union Theological Seminary. His work with the Columbus church has been very successful.

Bishop Practices Lambeth Proposals

The Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, Episcopal bishop of Southern Ohio, preached on November 27 in the Seventh Presbyterian church of Cincinnati. The bishop is one of the prime movers in the Episcopal church of closer fellowship with other denominations. He and several other

A Call to Unity

CONGREGATIONALISM'S commission on church unity met in New York, November 30, and adopted an earnest and challenging resolution on behalf of a closer and more friendly interdenominational relationship. Signed by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Dr. Newman Smyth and Prof. Williston Walker, the statement is entitled "A Call for a Covenant of Church Unity," and reads as follows:

"At this time the leading nations of the world are entering into a covenant of ten years for the realignment of their military forces for the sake of keeping the peace of the world; shall not the churches of Christ do likewise? Shall the diplomats of the world be wiser for this generation than are the leaders of the churches? At this historic hour the people throughout our churches are waiting for some clear call to make common cause of their means and their sacrifices that we may live in a Christian world. Surely this is no time for tarrying in theological consultations, or standing idly within ecclesiastical limitations. Now our spiritual unity needs to be made so visible that the man on the street may see it. 'The way to resume is to resume.'"

"The last National Council of the Congregational Churches, in June, 1921, expressed the belief 'that the evangelization of the world rests in a united church.' The council gave its commission on unity ample authorization to confer with other commissions' aid in effecting this unity. A joint commission of the Episcopal and the Congregational churches has had for some time under favorable consideration a concordat for common ministry in particular cases, the recent Lambeth conference of Anglican bishops, held in London last June, going still further in this direction in a message 'To all their fellow-believers' looked forward to a larger organic fellowship in a ministry of the whole church. These proposals call for responsive action.

"As Congregationalists we can speak only for ourselves. But that nothing may be lacking on our part we would declare our immediate readiness to confer with representatives of any other churches concerning any realignments or unification of our respective forces and ministries that may be proposed. In particular, among the desirable objectives for combined action we would be willing to consider means for the attainment of the following ends:

"1. The mutual recognition and utilization of the ministry of the different churches for common needs and service in all.

"2. The offering thereby of larger fields and greater incentive to enter the ministry to our young men, as well as limiting the number of ministers required for effective service at home where one may be better than two or more.

"3. More gradually, but possibly within the period of this ten years covenant of peace, such consolidations or combinations of church educational institutions and their means might be brought about as would prove advantageous for the best education, and for fellowship in their studies on the part of the ministers of the different churches.

"4. And for any philanthropic, social, missionary or federated service of the churches.

"The governments of this world are cooperating for the common good. Shall the churches of Christ do less for his kingdom?"

American bishops were a strong influence in bringing about the Lambeth statement which goes far in breaking down Episcopal exclusiveness. He called his visit to the Presbyterian church a "practice of the Lambeth proposals." He is now nearly eighty years of age, but he preached a strong and convincing sermon on "The Struggles of the Faith," showing how it was possible after accepting the scholarly conclusions of the past hundred years still to hold to historic Christianity.

Seventh Day Adventists Make Increases

The General Conference of the Seventh Day Adventists have recently issued the annual statistical report for the year ending Dec. 31, 1920. It is evident that the war conditions have operated for the upbuilding of this denomination. Announcement is made that the funds increased from $8,577,050.86 in 1919 to $11,854,404.23 in 1920, a gain of over three millions in a single year. Of this amount $7,195,463.04 was collected as tithes, and the remainder came in as extra gifts for home and foreign mission work. The denominational membership is 185,450 and the per capita of giving was $63.92. It may safely be said that this is the largest per capita of giving to be found in any religious communion in the United States. The sale of denominational literature was greater than during any previous year. This amounted to $5,682,972.35. Thirty-three sanitariums are operated and in these institutions 27,791 patients were treated last year. In addition to the boarding patients, 15,000 others received medical advice. The big point in the message of the organization is the "nearness of the coming of Christ."

Old Chief Could Not Choose Between Wives

The missionaries have a most difficult problem in the matter of enforcing monogamy in a country where polygamy has been the common practice. F. M. Stead, a Presbyterian missionary in Persia, relates an interesting story to depict this dilemma. An old chief living in the mountains of Koliai became a convert to the faith, but the missionaries would not baptize him because he had two wives. He could not decide which one to give up. The older one was sufficiently aged that she needed his care and the younger one was the mother of his children. He finally decided to wait, and live as an upbaptized Christian. When the influenza epidemic came, both of the wives died, and he at once united with the local church. The question of any compromise in such a situation as this does not seem to have arisen on any mission field.

Minister Sends His Sermon Seven Hundred Miles

Ministers in Pittsburgh have the advantage of wonderful apparatus with which to send out their sermons by wireless on occasion. Rev. P. H. Barker, a Presbyterian minister, has received letters indicating that he was reaching an audience for seven hundred miles around Pittsburgh. His Thanksgiving sermon was sent out with the maximum power of the Westinghouse wireless plant. The letters from shut-in people have proven a great encouragement to Mr. Barker in his efforts to extend the gospel by this unique method.

Presbyterians Decide Where the Money Shall Go

The Presbyterians now have an executive commission which draws up a denominational budget for the year. For the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1922, a budget of $14,500,000 is required. The money is appropriated on the percentage method to the various Presbyterian causes. Foreign missions gets 29.27 per cent, and the combined causes of home missions and self-supporting synods will receive 34.17 per cent. A million and a half will be given to the educational enterprises of the denomination.

Evangelicals of Europe Have Fellowship in Esperanto

The so-called universal language, Esperanto, is not widely known in the United States and is often treated facetiously by publicists. Nevertheless it has come into rather wide use in Europe. The New Testament has been issued in Esperanto, and even Roman Catholic propagandists have made rather wide use of this version. In South Germany and Bohemia where there is a babel of language, the evangelicals have used the Esperanto language as a means of bringing the various racial groups into fellowship at conventions.

Fundamentalist Movement Has Footing in England

The Baptist Bible Union of England corresponds with the fundamentalist movement in the Baptist denomination in this country. The members of this organization are largely the young men trained in the school founded by Spurgeon. The methods and results of this organization are greatly similar to those of the American organization. The stigma of heresy is used in order to enforce orthodoxy, though in England it is far more difficult to get sympathy from the general public for an obscurantist movement in theology.

Widow of General Carranza Is Now a Methodist

The theological boat was rocked in Mexico recently when the widow of General Carranza, ex-president of Mexico, joined the Methodist church, bringing her whole family with her into the Protestant fellowship. In her new-found zeal she has presented to the Methodist mission at Monterey a block of land containing a two-story building which will be used for school and church purposes. Those who imagine that Protestant mission work is making little impression in Latin America will find in this incident some food for thought.

What Became of the K. C. War-Chest

During the last great campaign for fund, before the war closed, the Knights of Columbus and the Jewish War Relief organization joined with the Y. M. C. A. and other agencies in a common appeal to the public. The armistice came on quickly, and all the organizations had large sums of money which they invested in various tasks for the soldiers. The Y. M. C. A. has helped to send a large number of men to college and to institutions where vocational training is given. It is noted, however, that the Knights of Columbus have purchased $42,000,000 worth of Liberty bonds, and the money they got for work among soldiers will be at the service of a propagandist organization. This action of the Knights of Columbus in so using money which was contributed by the general public and pro-rated is being widely criticised.

Oberammergau Will Present Passion Play in 1922

The villagers of Oberammergau are taking a big risk in arranging for the presentation of the Passion Play next year. It will be two years late but the village has kept up its custom for nearly 300 years of a presentation of the sacred drama every decade. In case the world is unwilling to go to Germany next year the little village will be ruined. The enterprise had a back-set recently in the death of the village priest, Father Shroeder, who would have had charge of the play. It is also necessary to find a new Mary for the young woman who formerly impersonated the mother of Jesus is now married, and custom forbids that a married woman should take this part.

Ministry Still Appeals to Theatrical Producers

No profession has so worked upon the imagination of fiction writers and producers of drama as has the ministry. Several plays on the boards in New York this winter illustrate this fact. "The Return of Peter Grim" makes the English squire sort of person the hero. He is on terms of great intimacy with his rector, but insists upon dominating everything in sight. The rector impersonates a combination of refinement and subserviency. The play "Thank You" is but a thinly veiled propaganda in behalf of better support for the ministry. It satirizes the custom of supporting ministers with donations. Ministers are apt to resent the first named play, but to find in the second a presentation of their claims to the public for sympathy and support.

Eighty Cars Put to Work for Religion

Not every church is able to turn the automobile liability into an asset. The multiplication of cars, and consequent good transportation facilities, has in many parishes resulted in a decrease of audiences. Central Christian Church of Buffalo recently undertook the mobilization of its cars. Eighty were brought into use in a single day, and large numbers of invalids were brought to the church.

Lutherans Claim to be Largest Protestant Denomination

Since the organization of the National Lutheran Council it is much easier to secure facts and figures about Lutherans, for a large and authoritative year-book is now published each year. In the recent manual the claim is made that the Lutheran family is the largest denom-national family in the world. According to this source book the various denominational groups are numbered as follows: "81,000,000 Lutherans, 21,600,000 Anglicans, 17,800,000 Methodists, 11,500,000 Baptists, 9,700,000 Presbyterians, 5,500,000 Congregationalists, and 10,000,000 of other bodies. The total Lutheran population is claimed to be 122,000,000, of which 64,574,000 are in Germany.

Another Methodist Assembly Comes Into Being

The old-time Methodist camp-meeting is being superseded in various parts of the country by "assemblies." The North Indiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church recently decided to start a new assembly similar to the one at Lakeside, O. Two hundred and forty acres have been purchased on the north shore of Lake Webster which will become a center for Hoosier Methodists. An auditorium is being constructed which will seat 5,000 people. Thus the Methodists when they have finished their plans hope to have an institution which will rival the great Presbyterian center at Winona Lake.

New Professor of Missions and Comparative Religion

The theological seminaries are rapidly becoming training schools for missionaries, and this gives the study of comparative religion a new significance. Dr. James G. Hunt was recently made professor of missions and comparative religion at the Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, an institution of the United Presbyterian church. Dr. Hunt's inaugural address was upon the theme: "The Intolerance of Christianity." He emphasized the uniqueness of Christianity and the impossibility of the so-called "ethnic religions" securing footing on the same platform with Christianity. Dr. Soper of Northwestern University who teaches comparative religion recently addressed the Methodist conference at Detroit. He put forth the point of view that the ethnic religions had in them large sections of Christian truth. They are not false religions, but are inadequate. He held that Christianity must come to supplement the teaching of the "ethnic faiths."

Episcopalians Now Have Centralization

Only a few years ago the various societies operating in the religious denominations of America were privileged to go out and get all the money they could raise. The cause which secured the most virile secretary and which could stage the most emotional appeal got the money without regard to any considerations of denominational policy. The Disciples were the first to end this undesirable state of affairs in the organization of the United Christian Missionary Society to include five constituent societies. Since then a number of denominations have secured the same practical end by a variety of methods. The Protestant Episcopal church now has a Presiding Bishop and Council which arranges the budget for all the church enterprises. The present income of this body of Christians is $3,750,000 for their organized work. The receipts so far this year are about $10,000 in advance of last year. At the recent meeting of the Council the request of the Continental Domestic Missionary Bishops for $127,000 for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings had to be deferred.

Methodist Tries His Hand at the Cryptic Interpretation

Pastor Russell now has a rival in expounding the cryptic in the Bible and other places. The Millennial Dawn leader found the corroboration of his whole system in certain measurements which can be made in the Egyptian pyramids. Inches correspond to years and God hid the secret of his plan for centuries until he made it known to the Pittsburgh leader. Dr. Zaring, editor of Northwestern Christian Advocate recently grew facetious, and tried his hand at cryptic. He asserted he could prove that Shakespeare wrote the 46th Psalm. He does so in these words: "Turn to the 46th Psalm (King James version), count down from the top, and when you come to the forty-sixth word write it down. Then count up from the bottom, and when you come to the forty-sixth word place that in connection with the first, and what do you have? Shakespeare. Forty-sixth Psalm, forty-sixth word from the beginning, forty-sixth word from the end! What deep and hidden things there are in the Scriptures!"

Conservatives Have Catalogued the Heretics

If you want to know who is a heretic, you have only to consult a dictionary now. If things keep on the "down-grade," to use a phrase of Spurgeon, ten years hence the world will have a large encyclopedia, for by the express statement of the heresy-hunters in the different denominations, theological conditions are growing rapidly worse "as the end approaches." Joseph McCabe has published a "Biographical Dictionary of Modern Rationalists." Among the men to be found in this list considered unsound in the faith are Longfellow, Robert Browning and Tennyson. Roger Williams, patron saint of the Baptists of this country, is stigmatized as a "theist." The dictionary enlightens us that Abraham Lincoln was simply fooling the people when he prayed and read the Bible. A number of living men whose names appear in the dictionary have disclaimed the alleged disloyalty to Christ and the Bible, but of course the large number of deceased heretics must rest under the charges brought. Many English Baptists are on the list of lost souls, and southern Baptist newspapers appeal to the dictionary to establish the unsoundness of their English brethren.

Denominations Fight With Paid Advertising

Martin Luther started theological warfare by posting his ninety-five theses on the church door at Wittenburg. The Catholic laymen of Pittsburgh started controversy on a much wider scale recently by publishing paid advertisements setting forth the history and doctrine of their church. These advertisements soon drew a reply from the Protestant camp. Prof. David S. Schaff, D.D., of the local theological seminary offered advertising copy. The leading newspapers refused to print the Protestant ad. This aroused the ire of Protestant ministers, and recently the East End group voted to inquire from the local newspapers the ground for their discrimination. The Catholic advertisement stated: "Those who condemn the Catholic church for not changing her doctrines should condemn the professors of mathematics for not changing the multiplication table. Truth is unchangeable." Dr. Schaff's advertisement had in it this paragraph: "If Pope Alexander VI was a member of the church, who had at least eight children by different women, why were Luther, Calvin, John Knox and Jonathan Edwards not members of the church, who were baptized, and had no children born out of wedlock, and studied the New Testament in the original Greek, which Alexander was not able to do if he had wanted?" Perhaps one of the Protestant publicity men could tell Dr. Schaff why one ad was accepted and the other rejected. The reason may not be due to theological bias in the newspaper office. Catholic advertisements are now being rejected as well as Protestant in the Pittsburgh newspaper offices.

Is Rabindranath Tagore a Christian?

Rabindranath Tagore has been suspected by many of being a Christian. Into the Brahmo-Somaj movement large elements of Christian truth entered, and it is known that the poet has written essays on Christ. Mr. E. J. Thomson of England has recently published a book on the poet in which there is evidence of a large amount of research. Mr. Thompson quotes Tagore as saying that he had never read the Bible. The father of the poet was the least Christian of the leaders of the Brahmo-Somaj. The English writer finds Christianity in the air in India and the great poet has unconsciously absorbed many Christian ideas.

When Should Communion be Observed?

The first communion was undoubtedly held as an evening meal, but the historical churches through the centuries have had the practice of an early morning celebration, and this practice has carried over into Protestant custom. Roger Williams' Baptist church of Providence, R. I., recently changed its communion custom, and henceforth the celebration will be at the evening service. On November 6 an effort was made by this church to induce all of the 107 new members to be present.

Baptist World Alliance May Go to Stockholm

Sweden is making a bid these days for a number of interdenominational meetings and seems to be getting what she goes after. The most recent organization to receive an invitation to meet at Stockholm is the Baptist World Alliance which will hold its next meeting in July, 1923. Baptists in Sweden are strong in numbers and influence. The European Baptist Congress was held there in 1913, and the delegates were charmed with the hospitality they received. The city of Stockholm has in recent years been drawing a larger number of tourists as it is a very beautiful city.

Riding the Circuit by Aeroplane

The messengers of the gospel are quick to take advantage of the modern modes of travel. Long since the automobile has made possible larger reaches of ministerial influence. So far as known Rev. Frank Scott Hollett is the first Methodist minister to ride his circuit through the air. On October 30 he preached at both Lisbon and Elliott, N. D., using the aeroplane as the mode of transit. It was good literature Sunday, and he carried with him not only his Bible, but also a generous supply of the denominational newspapers, for distribution in the two churches. This kind of thing is considerably removed from the pioneer conditions when men went on horseback with a Bible in one saddlebag and a generous supply of whisky and quinine in the other.

Successor Chosen for Deceased Washington Pastor

During the national convention of the Disciples at Winona Lake in August, the delegates were saddened by a telegram announcing the death of Rev. E. B. Bagby, pastor of Columbia Heights Christian church of Washington. Mr. Bagby was one of the veteran ministers of the city. His work will be carried on henceforth by Rev. B. H. Melton, who was recently called from Twenty-fifth Street church of Baltimore. Mr. Melton is a graduate of Transylvania college and did some post graduate work at Harvard University. He has had three pastorates, Wilson, N. C.; Marshall Street church, Richmond, Va., and Twenty-fifth Street church of Baltimore. His work in these three churches has been marked by signal success. The Washington church has under construction the most commodious place of worship that the Disciples have in the Capital city.

How a Prominent Scientist Leader Looks at Religion

The first week in November a Conference of Modern Religious Thinkers was held in London. This conference brought together representatives of the Ethical Union, the Ethical Church, the South Place Ethical Scientist church, the Free Religious movement, the Positivist Society, the Rationalist Press Association and the Theosophical Society. No theological tabus prevent the utmost freedom of speech in these meetings. If there is any tabu around the conference it is the fear of being considered orthodox. This would be unpardonable. At the November meeting a very interesting address was given by Sir Harry Johnston, D. Sc., who felt that most of our theological convictions had arisen in the neolithic age, and are now outgrown. That he still finds rather more to admire in Christianity than in other religions is interesting. He does not believe in Jesus and his way of life. He says: "I deny the possibility of nothing that is a tenet of the Christian religion, but I have doubt of the probability of its theology so that I will not waste a minute of my short amount of time in discussing what cannot be brought within the scope of scientific investigation. The only things that stand out preeminent in this particular phase of religious speculation are the warm human charity, love, and liberty of thought which pervaded the recorded utterances of the Galilean Peasant. With one or two exceptions, nothing similarly good and true was recorded in the apostolic utterances following in succession to the veritable foundation of the gospels. As regards other phases of 'religious belief' and expression of thought, they are scarcely worth consideration in these busy days, and they are all influenced by false conceptions of the relations between this tiny planet and the rest of the universe. The only religion I can tolerate in thought would be a Christianity which applied itself wholly and exclusively to the improvement of man's life on this planet, and wasted no time on unproved speculations concerning the idea of a divinity not as yet made manifest through any branch of modern scientific speculation."

The oriental religionists were not troubled about the lack of scientific demonstration of God. They in all their addresses asserted their faith in a supreme being. The Buddhist insisted on not qualifying the Infinite, lest he be thereby limited. The conference had for one of its major problems that of trying to find a basis for the religious unity of the human race. Mr. A. D. Howell Smith described the religious differences of the east and the west as being this: "The west is all for getting on, and the east is all for contemplation."

Dr. Stanton Coit, the well known positivist who has lectured in America and who finds humanity to be his deity, made some challenging statements about the course that religious progress should take. He says: "What would quicken the pace? First a great upheaval of entrenched religious organizations—something like the great war. Rome must be overthrown as Berlin was overthrown. When in Italy I felt that such an event was quite possible. America is more alarmed about Roman aggression than she ever was about Prussian aggression. Great events will come which will do for religion what the great war has done for democracy in sweeping away the strongholds of autocracy. After the first great religious convulsion of the world there will arise specialists in religion and groups of followers—searchers, not after religious unity, but after the basis in human needs and facts and formulas which will form a basis of religious unity."

Scientific observers of religious phenomena will find in this conference at least one great sense of need with which they may sympathize. The world needs a great common religion. Many of the thinkers in the conference felt that a new religion had to be invented. Many others felt that one of the older religions might be amended to serve. The world wants a great unifying religious faith. Can this unifying religious faith be the modern evangelical religion as it has been formulated in harmony with the great branches of human knowledge?

Jessie Brown Pounds:

Memorial Selections

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY PRESS is pleased to announce that early next week—in good time for Christmas—will come from the bindery, the beautiful volume which has been awaited with expectancy by the multitude of admiring readers of Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, poet, hymn-writer, essayist, story-writer.

For several years—until her death in the Spring of 1920—she was a member of the editorial staff of The Christian Century.

The new volume will contain many poems and hymns, illuminating essays, short stories, and a play.

Even Mrs. Pounds' close friends will be surprised at the variety of her literary achievements. The biographical sketch in the early part of the volume will be read with great interest by the many thousands who have been inspired by her messages in verse and prose.

Dear Dr. Macfarland:

I have received the following cablegram from Colonel Haskell today:

"Notwithstanding gigantic American Relief operations already under way, millions of Christian people in Russia face certain death by starvation before 1922 harvest unless material outside assistance is forthcoming. Even now the daily mortality is great and it will increase as winter advances. Any charity that can be given will be so distributed that the maximum number of human lives will be saved. The Russian peasant, surrounded by his family, calmly contemplates the inevitable while cherishing the vague idea that America may yet find the way to save them."

"I do not know that there is anything I could add to this beyond the urgent hope that our people will feel able to provide something for the Russian people after taking into full account the increased obligations we have at home during the forthcoming winter.

Faithfully yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me."

"It is not the will of your Heavenly Father that one of these little ones should perish."

The Churches of America, acting through the Federal Council, are undertaking to do their full part in answering the cry of suffering humanity.

The American Relief Administration is giving 1,200,000 children of Russia one free balanced meal a day, as well as supplying clothing and medical care, and the American Friends Service Committee (Quaker) is caring for 50,000. 3,000,000 more children in Russia face starvation this winter unless aid comes to them. Fifteen dollars ($15.00) will provide for one of these helpless Russian children through this summer. WILL YOU ANSWER THIS CHALLENGE TO OUR CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION?

The Twentieth Century Quarterly (Uniform)

is used by many hundreds of adult
and young people's Bible classes today:

Because William Dunn Ryan's remarkable success as a leader of great adult schools makes him an ideal conductor of the department, "Getting Into the Lesson."

Because Herbert L. Willett, Jr.'s several years experience in the Orient give him unquestioned authority as an interpreter of Bible life. His department is headed, "Difficult Points Explained."

Because John R. Ewers' lesson talks come straight from life and, therefore, go straight to life.

Because Prof. W. C. Morro's long experience as a teacher make him a past-master in the art of questioning. He conducts the "Lesson Forum."

Because Ernest Bournier Allen, who contributes the weekly "Prayer Thought," knows how to gather up the spiritual content of a lesson and to crystallize it into one or two vibrant sentences.

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT

The Daily Altar

By HERBERT L. WILLETT and
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

THERE has never been published a book which is better adapted for gift purposes than The Daily Altar. There are several reasons for its popularity:

1. It is beautifully made. Typographically it is perfect, and the binding is superb. It is bound in full morocco ($2.50) and in beautiful purple cloth ($1.50, add 8 cents postage).
2. It carries a religious message. The Christmas season is a religious one and the ideal Christmas gift is a religious book.
3. It lasts the year round — and for many years. Every time your friend takes up the book for his morning reading he will think of the thoughtful giver of the gift.

What The Daily Altar Contains

There is a page for each day's reading. For each day there is a verse of Scripture, a meditation, a brief poem, and a prayer.

A suggestion: Send for one copy of the book at once, either leather or cloth, then make up your list of friends who are to receive this delightful gift from you, and send on your order without delay.

WHAT THEY SAY OF THE DAILY ALTAR

The Central Christian Advocate: "Cannot be too highly commended."
The Presbyterian Advance: "Excellent and beautiful."
The Christian Evangelist: "A real help toward restoring the family altar."
The Churchman: "A beautiful book."
The Christian Standard: "Beyond all praise."
The Christian Advocate (New York): "Excellent arranged."

EDITORIAL

The World's Worst Tragedy

FOR a time it was thought that Mr. Hoover's organization in Russia would be able to cope with the situation there. It seems, however, that the need is much wider spread than was first known. Mr. Lloyd George says: "In the Russian famine we are witnessing the most terrible devastation that has afflicted the world in centuries. The possible death of fifteen million men, women and children would be the greatest tragedy of its kind within the memory of man." Recently the Federal Council of Churches called into council representatives of the churches, the "Y" associations, the Friends and the Russian Relief Fund to inquire what service the churches should undertake. The Friends have been doing valiant service. Should other bodies do even a tithe of the work done by this small but devoted group of Christian people, the situation would be met. The Federal Council was advised that the evangelical churches ought to set up an organization, and send a man to Russia to assist in the direction of the church funds which will be gathered this winter. Already churches that understand the need are taking action. A small Italian church in Chicago of the Protestant faith, which every year makes an offering to some needy people, has this year arranged to send its offering to Russia. The prejudices of economic and industrial opinion stand in the way of the speedy and effective relief of famine in Russia. Any American so lacking in human feeling as to withhold bread from dying children on account of the political opinions of their parents, would do well to ponder that the bolsheviki of Russia will take better care of their own than of their enemies. It is a time, however, to forget all such unworthy prejudices. The Good Samaritan stops at no national or creedal barrier, but goes at once to the relief of the needy man. To do less is to be less than Christian. To save fifteen million human beings this winter would be to set up once more the lines of communication with a great nation which needs not only our bread but our ideas.

A Christless Christmas

WHEN institutions lose their original meaning or even come to be like an army in full retreat, one is moved to deep regret and pity. A Fourth of July with no zeal for liberty, or a Thanksgiving with no giving of thanks is sorry enough. The worst of all perversions, however, is a Christless Christmas. There are many superficial signs of this perversion. Greeting cards, one hears, are often gotten out by Jews, and that is one reason any mention of Christ is so conspicuously absent. Perhaps the deeper reason is that a touch of religion in greeting cards renders them less popular! The matter of phraseology on a card is not conclusive. In the church programs at Christmas time there is often little to suggest Christ's story. Christmas in the child mind is Santa Claus day rather than the birthday of the world's Redeemer. This is pathetic. But one needs to go to the great stores to be convinced that for many people Christmas has come to be only another big pagan festival. Though the world has more hungry people in it than at any previous Christmas season in the lifetime of this generation, the sale of wrist-watches exceeds that of any previous years. Furs at enormous prices, luxuries of every sort are being purchased at the big annual display of American prosperity. Meanwhile we are warned by the charity bureaus all over the country that this year there will be more hungry families in our America than on any previous Christmas within memory. Charity bureaus are desperate for funds to meet the demands that press upon them. In how many city churches will the month of December show smaller congregations, because clerks and tired shoppers must find rest on Sunday from it is the month of the birthday of Jesus? Overworked the strenuous labors of the week. When Christmas has Christ in it, it is the most beautiful day of all the year. But a Christless Christmas becomes the sorriest of all travesties.

Denominationalism In Europe

GR^EAT funds raised by certain American denominations are now being employed in sectarian propaganda in the war-stricken countries of Europe. At first the work was largely philanthropic, but owing to the break-up of social loyalties in Europe, there is now a unique opportunity to carry on aggressive Protestant work in sections where it was formerly impossible. Presbyterians were able to cooperate in certain countries with Reformed churches of like creed and order. The same has been true of Lutherans, and in some measure of the Baptists. Methodists and Congregationalists, however, found in but few European countries any church organization which would naturally cooperate with them. It looks as though American denominationalism was about to be transplanted bodily to Europe. Thus a real opportunity for the evangelical faith will be frittered away. Europe does not need American denominationalism. In Catholic countries the divisions of Protestantism have long been held up to ridicule, and these have constituted one of the strongest reasons for the nations to remain in the fellowship of the Roman church. The democratic movements in various countries support the demand for a democratic church, but that does not mean a divided church. Our various denominations have agreed to work out a joint program in San Domingo. In that island evangelical religion will be given a fair chance among those who have lost their contacts with the older church. Why should not the same procedure be followed in Europe? The idea of sending American denominational missionaries to France is ridiculous on the face of it. It means that the French will not only reject our efforts but come to despise us. If our money were spent in aid of indigenous French Protestantism a modern Huguenot movement might spring up which would change the map of France. The need of the hour is a statesmanship in Christian missions which will see more than denominational prestige in the spending of vast funds.

Methodists Have All the Ordination They Want

THE Lambeth proposals for unity promulgated by the Anglican bishops have now had consideration by a number of evangelical bodies. The Congregationalists, who are farther removed from the Episcopalians in the matter of orders than are any other group have given the most respectful attention to the proposals, though they have not as yet accepted them. The Presbyterians in the Alliance of Reformed Churches Holding to the Presbyterian System have rejected the proposals, though holding the door open to conference. Recently the Methodist bishops in their meeting at Syracuse considered the proposals, and rejected them. The Methodist theory of the episcopate is so different from the Episcopal that the matter of historic continuity plays no part in their thinking whatever. In the United States where there are over seven million Methodists, and less than a million Episcopalians, it would have been a peculiar situation for the big body to turn to the small one for a sanction to its efforts. Has not the Holy Spirit already given ample proof that the efforts of the Methodists are well pleasing to God? The Baptists refuse to consider any kind of overture that relates to Christian unity. The Disciples have such widely varying conceptions of how unity may be achieved that they have up to the present moment not undertaken to make the Lambeth proposal a topic of discussion in any of their gatherings. Probably the judgment the Methodists have decisively delivered will be that of American non-episcopal churches pretty generally. To deny the validity of the non-episcopal church ministry would seem to be a kind of sin against the Holy Spirit. The unity of God's people must come by some more democratic process than the patronage involved in one denomination conferring upon the others the benefit of its orders. Christian unity must be lifted out of legalistic discussion utterly, before it has a remote chance of success.

Hounding the High School Teachers

THROUGH the activities of William Jennings Bryan and other popular lecturers and writers, people in the south have come to a sudden and shocking realization that science as taught in the high schools is constructed from the point of view of the evolutionary hypothesis. For decades the churches have been teaching one thing, and the public schools another. Ministers of certain Baptist churches in the south are now making a loud demand that the state cease to teach evolution in the public schools. Those who are at all aware educationally know that science can be taught in only one way, and that is with respect for facts. A laboratory cannot be checked up by the theologians at the end of every day's work. Many a southern community is filled with strife and bitterness as the issue is joined. Some church people of limited horizon will probably deny their young people the privileges of a high school education, and school boards will without doubt face problems and difficulties. This issue had to come, however, and it is well that the issue is no longer delayed. The obscurantism of the church in many communities has quite alienated the intelligence of the community. The church itself has been making infidels faster than Mr. Ingersoll ever could. Over every church in the future should be inscribed the great words of the Master, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Only the church that dares to face the light, and to invite free consideration of her teachings can hope to command faith. The other kind of church betrays Christianity.

Christian Science and the Courts

THE lawsuit over the control of Christian Science literature has been decided in favor of the directors of the mother church and against the trustees of the Publishing Society. Thus ends a long and tortuous lawsuit. The various periodicals of the movement have in the meantime suffered greatly. It has been stated that a considerable body of Christian Scientists who sympathized with the contentions of the mother church have refused to take the journals put out by the Publishing Society. The experience of controversy at the very fountain source of authority has been rather humbling to an organization which has not been very long on humility. The decision of the court in establishing ecclesiastical authority falls in line with most ecclesiastical development in these days. Everywhere there is a tendency to great centralization of authority. There is no longer any question as to the supreme authority in Christian Science. The determination of that question will probably result in greater peace and efficiency in the movement. Meanwhile Christian Science faces the very temptations that come to every organization with large sums of money in its control. Can a church be rich and spiritual at the same time? More than one evangelical body faces this very dilemma. The very success of great money-raising campaigns may be the beginning of disintegration. Christian Science is less crudely superstitious than most of the faith-cure movements of recent times. It serves as a valuable foil against tendencies that are infinitely worse in the religious world. It is well that henceforth the central energies of the movement may be used for other than controversial purposes.

Guidance for the Children's Reading

IT is possible to blow a boy's brains out with a bad book quite as surely as with a pistol. Our fathers understood that and they insisted that the yellow weeklies with their impossible tales of crime and heroism should be taboo. The yellow weekly has almost disappeared from the newsstand, but the yellow thing is still with us in more attractive form. The same yellow story of blood and miraculous escapes is now often purchased in a respectable book-store in good binding by unsuspecting parents. The contents of such books are purveyed by the movies. It would be difficult to find a more exact parallel to the old style paper-back trash than one finds in many of the pictures offered to American children. Those illustrators deserve our praise who are engaged in bringing the children's classics back to them in a form more attractive to the eye of the child. The immortal story of Robinson Crusoe may now be obtained in a volume that is fulsomely illustrated. It costs more that way, but it is worth what it costs. Pictures in a book for adults may be a luxury, but in a book for children the illustrations are often the main thing. French boys learn to read Jules Verne very much earlier than our boys do. It is a very interesting fact that up-to-date libraries now employ librarians for the specific needs of children. In Evanston, Ill., a lady has been employed jointly by the school board and the library board whose sole task in the community is to make children's books of the better sort known to all the parents. Recently the library held an open night when the best children's books were on exhibition for the benefit of all prospective helpers to Santa Claus this year. The response of the public indicated that the service rendered was very greatly appreciated.

What the Church Can Do About Unemployment

THERE is no city in the United States so fortunate as to have all its men employed. Millions of unemployed are to be found all over the nation. The Federal Council of Churches has recognized this as one of the challenging problems of the local churches for this winter and has suggested methods of meeting the situation. The very first need is cooperation. Nearly every city now has some method of "clearing" these cases. Every church that does any work among needy people should file its report with the central agency so there may be no duplication of effort. In many cases the pastor lacks experience in modern methods of relief. He should be made to know that indiscriminate giving may work quite as much harm as callous indifference. The minister ought to be given sufficient training in social service to know what are legitimate and what are illegitimate measures of relief. The Federal Council suggests that a loan fund be established by the local church from which remedial loans may be made. This is a likely task for the men's class. In a number of communities the class has seen its opportunity and has acted. The first duty of the church is to its own community rather than to strangers. Indiscriminate giving to back-door solicitors would in a few months fill the nation with tramps. Churches that establish bread lines, soup kitchens and other spectacular forms of indiscriminate relief are multiplying the evil rather than alleviating it. These latter activities would better be carried on by the city under the direction of trained social workers. Meanwhile the church will do well to preach the duty of industrial leaders to make reasonable sacrifices in keeping open their manufacturing establishments. The employer has a duty to his own men that must be considered seriously in the degree that he earnestly strives to apply Christianity to his business.

The Scientific Study of Theology

WHILE the great colleges and universities of the country long ago refused to consider themselves as propagandist institutions set to the task of defending the doctrines of a sect, most of the divinity schools are still regarded as the peculiar property of a denomination. Harvard Divinity School was the first of the older institutions to declare itself independent of denominational control. There are now six standard seminaries which are independent of denominational control, among them Union Seminary and the Pacific School of Religion. In some schools that are still nominally listed as denominational, instructors are employed from various denominations and a large measure of freedom is enjoyed. Not only in the teaching force, but in the student body, is there an increasing diversity. Young men study together and then go into the various denominations for their life work. Such ministers can never take quite the point of view of the man with the more restricted training. The breadth of outlook and the friendships that reach across denominational boundaries guarantee the graduates of such schools against narrow denominationalism. These men of the wider outlook come quickly to places of leadership in their denominations. Here is a chain of cause and effect which would seem to be a reason for optimism with regard to the cause of Christian union in America. The scientific study of theology in perfectly free institutions will lay far more secure foundations for faith than the church now possesses. A dogma that must be sheltered from criticism by artificial means is never a convincing dogma. Even the most faithful dogmatists have their moods of doubt. When we have a perfectly free study of things religious, we shall have emerged from an era of chronic doubt to one of wholesome and sincere conviction.

Federal Council Faces Vital Issues

HATRED and division were the great enemies of religion most denounced at the annual meeting of the executive committee of the Federal Council held in Chicago December 14-16. Leading churchmen from all over America assembled at the chapel of Union Theological College, and were cared for by the gracious hospitality of New First Congregational Church. Most of these men stopped at a down town hotel, and the discussion of the problems of Protestantism was thus not limited to the hours of formal conference at the chapel.

The death of Bishop Lambuth of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, had left the committee without a chairman. Rev. F. W. Burnham was made the new chairman, and the southern Methodists were asked to name a vice-president for the organization. The materials for discussion were in good form, the various commissions presenting printed reports which were bound in a large volume and these reports represented in large measure the agenda for the meeting. From start to finish the meetings were well planned, and in three days a comprehensive review of the problems of American Protestantism was completed.

The northern spectators were amazed at the discussion of the racial problem on the evening of the first day. There has grown up in the new south a body of opinion which promises to revolutionize the handling of this most acute problem of our American life. Many of the speakers were from the neighborhood of Atlanta, where, following the Atlanta riots, the consideration of the race question has been unusually scientific and Christian. Bishop Jones of the Methodist Episcopal church, a Negro of great ability, asserted that the worm was about to turn. Negro audiences cheer to the echo these days appeals to race hatred. This attitude is new, he declared. The spirit of the bishop must be gauged by his statement, "What the Negro wants is not philanthropy; it is justice. I am glad we are taking no collections tonight." Dr. W. W. Alexander, of Atlanta, southern Methodist, and pastor of a white church said: "If there is another race riot, there will be three groups, one of bad Negroes, another of bad whites, and a third of Negroes and whites who have learned to understand each other. The Ku Klux has failed in the south for the lack of publicity. It succeeds only in the north where newspapers have exploited it. In the war days we discovered the Negro as an asset instead of a liability. The Negroes must help the white men in the solution of the race question." A southern white woman of gentle birth insisted in the discussion that the educated women of the south are now united in the belief that lynching is no protection for southern women.

The discussion of the problems of religious education brought forth the judgment that there are far too many agencies at work in this field and the result is the lack of any adequate program. A speaker brought the house down with the story of a stenographer who determined to know something about the Bible to help her in her work in a secretary's office, and went to the public library to inquire for the book of Nehemiah. The librarian asserted she did not know of such a book! Two hundred and forty towns in the United States now have a program of religious education correlated with the public schools.

Organic church union was a touchy subject with the delegates. Bishop Nicholson of the Methodist church denounced the idea roundly as discredited by the lessons of church history. Arthur Nash, of Golden Rule fame, asserted that the thing fundamentally wrong with American Christianity was creedalism and denominationalism. On these topics a lively debate would have been precipitated if the meetings had not been carefully directed.

In the social service session, Secretary Tippy reported that community conferences had already been held in fifteen centers to popularize the contentions of his commission. A research department in charge of Secretary Johnson gathers facts continually, and henceforth the department will emphasize education more than propaganda. The big event of the social service program was Arthur Nash. The crowd listened to him until eleven o'clock at night while with passionate appeal and mystical fervor he appealed for the practice of the real religion of Jesus as contrasted with the other-worldliness of the historic communions. He related his religious experiences in detail with the deepest interest. No better could the problems of American religion be summarized than in his story of taking in a dozen of his former Seventh Day Adventist brethren into his factory. He did this so they could observe their Sabbath, and still make a living. Over them was a Roman Catholic forelady with a Jewish assistant. He said he took in the Adventists so they could practice their religion and thus make ready for the coming of the Lord when the world would be burned up and the Roman Catholic forelady and her Jewish assistant who taught the trade that the true servants of the Lord would be destroyed along with the Beast! Everybody lost their decorum, even Dean Shailer Mathews, presiding officer, shedding tears of laughter. When anything can become as funny as Arthur Nash makes some of our ecclesiastical hobbies, it will hardly last long.

The reports of famine-stricken lands were too painful for description. Men and women in Russia are gathering the hoofs of dead horses in Russia and grinding them with dry grass to make a kind of meal. When the hoofs are exhausted, the people will die. The detailed and carefully stated report of Miss Anna J. Haines, head worker of American Friends service committee, who recently returned from Russia, was full of terrible reality from start to finish. The Federal Council regrets its lack of organization to meet such emergencies adequately, and will endeavor to aid in every way possible, working through the relief agencies already established and at work.

The council authorized a message to the League of Nations congratulating them upon the creation of an International Court of Justice. This was the only motion to arouse serious dissent, but it was passed by a decisive vote. Many thought the peak of interest was reached in the report of the Commission on International Justice and Good-will. The report ran to 2500 words of space, and may only be summarized. A declaration was made of principles that must guide the churches. It was admitted, in agreement with the message sent by Lord Balfour, that the churches may occupy themselves only with moral principles and not with controversial details in the field of practical politics. The report authorized a message to Lloyd George and the Irish leaders congratulating them on the plan for peace in Ireland. The council voted that an international agreement should be entered into demanding from Turkey the protection of the Armenians. Among the resolutions was this: "We reject with indignation a policy of taking all possible economic advantages in all parts of the world while shirking international responsibilities and obligations." The council also favors a lenient policy on the part of the United States toward the debts owed her by European nations.

The Achilles heel of the Federal Council has been its finances. Under the leadership of Dr. R. H. Crossfield the debt has been reduced from $60,000 to $25,000. The budget for next year will be $245,000. Last year less than half the money was given by denominations, the remainder being secured from individuals, a confessedly wrong method of finance. Lutherans and Episcopalians are only "corresponding" members of the council, taking no responsibility. Other denominations are outside entirely, as southern Baptists, or cold and suspicious. The Federal Council has during the past year turned out an astonishingly large product, and it deserves better things from its constituency.

Citizenship and Religious Leadership

THIRTY-THREE years ago a talented young fellow left a leading theological seminary on the eastern seaboard, was joined by his bride, and went to the then raw and undeveloped southwest. He died the other day, still a resident of the region where he had first settled. Shortly before his death the high school youngsters were conducting a novelty election to which somebody had put them up, and they voted this minister the most useful citizen of his town, now a flourishing county seat and aspiring to city pretensions. He was a part of every enterprise to make for the upbuilding of his community. The chamber of commerce could not do without him. A good roads project was not expected to go across without his boosting. His town stands among all its neighbors for its cleanliness, the advanced stage of its public utilities, its high-minded civic sense, its progressive temper. When the youngsters voted him their most useful citizen they were taking their cue from their elders, and this was one election which left no heart-burnings: everybody acquiesced in the decision. When he died the whole town was stirred as by a personal bereavement. The leading newspaper of the state, published in a distant city, in the edition of the following Sunday, featured his photograph and a sketch of his career and service to his state.

All this occurred in a region where town after town does not retain a minister in any one of its six or eight or ten churches for a period longer than two years. Citizenship in any real sense of the word is not thought of among the great majority of the ministers. A large proportion of them talk of what "you" are doing or not doing in "this town." Laymen frankly state that they have ceased to look to their ministers for leadership in matters bearing upon the community life. And because the churches are so completely dependent upon ministerial leadership, they also fail to function as constructive community factors.

Let not that fact escape any thoughtful churchman or citizen. The churches are more, not less, dependent upon ministerial leadership. Our denominational system is concentrating power in the overhead denominational machine. At the same time, the official agent of that system in the local community is one of the most hopeless drifters of our social scheme. The circuit-riding Methodist minister, transferred by the decision of his bishop or of his "presiding elder" after one or two years of service in any one locality, has been the standard jest in ecclesiastical circles this long time. But he is a stable and responsible citizen among the drifters which the large proportion of the ministers of other denominations have become in many sections of the country. It is literally and prevailingly true that the Methodist minister, even where the old conference assignment method still obtains, is the most constant and most influential minister in the town. Though he moves by the compulsion of his ecclesiastical machinery every year or two, he is often more stable than are the preachers of other denominations. In a town of four thousand with seven churches and four resident pastors, it was ascertained the other day that only one of the four had been in residence for as long as a year.

Citizenship and the ministry are becoming as completely divorced as if the United States, at least rural and small-town United States, were a foreign mission field. Indeed the foreign missionary is, on the average, a more stable social factor in his civilization than is the denominational minister of the United States. His average period of residence is probably two or three times that of his fellow in this land.

The determining causes of this state of affairs are obvious. The minister is perforce the agent of the denominational machine. The denominational system does not permit his becoming a citizen. His loyalty is to the organization which makes him and can unmake him at will. Absentee landlords are wrecking the economic interests of numerous communities. But this social evil does not surpass in extent nor in banality absentee ecclesiastical domination. Few chain stores, or high-line public utilities, or monopolistic corporations in control of staple commodities, perpetrate upon the communities where they operate the irresponsible program which our denominations impose upon the average American town and village. They would not dare change their managers so often and so recklessly. And they certainly do not allow their business to run at such loose ends. Bankruptcy would be certain if they did.

The arbitrary dispensations of the denomination to which that minister belonged, whose story is sketched at the beginning of this discussion, was the source of much distress to him. The draft upon energies necessary to keep the denominational machine from doing too much mischief was what sapped his strength and strained his nerves more than any other duties he assumed. More than once he was compelled to defy and set aside decisions imposed upon him by this ecclesiastical overhead. His sweetness of spirit never failed, and he was loyal to the organization under which he had enlisted, but again and again he would have been compelled to abandon the life program whose achievements are a monument to him and a permanent benediction to his country, and have joined the drifters of his guild, if he had not determinedly declined to accept the decisions of absentee denominational sovereignty.

Another cause of this migrant ministry is shallow thinking and meager training. This grows more directly out of the first cause mentioned than is generally perceived. The tenant farmer, who is the curse of American agriculture, is an inveterate drifter. He is a confirmed ne'er-do-well. Everybody swears at him. But the tenant farmer did not create himself. He is the creature of his landlord. Any student of farm tenancy will verify the statement that only where landlords want to continue the system does it prevail. They hold on to the land with a tenacity which only the hardest tenant can resist. It is true that the ministry of all the denominations is in numbers recruited from meagerly or falsely educated elements. But no worthy end is gained by swearing at the poor fellows who are made the victims of this arbitrary system. It is precisely because they are meagerly or falsely educated that they accept the system imposed upon them.

The theological and social narrowness of this drifting, shifting ministry is its outstanding mark. Its cut-and-dried formulas of personal and social conduct are inevitably worn out in any flesh-and-blood community within the short period now established for their residence. The clamant demand for religion in the social economy compels a certain loyalty to the church, which is assumed to embody this essence, but the inept, meagerly educated ministry now assuming larger and larger proportions in all denominations forces this program of perpetual change upon our communities. These facts can here be discussed in complete frankness with little or no peril of offense, for the discussion will not come under the eye of that section of the ministry. The evils of farm tenantry can be innocently excoriated in the progressive farm journals, because the tenant farmer is not a diligent reader of such journals, nor, indeed, of any journals.

But it is a very superficial discussion which is content with saying bad words about the lifeless, unintelligent, mal-educated ministry which towns and villages are forced all too often to accept. They are creatures, not creators. They have not merely been permitted to create themselves. They are actively cultivated. We are maintaining machinery which turns them out as its natural product, just as the tenant farmer results inevitably from the landlord system out of which multitudes of our "best people" are drawing their plump incomes. If the shiftless, uneducated minister did not already exist, our denominational order would create him. He is indispensable to the system.

The cure for both evils and for similar social maladies is not so far to seek as we commonly assume. The gauging of success by profits instead of by service has wrought the havoc we see all about in agricultural and commercial fields. Our ecclesiastical program does not consider first and foremost the welfare of the people in our communities. No one in his right mind will believe, in face of the manifest facts and conditions in the American town and village, that the denominational system is socially applicable, or is capable of serving the spiritual interests of the population. Yet it is preserved, and justified, and defended by secluded editors, and honored by traditionalists, and held to tenaciously by the comfortable mechanics who operate the denominational machinery, and accepted by the suffering multitudes in the towns and villages because nobody offers them hope of anything different. There is reassurance in the so evident fact that the system is running down and out. The church is facing this most arresting fact that many vital social movements holding inherently within themselves a high quality of religious passion tend serenely to leave the churches out of account and would frankly do so if the traditional respect for the religion their churches have assumed to express did not preserve for them the strength to stand in the way of social progress and to keep alive the spirit of faction upon which denominationalism feeds. So long as ministers are trained in cloisters moved from community life, tagged with denominational labels, subsidized by denominational funds and dedicated to denominational interests, religious leadership inspired by a sense of citizenship, or even capable of responding to its impulses, is not to be expected. The socially minded will either not submit to such training to start with, or, enticed into it unwittingly, will desert it under the pressure of human realities in actual community contacts. So long as all national or other formal promotion of religion emanates from sources committed to perpetuating the denominational system, of course nothing but despair and the frustration of essential social religion is to be expected from official programs. Driven by this two-cylindered motor in the direction our ecclesiastical system is now going, its end is easy to see. In the meantime, so many media and avenues for the expression of essential religion are appearing and being utilized, that the moment in which we once vividly sense the loss of the denominational church will be the moment in which the true church of divine democracy will be revealed. The religious leader, no matter what his present denominational connection may be, freshens his spirit most and best who discovers the welling forth of religion in other areas of the social life and under other auspices of the social organism. In the nature of the case the traditional ministry of the denominational churches in the typical American town cannot function as a social factor save under the most pathetic limitations. Happy is that priest and prophet of the true church of God who can rise above the sectarianism of his system and collaborate with the divine forces of community life for the bringing in of the kingdom of goodwill and joy.

The Elevator

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I DESIRED to see a Man, who had an office on the Umteenth Floor of a Tower of Babel in a Great City. And I entered the Building on the Ground Floor, and there was a lad in a Flivver that ran from the Sub-basement up onto the Roof. And I entered into his Jitney, and waited for him to start. And others entered, until the car was full.

And certain of the Passengers Got Off at the Second Floor and Some at the Third Floor, and Some at the Fifth Floor, and some at the Ninth Floor. And by the time we arrived at the Umteenth Floor, I had the Bus almost wholly unto myself; save that the lad who operated the Machine was there also.

Now I tarried in the office of the Man whom I went to see, for the fourth part of an hour, for I was so busy and he pretended to be; and I did that for which I came, and I pushed the button and the same Airship ascended for to carry me down. And I entered into it and prepared to drop Umteen Floors. But I had no such Experience. For, albeit I started down alone, yet was the car full when we reached the Ground Floor. For there were certain that got on at the Eleventh Floor, and others at the Ninth, and divers others at the floors below.

And I said within myself, Behold, there is something to consider in the habit of an Elevator; for when it ascendeth it doth stop and let men out at nearly every Floor, and Taketh but few unto the Top; Whereas when it descendeth it gathereth men from all elevations and bringeth them down to one common level, even unto the level of the Street.

And I said within myself, Thus is it in life. As men ascend, they measure their progress upward in Achievement and Virtue, and many are content to dwell a very little way above the level of the Earth, and others attain unto a little greater height, and only a few reach the Top Floor of Goodness or Success. But when men descend they tend to reach one common level of failure and debasement.

But the Elevator that I run is Going Up. Please stand thou back in the Car, and let us welcome others.

December

THEY do you wrong, rare season of the snows,
Of crystal grottoes built by fairy hands;
They have no praise but for the June-blown rose,
For orchard gold, as plenteous as the sands.
There are no blossoms on December boughs,
But there are dreams within December hearts:
The firelight throws its cheer athwart the night
And wakes the fancy to a wild carouse;
Youth lives again, and hobbling age departs;
Love, spurned of old, returns to ply its darts,
And heaven dawns, amid the golden light.

The spring is sweet, when lilies burst the mold,
And summer gardens are as dear as song,
October boughs bend low with russet gold,
But to December brightest thoughts belong.
Then comes the snow, which in a single hour
Can rear a palace fit for Guinevere;
The beast of care goes skulking to its den
As children laugh beneath the frosty bower.
Amid such scenes can any shed a tear
For roses dead, for branches stark and sere?
Heap high the wood! Glad winter's here again!

Witnesses

THE centuries, since Christ to earthland came
Have been aflame
With his fair fame.

The nations that have fallen in decay
In sad tones say,
"His is the way."

And in this age of turpitude and blight,
Out from the night
Shines clear his Light.

Charles D. Williams

Fifteenth Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

By Joseph Fort Newton

CAN a prophet be a bishop? Can a bishop be a prophet? What is the function of a radical democrat in an old, aristocratic institution? What is the prophetic message for the ministry of today? Such questions were in my mind as I mingled with the divinity students at Yale when Bishop Williams gave his first lecture on preaching on the Lyman Beecher Foundation. It was an eager, expectant company, and some seemed waiting to see a longhaired, wild-eyed radical whose sentences would be a series of explosions. The lecturer, except for his clerical garb, looked more like a clear-cut, straight-seeing business man than a prophet of any kind; but behind his quiet manner and simple style one felt the glow of a divine fire. The genuineness of the man, his earnestness, his courage, his intellectual honesty, his spiritual passion won the day. The title of the course, "The Prophetic Ministry for Today," was characteristic of a teacher to whom religion is a vision, but a vision to be worked out practically in business, politics, industry, and legislation, no less than in the lonely conflicts of the inner life.

Unfortunately, I was able to hear only the first lecture in the course, which was a composite portrait of the Christian ministry—a series of dissolving views in which the Hebrew prophet, the Hebrew priest, the apostolic administrator, and the Greek sophist or rhetorician were blended. As in every such photograph, one saw when he had finished dim traces of each type; but it was clear that the lecturer thought the prophet faith and spirit ought to be supreme. The priest, the executive, and especially the rhetorician, ought to be subordinate, a point which he emphasized with some rather sharp words about flowery eloquence.

PROSE TIMES IN THE MINISTRY

Howbeit, no man can be a prophet fifty-two days in the year, no matter how brightly the fire burns. There are interludes of teaching and administration—what St. Paul called "helps and governments"—which often make passages of prose in the poetry of the ministry. There is also the danger, he said, that the running of wheels may finally run to wheels, and a man meant to be a prophet ends by being the pastor of "The Church of the Holy Fuss," where the wheels go round but get nowhere. Once in the lecture he gave us a glimpse of the life of a bishop, which made all of us vow never to accept such an office—reminding one of the words of Bishop Gore when he resigned as Bishop of Oxford. In the preface to the volume in which the lectures now appear he makes the glimpse more vivid, confirming us in our resolution:

There is no motto more applicable to a modern Bishop than the text, "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost." He is a man "scattered and peeled," troubled about many things, distracted with various and often mutually variant occupations. He must be a man of affairs and many affairs. He is expected to fulfill many functions. He is primarily a business man, an administrator and executive. Particularly he is the "trouble man" of a large corporation. All the "church quarrels" gather about his devoted head. He has the responsibility for everything that goes wrong, often without the authority to set anything right. He serves as a lightning rod to carry off the accumulated wrath of the ecclesiastical heavens. He is constantly called on to act as judge and should have a judicial temperament. He is also a "traveling man," a kind of ecclesiastical "drummer" or salesman. He is even sometimes in demand as a social ornament to say grace at banquets, make after-dinner speeches, adorn the stage at public meetings, and administer to the esthetic needs of conventional society at fashionable weddings, baptisms and funerals. In the midst of it all he is expected to find time and mind to be a preacher and teacher, a scholar and leader, and above all a man of prayer and a man of God!

Two weeks later Bishop Williams preached in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine—that noble Home of the Soul slowly rising on the cathedral heights of New York City, about which James Lane Allen wove his lovely story of "The Cathedral Singer." While waiting for the service to begin I found myself inquiring in the sanctuary in respect to two matters which weighed heavily upon my heart. What is the function of the cathedral in a democracy? Can it give our tangled modern world a common principle, a common passion, a common idea as it did the middle ages, when it sent the common man in his multitudes away to the crusades? Today we have no unifying principle to hold the world together. The nations seem to be drifting apart, and the classes in each are falling asunder, lacking a common ideal, a common faith, and a common hope. Would not a common form of worship—not so rigid as to become a mere rote or rigmarole, but with a common rhythm, at once corporate and communal, bringing art to the service of faith—do something to evoke a sense of common fellowship and obligation, and help to heal the appalling spiritual loneliness and chaos in which we find ourselves? In a cathedral all kinds and classes of people, learned and unlearned alike, are touched by a sense of mystery and awe which, if only for a brief time, brings each into the presence of a Reality which makes all one in their littleness and longing. In the midst of my reverie the organ began, but, like the writer of the 73rd Psalm, some solution of my problem seemed possible under that high and hospitable roof of God.

A DARING PREACHER

It was a notable occasion, made so by the daring of the preacher, whose sermon quickly shattered my mediæval mood, by showing how many clamorous questions from the noisy world intrude into the peace of a modern cathedral. The sermon provoked a heated discussion in the days following, as much for its rebuke of the hysteria and mob-mindedness of the moment when the Wilson-phobia was at its height, as for its castigation of certain reactionary influences seeking to capitalize an ugly mood for their own advantage. America was "seeing red," in a mood of mingled anger, hate and fear, actually having a cataleptic fit of terror at thought of a few radicals—like an elephant frightened at a mouse. It required some courage to speak plainly in face of such a mood, at a time when the pulpit seemed cowed and terrorized, and any one who dared to dissent from the madness of the hour was branded as a bolshevist, a socialist, an anarchist, or some other thought-saving epithet. The bishop not only stood erect against the storm, but he spoke pointedly about the steel strike, the open-shop campaign, and the absurd intolerance of the moment. In particular, he denounced the "invisible government" of the privileged few which, he said, was seeking to control pulpit, as well as academic and legislative, utterances. At once there was an uproar, and "The Wall Street Journal" asked exasperatedly: "Was it the bolshevists or the business men who built and endowed the Cathedral of St. John the Divine?" The implication of such a question is that, since Big Business builds cathedrals, it has the right to dictate what is preached in their pulpits; and that is a fact worth knowing. The next Sunday the bishop-elect of New York preached in reply, deprecating the preaching of politics, as if a sermon in defense of the present order is not as much "political-preaching" as a sermon in criticism of it. The matter was taken up by the secular and religious press of the country, and both bishops got as many brick-bats as bouquets; but the issue was clearly drawn.

A PROVOKER OF CONTROVERSY

The bishop of Michigan thus stands before us as a man who provokes controversies, not only by virtue of the causes he champions, but also by the picturesque and pungent manner in which he states his message. He is indeed one of the outstanding and challenging figures of our American Christianity—manly, brotherly, democratic, fearless, sincere, utterly loyal to his Master and a lover of humanity—and if he receives many floggings at the hands of his critics, he is wise enough to adopt the philosophy of the old couplet:

Sticks and stones will break my bones,
But words will never hurt me.

Happily he has a keen sense of humor which serves as a shield against the slings and arrows of his enemies, the while it makes him a charming companion; as when, albeit, a single taxpayer himself, he describes how an orator of that sect fixes you with his glittering eye, until he has proved that his scheme is a panacea for all the ills that flesh is heir to, "even the measles"; or when, in an impish mood, he mimics the holy whine—what Dickens called "the Heavenly Father voice"—with which the curate intones the service. It does not matter that he is called a radical, a notoriety-seeker, and an inciter of unrest; such things are a part of a prophet's reward. The chief fact about him is his profound earnestness, his fine sanity, and his vision of the religion of Jesus as practical fraternal righteousness. Yet even his friends have misgivings, at times, as to his methods, as witness these words of an able and high-minded journalist—words the more remarkable when we remember that any working journalist sees enough of the seamy side of humanity to equip half a dozen cynics:

As a preacher the bishop is earnest, forceful, intellectually honest, and tremendously courageous, and he marshals his facts well. Yet, somehow, I have always thought of him as a social, political and economic leader, rather than as a churchman. He has the two fisted belligerence of the worldly advocate, rather than those spiritual refinements we are supposed to associate with the pulpit. Yet he may be right, and our laymen's point of view all wrong, as to what a church leader should be. I do not know. He finds religion in the city streets and shops and factories; it is not something to be spiritualized and saved up for use only on Sundays. Whether his idea of the Christian church be right or wrong, he lives up to it; and because of his attitude he is beloved by the laboring men of the city, and is either feared, simply disliked, or blindly hated by that element in his church which pays its pew rent by the year and is eminently respectable—ah, yes, respectable though the heavens fall! Being a member of that church I know something of their quaint philosophy, and I really think that some of them rather lose their souls than the world's respect.

Yet, when I hear the bishop in church, I always feel that I would rather hear him as a great leader of worldly affairs, on the floor of the United States Senate for example. Morally and intellectually he holds me tight, but I have heard other men who could stir me more deeply spiritually. Or should I say emotionally? No doubt this feeling is due to generations behind me who held, as my father used to say, that the Episcopal church is a good one to belong to, because it never interferes either with politics or religion. On politics, economic and social issues the bishop has always been consistently liberal, sane, and sensible—sane, of course, because he agrees with us. From time to time radicals have tried to tie him up with their extreme proposals, but he has always avoided them. Personally I think this is his field, unless, after all, it is conceded that this is the field of the church. Either the church, as it is now organized, has outgrown its usefulness and the bishop is a pioneer in a new order of Christianity, or the church is right and he is wrong. Certainly they do not hitch, at least in their philosophic outlook.

PROPHECY NEEDED IN CHURCH

Some of us would rejoice to see the bishop of Michigan in the United States Senate—nowhere is spiritual vision more needed; but does not the church have need of a robust, forthright, statesman-like leadership? Surely, if Christianity is to be more practical, more socially-minded, less sectarian and more creative, and not simply "a device to give peace of mind in the midst of conditions as they are," such leadership is the first necessity. In short, if Christianity be the realization of God and the practice of brotherhood, then Bishop Williams is both a pioneer and a prophet. Those who say that he is not "spiritual" mistake emotional pietism for spirituality, as if truth, justice, and brotherhood were less spiritual than the rhythm of a ritual or the devoutness of Lent! The bishop holds that brotherhood—by which he means practical brotherhood, not a vague, dreamy sentiment—is not merely a poetic gesture in the Gospel of Jesus, but a fundamental principle; and that it is the mission of the church not only to redeem individuals, but also to help create an environment in which men can live the life of the spirit. He thinks the salvation of the church lies in its becoming once more the church of the lowly, since it is more important to have small churches of earnest men and women, poor but godly, than large churches housed in magnificent edifices—if it is necessary to temper the Gospel to the rich in order to gain their support.

Hence the cry of socialist, anarchist, bolshevist, and all the rest of the new vocabulary of profanity now in vogue, like jazz music. In olden times men threw stones at their prophets, but today they call names, finding abuse an easy substitute for the insight necessary to understand. The tragedy of our day is that we seem dead-locked between a narrow, selfish individualism on the one side and a visionary absurdity on the other, unable to find a fourth dimension. It so happens that Bishop Williams is not a Socialist at all, but a Christian teacher who finds in the gospel of Christ a way out of the dilemma. No one knows better than he that property, if honestly come by, represents moral values; and for that very reason it must be used in moral ways and for moral ends. It is not a question of the ownership of property, but of its moral and Christian use, modified by a sense of the common good, and, above all, by a sense of the sanctity of the human soul as the greatest and most precious of earthly realities. Therefore the Bishop holds that Judge Gary has no right to cling to the twelve-hour day in the steel mills, because it debases and brutalizes human souls, destroying that holy thing which Christ came to seek and redeem. So long as the lives of men, women, and little children are ground up in the machinery of industry in order to make money, he insists that the church must speak out specifically, emphatically, insistently, and that to be silent or neutral is to betray the Master. In regard to these and other matters the bishop has his own way of speaking out, which he would hardly ask, expect, or encourage all his clergy to follow; and no one can deny that it is effective. Some of his sayings are very striking, and they hit the mark:

If the Lord in desperation—pardon the phrase—should say, "I will feed these down trodden, starving children of mine," and rain brown bread and molasses upon the earth, it would do nothing to help the poverty of the world under our present system. It would merely raise the value of the land where the fall was heaviest.

We are soft and flabby because this is a day of self-indulgence. If a thing is agreeable, we do it. If it is disagreeable, we do not. This is the chief reason for the divorce problem. Homes are wrecked, moral life is undermined, children are damned because "I was unhappy."

The habit of decision, of swift moral action is lost. In the business world, statutes are broken and moral laws are shattered, because "a man must get ahead." Any principle is sacrificed rather than make a failure, because a failure is unpleasant. We are devotees of the pleasant, the agreeable, the successful—the slaves of comfort. We are morally short of wind, worshippers of the god of ease; our moral discrimination is blurred.

My ancestry has been American for two hundred years; my family has fought in all the wars of the republic. I am not a Bolshevik, parlor or otherwise. I am not a socialist, pink or white. As far as I can tell I am a plain, downright American. But I cannot stand this stage brand of 100 per cent Americanism that is up today. It is not Americanism. By the history of our nation, I call it Prussianism.

Our task is to make a perfect Christian civilization more Christian, but three kinds of impossibilists stand in the way. One is the blind individualist, the conventional Christian, who does not see the task at all. Another is the pessimist who resorts, as pessimists always do, to the apocalyptic and eschatological. He is the premillenarian. The third is the visionary idealist, the man with a panacea, with complete specifications of the heavenly city down to the last brick in the pavement.

There are lions in the way. There are difficulties and dangers and demands as you go forth into our prophetic ministry, but these are so many challenges and opportunities which make it the most glorious day in which men could be called to that ministry. Marcus Dodds once said, "I do not envy those who have to fight the battle of Christianity in the twentieth century. Yes, perhaps, I do, but it will be a stiff fight." And let me add, a stiff fight is what the true soldier of Christ loves.

If in this study I have laid less emphasis upon the teacher than upon his teaching, it is because he incarnates, as much by his office as by his insight, issues which will confront us increasingly in the days that lie ahead. The sum of his teaching, as well as the art which he employs, may be found in a book of sermons entitled, "A Valid Christianity for Today," which, by any test, must be reckoned as one of the most virile and arresting volumes in the literature of the American pulpit. Some of its sermons—such as The Religion of Democracy, Dives and Lazarus, and The Supreme Value—are of enduring worth and power; they search our hearts like flames of fire. The mysticism of the book—for, as Phillips Brooks said, mysticism is the heart of religion, without whose ever-beating life the hands of religion, which do the work, fall dead—is social as well as individual, and less contemplative than active. It is like the pity in the hearts of the medical students at Edinburgh, of which Dr. Brown wrote in a haunting passage; a pity, he said, which finds expression not in trembling tears and long-drawn sighs, but in clearer insight and a firmer and more skillful hand in healing the hurts of humanity. It is the vision of a man who sees that all life is sacramental, and that the Kingdom of God is a beloved community of noble men and women who do noble things together, making the service of man a ritual for the worship of God.

PROPHET AND STATESMAN

Even those who account themselves conservative—whether by nature or by grace—must surely thank God for the heroic ministry of Bishop Williams, both as prophet and statesman. If they do not always agree with what he teaches, they ought to be ready to fight for his right to teach the truth as God gives him to see it with every art at his command; a right now challenged in his own communion. At any rate, he is the reverent and clear-sighted leader of a large and gallant company of young men in all communions who are beginning to see what Jesus actually meant by his gospel of the kingdom, and are resolved to preach the larger gospel with gentle but relentless insistence, that so we may have a complete and comprehensive Christian witness in a sorely baffled world. St. James did not preach like St. John, nor did St. Peter and St. Paul always agree—each finding in the other things hard to understand—but together, by a fraternity of insight and experience, they expounded a profound and many-sided gospel, which, at last, will win all our wandering, imperfect tones into its sovereign harmony. This lesson is for us, reminding us that the Gospel of Jesus is deeper, richer and larger than our individual insight and emphasis; and, further, that though we have the eloquence of an angel and the zeal of a martyr, and have not brotherly love, we are as dead. God be thanked for a prophet-bishop! Long may he labor among us!

Temperamental Russia

By John Ralph Voris

THE question of Russia's future depends far less upon her present government than upon the racial characteristics of her people. To give a fair valuation to this nation one must try to understand the idealism that is inherent in the temperament of her people. The faith of the remainder of the world in Russia's future should rest not upon the success or failure of the soviet regime, or upon the vastness of her material resources, measureless though they may be, but upon the spiritual life of her people. In this and another paper I shall deal with these spiritual realities, and shall be concerned not so much with the attitude of the soviet government toward this question, interesting and important as that may be, as with the underlying characteristics of the people. In this article I shall consider æsthetic and intellectual tendencies, and in the next and last article, certain moral and religious aspects.

If I were preaching directly to the Russian, I should think it my duty to say as little as possible about this side of his life, and a good deal about the simple matter of his daily bread. Until the question of food, housing and clothes is solved there is little use to talk about books or music. Russia's idealists have perhaps been over-conscious of their own idealism and of their country's soul.

"Oh, the Americans are such a materialistic nation," said a young lady (a "princess") to me at Tiflis. "We Russians are idealists." Her mother, embarrassed, admonished her, saying, "My dear, since, if it were not for America we would probably not be alive today, it is hardly wise, just or true to say that. As a matter of fact,"—turning to me—"we are inclined to be lazy and over proud of our idealistic development, while at the same time the Americans work and then send us clothes and food to keep us alive." It was literally true that America had fed and clothed, if not these ladies, then many of their friends in that Transcaucasian Russian republic. "The Soul of Russia" is the title of a book which I picked up in one of the book shops of Moscow. It has assisted in disclosing to me the spirit of the country. But its title indicates the colorful way in which spiritually minded Russians view their own nation.

SOUL AND BODY

What Russia needs just now is the care not so much of her soul as of her body! And if she had a few successful, hard-headed American business men in charge of her economic development, she would soon have a more fit dwelling place for her somewhat extravagant spirit. But though idealistically minded Russians may lean over backward in their appreciation of their country's spiritual powers, the rest of the world leans the other way in failing to recognize her idealism at all. We in America need to realize that Russia does possess spiritual powers. It should be noted again that I am not attempting to state conclusions drawn after a careful, scientific study of Russia's past and present, nor can I pretend to be a student or critic of some of the expressional achievements I shall mention. I am giving my own impressions and fleeting observations. And yet, it is not impossible in a single visit to a home to sense its spirit. Possibly I can trust my impressions as to Russia's present and potential spiritual development even more than if for a long period I had been engrossed in the careful study of some one phase of it.

After having visited Russia I can understand how it is that some of the world's great musicians and composers are Russian. They have come up out of the land. They are indigenous. They are the expression of the people. The whole nation is instinctively musical. At Tiflis I heard a chorus of children and young people present an evening's program that rivaled anything I have ever heard, except the first class grand opera performances. I was amazed at the matchlessness, the unbelievable beauty of it. Stiff numbers from operas or oratorios, with highly technical scores, were given. The evidence of severe training, the native freshness of the young voices, the breadth and richness of harmony—and at a time when one would expect artistic morale to be low,—were astonishingly adequate. I have been a lover of music and a comparatively frequent attendant at sacrifice of time and effort at symphonic and operatic performances with some measurable development of taste. Yet to me this program of music given by children from the schools and "dining rooms" of the Near East Relief, led by one of the local musical experts, organized without expense, was singularly satisfying. It was a normal expression of artistic temperament and talent with which our children have nothing similar to compare.

LOVE OF MUSIC

Again, also at Tiflis, I heard at the cost of 8000 rubles, eight cents, a summer opera that awakened in me the joy of beauty. It was given in a cheap frame building, with inexpensive scenery, with a piano instead of an orchestra, with only a few principals, and no chorus, but there was here a rare beauty of voice and of conception, and a wonderful appreciation by the mixed crowd of ordinary people. I fear it would not go in America except with selected music lovers. I was told that Tiflis has grand opera equal to the best in Europe. She boasts some of the greatest singers in the world. This has been her pride for years. Today that pride and ability remain, but the poorest can attend, for the opera is practically free. At Constantinople I heard a Russian orchestra (probably composed of refugees) at a moving picture performance, play chamber music during the entire performance, comparable to the highest grade chamber concerts.

At Moscow I asked our local interpreter if there were any good music. He answered promptly in the affirmative, but said it was unfortunate that the operatic season was not on, and he explained that the opera began in September and continued during the year until June, but that only light music was to be heard now. Later one evening, after other work was finished, I was free and alone. I spoke no Russian, and I could not make my droshky driver understand that I wanted to go to the Hermitage Gardens, but when I said in French "L'Opera Comique," he and the crowd that had gathered about such an unknown being as an American (this was before the relief forces came) at once brightened and said, in Russian, "Oh, the Hermitage Gardens," and gave me directions. I heard there half a dozen soloists of unusual power, and two or three violinists, who would charm the most critical metropolitan audience of music lovers, and yet it was just a part of an evening's entertainment, costing fifteen cents. At this "variety" there was presented music of the highest grade such as one would hear at private recitals, and yet the crowds were enthusiastically responsive. They were precisely of the class that ordinary "movie" audiences are composed of in America.

SONGS AND THE DANCE

And this love for music is truly native. Much of that to which I have referred was intellectualized, and far from primitive. But I heard there that night a troupe of possibly thirty singers, dressed in native peasant costumes, sing folk songs, the rich, wild beauty of which will linger in my memory for a long time. They played their stringed native instruments, and danced their native folk dances, always singing, with an instinctive passion for song. Two or three of the American workers in Tiflis told me of the beauty of the music, both of choir and of organ, at the Greek Catholic churches there. I heard the choir and the people sing in one church in Tiflis and in the greatest church in Moscow. Perhaps the surprise element had something to do with my feeling, or perhaps the naturalness of the gift, or possibly it might have been the simplicity or the mysticism of their songs, but at any rate I was deeply affected by this music.

Dramatic talent is equally marked. On the same evenings when I heard the music, I saw parts of dramatic performances as well. I was anxious to come in contact with the many artistic talents of this many sided people that I might understand their temperament. They fairly revel in the dramatic. They take to it with zest. I had the feeling that it was over emotional both in spoken drama and the "movies." They seem to like heavy tragedy, extreme facial expression, elocutionary use of voice and "staginess," but that impression may have been due to my American bias for simplicity and naturalness. Or the performances that I saw may have been less restrained than the drama of a pre-revolutionary period, and more amateurish. At any rate it was all illuminating, for it expressed national gifts, and the critical and eager response of the audiences showed their appreciation of it. The only thing I did not like was one of the new-school, modernist plays, corresponding to the extremist ideas of drama and art, which seemed to me to be rather imbecile. There was, I am glad to report, a small audience at this play. In the "varieties" I saw one or two extremely clever and presumably comic special acts. In all of them there was absolutely nothing of the sensual, and little of "sex."

The "ballet" is the special hobby of the Russian stage. By ballet they do not mean merely the conventional ballet of the spectacular opera or extravaganza of the English-speaking stage, nor so much the type of Russian ballet which has been catching the imagination of stage-going America for several years, a good deal of which is sensuous. They mean pantomime or the acted idea by means of rhythmic motion. There were scenes in the few parts which I saw, like the action portrayed on ancient Greek vases. There was comic pantomime. There was a picturing of courage and fear, of defeat and victory, of love and of hate. It was very graceful and very beautiful, and it would be appreciated by the most ethically minded. It was, to my surprise, and delight, almost entirely devoid of sex suggestion. All Russians seem to have this natural gift of rhythmic dancing. The peasants everywhere possess it, and the city bred likewise. The Russian children seem to have this dramatic and musical talent and sense of rhythm from the cradle. It is a delight to see them. I want to go back to Russia sometime when the children have enough to eat, and when they feel naturally happy and full of life!

A PICTURE GALLERY

Several people at Moscow in the midst of conversations about important things, stopped to ask me if I had seen any of the picture galleries, and to urge that I be sure to visit as many as possible. They assured me that there was a greater opportunity for the art lover than ever before. Our Russian doctor, after she had visited friends at Moscow, and had learned from them of developments in a literary, scientific and artistic way, told me that the galleries were superior to what they were even in the old Moscow because of the addition of many paintings from the homes of the wealthy.

I had time to go but once, and then for a short while only—after church on Sunday afternoon just before we left Moscow enroute for the Volga. I went to the largest and best known of the galleries. It was a rather unimposing old building, in a somewhat run-down section of the city, directly across the Moscow river opposite the Kremlin. But my old droshky driver had no difficulty in understanding even my faulty pronunciation of the Russian name of the museum. I came away from that place, humbled in spirit, abashed at my lack of knowledge of this people, and filled with a sense of discovery and understanding.

The galleries were filled with people. They were plain folk as a whole: many soldiers; large numbers of workers; a few of peasant birth, evidently; a good many with unmistakable bourgeois characteristics; many children. There were two or three large classes of children whose teachers were carefully explaining groups of pictures, or the characteristics of some one canvas. I watched them rather enviously, and wished that my children cared one small fraction as much as did those Russian youngsters for that kind of thing. There were dozens of men and women—more men than women—with catalogues in hand, carefully studying, almost devotionally absorbed in the masters' works hanging before them. All were quiet. No guards were required to keep order or to protect the pictures. They were lovers of art if ever I saw such. It was just the ordinary Moscow crowd of people I had seen in the government offices or the gardens.

PAINTINGS AND LIFE

This common appreciation and love, this amazing response to the beautiful on the part of these people, almost diverted my attention from the pictures to the people. I went there to see paintings only. I found life. But I did not lose consciousness of my first mission. The exhibitions of modern art did not appeal to me. There were two or three small galleries devoted to it. I saw little of beauty or of idealism in the rather crude expressions of the extreme futurist type. Modern Russia seems to be creating only in this extravagant manner. But these canvases occupied only a little space in the museum. Although the "modernists" are in control of the government, they devote but a small space, in an inconspicuous corner, of a great art home, to the "bolshivist art," if I may crudely term it so, although it is in tune with much of the present extreme neurotic type everywhere, and no more attention is given to it over there than in America or Paris. They are not trying to substitute the chaff of a radical art theory for the kernel of classic art. Nor were there many people studying these modernist pictures. The rooms were almost deserted.

But the greater part of this large gallery, whose walls were too thickly covered with paints, was a delight. There was one entire section devoted to the native Russian art of the sacred icons, or pictures of saints. I studied these canvases with intense intellectual interest, rather than with emotional appreciation. This type of creative work not only represents an interesting side of artistic Russia, but likewise of religious Russia. In addition to these finely done paintings, which are similar to the thousands to be found in the churches, there were many other religious canvases of remarkable depth of spirit and beauty of execution. There were three or four very large scenes centering about the life of Christ as full of meaning and beauty as any I have ever seen.

RELIGION AND LANDSCAPE

But not all of Russian art is religious, though it is all spiritual. There were many rooms devoted to scenic canvases—sea and landscapes, with color and atmosphere and exquisite feeling. A large section heralded heroic historical events, war epics predominating. There were galleries of types of character. There were many canvases of many schools, showing the depth and majesty of Russia's creative art, and showing, too, human qualities—pity, sacrifice, lowly comradeship, courage. It was far and away the most satisfying collection of paintings I have seen. (My experience has been confined to American galleries.)

There was not a sex picture in the entire gallery—except possibly in the modernist section, where one could not tell whether it was that or something else—this in contrast to French, Italian and even our American schools. It was a constant appeal to the deeper emotions of sympathy, suffering, courage, faith, appreciation of nature.

Two or three deductions can be easily made: A nation that has in the past produced this artistic achievement, or that has been interested in bringing such paintings together from other nations, does not change in a moment. It is biologically impossible. The Russians are in their creative æsthetic impulses a great people. Further, a nation which in the midst of poverty and revolution can protect, value, and love its ancient art, shows not only that it has not lost the impulse toward beauty and ideals, but that it is attempting to build solidly upon the spiritual foundations of the past. And in the third place, a nation that not only realizes the richness of its heritage, but deliberately sets out to take that to all the people, people who had not had much of it before, has something worth noting in its practical vision.

SADNESS IN BOOKS

My treatment of Russia's literature, the most important perhaps of the topics coming into consideration in this paper, will be briefest since this is a statement of what I have seen, rather than what I have read. One cannot receive quickly definite impressions of literary realities as one can of the drama or music. There are fewer outward signs of either a wealth or a dearth of literary effort and production, and of appreciation. There was one outward sign, however, which we could perceive without difficulty. There were more stores selling books than any other merchandise—except millinery! In these book shops we found a good many new books and reports, published by the government. They were inexpensively printed, with paper covers, and, to our eyes, amazingly cheap. Food might be high; cabs could cost a young fortune; but books must be low priced. Most of these new books were distressingly "high-brow." But they were evidently being sold, and read, for cheap though they were, people do not have money to invest in what they do not want or use, when they are as poverty stricken as they are in Moscow.

All book stores had second hand books at sadly low prices. They were of all kinds, revealing a breadth of taste on the part of cultured people in Russia. There were wonderful editions of French, Italian, English and Russian travel and art books, in vellum and deckle edge with illustrations of rare beauty. There were classics of many nations, English, German, Italian, French, as well as Russian. There were special and rare editions. All were here—and for a song. It was at once a joy and a sorrow to us all—a joy to be able, even in the short while we had between interviews, to dip into so many rare and beautiful examples of book making, and a sorrow when we thought of every book being a mark of tragedy somewhere, and of the fact that Russia was too poor to buy even these inexpensive works. It was a tantalizing thing that we could not carry away with us hundreds of these volumes. But assuredly these shops were proof that there had been a cosmopolitan love of literature on the part of the old Russia. I have previously mentioned the plan of the educational department of the government to publish for a low price in Russian, the great classics of all nations. An ambitious, paternalistic, commendable project, is this, which should be carried out, and, we can well hope, may be carried out whatever the political control may be in the future.

Russia appreciates and honors her own literary men, and the great writers of all nations. She reveres Tolstoi, Dostoevesky, Gorky. Her public libraries are few, and her masses are illiterate, but they have nevertheless a deep respect for learning and for wise men, and they are eager to know as well as to revere, I believe. We cannot expect much creative work in a literary way at the present time, but out of this present turmoil there will undoubtedly come new expressions of Russia's literary talent. In fact Russia is not creating great paintings, literature, drama or music now. As far as that goes, in this shell-shocked world, not many other nations are. We could not expect it. And certainly in view of her economic breakdown is there little reason for hoping for it soon. But she is passing through a period of great importance to her spiritual life. Sometime the world, which has been merely critical in a negative way, may be able to see the significance of what is going on in Russia.

RETURNING TO MOSCOW

Let me try to put this idea as clearly as our doctor did to me, at a moment when, it seemed to me, she was rather inspired, and when she herself represented the soul of the new Russia. She was of the intelligentsia. Educated in Moscow a dozen years ago, she lived in Tiflis when the revolution came. She has passed through the stages of hardship which most of the intellectuals and the bourgeoisie of Russia passed through. Her parents suffered as did most of the others of their class. The doctor was able to continue her practice, giving in recent months her full time to the relief forces. She was alertly interested in the trend of events as she could observe them in Tiflis and from what news sifted through from Moscow. She was by training and family spirit naturally inclined to be skeptical of any good in the present regime and critical of much that had transpired. When I first talked with her before the Russian trip, this was my general impression. She was trying to be fair to the soviet regime, but was having a hard time to treat it and its leaders justly.

For years she had dreamed of returning to Moscow, and since the revolution her heart had turned to the city where she had received her professional training and many of her ideals. When asked if she would go with our commission in a professional capacity she was divided between eagerness to see Moscow again, and a fear that was born of a reluctance to see the results of bolshevism as well as a feeling that she might not be entirely safe. She talked with me about the city of her dreams on our way up. It brought back memories of vivid life, of activity and of fresh, idealistic youth. It was here in her student days, when in common with so many other students, she had dreamed of a recreated Russia,—a nation that would no longer be cruel or unjust to any of her people. It was here she had come in contact with many famous scientists and literary people. Then followed her long absence. And then the revolution and a broken city! Her friends had written her about conditions.

She was eager to see it again—eager, and yet constrained because she did not know what the picture would be. I watched her interestedly upon our arrival. She was too busy and concerned with one of our men who was seriously ill to give way to any feelings for the first day or so, and yet as we took our patient to the hospital on the night of our arrival—the Kremlin hospital, where only high government officials were treated—she gloried in the brilliant ten o'clock twilight; in the magnificent buildings, the great walls, the big gates, the sacred chapel of the Iberian virgin. And as we entered into the outer court the strange, weirdly conceived Vasily Glagenny church whose author was blinded by Ivan the Terrible in order that he might never create another like unto it, she was seething with eagerness and emotion. This was hers!

DAYLIGHT REALITY

Two days later she seemed to be very sad. She had just had a chance to look about in the day time. Self-controlled scientist that she was, there was a catch in her voice as she pointed out the changes that had taken place: the closed and deserted buildings where formerly there were brilliant stores, the lifeless streets, the shabby looking hotels once so gay, the apartment houses, including those where she had lived as a student, run down, and needing paint. It was all a shock to her, even though she had anticipated it all. The reality was equal to her worst fears.

And then she gradually began to see things differently,—in a new light. The process began at Moscow during the last day or so, and continued throughout our long journey from Moscow to Tiflis. She had nearly three weeks of reading. She had provided herself with an armful of the new books which she had eagerly purchased to feed her starving mind and she had nearly three weeks of reading, meditation and observation. At Moscow she had talked with the nurses and doctors at the hospital. She learned of their hardships, their low incomes, scarcely greater than those of the laboring men; their shabby clothes and insufficient food; the shortage of men physicians and the hardships of the women doctors; the lack of medical supplies, fuel and food for the patients. Then she had fortunately met at Moscow some friends of hers,—people who had been teachers and artists in a family of artists. They were intellectuals. She visited them, learning of their physical and mental sufferings—of their confinement to three rooms per family, of their having been drafted into educational work unlike anything they had ever done before. She knew, too, of their inadequate food, heat and clothes.

A CHANGE OF MIND

She talked with our soldier, many times, and with the peasants and the officials along the way. She could not speak frankly about political situations, but she kept her mind open for honest impressions. She attended the propaganda community meeting referred to in another article. And along toward the latter part of our trip, she came to her positive position. Her eyes shone. "Why, this thing that is going on is big," she said. "Russia is going through a sad, a terrible experience. We all have to suffer. My friends have suffered great hardships. But they would not exchange the present for the past, for they believe that we are rapidly coming to something greater and better than we have ever had before, and they are willing to endure any discomforts to assist in the process. Their talents are used as never before, and they are happy." . . . "And it seems to me that I see more happiness all about us than ever before. I have been watching the people at the railroad stations, and they are happy, especially those out of the famine section. They look poor, and often hungry, but they have a light in their faces they did not have formerly."

On another day, referring to certain matters of art, music, literature—the creative idealistic achievements of Russia—she exclaimed: "We are not creating now. In the past we created great things. We had great doctors and scientists, and we have had a wonderful literature. Our paintings and music are as good as the world possesses. But it was all from the cream. The people at the bottom were bearing these others up and making it possible for them to live in ease and to do creative work. But the people at the bottom did not have anything. They were thin milk, poor and ignorant and mentally starved. Now we are stirring the cream into the thin milk. We haven't any cream any more, apparently. But it's here just the same. We may not create for a dozen years or more. It may look as if Russia were not producing. But all the time we are getting down to the people the beauty and truth that the past has discovered and expressed. And after a while there will be more and greater creative work than ever before. It lies deep down in our people, and it will come out. And in some of our arguments in our car near the close of our trip, it was the doctor—the product of the Russian bourgeoisie, of the "intelligentsia,"—who was defending the present regime against the attacks of some of us.

ART AND THE MASSES

All this is something that the world must not pass over. The present heritage of art, music and literature is being disseminated among the great masses of people from whom eventually there will come creative artists, musicians and authors. I mean just that. Just as here in America some of the brightest scholars, most promising musicians, and artists, are coming from the second generation of the foreign born because they have advantages here they did not have in the old country, so over there, in the Volga, in the Ukraine, in the Don Kossack country, even in the Tartar provinces, certainly in the Transcaucasian provinces, there will come forth those who will not only create new impulses for their own nation, but will make contributions of value to the entire world.

After all, the great artists, leaders, scientists, do not come fundamentally from the idle and ease loving classes. They may apparently do so, but they have their roots down deep in the natural instincts and talents of the whole people. Russia has a multitude of artists, scholars, leaders in the courts of Europe and elsewhere in the world.

They probably feel that Russia is dead. But she is not. It is a regrettable thing that these people are not in Russia to help lead now, accepting the sacrifices and privations of those who are leading. These exiles are needed. If they do not return, either through their own volition, or through prohibition from Russia, they should cease lamenting and counter plotting, it seems to me, and go to work at their own art, giving a demonstration of their right to leadership. But whether they return or not, the same soil which gave them birth, and the same primal spiritual instincts which found expression in their talent will in the future spring up from a hundred places as compared to one in the past.

We cannot afford to permit these Russians to die because of famine. I cannot believe that the failure to contribute a bushel of grain, and therefore save a child from death, will be approved by the universal conscience. They must be fed.

Further, I cannot believe that a sane world will entirely crush a leadership, wanting though it may be in many particulars, which has released impulses whose inhibition will stunt the growth of a people for generations.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

"I HAVE been thinking about preachers," said the Lion.

There were several volumes of the Yale lectures on preaching lying on the table beside his bed. Among them I observed Sylvester Horne's "Romance of Preaching." Then beside the Yale collection was Dr. Parkes Cadman's "Ambassadors of God."

"You have been reading about them too," I remarked.

"Oh, I always read about preachers," said the Lion. "For years I have read every volume of the Yale series upon its appearance. But I have been thinking just now about contemporary preachers and their problems."

The Lion held Dr. Cadman's book in his hand for a moment, looking at the title.

"I wish I could be sure that they all knew that," he said. "I wish I could be entirely certain that they all know that they are ambassadors of God."

The Lion has a characteristic way of picking up a phrase and giving it an entirely fresh potency by the way in which he pronounces it. We sat silent for a moment and the magic of his tones seemed to fill the words which made up the title of Dr. Cadman's book.

Then the Lion went on:

"But I have been thinking not so much about the ambassador's relation to the court from which he comes as about his relation to the country in which he lives. For the ambassador must be at home in two lands. He must be at home in the land whose credentials he bears. And he must make a real and hearty place for himself in the land of his official duties."

"You think there is danger of his getting his loyalties confused?" I hazarded.

"That's just the point," declared the Lion. "Some preachers are actually unable to speak in the language of the land where they dwell. They have a heavenly message. But they have no speech in which to deliver it. And some men have become wonderful experts in the very last movement of the land where they are living. But in the meantime they have lost all vital connection with that invisible country of the spirit whose sanctions they represent."

"You mean that a preacher can get a vocabulary and many a point of contact from his environment but that he must go somewhere else for his messages?" I asked.

"Partly that. And partly something just a little different. There is a sense in which a preacher gets a part of his message from his environment. If a man lives in a time when the conscience of men is awaking as to the urgency of social problems he must take advantage of that new awareness. He must utilize every growing insight as to the duty of men to form an organic brotherhood. In that sense he receives a part of his message from his environment. But the opportunity which the mind and conscience and heart of his contemporaries give must be an introduction and a beginning. He must see the insights of his time in the light of larger relationships. He must gladly welcome its forward movements and he must interpret them in the light of the whole purpose of God."

"Do you think then that there is no place for the man who becomes the prophet of some aspect of Christian truth?"

"Far from that. The great reforms must have their particular voices in the pulpit. And every forward movement will produce its effective leaders whose very names will at last suggest the thought of the movement. But I would have these men always alive to the danger of the isolated virtue. I would have them remember that no one movement can save the world. I would have them speak always with deep respect of the men who are emphasizing other aspects of Christian truth. And I would have the church so keen about producing men of the largest Christian perspective that there are always men in positions of commanding leadership whose outstanding characteristic is that they see life steadily and that they see it whole. You must have men who have the mind of John the Baptist. But you are never safe unless they are followed by men who have the mind of Jesus."

"Is there not danger that this man who is always trying to see the whole sweep of Christian truth will be so busy trying to say everything clearly that he will say nothing effectively?"

The Lion smiled at that.

"Only when he substitutes classification for vital thinking," he replied. "A man can grow all kinds of flowers in his garden. He may also press all kinds of dead flowers and construct an amazing herbarium. I am not pleading for the man who slays truth for the purpose of arranging it in orderly fashion. The man who sees truth in large perspective may still see it alive."

"But is it not easy for this philosopher in the pulpit to use his desire for largeness of view in such a way as to evade his practical responsibility? May he not become content with putting forth a general view of right when the world needs a concrete condemnation of wrong? And even when he does not do that may he not become an Erasmus when the world needs a Luther?"

The Lion had the light in his eye which sometimes came in the midst of a vigorous mental tussle.

"All those rocks his ship must avoid," he replied. "He may wreck his vessel upon any one of them. But it is still true that the passionate prophet of a single truth must always be supplemented by the prophet of the whole of the Christian faith if we are to be saved from reaction and disillusionment at last. The whole gospel is vaster than any of our splendidly earnest party positions. And the best thing about it is that it includes them all."

"I suppose then that you would admit both Billy Sunday and Professor Rauschenbusch to ordination for a prophetic ministry?" I suggested.

"Without a doubt," said the Lion, "and I would feel terribly anxious about a church which did not combine evangelistic passion with social enthusiasm. But why did you choose Billy Sunday to represent the evangelistic type of preaching?"

I smiled back at the Lion when he asked this question. And that ended the discussion for the day.

Prayer for the Pastor

By Edna Marie LeNart

THOU knowest, Lord, how many worldly eyes
Are watching him, how swift to criticise
Are tongues that without reverence speak Thy name,
Are hearts whose barren altars know no flame
Of passion for Thy cause, or sympathy
With the great need of Thy humanity.

Thou knowest, too, how many hungry souls
Feed on the manna that his hand controls,
How many feet depend upon the light
He holds where cross the roads to depth and height;
Oh, what a privilege for him to be Made thus a link between mankind and Thee!

Yet, often it is we within the fold,
Whose unveiled eyes the vision should behold,
Who, thoughtless, intercept that golden ray
And let our shadows fall across the way—
For some sharp comment when we disagree
On little matters of theology.

Oh, let my petty grievances give place,
Like mottled clouds before Aurora's face,
To that great theme Thou hast reposed in him,
Nor any act of mine its glory dim;
And send, I pray Thee daily, more and more
Of love and zeal to Thine ambassador.

Propaganda Poison

THERE are as many kinds of propaganda as there are themes and temperaments. Propaganda is not of itself bad, but at present a very bad sort of propaganda is too often found. It was born of the war and its evil lies in the war spirit inspiring it, in these times of peace and reconstruction. It was a necessity in war, just as were a lot of things that became crimes in times of peace. To act as a spy in war requires a sort of courage that is heroic; to act as a spy in peace times is as vile as it is contemptible. Lying to obtain an advantage in battle may be as requisite as good strategy; lying in peace times is a fringe of either lunacy or crime. War knows no law but that of the jungle; peace requires law or there is no civilization. So war requires a sort of propaganda that is ruinous to peace; with it wars are won, but to continue it after the war is over is to destroy peace. We may save the world to democracy and justice by its use when war is forced upon us, simply because war is the only alternative to the wrecking of those precious gains of civilization, but we destroy all we have won if we continue to use a war type of propaganda in the reconstruction that must follow war.

There is a propaganda that is upright and wholesome. There is a missionary propaganda, a temperance propaganda and a propaganda for peace; these are as holy as are the objects sought. To propagandize is simply to propagate, and things that are good may be propagandized just as good fruits and cereals are propagated; but to propagandize things that are bad is like cultivating noxious weeds instead of wholesome crops. However, in these immediate times, there has been spread abroad so much unwholesome propaganda that the term itself is threatened with obloquy. And it all comes from carrying the war temper over into peace times.

We all did our part in the propagandizing for war; and America was so far from the scene of the war and from the causes of the war that it required extraordinary effort to work up our rank and file into a war spirit. Those of us who had the "gift of gab" were enlisted for "gas-attacks" on movie audiences; we bravely stormed the crowds from crowded curbs and from our pulpits we shouted forth arguments for America doing her part. War made all this a necessity and there was an abundance of legitimate argument to be emphasized.

But under the stress of the war feeling we were not all able to keep within the bounds of argument and reason, and many yielded to the temptation to revile and villify, readily accepting as proved fact the last shred of wild rumor or horror tale that floated up from a nerve-shocked world consciousness. Emotional ministers were among those least immune just because of their righteous indignation and their hot patriotism.

Some Overdone War Propaganda

There was the story of Belgian children having their hands cut off. We conjured up horrors akin to those of Herod's murder of infants and made ourselves believe it to be a regular form of Germanic atrocity. While in Germany last summer we inquired whether the Germans had any atrocity tale of like variety. They replied that they did; theirs was the story that every prisoner of war taken by their enemies had an eye gouged out. We asked if they had ever found one German who had been made sightless in that manner and they said they never had. We also inquired most diligently everywhere about the atrocity of the Belgian children, but found no one who had seen a single victim. Some English people had spent a great deal of time in Belgium looking for such, but had never been able to locate a single case. Certain of our party did likewise, but without results. The acts in the case are perhaps well given by the executive head of the Belgian Protestant church, whom I personally interviewed about it. He said he was in Belgium during the entire period of occupation and that he knew of many of the worst incidents of German schrecklichkeit, but that this particular piece of cruelty had never come under his observation. His duties require constant visitation over the kingdom, so I asked if he had a single friend or church brother or anyone else whose word he would trust who had ever seen such a victim, and he said "No." He then explained that there were many atrocities committed by drunken soldiers in the first army that crossed the border. This was due to two things, he thought: first, the fact that the early troops were of the regular standing army; second, the theory of the old army officers that schrecklichkeit or terror would subdue the inhabitants of occupied territory. He thought it quite possible that drunken soldiers had committed this particular atrocity in the early days and that its horror soon grew into a whirlwind of atrocity propaganda the world around. He said that the rule was always stern during occupation but that after the conscripted civilian armies took possession there were no atrocities.

The Rheims cathedral furnishes one of the most striking examples of the methods of war-propaganda. Rheims is a city of 130,000 and as one rides and walks about it even after three years he wonders how a more complete wreck of so large a place could be made. After three years there are only homes and reconstructed buildings enough to permit one-third of the population to return. The striking thing is that in the midst of this wreckage the two great towers of the grand old cathedral, the most conspicuous objects in the city, are about the only things not ruined. The Palace of Justice and the Hotel de Ville, or city hall, hard by the cathedral, are complete ruins, and there is not an unruined building within four blocks or it in any direction; but the grand old towers, visible for miles from the city, were never struck by a single high explosive, and only one, we are told, ever struck the cathedral itself. It, fortunately, did not explode. Just outside the city is a great fort of concrete, reinforced by steel, that is ground to powder, so to speak. Much damage was done the cathedral and many a gorgon head is missing from the towers, but this all seems to have happened in the course of the general bombardment. Of course the Big Berthas could have landed on the great, up-standing towers almost at will; in fact, it must have required careful shooting to have so completely destroyed all the other great buildings around the cathedral square and not have brought the towers down with a chance shot. It seems to the writer a much more heinous thing to destroy the homes or 130,000 people than to ruin the towers of any church, but it seemed to strike the public's sense of sacrilege to picture the destruction of the cathedral, so it was played up to the utmost; the ruin of homes and the loss of lives came to pall upon us and no longer thrilled us with horror.

What About Russia?

At last we seem to compose our fevered minds and listen to sane men tell us of what they have seen in Russia without calling them "Bolsheviki." Still, it has been only within the past month that I have seen a picture of the famine, with the legend beneath saying that the Bolsheviki were forcibly taking from the starving inhabitants what little grain they had left. An editorial in one of our great dailies recently laid the whole responsibility for famine on Lenin's government; drought, war, revolution—nothing else entered into his homily; all was a horrible example of communism. And just yesterday there was a tale in sober print to the effect that whole battalions were being shot at one time by the Commissars. Then, only a few months ago, a university professor, driven by the reports of a noted American who had returned, turned in exasperation to ask what about the nationalization of women.

In England this summer we interviewed several of the notables who had been in Russia, and the men selected by the English government to negotiate its trade treaties with Krassin gave us a whole evening. We also had a morning with Senator France of Maryland as he came from Russia, and I had a long talk with a German business man of pronounced monarchial tendencies who had been held in Russia during the entire war and through the revolution. They all told the same stories that our Y. M. C. A. and the Quaker representatives have told, and that was that Russia was the most lied about country in the world. There was a terrible debacle from war, there was terrorism in the revolution and the break-up, and there is a famine now of almost unprecedented proportions. But the terrorism has been greatly exaggerated through our fear of Bolshevism and its declared intentions of pushing its theories into other lands. An anti-Bolshevik Russian, several Americans who were there many months and all our English travelers agreed that there was never any nationalization of women, that there were probably seven or eight thousand executions, most of them for graft and for conspiracy against the government, and that, erroneous and hopeless as were the Bolshevik theories and programs for a civilization, they alone had sufficient backing right now to insure order of any kind, and that overthrow of the Bolsheviks would immediately result in anarchy and terror. All agreed that Allied interference had solidified Russian parties against the common alien enemy and prolonged the day of Lenin's rule. To have searched for the truth and sought reconstruction on the basis of truth might have saved Russia ere this from the dictatorship of both the bureaucrat and the bolshevik.

Two Notable Reformers

London, November 28, 1921.

MR. H. M. HYNDMAN and Canon Horsley have finished this week the long campaigns of their lives. Both were social reformers and bonnie fighting men but widely apart in their creeds. Hyndman was one of our aristocratic socialists; rich enough to be independent of a profession, trained at Cambridge where he was a contemporary of King Edward VII, and of the same college, a member of the Sussex county cricket team, friend of Garibaldi and since 1880 one of the more revolutionary of socialists, after being converted to that creed by William Morris! A socialist and yet a strong patriot, and a fierce opponent of pacifists; the son of a rich man who left large sums for the building of low churches, Hyndman himself showed no sympathy for evangelical or indeed with any religion. Like William Morris he was a somewhat stormy figure in his party. Yet he went the whole way; and arrayed in silk hat and frock coat, would even sell his paper, "Justice," on the street and deliver harangues in Hyde Park. But he was much more the continental socialist than one of the English type. He was always a fighter for the oppressed proletariat; and it must be remembered that with all the prizes of his own class within his grasp, he chose to take his place with the dispossessed.

Canon Horsley, who also has now left us, was another gallant figure from the same age. He too was a radical, but he never ceased to be the minister of Christ. A prison reformer; a strong advocate of temperance; a municipal reformer in poorer London, he filled many parts, and whenever there was a fight forward, especially for labor reform, he would be in it with all his genius. But nothing became him more than his manner of leaving this scene. When he received sentence of death he telegraphed the news to the paper with the announcement that he meant to take a party of friends to Switzerland for the last time. He waited death busy to the last, and calmly confident in his faith. He was moreover a true inter-churchman; when he had to choose between two offers of meetings to address, one in a church and one in a "chapel," he chose the "chapel." The political parson is tempted to keep the parson in the background, but this Canon Horsley never would do; whether as mayor or as political speaker or temperance advocate, he was always first and always the minister of Christ.

The Church of England Assembly

The Church of England Assembly is over; and what it has revealed to the general public is chiefly the lack of funds available for the church. There should be no such lack in this church, which has many resources untapped. Yet when it is faced by the question whether or not a training school for ordination candidates should be continued, it is bound to ask, Where is the money? There is a failure on the part of the laity; it cannot be said that the clergy are wanting in generous giving. The whole case is set forcibly before the nation in a leading article in the "Times":

"Out of the eight or ten millions provided by the church as a whole they give, according to the Bishop of St. Albans, well over two millions out of their own pockets. We venture to set that example before the other members of the body of the church. It is not seemly—it is, indeed, shameful—that the church should subsist on the charity of the clergy. The laborer is worthy of his hire. That is a truth which churchmen as a whole are far too prone to forget. It lies with them so to strengthen the hand of the church that it may be able to carry out its great mission to the general benefit of the whole community."

Much time was spent in this assembly upon the new lectionary; but nothing was finally decided and the discussion must be renewed in April. The church assembly certainly does not bear out the fears of the conservatives in church matters, who had visions of revolutions when the church attained self-government. It moves slowly.

Princess Mary

The engagement of Princess Mary has been received with genuine delight. The royal family has never been more in the heart of the national life than it is today. The war revealed the members of that august family, willing and eager to share the lot of their nation, and we do not forget such things. It is no idle flattery to say that the king and queen and their family, not least the Princess Mary, are beloved by their people not for their official position but for their own sakes. The fact that the princess is to marry a Yorkshire peer and not a member of some other royal house, has been received with satisfaction. Viscount Lascelles is not personally well known, though he fought unsuccessfully as a unionist candidature some years ago for a Yorkshire constituency; it is more in order to recall that he fought gallantly in the war and won many distinctions, and was wounded more than once.

Dr. Jowett on Revival

At the anniversary of the Manchester mission which was founded by the late Mr. Collier, Dr. Jowett said some words which have been widely quoted. He was speaking of the revival of a century and a half ago and of the modern substitutes:

"Christian science! It first begins by denying my deepest necessity, and then it presents its specific. It first of all resolves sin into an illusion, and my Saviour vanishes like a dream. New thought! I have read scores of volumes of it, and when you come to its dynamics they consist of lifting yourself by your own coat collar. And as for spiritualism, of which I speak with reverence—well, we are told that mystic highways have been discovered across the unknown waters and the communication is frequent and regular. All I have to say, after much reading, is this: that I am waiting for a vessel coming across those mystic waves that is not freighted with triviality and frivolity. I am looking for a vessel coming across those waters which shall be to me an argosy of light and truth."

Other Things

The Bishop of Durham has been praising in no stinted way the work of Sunday schools; in the modern educational world in which teachers are eager to increase the time for many subjects there is a danger lest religious instruction should be neglected. All the more reason for the Sunday school to redress the balance.—The new Archbishop of Melbourne, Dr. Harrington Lees, leaves Swansea at the end of November. This morning I see in my paper a picture of the archbishop kicking off at a football match; he looks as if he had done this before. He will be a loss to the evangelical party in the church of England.—Dr. Charles Alfred Howell Green has been elected first bishop of the new diocese of Monmouth. He is said to be a good Welsh scholar; he has been for years a leading figure in the church in the principality.—In Manchester five preachers of different denominations have been invited by the vicar of St. Ann's to preach in Advent. This does not please the Bishop of Zanzibar; the five preachers will be Rev. J. E. Roberts, Professor Peake, Rev. George Jackson, George Barclay, and my brother, Rev. George Shillito, of Oldham. The vicar, in a letter to all men of good-will, says that "the greatest thing in the world is love, charity, kindness, brotherhood, and that it is the duty of us all to think and talk more about the things in which we agree than about the things in which we differ."

Advent

The season of year begins again when according to the custom of the church of Christ we are bidden to look away to the End before we prepare to remember the wonders of Bethlehem and all the redeeming acts of God. Last week in its Saturday column, devoted to religious themes, the "Times" had an article on "The Far Horizon" in which the writer showed how the heart of man still calls for some vision of the "Long Last"; he seeks to know before he sings his "Nunc Dimittes," that the world is held by the Everlasting Love. Christian believers may interpret the End in many ways, but they are agreed in this belief that there must be judgment, and that he who is the Alpha is also the Omega—the living and at the last the victorious Lord.

Not in the clouds that veil the sky
Look we for his long-tarrying feet;
But in the mists that round us lie—
These mists of earth we hope to meet
That Lord of ours returning home;
To earth, thy home, Lord Jesus, come!

Is There a Shortage of Ministers?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Aside from the question of church union, there is no subject that has engrossed the minds of religious and secular leaders like the problem of a decreasing ministerial supply. The various church boards have conducted a well managed propaganda on this matter until the secular press has taken up the matter. The great magazines have discussed it: world weary editors have written lengthy editorials on the matter; divinity schools and universities have conducted questionnaires and made analyses. And with one accord the note that has sounded forth has been one of panic and pessimism. Church and world alike have accepted, as a matter of course, the proposition that ordained clergymen, of the educated type, will soon become as rare as the Australian dodo.

In the face of all this it requires considerable courage to sound a contrary voice and say that there has been much ado about nothing. But that is precisely what we propose to do. After due examination of the matter, after an analysis of facts and statistics that are within reach of everybody, we come to the conclusion that the church need have no fear on this score.

We will take the Presbyterian church, U. S. A., as an example. It is a large church, it covers every section of the country, it harbors all degrees of theological teachings, and its records are well kept. What do we discover?

Let us take the last ten years. In 1912, the Presbyterian church had 9,274 ministers; in 1921, 9,979; an average, for the period, of 9,711.8. Does this appear alarming? Consider, now, the churches these ministers were called upon to fill. In 1912, the Presbyterian church had 10,030 churches; in 1921, 9,842; an average, for the period of 9,951.1. A mere glance will reveal two things, viz: First, that the number of ministers for 1921 is above the average, for the ten-year period; and the number of churches is below the average. Second, that the number of ministers has steadily increased while the number of organized churches has steadily decreased.

New Era surveys inform us that of the 9,842 churches reported this year (1921), fully 5,000 have a membership of 100 or less. There are literally thousands of churches that can never hope to sustain a minister unless they are heavily subsidized by the home mission board. Is it fair to say that the Presbyterian church is immediately short 400 ministers and use such churches as a basis for calculation?

Our friends who continue to put forward the thesis of a diminishing ministry, however, reply quickly that the Presbyterian church is saved by the large number of clergymen who come to us from other denominations. We might be unkind enough to ask why these other denominations are not closing their doors, but we will pass that by and consider the source of ministerial supply,—the theological seminaries. The records here are plain so that he that runs may read.

Let us consider, first, the number of students in our fourteen Presbyterian seminaries. From 1877, when the total enrollment was 547, to 1921, when it was 639, there has been a slow but sure increase. The banner year was 1895, when the enrollment was 999. The average attendance, from 1877 to 1895, was 699.5; from 1896 to 1921, it was 743.3. To be sure, there has been a steady decrease from 1896 to 1921, but the average, as is plain, is higher than the average for the nineteen years, 1877 to 1895, when there was a consistent increase. Why, then, be alarmed? All movements ebb and flow, and the stream of theological students is no exception. Let us remember that the average for these forty-five years is 724.8, and that the number in our seminaries, in 1917, the last year to be affected by the war, was 873. That is 149 students above the forty-five year average! To count in the enrollment of the last four years is surely statistical dishonesty.

When we turn to the number of men actually graduated, the same ratio, practically, continues. In 1878, 141 students graduated; in 1921, 161; the peak year was 1896 with 300 graduates; the average for forty-four years is 192.6. In 1917, the last year to be uninfluenced by the war, 215 students graduated, —23 above the forty-four year average. Again, we ask, Whence the alarm?

So much for the theory; how about actual experiences on the field? The writer has never heard of a man candidating for a field that paid even approximately a living wage (say $1,500.00 and manse) but that there were always a great crowd of competitors. The chairman of the vacancy and supply committee of one of our small rural presbyteries said he had on his desk, stacked up and unanswered, over seventy-five requests to be given a chance to be heard. Pulpit committee chairmen report their astonishment and confusion at the number of applications received when once the vacancy of their church becomes known. Cases are known where ministers wished to make a change for perfectly legitimate reasons and spent months corresponding with vacancy and supply chairmen without once being given a chance to be heard. Strange, very strange, that these things should be so if ministers are deserting their pulpits in numbers and if young men have ceased to study for the ministry!

The Legion's "Pranks"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Kansas City counts among the events of which it is most proud the recent visit of the American Legion, when it held its annual convention in this city. It can never forget the great parade, the crowds of splendid young manhood, the solemn dedication of the site of its memorial monument. It will long remember the visit of Foch, Beatty, Pershing and the rest. Kansas City welcomed them gladly; entertained them proudly and urged them eagerly to come again.

Kansas City refuses to get excited over the fact that the 50,000 American Legion boys insisted upon having a good time while here, and that some of them had that good time in a manner which was not altogether in accordance with the way ordinary mortals act on ordinary occasions. But these were not ordinary mortals, and this was not an ordinary occasion.

Kansas City has been around a little—it has even been in a town where the state university celebrated an unexpected victory of its football team. What happened was denominated as "boisterous and riotous," by some folks, but the citizens generally smiled, and were happy that the youngsters had so much college spirit. It remembers when, on one occasion, an officious policeman was ducked in the lake on the campus. It also has a hazy remembrance of the fact that some of the boys who were painting the town got some real paint and daubed up the statue of a great man, whom the university had delighted to honor.

The citizens were shocked that this act of vandalism had been committed, but nobody thought of condemning the whole faculty and student body because of the thoughtless action of a few rowdies. And nobody thought that the university was forever disgraced because that policeman got his ducking. And least of all did the citizens think that the institution should be disbanded because the students became hilarious.

Because of these things, Kansas City is puzzled to read the wholesale condemnation of the American Legion because of the pranks of a few "boisterous and riotous" soldiers. It wonders if the editor of The Christian Century was ever in a class scrap. And it marvels that a publication that has the reputation of fairness and ordinary intelligence could be betrayed into peddling the propaganda of the "wets," and state on unconfirmed press reports, that "liquor flowed more freely for three days than it had ever done in the old days of the open saloon."

The above is, I believe, a fair reply to the editorial in the Century of December 1, and I ask that you give it the same publicity that you gave what is, we feel, a slander on the good name of our city and the boys who went over the top for humanity—not only upon them, but upon many of our own best citizens. Personally, I can say that I saw that parade at six or seven points, and that I have never seen a more orderly one; that I have never been more impressed with any occasion than the dedication of the site of the Memorial Monument, and that most any ordinary political convention develops more riot and noise than was found in the convention of the legion.

We believe you have been misled—we can not think you wanted to be as unfair and as censorial as your words seem to indicate.

Did the Church Lead?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I read with the great interest with which I read practically everything in The Christian Century, the editorial on "The Church's Stake." With the general conclusions I am in most hearty agreement. With all the more feeling, therefore, I am constrained to express regret at the dropping of the thought of the editorial in one considerable section into a very familiar, but fallacious criticism of the churches for their alleged failure of leadership during the war. They were to blame, as I understand the editorial to say, because they did not bring the war to an end during its course, and before Germany was defeated. This failure was accentuated by the necessity of leaving to the Y. M. C. A. the work of relief in the camps.

This seems to me an evidence of the loosest sort of thinking. Take the lesser point first. What possible reproach can fairly rest upon the churches because they left to the Y. M. C. A. the ministry it performed? This ministry required a highly centralized organization. How was Protestantism to secure this? If it were to be argued that the Protestant churches should have had such a complete centralized organization, and that the absence of this marks one of the chief failures of the churches, then I admit the cogency of the claim that the churches should have done the work directly they did indirectly through the Y. M. C. A. But the assumption that such a centralized authority ought to have been in existence, I emphatically reject. And if this authoritative organization was neither to be expected nor desired the only possible thing was to depend on the Y. M. C. A. for the particular work the war required. Here was an organization immediately responsive to the church, but highly centralized in control so as quickly to care for all the inevitable multifarious details. Since it was not the spirit in the churches which was lacking, but merely a piece of machinery, what more natural and proper thing could be done than to use a finely tempered instrument already fashioned?

It is significant, moreover, that even with a strong organization the Roman Catholic Church found it wiser to entrust its relief work with the army of the K. of C.

The larger criticism is that during the war the church abdicated leadership and surrendered to the views of the state. It is not conceivable that the church might honestly have believed the position of the state correct? Of course to the pacifist this is unthinkable. But I am assuming, perhaps here is where I am wrong, that The Christian Century is not standing for pacifism as such. If it ever be right to fight to resist wrong, if it was true in 1917 that we could not be Christian and not use force of arms against Germany, then should not the church have stood by the state in seeking a just triumph.

I recognize the difference of opinion which existed on this point. But, as I hold those were wrong who berate the whole church because a part opposed righteous war, so I lose patience with those who jauntily assume that the portion of the church which believed the state to be right and said so, abdicated "its position of moral sovereignty in Christendom." In my judgment it never entered more fully into the service of humanity.

The church was woefully remiss in preaching international peace before the war. God grant a like failure be not charged against her today after the war. To all that The Christian Century says on these things, I say Amen. But because so much is most valuable and sound in the editorial all the more to be pitied is its failure to distinguish between our duty to have done all possible to avoid war and our necessity of waging war wholeheartedly when it became inevitable by the persistent ill will of one party. There was left but one single alternative, surrender to evil or fighting to save the right. The cause of peace will not be advanced by refusing to admit that this stark alternative has arisen in the past and did arise for America four years ago, as it had arisen earlier for England.

We ought to have done more to prevent the war than we did. We ought to do more than we are doing to prevent its recurrence. But when it came the way out was by victory over evil, not compromise with it. Had the church urged peace by the latter method, it would have been indeed guilty of "abdication of its moral sovereignty."

Convenient Idols *

AND Jeroboam said, "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold thy gods, O Israel." Swift and terrible changes came upon Israel after the death of the Golden Monarch. Solomon was a kind of Louis—after him came the deluge. Rehoboam ignored the counsel of the elders, who had some historical perspective, and took the advice of the fast set of young men with whom he had surrounded himself. Foolish and headstrong, he alienated all the northern tribes. Jeroboam then returned and became king of the northern peoples, thus establishing a dangerous rivalry. Jeroboam also rode the whirlwind, for he broke with the Jerusalem temple worship and set up golden calves. He called upon the people to worship these calves. We wonder why they so quickly and easily obeyed. One ceases to wonder when he learns of the temptation to the lower life which such worship involved. Around this adoration of the Golden Bull gathered the most powerful appeals to corrupt living and it never has been hard to get the people to follow the soft, selfish and easy paths that lead to perdition; broad is the way and wide the gate that leads to death. "Easy is the way to hell," we read in Virgil, and it has always been the story of mankind. Only a few struggle upward over the sharp cliffs, the crowd slowly winds down the comfortable slopes into the valleys of death. Jeroboam appealed to the lowest in his people and being king he easily influenced them into the selfish and sinful ways. But notice the words by which he led them astray—the appeal to convenience—"It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem!" How many classes of people make that same excuse today! Here is the tired business man. "It is too much for him to get up and go to church." He sleeps late. He has little regard for his influence over his children or his neighbors. There is no doubt about his being tired; he is frightfully tired, he is exhausted. The fierce competition of the daily grind, the dedication even of the lunch hour to sharp and keen conferences, the board meetings, the relaxation at the late theater, the all-night ride in the Pullman, the bitter fight with a competitor to land the business—all this leaves him tired indeed. But why take it out on God? Is there no chivalry left in the race, no gratitude, no sense of proportion? Where did he get his wealth? Who stored the world with oil, coal and valuable metals? Who caused the forests to grow? Who made the fertile soil? Who sent the rain and the sunshine? Is it not a contemptible life that grabs everything in sight for oneself and never gives thanks to the eternal God? The limousine waits in the garage, the chauffeur listens for the telephone, the children are hustled off to Sunday-school but Mr. Tired Business Man smokes and throws about the morning paper, while his pew in church advertises his selfishness and carelessness.

"It is too much for you to get up and go to church," says the student. He has noticed that big business men are many times indifferent to the church services. The student has had a hard week. The professors have had no conscience in assigning the lessons, he thinks. There have been tests, long reading assignments, essays, plays, parties, dances, and on Saturday a ballgame. He agrees with Harry Lauder that it's nice to lie between the sheets on Sunday morning! He has a pang at the thought of missing the young men's class and the preacher has been mighty fine to him but then—O well! (He turns over and sleeps.) The working man also takes his cue from those who pretend to be his superiors. He notices that others do not hurt themselves to get up and get out and surely he has had a tough week. Has he not toiled before the roaring fires? Has he not been out in all kinds of weather? Has he not risen early six mornings out of the seven? Surely it is asking too much of him to insist that he go to church. He hears the word of Jeroboam—he takes the line of least resistance. Soft beds, sweet cigars, late breakfasts, the sporting page—let the church go hang! So you see it was not only in the long ago that the advice of Jeroboam was accepted—it is obeyed now. John was a burning and shining light. He shone because he burned. Sacrifice is the best price of influence. We burn up in service. Shall business claim all your best energies? Must our students exhaust themselves in learning how not to live? Shall workingmen avoid the place of power and inspiration and shall we all become godless and useless because we follow the advice of an infamous king, "Who taught Israel to sin?"

Public Opinion and Theology

The Earl Lectures of the Pacific School of Religion

By BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL

Bishop McConnell says that the influence of the congregation itself upon preaching has never been adequately expounded. This is perfectly true. Nor has the whole popular spirit in its influence upon theology been expounded anywhere, so far as we know, with such insight and logical setting forth as in these lectures.—The Biblical World.

Methodists Make Big Gain the Last Decade

The past ten years, including as they do the war period, have not been a favorable time for church growth. Nevertheless the various Methodist communions have established a record which is very gratifying to them. The gain for this period was a total of 1,255,091. Keen observers find in this growth a triumph not only for systematic methods of doing church work, but also for a certain cheerfulness and practical spirit which characterizes Methodists in their religious work. Methodists have capitalized the world's demand that religion shall not be long-faced.

Baptist Preacher Speaks From the Spirit World

Years ago Dr. George C. Lorimer was one of the most popular ministers of Boston. Recently a minister of the spiritualist persuasion has been delivering addresses which are alleged to originate in the spirit world through the dictation of Dr. Lorimer. The meeting in Jordan hall naturally attracts large numbers of the old friends of the deceased minister. A correspondent of the New York World says, facetiously, "Dr. Lorimer is not as eloquent as he used to be." Old friends are unable to discover any of the peculiar marks of the well-known preacher in the addresses. Sermons from other well-known deceased ministers are to be given during the winter.

Church Is Gracious to Its Pastor

Some churches have a heart in spite of the callousness which characterizes others. Rev. James M. Philputt, pastor of the Disciples church adjacent to Eureka college in Illinois, recently suffered a break in his health, and resigned. The congregation promptly voted to hand his resignation back to him. He has been given a leave of absence for the winter to go south in the search of health. Rev. I. J. Spencer, pastor emeritus of Central church, Lexington, Ky., will fill the pulpit during his absence.

Son of Well-Known Evangelist Takes Chicago Pastorate

Rev. T. A. Mills is the son of the well-known evangelist, Rev. B. Fay Mills, who died a few years ago. The son was educated at Tufts college and at the University of California. Early in his ministry he served churches of the liberal persuasion, being at one time pastor of the independent church at Santa Rosa, Calif.; associate pastor of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City; six years pastor of the church of the Christian Union at Rockford, Ill., and in 1912 became pastor of the Independent Congregational church of Battle Creek, Mich. While with the latter church he brought it back into fellowship with the Congregational association. During the war he was overseas, and since then he has been in the lecture field. He recently accepted a call to New England Congregational church of Chicago where he is the successor of Rev. John Gardner. New England Congregational church is almost a down-town church, being located just north of the loop, and its problems are growing more difficult every year by reason of the change of population. It is in the same general district as is Moody church, and must face many of the same conditions.

Congregational Moderator Gets a Call

Dr. W. E. Barton, moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches, and pastor of First church of Oak Park, recently was called to First Congregational church of Berkeley, Calif. He is reported as giving serious consideration to the call. He has been with Oak Park for twenty-three years, and in that time has come to be considered a part of the theological landscape. His own church achieved a great success, and Oak Park now has six Congregational churches which are out-growths of his work. He is closely connected with the life of Chicago and his going would change the church life of Chicago in many important ways.

Baptist Membership in America Almost Equals Methodist

The various Baptist denominations of this country had a gain last year of 129,000 members. The previous year they reported a loss of 11,000. The total Baptist constituency for the country is now 7,700,000, which number is very nearly equal to the total reported by the Methodist communion. The two leading Protestant forces of the country are known for their evangelical quality and for their missionary zeal. The figures would seem to indicate that the future of religion in this country lies with evangelicalism.

Gideon Leader Is Ordained

Charles W. Shull, national field secretary of the Gideons, was recently ordained at Jackson Boulevard Christian church of Chicago. Mr. Shull has served as a song leader and later as manager for a song book publishing firm. During the war he was in demand at the military and naval camps as a chorus leader. In some cases secretaries of religious organizations consider it an advantage not to be ordained, but Mr. Shull regards it otherwise. Among his first ministerial acts was the baptism of three members of his family.

Methodist Minister Preaches in Roman Catholic Cathedral

Not often in the history of this old world has a Methodist minister preached from the high altar of a Roman Catholic cathedral. Rev. C. T. Coyler, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, who is working in Europe, came to a city in Czecho-Slovakia and there found the national church of the "Los-von-Rom" movement occupied the cathedral jointly with the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics. The American missionary spoke at the morning service, and was announced again for the afternoon. At the second service the cathedral was filled to capacity while the ex-priest of the Catholic church, now in the service of the national church, acted as interpreter. The American missionary insists that the nation is now quite ready to receive the Protestant interpretation of the Christian religion.

Church Union in Scotland Awaits Further Legislation

The union of the Established church of Scotland with the United Free church now awaits further legislation by parliament. The government is in the process of framing its "temporalities proposals." The main principles of the union have been established by previous legislation. The united church will be protestant and trinitarian. It will be both national and free. The abolition of the old-time patronage system in the placing of ministers will be an impossibility. The Free church leaders generously acknowledge the advantage of a single great national church which should unify the people of Scotland in their allegiance to Jesus Christ.

Lutherans Act Cautiously With Regard to Federal Council

The conference between the leaders of the United Lutheran church and the officials of the Federal council have resulted in the setting up of a consultative relationship between Federal council and the United Lutheran church. The Lutherans propose that they shall have a voice but no vote in the deliberations of the Federal council, and that no actions taken shall be binding upon them without endorsement by the executive board of the United Lutheran church.

Religious Awakening in Russia Reported

It was not to be expected that the Russians, the most religious people of Russia, should in a day give up their ancestral faith and remain without a religion. The land of Count Tolstoi is unable to live without the mystical element in its experience. Recent press stories in secular papers tell of a great religious awakening. These stories are supplemented by letters received by religious workers in this country. The Chicago Daily News prints the following cablegram: "Russia is going through a remarkable religious revival, says a Copenhagen dispatch. More than 150,000 gathered in Red Square under the walls of the Kremlin at Moscow for devotional exercises. From the windows of his office in the Kremlin, Lenine looked on and watched the patriarch bless the people. There were many officers and privates from the red army in the throng. Afterwards there was a procession, including many bishops of the 'old faith.' For upwards of three centuries ecclesiastics of the 'old faith' refused to join the Orthodox church, despite persecution to compel them to do so." To this may well be added another cablegram to the Chicago Herald and Examiner which indicates that the movement is very widespread: "Cumulative reports from various parts of Russia tell of a rapidly growing religious reaction from the atheistic and irreligious bolshevist doctrines. In some sections it is reported this movement is almost becoming phenomenal from the standpoint of mass psychology. Leaders of the communist parties are complaining that large numbers are being swept away by this reborn religious wave. The people are returning to the churches, are again being married in the churches and having their children baptized, all of which was done away with by the communists as "unnecessary" and superstition. The bolshevist press is thundering loudly at the church, but the position of the church has been so strengthened by the new religious movement that the communists are chary about resorting to rigorous measures."

Catholic Views of Protestantism in Czecho-Slovakia

America, the leading Catholic weekly of this country, has recently been corresponding with Roman Catholic authorities in Czecho-Slovakia with a view to finding out the truth about the Protestant movement in that country. While the claims of the Catholics and Protestants about the religious movement in Bohemia do not coincide, and in view of the faulty statistics could not be expected to coincide, nevertheless the Catholic journal concedes that there have been large defections. It reports: "The statement given to the American press that the Czecho-Slovakian sect numbers about 800,000 members is certainly a wild exaggeration. An application made to the Czecho-Slovakian census office for data towards the beginning of last month was answered by the reply that data were not ready. It has probably good reasons for delaying what it must consider bad news. The first congress held by the sect in January, 1921, one month before the taking of the census, did not dare to claim more than 200,000 souls, in 109 groups. The real number of apostasies officially registered at that time was approximately 50,000. Were we to grant the utmost success to the mad apostatizing campaign instituted immediately before the taking of the census the additional total could not have amounted to 150,000 souls. Consequently the greatest membership that could be assigned to the new sect would at the utmost be no more than 200,000 scattered through all of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia. Yet even this total is likely to be a gross overstatement. Instead of increasing, the sect has shown clear signs of diminishing. Many who are now undeceived have left it in disgust. Its acme was reached during the socialist-agrarian coalition, when it was free to seize with impunity Catholic churches and chapels, and to maltreat the Catholic priests. Under a former administration its partisans were able to accomplish little, and under the present cabinet, in which the popular party has its own representatives, prosecutions will be instituted for the robberies committed by the sectaries. It is a fact that about 200 unworthy priests left the church, mostly for 'a wife's sake,' but sad as such apostasies are they represent a happy riddance for the church herself and for the faithful. Not more than about seventy of these apostates attached themselves to the sect, and very few 'took their parishes with them,' except in the sense that about forty churches and chapels were violently seized by the sectaries."

Plan to Bring European Ministers Here in 1922

The committee on Interchange of Speakers and Preachers between America, Great Britain and France representing the Church Peace union, the World Alliance for International Friendship and the Federal Council of Churches has been able to accomplish a great deal during the past year in the way of placing British preachers in American pulpits. This committee has still more ambitious plans for the coming year. In April, Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, of New York, will exchange pulpits with Dr. Frederick Norwood, of City Temple, London. Each man will make a number of special addresses during the month of his service away from his own church. The committee voted to invite the Bishop of Peterborough, Rev. C. Brierly Kay, and Rev. Thomas Nightingale to visit this country as a delegation from the British churches to be here through November and the early part of December, 1922. It was further voted to invite the Archbishop of Upsala to visit this country in November, 1922. The Swedish Archbishop is coming to be one of the most influential Protestant ecclesiastics in the world.

Denominational Exclusiveness Still Abides

The characteristic attitude of a protestant denomination a century ago was that the full truth of God was to be found in a single organization. The educational process has done much to shake the convictions of some who were dead sure of their theological views. In the ranks of the southern Baptists one still finds the notion of denominational infallibility. A question in a recent issue of a southern Baptist paper asks, "Should Missionary Baptist churches receive Free-will Baptists without re-baptism?" The question was answered in this way by the paper: "Free-will baptism is an alien performance which ought not to be recognized by us. It is a sure way of introducing doctrinal division, for our differences are fundamental."

Church Federation Protests Newspaper Lottery

The two morning newspapers of Chicago were recently engaged in a cut-throat circulation rivalry which involved the giving away of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the holders of certain lucky tickets that were drawn day by day. The city was in a ferment of excitement over this easy money. Religious forces of various kinds protested, including the Church Federation of the city, and the scheme was denounced by prominent ministers in their pulpits, including Dr. A. J. McCartney of Kenwood Evangelical church. The federal authorities finally put an end to the drawings, and the unseemly contest was at an end. Many business interests joined in opposing the lottery plan.

English King Sanctions New Georgian Patriarch

The king of England rules men of a wide variety of religions. The broad policy of toleration of the British Empire makes the king perform some rather peculiar duties. Recently a new patriarch of Jerusalem in the Georgian church of Armenia was enthroned. This was done in the presence of a Jew, Sir Herbert Samuel, the governor of Palestine, and with the assistance of Dr. Rennie McInnes, the Anglican bishop of Jerusalem. This is the first time in history that an Armenian patriarch has ever received his authority from an English king.

Protestants, Catholics and Jews Consider Industrial Questions

On November 13 and 14, in Boston, representatives of Protestants, Catholics and Jews sat together in a conference which considered the general subject of "Religious Ideals in Industry." The speakers included: Whiting Williams of Cleveland, Arthur Nash of Cincinnati and W. C. Coleman of Wichita, Kans. While these religious leaders vary widely in their theological concepts they are astonishingly close together in their conception of a program for industry. The coming of B. Seebom Rountree to America to give opportunity in many cities to conduct successful conferences on industry. Mr. Rountree is proprietor of a large cocoa manufacturing plant in York, England. He finds the labor union a help rather than a hindrance in the organization of his factory, and has brought astonishment to many American manufacturers by his progressive views on the labor question.

University Church Unable to Seat Audiences

Four hundred people are often turned away from the morning services at First Christian church, Columbia, Mo. While the auditorium was considered commodious when built a few years ago, the number of Disciples students in the university has increased from 400 to 800, and there is in addition a girls' college in the city with a constituency mostly of Disciples. The local church has felt itself unable to meet unaided the question of equipment for the care of the students, and has appealed to the churches throughout Missouri for aid. A meeting was held at Hotel Statler in St. Louis recently to consider the needs of these students. Rev. W. M. Haushalter is the pastor of this popular church.

Disciple Innovation Spreads

Though the forefathers of the Disciples movement were Presbyterians for the most part, they early adopted the Baptist practice with regard to immersion. This soon meant an exclusively immersionist membership. In recent years ministers in various parts of the country have been declaring in favor of the "practice of Christian union," by which they mean the free admission of evangelical Christians to Disciples churches without rebaptism. This practice has been adopted by many churches over the country in a quiet way, since they did not wish to enter into controversy with reactionary influences outside their own communities. A mild sensation has been sprung recently by the discovery that all the Disciples in the city of Baltimore are now "open membership churches with a single exception, and that even this lone church has a majority sentiment in favor of the broader practice. This situation at Baltimore was recently made the subject of a special address at the congress of conservatives held in Louisville. The remedy continually proposed by conservative leaders is exclusion of offending churches from the denomination, but such an exercise of theological authority by state or national conventions is without Disciple precedent, and therefore is regarded by many conservatives as an impractical measure.

Y. M. C. A. Secretaries Denied a Vote

A special committee has been at work on the problem of reducing the size of international conventions of the Y. M. C. A. The committee reports a plan to limit all but the largest city associations to one delegate apiece, and when only one delegate is sent, he is to be a layman from the board of management rather than a secretary. This will mean that large numbers of professional religious workers who regard the secretaryship as a life work will have no voice in the national meeting. This committee report has been published in advance of consideration of the next convention that it may receive criticism, and it is getting it.

Steps Taken for Next Disciples International Convention

The question of a location for the next international convention of the Disciples of Christ is a vexing one. At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the International Convention, it was decided to create a special committee which would have complete charge of the coming convention. This committee will meet during the opening weeks of the new year. It is composed of Rev. S. E. Fisher, Rev. Graham Frank, J. H. Atkinson, Mrs. F. M. Wright and Mrs. G. W. Muckley. Rumor has been pointing toward Denver as the next convention city. At the recent St. Louis meeting an important change was made when the resignation of E. E. Elliott as transportation secretary was accepted. His place was filled by the appointment of H. B. Holloway, the business manager of the United Society, in his place.

Glasgow Chosen as Sunday-School Convention City

The next world's Sunday-school convention will be held at Glasgow. The invitation of this city was very pressing, and it was supported by the London Sunday-school Union. A world convention has not been held in Great Britain since 1898. The convention in Glasgow will be held in St. Andrew's hall which has a seating capacity of 3,455. The convention at Zurich enrolled 2,609, and it is believed that a large number of Sunday-school workers will attend the Glasgow convention.

Prof. Harry F. Ward Appointed by Methodist Body

Men who pioneer any great reform are often misunderstood as they go along. It is gratifying, therefore, to find one of the greatest Methodist conferences in this country, the Rock River conference, adopting a resolution of enthusiastic endorsement of the work of Prof. Harry F. Ward. Among the kind phrases in the extended resolutions are the following: "We express our appreciation of these lectures in particular, because of their unwavering allegiance to the independent standard of Christian principle, for their inclusive concern for the common weal, for the atmosphere in which they have moved above strife and party catchwords and for their discriminating judgment."

"Not only luminous, but inspiring," says The Christian Century.

"Of charming eloquence and practical power," says The (Edinburgh) Scotsman.

Dr. Hutton, who has stirred America to an intense interest in his writings by his recent visit here, holds in this book that Jesus intended his message to be practically applied in the solution of the larger problems of his time — social, political, religious; he maintains also that he was put to death for that very reason by the influential leaders of his day, who, like their sons of today, do not like to see Christianity considered as a "practical" religion.

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS
The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

gating conditions in Chicago this month. Miss Strain reports: "There are still 20,000 drug addicts at large in New York City. These do not include the legitimate drug users, that is, addicts who are being treated by their physicians. The narcotic squad does not interfere with doctors or their patients. The New York drug peddler averages about $5 a day from each addict. The total income of the New York City drug dealers is $100,000 daily. A dose of heroin sells on the New York streets from $1.50 to $3.00, depending on the locality."

Prof. A. W. Taylor Makes Many Addresses

Since Prof. Alva W. Taylor took up his duties as secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare of the Disciples of Christ, he has been kept busy delivering addresses. He visited Flint, Mich., recently and while there spoke before Central Christian church, First Presbyterian church, the Ministerial association, the Men's club of Central church, and the Board of Commerce of the city. This trip is just one of many similar ones during the autumn time.

Death of Bahaist Leader

The leader of the Bahaist religion, Abdul Baha, died on December first at Acca. He was a Persian who, after considerable trouble over the succession, obtained leadership of the movement. His death at this time will have considerable bearing on a number of important enterprises. The Bahaist Temple on the outskirts of Chicago is in process of erection. The succession to the leadership in this movement has no well-defined method, the death of each leader entailing controversy. The principle of hereditary succession is at variance with another principle of divine selection. No announcement has yet been given publicly with regard to the successor of Abdul Baha. The deceased leader was born at Teheran, May 23, 1844. He visited America in 1912, and approved the plan of a temple at Wilmette, Chicago.

Presbyterians are Called to Prayer

While the Presbyterian church has been increasing its budget, the churches have been reporting decreasing income on account of straitened conditions in agricultural districts. The moderator, Rev. Henry Chapman Swearingen, has called the church to observe Sunday, December 18, as a day of special prayer for the missionary work of the church. The call says: "We are straitened only in ourselves. Our tasks, however they may appear to us, lay but a slight tax on God's resources. Let us stir up ourselves to take hold of His strength."

Dr. Stelzle Now Connected With Evangelistic Committee

The Evangelistic committee of New York is headed by Dr. Charles Stelzle, once the pastor of Labor Temple in New York, and well-known speaker upon social themes. Dr. Stelzle's committee is sponsoring many evangelistic enterprises for the city. Captain Gypsy Pat Smith will conduct special services at Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church in New York beginning December 27. During the past year the committee preached the gospel to 546,525 people in 2,958 meetings, and distributed 13,656 bibles, testaments and gospels in fourteen languages. The meetings were conducted in seven different languages.

Federal Council Will Not Set up Independent Agency

In the relief work in Russia the Federal council will act through the established agencies of the American Relief administration, and the American Friends Service committee. By this means the utmost economy will be observed in providing relief for the starving people of Russia. The Federal council states that fifteen dollars will keep a child alive until the next harvest. Each American family is asked to give an amount equal to the price of the Christmas dinner that is served this year. Hon. Carl E. Milliken, former governor of Maine, has been appointed treasurer of the special fund for Russia.

Federal Council Defines Attitude Toward European Protestants

The Federal council has taken cognizance of the relations between American protestant churches, and those of Europe. The Council disclaims any purpose of undertaking to control the action of American denominations in their program for Europe, or of undertaking to impose American methods on European churches. At the same time provision is made for an agency through which the denominations may clear if they wish to undertake any work in Europe cooperatively. Many Christian leaders in this country believe that most of the work done in Europe should be done cooperatively rather than with a view to extending American denominationalism in Europe. It is suggested by the Federal council committee on findings that provision be made to aid in the support of native European pastors, and also in the education of young men of Europe for the Protestant ministry. It is also thought wise to provide some scholarships for study in the United States for young men of special promise.

Plan of Federal Union of Presbyterians Fail

The plan of a federal union of the various Presbyterian denominations in this country has failed, according to an announcement sent out by Dr. James E. Clarke, secretary of the committee. Some of the delegates at the conference felt that the federal plan of union was no improvement on the present plan of clearing through the Council of Reformed churches. The delegates of the northern Presbyterian church stood for the idea of one church with sectional assemblies. The whole matter has gone back to status quo. The United Presbyterian church was the only one which voted in its assembly this year in favor of the federal plan of union. It is thought that Presbyterian reunion is by this report indefinitely deferred. It is interesting to note that the sectional divisions in the church created by the civil war do readily yield to treatment. Northern and southern Baptists do not even talk about reunion. Northern and southern Presbyterians seem to have reached an impasse. The negotiations between northern and southern Methodists are not very promising at this moment. Each of these denominations is wasting money in the border states, and suffering from competition and friction.

Why

The Twentieth Century Quarterly (Uniform)

is used by many hundreds of adult
and young people's Bible classes today:

Because William Dunn Ryan's remarkable success as a leader of great adult schools makes him an ideal conductor of the department, "Getting Into the Lesson."

Because Herbert L. Willett, Jr.'s several years experience in the Orient give him unquestioned authority as an interpreter of Bible life. His department is headed, "Difficult Points Explained."

Because John R. Ewers' lesson talks come straight from life and, therefore, go straight to life.

Because Prof. W. C. Morro's long experience as a teacher make him a past-master in the art of questioning. He conducts the "Lesson Forum."

Because Ernest Bournier Allen, who contributes the weekly "Prayer Thought," knows how to gather up the spiritual content of a lesson and to crystallize it into one or two vibrant sentences.

Because Thomas Curtis Clark, editor of The Quarterly, has had twenty years of experience as a teacher of large adult and young people's classes. He can feel the pulse of the average Bible class.

CHICAGO

WITH the death of the old year and the birth of the new, at midnight December thirty-one, the first half of the current missionary year of the Disciples of Christ will close. It will also mark the end of the second quarter of this year. This means that half of the yearly budget for Christian education is due. It means that churches should see to it that the money due on pledges to the budget is collected and forwarded at once. If a church is not using the budget plan, or if Christian education is not included, then a generous offering should be taken; for the colleges never needed money for current expenses more than now. All monies intended for Disciple Colleges should be sent to the Board of Education at 222 Downey Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana.

GAY colored lights—glittering tinsel—the laughter of children—the Tree—Home—and off there in the Volga country people are starving to death.

Holly and mistletoe—bulging stockings by the fire in the living-room—red and white candy canes—little packages tied with red and green ribbons—Mother—and off there in the Volga country the nurses are separating the babies who are going to die today from the ones who won't die until tomorrow.

Dad carving the turkey and spilling gravy on the tablecloth—the family laughing at Baby as she sucks the drumstick bone—teasing Mother because she didn't put enough sugar in the cranberry sauce—and off there in the Volga country they're eating bread made of dried grass and ground-up horses' hoofs.

While our lights are gay and our homes are filled with Christmas cheer—

Death plays Santa Claus.

Off there in the Volga country fifteen million people are dying of hunger while we say "Merry Christmas" and celebrate the birthday of Jesus Christ.

Disconcerting Developments at the Washington Conference

THE long lull in formal announcements of progress by the Washington conference has given rise to much apprehensive talk tending to discount the earlier optimism with which the gathering of diplomats has been universally regarded. The return of Premier Briand to France has been followed by the departure of M. Viviani, thus leaving French interests in the hands of a delegation of obscure personnel and dubious authority. Mr. Hughes has been compelled to carry on negotiations with M. Briand by cable, an awkward method at best and a procedure which has excited the resentment of the remaining members of the French delegates. It is now definitely announced that Mr. Lloyd George will not cross the water and this fact has appreciably subtracted from public confidence in the authority and seriousness of the nations participating in the parley, despite the continuing presence of Mr. Balfour and the other distinguished members of the British delegation. President Harding's unfortunate interview in which he disclosed his unawareness of the significance of the four power treaty as applying to the homeland islands of Japan has opened the way for an attack upon the treaty by the irreconcilable forces, which seriously weakens its prestige in the senate. The apparent impracticability of carrying on vital discussions in open session has brought disappointment to many. The hope became well fixed that this conference would stand out in sharp and wholesome contrast to the Paris meetings of three years ago as an illustration of the ideal of "open covenants openly arrived at." These developments have cast a shadow over the gathering which for two weeks has been growing more ominous. Other developments more fundamental and more serious have also come to light. It seems to grow increasingly clear that the conference will be compelled, if it continues in its present groove, to touch the essential problems of China with but the most delicate, tentative and platitudinous formulas. The Shantung question is still unsettled, and the question of the twenty-one demands made by Japan and accepted by China under duress while the attention of the rest of the world was centered upon the European war, has been specifically ruled out of the purview of the conference on the ground that this question lies within the domestic sphere of the two nations and can be considered only by the interested nations themselves in direct negotiations. The decision is, of course, precisely what Japan wants, and the public cannot help interpreting her reconciliation to the 5-5-3 naval ratio, together with the scheme for the return to China of her railroad interests in China—at a high valuation—as a triumph of Japan's barter diplomacy.

Fresh Disclosures of French Policy

MORE disconcerting even than the intractable problems emerging in the Pacific itself is the disclosure of the state of mind of the present government of France. It was naively assumed by American public opinion that the question of curtailment of naval armament was one whose settlement would involve only those nations with sizeable navies—Britain, the United States and Japan. But the tentative agreement reached by these three powers on the Hughes plan is now held up by the attitude of France who declines to accept her present naval status as a measure of her rights and aspirations as a naval power. France, according to the best reports obtainable, appears to demand a navy equal to that of Japan. This means that while other nations will be scrapping sixty-six of their ships, France will be building more. Particularly does France insist upon her need of submarines, alleging that in the day when German sea commerce is revived, if war breaks out again between herself and Germany, these submarines will be necessary as a weapon of defense and offense. British opinion has been profoundly stirred by this disclosure of French purposes. It regards the representations of its late ally as a disingenuous justification of a navy intended in reality to be used against England. Liberal opinion outside of England sees in the French attitude toward the Washington disarmament proposals only another confirmation of the policy of imperialism backed up by a strong military and naval force which all French diplomacy since the war has hardly been able to conceal. Any one at all acquainted with the inwardness of the treaty of Versailles, and the steps taken by France to execute it, together with the diplomatic network by which she is weaving her control into the affairs of the smaller nations of Europe, can hardly doubt that British opinion is not far off the track in seeing something sinister in the proposal for a strong French navy. England is the only power that is likely to block France's ambitions to extend her hegemony over the whole of Europe. As her ambitions unfold it is quite within the bounds of reasonable probability to expect a sharp and serious clash between the two nations. France armed with submarines will then have a tremendously formidable weapon against England, whose very subsistence depends upon the security of her sea commerce. And if, as is every way likely, Italy, also equipped with a navy equal, or nearly equal to that of France, takes sides with France, the British navy would almost inevitably lose her control of the seas. The far reach of such a threatening instrument in the hands of French imperialism would put an inhibition upon British policy that would practically give France a free hand in the whole of continental Europe.

The Peril of the Conference

HERE an irony as of fate itself is seen to inhere in the cautious disarmament plans of the Washington conference. That the proposal to cut down the navies of the leaders should be met by the proposal to build up the navies of the lesser powers only demonstrates how slight a benefit is likely to accrue from the timid method of partial disarmament. The nations are being caught again in the wretched attempt to create a balance among themselves. This balance has war as its chief presupposition, not peace, nor friendship, nor justice. It is essentially unfrank, greedy and fearful. The ruling motive of such partial disarmament is the reduction of expenses, not the hope of ending war. This is no reflection upon the policy of curtailing navies. It is simply an acknowledgment of the limited consequences we may expect to flow from such partial disarmament. Yet it is more than that. It is an unescapable suggestion that disarmament can as safely go the full length as part way. There is no reason why, after providing for international police protection, the nations should not scrap their entire navies. The logic of scrapping sixty-six ships leads inevitably to the scrapping of all. And there is even better reason for the thoroughgoing procedure than for the partial procedure. The economic argument applies to the total as well as to a part. And the psychological argument applies better to the total than to a part. As for the ethical argument, it finds no satisfaction at all in a suspicious policy of partial reduction; it can hardly be said to be applied at all unless it is applied without reservation. If the militarism of Japan and France ends in driving the nations into an armed balance of power, involving nicely apportioned naval ratios, and afterward army ratios, the tension of such a balance will in every nation, inevitably stimulate the development on a vast scale of the less conspicuous and therefore more easily concealed forms of war preparation such as aeroplanes and gas. With the seeds of war implicit in the very plan to end war we will thus have another demonstration of the futility of all mechanical or pagan schemes of abolishing war that refuse to deal with the causes of war according to the mind of Christ.

The Irish Free State

THE Irish issue has been transferred from London to Dublin, and from Dublin to the remotest village and household of Erin. Each day's news makes it increasingly certain that in spite of the divided counsels among the leaders the reconciliation devised in the London conferences will be ratified by the Dail and by public opinion. The members are hearing from their constituencies in decisive fashion during the Christmas holidays. It is an interesting sidelight on human nature that de Valera of South American derivation should represent the extremist position, while the native Irishman tends more to a moderate position involving an acceptance of the treaty. The peace plan is of course a compromise. Every peace where mutual rights are involved must be of this sort, unless it is a peace of conquest. Certain noisy partisans in America who will never have to face the hazard of British bullets, continue to fulminate against the acceptance of the peace plan. Yet it seems probable that the good sense of the native Irishman will prevail against his false counselors. The plan which Mr. Lloyd George has worked out with the assistance of the Irish leaders safeguards the interests that are most dear to men of modern democratic feelings. Religious persecution has been made impossible. Ireland has been kept divided for two hundred years by fear of religious coercion. The Protestant minority represented by Ulster has no longer any just ground for nursing this fear under the terms of the proposed treaty. Its altars and institutions will be protected in the freedom that is dear to all men of good conscience. The plan guarantees all the rights of political sovereignty and the opportunity to determine a national destiny in harmony with the distinctive culture which the Sinn Fein movement has brought to a high degree of self-consciousness. At the same time the peace plan recognizes facts that are written into the very geography of Europe. Great Britain and Ireland are economically and politically interdependent. So long as we live in an international system where military and naval defense must be considered, it is obvious that the defense of England and Ireland must be under one control. If, as it now seems likely to do, the Dail ratifies the treaty, the position in which Ulster is placing itself will come to be regarded with increasing disfavor by liberal Protestant opinion the world over. Happily the treaty leaves the door open for Ulster to change her mind and deportment at any time. In the providence of God we may believe that when the smoke of the present controversy clears away the Irish and the English peoples will enter upon a long era of cooperation and good-will.

The Cloud Over the Christmas Star

NOT many hearts were able to pass the season of Christmas joy with unalloyed merriment. Over all the festivities there hung the clouds of unemployment at home and famine abroad. Authentic and vivid descriptions of the Russian famine have been burned into too many consciences for them to be able to take their own comfort and prosperity in utter selfishness. Take for example the report of Miss Anna J. Haines, who has just returned from Russia where as head worker of the American Friends Service Committee she saw the situation in the famine cursed section as only a woman could see it. Her report is less statistical and more human than if it were issued by a man. It checks completely with the reports which are coming from the American Relief Administration. People are eating horse hoofs and dry grass before they give up to die. Babies are hauled out to burial places by cartloads from large cities. The animals of the section are mostly dead, and soon millions of people will be dead. The difficulty of transportation prevents the saving of all the people affected, but whatever is humanly possible must be done and done at once. American churches received Christmas offerings which are now being sent to the Federal Council of Churches for use through the agencies already set up. Even if we do our best, the deaths in Russia this winter may exceed those of the world war. Thirty million people are hungry, and it is feared ten millions will perish. Out of such a terrible situation come the plagues that reach to the more prosperous sections of the world. The Christmas spirit asks no questions in the face of human need. It matters not what religion is professed, if any, or what political creed is held, a starving man is just our brother in Christ to be helped. The judgment parable of Jesus closes with a warning which should sound in the ears of Christians all over this land this winter. "I was hungry and ye gave me no meat."

When the Pulpit is Not Interesting

RECENTLY a layman of Minnesota aired his grievances with regard to the churches. He and his wife had been looking about honestly for a church they could join. Four were within driving distance, and each was visited. In not a single instance did they hear a sermon that was interesting enough to make them want to hear another. This layman has been properly taken to task by the religious journals, and it has been suggested to him that if he had been in the right attitude himself he would probably have been interested in the sermons he heard. One wonders however, whether this layman's experience is an exceptional one and if there may not be a certain justification for the mood in which his quest left him. Why are preachers not interesting? This man found a Methodist preacher expounding home missions. He had to do this every year, whether he had anything to say on the subject or not. It was one of his church interests which he must support, or allow his professional standing to suffer. Perhaps he should have been ingenious enough to meet this emergency, but he was not. The Disciples ministry was explaining some portion of the Bible, and using terms that lacked reality and vitality except to those who were familiar with a certain lingo. Either through ignorance or prejudice he had failed to read modern books on the Bible. The layman knew that something was wrong with this sermon, though he could not say what. In another church the minister was defending and explaining an ancient doctrine. Perhaps the doctrine was true, but because it was not made interesting, it failed to convince. The minister seemed to be preaching this doctrine by rote more than by experience. The pulpit cannot be interesting until preachers free themselves from the trammels of tradition and deal at first hand with life. To be uninteresting in the pulpit is an unpardonable sin. It would be more edifying for the layman to sit in an attitude of dissent for thirty minutes than to be bored and sleepy. When preachers are no mere collection agents for organized interests, nor the professional exponents of ancient dogmas, but free men with a religious experience of their own to interpret, they can thrill multitudes.

Publicity and Education as Weapons of Peace

LORD RIDDELL, representative of the Newspaper Proprietor's Association of London, who is in America attending the Washington conference, has been much impressed by the campaign of publicity which the churches are carrying on to emphasize the ideals of peace. Himself a strong believer in world brotherhood, he appreciates the necessity of making every right-minded man a propagandist of the most outstanding idea that has come to the world in a century. He urges the man of the street who believes in world peace to talk to his parson about a special sermon on this subject. Quite rightly it is suggested that even better than a campaign of publicity is a program of religious education. Until children come up thoroughly grounded in the idea that the human race is a brotherhood, we shall not hope to be past all danger of war. The Christmas toys are no longer so military as they were. The lesson materials of the Sunday schools, however, are not yet as well organized as they should be with reference to the great reform movements of our time which derive from the Christian conscience. The Federal Council has done a most commendable work in providing a pamphlet in which the duty of the Christian church is clearly outlined. "Working toward a Warless World" is a contribution toward the cause of peace of the very greatest value. Meanwhile the church must settle down to the steady pulling which will be necessary to bring the ultimate success. It took a century to outlaw the saloon. Until the liquor reform was grounded in the curriculum of religious education, and became the refrain of sermons throughout the land, an ancient evil remained triumphant. War will never be banished by resolutions. Nor will the kind of armament reduction about to be accepted by the conference at Washington do it. The great weapons are publicity and education and the persistent preaching of the Christian doctrine of human fellowship and world brotherhood.

The Balance of Power in Religion

A CURRENT and increasing effort of denominational leaders to remove the scandal of sectarian overlapping and overreaching is embodied in the so-called reciprocal exchange. The aim is also to deal more adequately with neglected regions. Denominational "statesmanship" formerly prompted the clustering of churches in and around the "strategic centers." Communities which do not offer promise of being the Chicagos and New Yorks and Londons of the next generation were neglected by national and state agencies in favor of those towns whose ambitions soar higher. Thus it has come about, especially in the western frontier regions, that there is a suffocating congestion of churches in certain towns and few or none at all in others. Denominational "strategy" has achieved this. Church "statesmen" have taken no chances. They were determined to be on the ground floor in anticipation of the boom. Where there was no prospect of a boom, the town was regarded lightly or shunned.

The plan of reciprocal exchanges gains its precise designation, however, from the older regions where the town occupied by several churches proves unable adequately to support so many. Perhaps early ambitions which projected a metropolitan center have not been realized. Perhaps once thriving industries have declined and there has been a migration in search of greater economic advantages. In such a case, a denomination agrees to withdraw from one town provided its competitor will withdraw from another town where the two denominations concerned are duplicated. It is agreed that this is a fair exchange of advantages, and that instead of two weak and ineffective churches, each denomination will have one strong organization, one in one town and the other in the other. Though the antecedent conditions are radically different in the old east from those in the new west, this plan is thought to be equally promising for Maine and Montana, for Vermont and Utah. Great store is laid by the movement in much home mission and other denominational literature. First blush, many who eagerly desire the cure of the manifest evils of denominational overlapping and overlooking see large promise in this device.

It is with no intention of damping this worthy ardor, but only to follow out some of its implications that the plan is subjected to the present scrutiny. If its promise is to be fulfilled, we must discover where it will land us. If it shall prove of permanent value its inherent qualities must stand searching tests.

In the first place, it should be noted that the plan presupposes that our denominations have rights independent of the interests of the communities they are designed to serve. Our "statesmanship" must preserve the balance. You give up here and we will give up over there. We must not destroy the balance of power. This is identical with European pre-war diplomacy. The security of European civilization was based upon a preservation of a balance as between imperial powers. The balance was disturbed in 1914, and European civilization is today in wreck. Are fears of a similar debacle justified among the religious forces of the United States? Is it not rather disconcerting, after all the hard words we have used about pettifogging and bartering European diplomacy of the old order, to find the dearest values of our civilization being subjected to the same hazards? Has any denomination rights independent of its service to the community? Who decides that the "balance" must be preserved? Why is it necessary to consider such questions? If the dominant and sole purpose of our churches is to serve, why should we be so cautious of our rights?

In the second place, what is the basis of our denominational divisions? If Methodism is so good, as Methodism, is it right that any compact shall be entered into that will arbitrarily, or even by a gentleman's agreement, deprive any American community of the boon of practicing Methodism? What right have Baptist overlords so much as to suggest that this, or that, or the other community, shall be deprived of the benisons of a Baptist organization? Of course, any Baptist denominational leader would hasten to repudiate an intention thus to dictate to a free-born American population. But are not those numerous Baptists who repudiate the compact, expressed or implied in the reciprocal exchange, and who excoriate agents of the denomination, official or other, who may be party to such an understanding—are not they the simon-pure Baptists, and are they not right in denouncing those who join in reciprocal exchange movements as false to the faith, and disloyal to those principles on which the whole Baptist order is founded? To a cold-blooded outsider they seem to have the right of the controversy which is breaking out here and there in the Baptist communion.

Nor is the case different with any other denomination. Once the denomination is granted inherent and independent significance, no compromise with other denominations, such as is involved in this plan of reciprocal exchanges, is logically possible. Engaging in such barter on any terms is tantamount to the admission that denominational distinctions are merely matters of expediency, of sectarian rights and advantages, of group interests. These may be freely manipulated in any manner which will insure a good bargain. Church statesmen have become traders, and those who can drive the sharpest bargain stand to win.

Furthermore, what about the people in the communities affected by this plan? If the city man is entitled to true-blue Presbyterianism, safely preserved and dispensed in an organization designed to guarantee its purity, why should the equally worthy Presbyterian in the isolated village or town be expected to affiliate with a Methodist or Baptist communion which it may have pleased the reciprocal exchangers to have wished upon his community as the sole custodian of religion? Is denominational integrity one of those modern conveniences which one may enjoy in the city but which the bumpkin must forego in the village and rural community? Are denominational convictions matters of geographical convenience? Must one be prepared to change them to suit the locality into which business or educational considerations may draw him? If people may be expected to put on and put off their denominational loyalties so readily as this plan implies, of what value are they first or last? Will it not become clear to the people who pass back and forth among these communities upon which reciprocal exchanges have been imposed, that denominational alignments are chiefly significant as buttresses of denominational machines?

These communities are being treated by the churches on the same basis as they would be treated by two competitive mercantile establishments who enter into an agreement to keep out of each other's trade territory. It is well known what motive prompts such agreements. These enterprises are after profits, and they increase them by agreeing not to fight out the battle to the fatal finish. They are competitors operating under a truce. If the denominations are operating on the same basis, the people subjected to their terms will know how to rate and classify them. It goes without saying that most religious-minded people in our small communities do not take kindly to the proposal that their religious organizations shall operate on the same basis and for similar purposes with competitive mercantile establishments.

In the days of the fathers when the heretics of opposing denominations were unceremoniously consigned to the limbo meet for those who rejected the truth of God confided alone to the true body of believers, there was a certain honesty and robustness about the denominational order which must command the respect of the historian. But when denominational relations are reduced to the status of barter, the dispassionate and disinterested observer can scarcely muster a degree of respect. All such shifting devices as this of reciprocal exchanges between the denominations are multiplying evidences of the spiritual bankruptcy of the system under which we persist in seeking to administer our religious interests. We act as though this system must be preserved at any cost.

Credit must be given for every sincere desire to rob the system of its grossness. The knock-down-drag-out fight, uncompromising and bitter, which for the most part gave rise to our denominational alignments, is universally regarded as unseemly. But if our conversion to the more brotherly, more Christian, more human, more democratic conception of religion, has brought us only to the point of watchful and profit-seeking diplomacy, we certainly have not left the old order far behind. Europe was content with this type of statesmanship. But it proved too easy to resort to the old savagery. Those who believe that religion has a mission in American society other than to furnish advantage-seeking denominational groups a chance to barter each in its own interests will be pardoned for a languid zeal in furthering reciprocal exchanges. The way to be rid of a system of such manifold evils, is not by taming its asperities nor glozing its iniquities with suave diplomacy, but doing away with the system.

When denominational agencies approach communities with the community interests first and foremost in every consideration, of course they will not higgle and thrust and withdraw in a gentlemanly sparring match, but will frankly and joyously encourage the organization of religious interests on a basis which are suited to the needs of that community. No denominational "statesman" has yet disclosed a zeal for the "community church" unless he can tag the name of his denomination somewhere upon it. He cannot view with equanimity a rival denominational name upon one of these organizations even in parenthesis, unless he can be guaranteed immunity in attaching his own tag on some neighboring town's organization. The balance must be preserved in any case. The sentiment for reciprocal exchanges often proves to be a camouflage for capturing community churches for the denominations. Seeing that it is impossible for any one denomination to capture all, our "statesmen" are entering into gentlemen's agreements under which each gets its fair share of the spoils.

The implications of this procedure must be exposed. They are not consciously sinister. Everybody involved in this policy is sincere and well-intentioned enough. But the mischief is done nevertheless. The control of religion which in the early centuries of church history was sucked away from the people by the developing hierarchy has never yet been given back to the people by our modern Protestantism. It must be given back. The lay community is the unit of churchly as well as political democracy. The impertinent intrusion of outside overhead organizations into the determination of the type of religious organization for the community is undemocratic and schismatic. The balance of power idea in religion is no better than the balance of power idea in world politics. It must give way to a consideration of the rights of the people who are actually involved.

The Feeling of Possession

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I RODE upon a Train. And I wakened in the morning and found myself Refreshed. And I Spake unto the Porter, and said unto him, How dost thou feel this fine morning? And he answered me saying—

Ah feels lack a man dat's got money. No, sah, Ah don't have no money—leastwise not much. Ah jis nachally feels lack ah has it. Ah could have money ef ah didn't have to eat and to wah clothes; but ef ah didn't have to do dem things, money wouldn't be no good nohow: So ah don't feel bad about washin' de clothes and eatin' de food, but on de contrary ah kiner enjoys it. An' dat's de way de money goes, an' hit kin go. Dey gits de money away from me for the food and the clothes, but dey kaint take away de feelin'. I still has dat. No sah, hit ain't necessary fo a man to have money to have de feelin' of havin' it: and hit ain't necessary for a man to have de feelin' when he has de cash. A man mout have de money and feel pore, and den he shore would be pore, an for dat feelin' of bein' pore dey ain't no remedy. But on de contrary a mon mout have de feelin' of bein' rich when he didn't have no money, and den he would be rich widdout it, and even de gettin' of money couldn't make dat man pore. Hit's a fine mawnin,' an' de train is on time, an' my gal lives at dis end of de line and I'se happy.

And I spake unto him saying, No poverty of worldly goods can ever make thee poor; for thou art a philosopher. And behold, no wealth can spoil thee. Therefore shalt thou have wealth. For I had intended to give thee the fourth part of a shekel; but thou art a wise man, and I will give thee twice as much. For unto a man who hath wealth within his soul, unto him should wealth be entrusted.

And I also am one of those who feel as if they had money.

VERSE

"Shall the Sword Devour Forever?"

(II Samuel 2:26)

SHALL the sword devour forever,
Shall the peoples ne'er be free
Of the lures and lusts which sever
Man from his humanity?

Whence come wars and hatreds ever?
Thine thou hast but seekest mine;
Greedy souls and satiate never,
Passion driven as the swine.

Gracious Father, great All-giver,
Send Thy suffering world release!
Circe spells with love-lance shiver;
Strip away brute legacies!

Holy Spirit, brooding Mother,
Woo our race with mighty power!
Pitying Christ, thou All-men's Brother,
Mount the throne this crucial hour!

CHARLES MANFORD SHARPE.

The Miracle

THERE was a lowly mortal, stained by sin,
On whom men looked with scorn, scarce pitying,
Until one dared to stoop and enter in
The charnel cave of his base thoughts, and wring
A slow repentance by the power of love
The Master lent him from his throne above.
A slow repentance, then a great delight
Broke in upon that ignominious soul,
Till all affrighted at the wondrous sight
Of the transforming love which seemed to roll
In mighty billows round and over him,
He sank into the shadows old and grim.
Fearful he sank. How could he share the clean,
The holy life of God—who was so vile?
Till in his ear the voice of Faith, serene,
Bade him be comforted, again to smile;
For in repenting he who seemed a clod
Had moved with joy the mighty heart of God.

ETHELBERT D. WARFIELD.

Not Twilight

NAY, Mourner on the shadowed stair,
This is not twilight of the Faith,
This cloud, that like an acrid wraith
Blows through the Temple everywhere—
This haze is from a smouldering flare
In that sere stubble where Armed Death
Binds his last sheaf and halts for breath
Among the bones of Empire there.
The Faith aforetime knew the Dark
That girt the world with fire and sword
From Northern Ocean to the Nile:
No shadow now can dim the spark—
There is no evening with the Lord!
No mark for Twilight on His Dial.

Not Twilight, but a growing day,
As each worn century departs
And takes some burden from our hearts,
Some stone or stumbling from our way—
Till presently a man shall say,
"The road is clearer than the charts:
The old wayfarers saw but parts,
And darkly through a mist of gray."

And presently the world will own
A place to lave her wounds and rest
While Peace fades out her ancient scar—
Her brave arms lifted to the Throne,
The Rose of Sharon on her breast,
And on her brow the Morning Star.

M. E. BYRD.

Benediction

AND now, may the Mystic Comrade lead thee through all the waiting years; vouchsafe thee light in darkness, strength in weakness, love in loneliness, sympathy in sorrow, harmony in joy. May the lustre of His Presence hallow the dreams of thy morning; the seal of His approval crown the work of thy noonday; and mayest thou find His arm thy staff, His unsinking feet thine assurance when thou comest to the chill waters of eventide.

Social Ideals and the Sense of Sin

By William E. Gilroy

READERS of Dr. Swain's book, "What and Where is God?" will remember his striking story of the dear old white-haired saint, beautiful in mien and manners, with a charming accent, and a mind richly stored with the treasures of poetry and refinement. "Loving all saints," he says, "she was equally loved by them." And yet, he discovered one day that his "dear old saint was a saint only in spots." He had asked her if she knew of the family with four children across the way, who had lately come to her neighborhood, and had suggested that she might be useful to them. It was not a case, Dr. Swain says, as sometimes happens, where caution was necessary; and the dear old lady might have been of some real service. Yet she drew herself up at his suggestion, and "with a spasmodic jerk of the elbow, and a toss of the head," replied, "No, I don't want to know such folks!" "She had forgotten," says Dr. Swain, "that her Father was over there struggling and suffering to save his children from sin and harm, and that he sorely needed his older daughter over the way to help him. My dear old saint would not go across the street to help her Father whom she thought she loved so dearly. She did not realize that God was the Father of all spirits, and that all were members of one family."

SOCIETY AND THE SAINTS

No story could suggest more aptly the social function of the sense of sin, and the social inadequacy of certain types of saintliness, very commendable and beautiful as far as they go. Dr. Swain's dear old saint was lacking in depth of humanity, and in true democracy, because she was lacking in the sense of sin, or had only a sense of sin exclusively individual and personal. The tendency, in fact, has been to think of the sense of sin only in its individual and personal aspects; and, if we have at all viewed sin and the sense of sin from the social standpoint, it has been mainly with reference to the effect upon others, rather than upon the sinner himself, or upon the one conscious of his sin. As a matter of fact the sense of sin in the individual is the deepest and most profound of social factors, the centre around which is determined man's right relation, not only to God, but to his fellows. Without the sense of sin there can be little vital and fundamental democracy in a world like ours.

It is remarkable that Whitman, otherwise a true poet of democracy, never discovered this. Nowhere does his writing fall so flat, or sound so hollow, as in his references to the sense of sin. In the "Leaves of Grass," singing the eulogy of animals, he says:

They do not sweat and whine about their condition;
They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins;
They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God;
Not one is dissatisfied—

and similar passages are found throughout his writings.

There was in Whitman, of course, the rather healthy reaction of a broad and comprehensive naturalism against the strained artificiality and the perverted manifestations of the sense of sin as expressed in so much of the religion of the time. His very complete and perfect sympathy with humanity atoned in some measure for the lack of the sense of sin, and there are very noble passages in which Whitman expresses the community of human life, which many saints have missed. There is a deep sense in which he touched hell as well as heaven, but it is strange that professedly identifying himself with all human conditions and emotions, he never fully sympathized with the sincere and ingenuous manifestations of the sense of sin. It was a phase of naturalism that he missed. He identifies himself with the sinner, but he hardly came to the place where he identified himself with the sinner's remorse and revulsion.

THE LOST WAY

Edward Carpenter, who might be called the English Whitman, came a little nearer to it, in his "Towards Democracy," and in the remarkable prose essays published under the title, "England's Ideal." In both books there is a tragic sense of man's having missed the way. So evidently inspired by Whitman, and so essentially like his master, Carpenter is none the less the poet of idealism, rather than of naturalism, and when he sings, or, should we say, shouts boastfully:

I know that the veriest sot in the village is my equal
And this is my strength,

the Cambridge scholar is expressing something more than a passing phase of identification with the guttersnipe. In spite of all Whitman's over-identification of himself with sin and sinners, there is something that hardly rings quite true in that phase of his writings. It sounds hollow and cracked beside some such stately expression of the Christian consciousness in the presence of sin as, for example, F. D. Maurice's noble saying: "I wish to confess the sins of my country and time as my own." There spake the voice of the Hebrew prophet, and of the genuine prophet of all time.

The man who has no sense of sin is apt to be a very superior person, and very lonely in a world where there are so many sinners. The sense of sin is a companionable thing; few factors bring men nearer to their fellows than a sincere and honest consciousness of their own imperfections. The story of John Wesley's rebuke of Captain Oglethorpe is apropos. When Wesley was crossing the Atlantic, he saw the captain one day in a rage, pursuing a servant who had offended him. "I shall never forgive him," roared the captain. "Oh then," said Wesley, quietly, "I suppose that you have never done wrong." The test of the sincerity of our sense of sin, and of our confession of sin, is found in our attitude toward other sinners. Maurice's confession of the sins of his country and time, as his own, was no expression of cant or formalism. It was not, indeed, a grovelling besmirchment of his own personal character, but it was a very real consciousness of his solidarity with the society and time in which he lived,—a recognition of the pit whence even saint and scholar are digged. The truest and best saints have felt it, and have not merely professed to feel it. The late Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh, emphasized the sense of sin, and keenly expressed it as personal. So strongly did he seem to accuse himself that some of his friends thought he overdid it, and suggested that if Whyte had been half as bad as he represented himself to be, when he dwelt upon the sense of sin, he would hardly have been fit company for decent folk. It was a shallow criticism of a deep and far-seeing man, for Whyte understood the tragedy of sin in life, and how near the deepest sins lie to the hearts of men who seem most far removed from them.

LIFE AND REALITY

It is a profound mistake when men of genial character and goodwill fail to face the facts of life as they are, and attribute to all men the gentle purposes and emotions with which they themselves are swayed. Classic literature of all languages and eras remind us that life is not all idyl and comedy. It is filled with tragedy moving in the atmosphere of the fact and consciousness of sin. The gentle and genial are self-deceived, if they believe that tragedy nowhere touches them, and imagine that they have no blood-relationship with the sinful and criminal. Oscar Wilde was too essentially a poseur to be quoted seriously in most matters, but his "De Profundis" was the cry of a soul in disgrace and anguish, and it is full of passages that are instinct with a sincerity born of personal tragedy, real and vital, even if only a passing phase, and indicating the clear vision and temporary enlightenment of a man of scholarly instincts and artistic soul, trailed in the mire and herded with criminals and outcasts. He tells how in his trouble someone had written to him, 'When you are not on your pedestal you are not interesting.' "How remote," he says, "was the writer from what Matthew Arnold calls 'the Secret of Jesus.' Either would have taught him that whatever happens to another happens to oneself, and if you want an inscription to read at dawn and at night-time, and for pleasure or for pain, write up on the walls of your house in letters for the sun to gild and the moon to silver, 'Whatever happens to oneself happens to another.'"

The great war with its sudden revelation of hell, a revelation in both depth and magnitude, was an ironical and awful answer to an age that had lightly regarded, or intensely rebelled against, the sense of sin. Nor was it only a revelation to individual hearts. Men rose in the anguish of humanity to sublime heights of courage and sacrifice. There were many who discovered for the first time the meaning of Calvary. But there were others who had lived in complacent morality, or in peaceful and unruffled religious experience, who were amazed to discover within themselves something akin to the passion and hate which they might vaguely have thought of as being somewhere in humanity, but to which they had regarded themselves as strangers, and which they had thought of themselves as incapable of feeling. There were gentle, noble men, who went out to fight with a keen feeling of moral necessity, and they would go out to fight again in the same cause, and with the same compulsion.

But to the noblest-minded of them all, in spite of the crusader's conscience, the experience and the homecoming were marked by a new sense of the meaning and horror of murder, and greed, and hate, and worldly ambition and lust. The sense of sin swept over sensitive souls who had never experienced it, or who had even denied its reality, and in some cases it tore them from their moorings, and launched them in the depths of ignominy and despair. Humanity paid an awful price for the denial of the sins which, had they been repented of in sackcloth and ashes, might not have brought the world to the brink of ruin, and humanity today is contemplating the past war and the possibility of war in the future more with the sense of pain and loss, with proud self-sufficiency and self-confident preparation, or with a consciousness of stumbling and bewilderment, rather than with a clear conviction of sin. There has been no conference of men, or of nations, for the disarmament of the soul. The epistle of James may yet have a truer word upon the causes of war, and the way of peace, than has been sounded by either Wilson or Harding.

AN AGE OF SELF-ASSERTION

The dominant note in the fiction which reveals the characters and spirit of the age is that of confident self-assurance; the heroes of the age are supermen in courage, endurance and capacity. Jack London in his ferocious portrayal of the "strong" man is only a little more extreme, and crudely, but splendidly, barbarous in expressing the general spirit of current fiction. And in the plain, practical, non-fictitious spheres of business, industry and politics it is the "captain of his soul" who is the typical man of success. Doubt of one's worth, rightness, or capacity must never be allowed to cross one's mind, or if it crosses the mind it must not find expression upon one's lips, or in one's attitude. Even in the sphere of religion and the church there seems to be a preference for the man of vociferous certainty, over the man who is humble and reverentially inquiring in the presence of Truth. The actual condition of the world today is well symbolized in the words of a popular song, "We don't know where we're going, but we're on the way." There is no long vision and no depth of purpose; there is little disposition to inquire if the way be the right one; there is no time to stop; there is, indeed, a commendable courage and spirit in surmounting difficulties; but there is a spirit of positiveness that drives forward alike in darkness as in light, with little sense of the need of either Guide or Saviour. There are few voices crying, "Lord save me, I perish," or "What must I do to be saved?"

Yet if the world is to be saved from its mistakes and its blunderings, from its reign of violence and war, it can only be through a new manifestation of the sense of sin, in individual and in mass. Humanity's deepest lack at the present hour is the collective consciousness and experience that has driven individual sinners to the penitent bench. An able journalist who some years ago went the rounds of the churches of a large city, recording his impressions, expressed the hope that some day he might hear "a clear, ringing, workable answer to the question, What must I do to be saved?" But before that answer can be forthcoming, there must be some clear and ringing asking of the question, and there will never be that until there is a deep and widespread conviction of sin. Could ever a truer word be said of our world, and possibly of the average community, than the word of the spirit to the Laodiceans: "Thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed . . . and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see."

THE WORST SIN

The peculiarly damning sin of today is the sin of self-satisfaction in quiescence and of self-sufficiency in action—the sin, in short, of feeling no sense of sin. It is a social as much as a personal sin, not only as a sin of society, but as a social sin and shortcoming of the individual. The social condition of the Pharisee was much more deplorable than his religious condition. His religion might have saved him, if he had had the slightest sense of democracy and the consciousness that he was flesh and blood with the publican whom he despised. The fundamental task of religion today, and rightly conceived of education also, is the permeation of democracy with the sense of sin; and it this is to be accomplished the sense of sin must itself be democratized, or its essentially democratic character be recognized. Someone has remarked that in our modern day the characters of the parable are apt to be reversed, and the Pharisee may be found speaking the language of the publican, with an unchanged heart and a self-pride in the confession of sins he does not feel. Let him cease lifting his eyes to heaven until he has found his solidarity with the publican, and he will confess as his own, very really and penitently, sins that he never felt before.

In recent years Thomas Carlyle, possibly unjustly, has been blamed for encouraging the worship of the "strong" man, and for developing much of the widespread spirit of self-assertion and aggression. There were nobler influences in his work, though in his later years there seemed a sneering and gloomy attitude strongly at variance with the moral passion of his youth, when he had experienced what he described as not unlike "the Methodist experience of conversion." Carlyle was a man of true greatness, but there is a story that suggests his deepest weakness, and his least commendable influence on life. At a dinner of the Royal Academy, it is said, Thackeray and Carlyle were guests. Talk around the table had turned on Titian. One artist had remarked upon his glorious coloring, another upon his drawing, and others had cited additional facts, until Carlyle interrupted "with egotistic emphasis and deliberation" to say: "And here sit I, a man made in the image of God, who knows nothing about Titian, and cares nothing about Titian—and that's another fact about Titian!" But Thackeray, the story goes, paused in sipping his claret, bowed to his fellow-guests, and said: "Pardon me, that is not a fact about Titian. It is a fact—a lamentable fact—about Thomas Carlyle."

The world's indifference to the kingdom of heaven is a judgment not upon that kingdom but upon the world.

The Church at the Crossroads

By Sherwood Eddy

THE church is facing a crisis in its own history and in the world. It is not yet too late to save the situation in America. My recent visits to Europe during and since the war have convinced me, however, that history may repeat itself, and the church in America may make the same mistake that it has made on the continent of Europe, unless we realize the danger in time.

Before the war, I saw the church in Russia powerful and secure, with its gorgeous ritual and beautiful choral services, with its vast wealth, prestige and power. The churches were often thronged with the humble and devout worshipping poor; the cabmen and passersby were crossing themselves before every ikon. The church was the pillar of the state, generous in its charity to the poor, and supported by the ruling classes in apparent prosperity. But I saw that church identify itself with the privileged class, rather than with Christ and the people, finding its support from the autocracy, aristocracy and plutocracy of privilege. It finally became almost an adjunct of the spy system of the police department. Every man who showed dangerous tendencies of independent thought, or a demand for liberty, or for the rights of the poor, was promptly reported for drastic action, and found his way swiftly to prison or banishment. Seventy-five per cent of the people were living in illiteracy, sixty per cent in hovels scarcely fit for beasts. For a thousand years Russia had suffered; for five hundred years it had been victimized by czarism. Yet the church identified itself with the class of privilege and of power.

Finally we saw the people in revolution turn in blind fury and curse that church and the church's God. Ten millions of men pouring back from the war, with a vast elemental life-hunger and land-hunger, called upon the church and state to give an account of their stewardship, and laid hands upon those who had so long exploited and oppressed them. Men complain of the materialism, the irreligion, and the present dictatorship of Russia. But where were the present leaders trained and educated? They were trained in the czar's prisons and dungeons, and in banishment in the wastes of Siberia. What religious education did they receive from the church? What had it done for the poor, for the uneducated, for the oppressed? It had given paternal "charity" but not justice. Complaint is made that some of the priests were killed during and after the revolution. It is all too true, but the blind fury of the mob called to account even the ministers of religion, who were supposed to have been shepherds of the sheep, but who had left them distressed and scattered, unshepherded and unsought.

THE CHURCH'S AFFINITIES

I saw the church in Protestant Germany and Catholic Austria alike identify itself with special privilege, with militarism, with imperialism, commercialism, and capitalism, but not with Christ and the people. I saw the churches faithful to the state and to those who supported them, confident in their power and pride, correct in their orthodoxy of belief, faultless in their ritual, tithing their mint and anise and cummin. I saw the crowded churches, heard the wonderful singing, read the sermons of ministers who became as able centers of militarism and as effective leaders of recruiting stations as the pulpits of the allies. I saw the church charitable to the poor, dealing out paternal palliatives and doles. I saw an effective paternalism in both church and state. What more could they have done? What vast welfare work and insurance schemes! Why were the masses so unappreciative? Why did labor never darken the doors of their church? Why were working men "so godless and materialistic"? Why would they insist on organizing and demanding their rights? Why did they not show a meek and gentle spirit and be duly grateful for charity received?

But at last came the day of reckoning. I saw a vast mass of organized labor—materialistic, disillusioned, and embittered—turn against the church and the church's God. Even now that it is almost too late, the church has not learned its lesson. I stood recently in the great dome of the kaiser's church in Berlin. It was midsummer, and the ordinary service was crowded with five thousand worshippers, with many standing in the aisles. Every seat was taken—all save one section; the whole gallery for the kaiser and the royal household was empty—vacant and waiting. I heard the preacher, earnest and impassioned, eloquent and evidently sincere, comforting the multitude by an individualistic gospel: Each must be good; each must save his own soul and get to heaven; but he warned them against any social gospel as a false hope. He was as earnest and as spiritual as many of the best individualistic ministers in America.

A FULL-ORBED GOSPEL

When shall we learn to take the full-orbed reality of a gospel both individual and social, that saves and regenerates the individual, and transforms all his relationships and his environment? I found that while labor in Germany was democratic and stood unitedly for the republic, the Christian people for the most part still cling fondly to a monarchy of paternal power. It is true that they ask for a limited monarchy fashioned after that of Great Britain, but they are suspicious of democracy. They admit, however, that something is wrong, that a great gulf separates two classes in Germany. They speak the same language, yet they are two peoples, with different ideals, speaking a different tongue, though all German. There is the old Germany of culture and of privilege, that has not yet learned its lesson, either in the church or the university, and there is the Germany of labor,—nearly twelve millions in their organized trade unions who, with their families, make up the bulk of the population. The militarists still dream of war. Labor is disillusioned and is demanding peace. I saw the great placards over Berlin, where sixty thousand men of labor marched to the open square, under their banner "Nie Wieder Krieg," "No More War." How strange that while labor is demanding peace, the churches were often recruiting stations during the war. It has been well said that "the church has nearly always opposed war in general, but has advocated each war in particular." If it is our war, it is a righteous war.

ATTITUDE OF LABOR

I talked with Mr. Fimmen, the quiet, kindly and efficient leader of twenty-six millions in the International Federation of Trade Unions. I heard him condemn the radicals of Russia, and plead for a sane, conservative policy. I asked him what was the attitude of labor, as he knew it over the continent of Europe, toward the church. He told me that in the south of Europe, labor was prevalently syndicalist and largely materialistic, anti-religious and bitterly anti-Christian. In the central countries of Europe they looked rather with pity or contempt upon a church that had failed, Catholic and Protestant alike, to seek to win labor, or to seek justice for humanity, or to meet the needs of the masses. He told me that in the northern countries of Scandinavia and Holland, labor looked upon organized religion with greater tolerance, as a matter of individual decision: It might be helpful for those who felt the need of it. In Great Britain, he said, religion was a stronger force in the labor movement than in any other country in Europe. Many of the best labor leaders were local preachers or Christian men. There was more Christian idealism in the labor party than among either of the other political parties, conservative or liberal. In Russia, the party in power, while tolerant of religion for the masses, finds no use for a church which so long oppressed them.

Speaking of continental Europe generally, is it too much to say that the church has failed—miserably, pathetically failed—in its duty to the people, to the poor, to labor, and in the great moral issues of the day? It has failed to apply the principles of Jesus to the whole of life, political, social, and industrial. It has failed to hold up the cross save as a symbol of personal salvation and a shibboleth of orthodoxy. It has failed to follow the Prince of Peace, to be a peace maker, to end war either in the field of militarism or of commercialism, between nations, races, or classes. After nineteen centuries, the church seems still ready in Europe to become the recruiting station of the next war.

We see the mote in our brother's eye; we see the measure of failure of the church in Europe. Do we see no danger in America? Are we to be as inhospitable, as suspicious toward organized labor with its inevitable demand for life, and life more abundant, for liberty, for justice? Are we to refuse its human right of organization, of collective bargaining, of the simple, elemental, inevitable demands that labor has ever made, and must ever make unless it ceases to be human? Are we to align ourselves with national, racial, and class privilege, or shall we stand with Christ and all the people, all nations, all races, all classes, all men, for life and life more abundant? We repeat the same Christian phrases as they did in Russia and Prussia before the war, but do we stand for what Hoover calls the "sheer inhumanity" of a twelve-hour day and a seven-day week, which crushes human life as surely as chattel slavery, or czarist Russia, or Prussian militarism or Hapsburg autocracy.

MOTE IN OUR BROTHER'S EYE

We do not question the sincere piety of the Christians who advocate so zealously the status quo, and who protest with such alarm and evident sincerity against ministers or Christian laymen interfering with the methods of the present conduct of industry. These men may be good individual Christians, but that does not make their position right. The czar was a pious individual Christian, according to his lights, kind and gentle in his family life, charitable, humble, and generous to the poor, subscribing liberally to the church, "orthodox" in his beliefs, earnest in prayer. Up to his lights he was an individual Christian in his own heart and in his own home, but at the same time he was making his country a hell. This sincere and pious Christian was banishing twenty thousand of his brothers and fellow Christians a year, until eight hundred thousand were in Siberia. He earnestly believed that there were two kinds of humanity: one born to be rich, one to be poor; one to rule, and the other to be ruled; one to be educated, and the other uneducated. He sincerely believed in the divine right of special privilege for a few. We would not so much blame this pathetic individual as the system of which he was a part.

The kaiser also, according to the report of a leading social Christian who was intimate with him, was a pious Christian in his own heart and in his own home, kind to his family, generous to the church, with a zeal for religion, showing the deepest interest in every sermon, but seeing no inconsistency in a vast military machine, which like a Moloch god of war was to drag the world into misery. There were good and pious Christians that burned supposed witches, that tortured in the agony of the inquisition to make people correct in their beliefs and get them safely into heaven. Even Xavier, with his flaming zeal, his tireless energy, his sacrifice and devotion that puts to shame the vast majority of us modern missionaries by his heroic self-denial, sincerely believed in the inquisition. For long centuries many of the priests and preachers of the church defended slavery, and stood century after century, generation after generation, for the status quo of special privilege. If it took us eighteen hundred years to see that a thing as monstrous and as obvious as slavery was wrong, is it possible that today we are still blinded by prejudice and privilege and are upholding wrongs in the present social order that are as fundamental and as unjust as slavery? For myself, I believe that the present industrial problem is an issue as great, as insistent and morally imperative as the issue of slavery. Slavery directly affected a few million people of another race. Industry affects the very life of the nation and of the world.

MINISTER AND MORAL ISSUES

What stand will the ministers of America take on the moral issues of our social and industrial life? When the threat came that the sources of supply would be cut off and money would be denied to those churches and ministers who dared to stand for social justice, Harry Emerson Fosdick boldly replied, "Before high God, not for sale." The ministers of this country could not be bought.

We believe that it is true. It is not yet too late to save the situation in America. But there are many who, with equal earnestness and seemingly unconscious of the social implications of the gospel, are preaching the same exclusively individualistic gospel that was being preached by the subsidized priests of Russia, by the preachers of the Hohenzollerns, by the priests of the Hapsburgs, and that is still being preached by the Protestant churches in Berlin.

The church cannot forfeit its right of moral judgment in economic questions. It cannot be relegated to a harmless seventh day of rest and be silent on the application of religion to the conditions of the working. It must apply the whole gospel to the whole of life. It must be concerned not only with the evangelization of Africa, but with the christianization of industry. It must give heed not only to how men give their money, but to how they make it. Is there upon these gifts the bloody sweat of a twelve-hour day, a seven-day week, and an inadequate wage? We should be concerned not only for campaigns to add to our membership, but more to a call to repentance and a time for judgment to begin at the house of God. If Christ came today would he begin with a campaign for increasing our statistics or by driving the money changers from their encroachments into the Lord's house? Would he ask for more money, more tithing of mint and anise and cummin, or justice and mercy and right relations with our fellow men in our present unjust and unchristian social order?

Once again, we repeat, it is not too late in America if we are really ready to begin. But have we yet learned the lesson of the war? On the issue of war, as a generation ago on the issue of slavery, on the moral issues of our industrial, social and political life, the church is at the parting of the ways. Will it take up its cross and follow its Master in a self-sacrificing life of redemptive love, or follow the discredited methods of the autocracies of the old world in fighting for the status quo, without vision and without passion for social justice?

Russia's Morals and Religion

By John Ralph Voris

OF ALL my impressions of Russia those to which I shall refer in this paper are possibly the most controversial. But though they may be limited in their area of truth there will be some things that are new to most Americans. As in the other studies, I shall no doubt be found rushing in where angels might fear to tread. Not only will the deductions bring us into debatable territory, but also the criterion to be used in the definition of terms, especially with respect to the moral problem. But I take it that those who read this will try with me to approach the subject with openness of mind. The last word will not be said here. Indeed it can hardly be said to be the first word.

In giving my impressions as to the moral conditions in Russia today I shall not touch particularly upon the problem of the morality of a nation which frankly uses a militaristic method, such as Russia is using, or brings government pressure against individual consciences. Russia, like most other nations today, is immoral in that sense. She is only more immoral than many other nations in degree, perhaps. However, the degree of pressure she brings to bear through force, or the fear of force, is so great that unless she soon finds it possible to lessen that pressure, the present government must fall, on the ground of abnormality and barbarity. Leaving, however, to future developments this larger question, I shall discuss here the problem of Russian moral conditions in the more conventional sense of social ethics.

ABSENCE OF DRINK

Let us take first the question of alcoholism. I traveled four weeks in Russia proper, and two weeks more in sovietized territory. I saw tens of thousands of soldiers packed into hundreds of freight cars. I saw thousands of officials and workingmen and peasants, and tens of thousands of refugees. Yet I did not see an intoxicated person, nor indeed did I note the odor of liquor on any man's breath. The newspapermen who came through central Europe reported a great deal of drunkenness and licentiousness there. America has a vast problem on her hands in spite of prohibition but Russia seems at the present time to have solved this question. When one thinks of vodka-drinking Russia as she was before the great war one realizes the transition. Then drunkenness was common. True, the czar gave the order to stop, but it is at least to the credit of the people now that they have continued that order, in spite of their break from nearly everything that had to do with the old regime.

We think of the prohibition movement in America as being the most outstanding moral achievement of the past half century. All the churches claim that. The movement was and still is supported against terrific odds. It is hardly sportsmanlike to give ourselves credit for a supreme moral grandeur here without giving some credit to the Russian people for their abstinence. Granted that Russia is poverty stricken and unable to purchase anything but the bare necessities still that would not prevent many who have had power in their hands to get what they wanted by manufacturing or otherwise securing alcohol.

Consider today the drink evil of England, Ireland, Scotland, the Scandinavian countries, and we realize that Russia too is a country of vigorous men and women who have the taste for alcohol as over against the light wines of the southern countries. A country and a government must have a good deal of stamina to take a position such as this. It is true that it is now reported that a fifteen per cent alcoholic content will soon be permitted. For this the friends of temperance can be profoundly disappointed. It is a step backward. But even with this retrogression the nation will be in advance of most other European nations in this respect and will deserve commendation and appreciation.

SEX MORALITY

Though one would prefer to avoid the problem of sex relationships, one cannot do so who seeks to present a just and fair picture of conditions as they are. I shall, however, deal with the theme briefly. Sex immorality the world over makes itself known in three flagrant forms, namely, the insidious popularizing of sex-consciousness through pictures, magazines, books, the drama, and through popular songs, dancing and conversation; second, the apparent, open commercialized vice; third, the clandestine fulfilment of desire. In America we are in the midst of a veritable tidal-wave of the first kind; the second is waning; as to the third I do not know. In Paris and Constantinople, according to my impressions, and in Vienna, Budapest, Warsaw, and possibly Berlin and London, conditions are openly bad in both the first and second classes. I mention these facts in comparison with the Russian situation in so far as we could sense it. No large city in America gives one the impression of apparent moral cleanliness more than do the great Russian cities of Moscow and Tiflis at the present time. No great city of Europe can compare with these Russian municipalities in this regard. I did not see any outward manifestation anywhere in Russia, either in Transcaucasia or Russia proper of either the first or second types of sex immorality.

This came as a heartening surprise. I had thought of the Russians as perhaps an over-developed people in their sex consciousness. Many of the poor souls referred to in Paris and Constantinople were said to be Russian. I had heard of the "free-love" principles of communism, and I expected to see some outward signs of salaciousness in magazine and drama. But there seems to be none whatever of this baneful avalanche of suggestiveness as we have it in America and in the greater part of Europe in the jazz dance, pagan music, stage, movie and magazine illustration and story.

At the theaters previously referred to, at Tiflis and Moscow, including part of a movie, a grand opera, a "legitimate," two "varieties," and two "ballets" (stories in rhythmic pantomime) into which I dipped with the idea not so much of securing relaxation as out of discovering the social ideals of the people, there was no sex flaunting as it is set out commonly on the American stage. There was likewise no sensuous note at the art museum, except in one or two of the modern halls where the neurotic trend brought the sex idea in. There was none in the native dances. There was not a hint of it in the posters issued by the government. There was none of it in the books issued by the public press. There was none in the book display at the book stores. Apparently, so far as one can see, Russia is not thinking wantonly about sex relations. She seems to be thinking clean.

Whether or not this outward condition is due to poverty and hunger, or to economic equality, or on the other hand to a rather fine spirit of moral earnestness, seriousness of purpose, definiteness of program, I do not know. It may perhaps be due to indulgence of the third type. One can only surmise. Unquestionably the attitude of the bolshevist leaders has been one of tolerance toward that which we regard as perilous looseness in sex relations. "Divorce" has become simple; marriage a matter which may or may not be with the knowledge and approval of the church or of the state or both, just as the individuals may desire. All of this in theory comes near that which has been pictured by reports of the destruction of the sanctity of marriage by the communists. In so far as this theory and practice have taken hold of the Russian people no man who cherishes the sacred ideals of the home would condone or defend.

FREE LOVE IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

But if one would be fair to the situation as it really is, one must note other considerations beside the bolshevist theory of "free-love." So far as my observations or those of the other members of the commission go there was nothing which would seem to indicate the development of an extreme state of affairs in this regard. Some of the welfare workers whom we saw in Transcaucasia or in Russia would unquestionably have spoken of evil conditions did they exist flagrantly and openly, yet we heard no expressions of moral recoil, not even from those natives who oppose the present form of government. My personal deduction, based upon these inadequate observations, would be that the innovation is chiefly theoretical and has not made any appreciable difference in the people's customs. Evidently young women take pride in their purity, and married people live together monogamously, just as they did during the times of stricter laws. My impressions are supported by the testimony of my soviet acquaintances who talked at length and freely about these matters. It was insisted that moral conditions in this respect are superior to what they were before the soviet regime.

I cannot but believe that the laws, even if the soviet system continues will eventually not only indicate a preference for, but will require a definite civil marriage contract. Folks are really by instinct decent and will not in any universal manner fly from decency. From all that I can learn the morality of the home is probably as high there as it has been. Without wishing to be cynical I am inclined to believe that neither now nor in the past has the standard been as high as it should be. The only possible defense that one can make of the radical tendency with respect to marriage relations is that former laws there, as in many other European countries and in South America, may have so limited divorce that only the wealthy, or those utterly indifferent to the church, could escape from unbearable marriage entanglements. This revolt may, to an extent at least, have been needed.

FAIL TO KILL RELIGION

Take the subject of religion. If the well-known phrase, first used by Sabatier, I believe, that man is incurably religious ever applied to any people it surely describes the Russians. The communistic influence in the soviet regime has theoretically tried to kill religion. It has not succeeded. The communist party, it seems, stands not only for a complete separation of state and church, but it denies the existence of God, and the place of religion in life. It further requires of its members—at least of the Young Communists' Organization—that they deny the existence of a God, and that they will teach their children that they are dependent upon themselves and not upon any transcendental power, and that their service is to be for the state, not for God.

But here, again, as in other instances, I want to distinguish sharply between the communist party and the soviet government, and also between theory and practice. The soviet government is far more moderate than the communistic philosophy, and the practice is less base than the theory. I have no way of accurately tracing the events backward to the time of the revolution. But it is certainly true that the present government broke sharply with the church. It not only withdrew all governmental support, but it represented the communists in deriding the place and work of the priests. In its propaganda it united the church with capitalism, and it incited the people to treat it accordingly. I recall seeing one of the posters in the Moscow poster propaganda headquarters, showing the priest and the capitalist as huge grotesque evils to be overcome by the workers and the peasants. The priests, like the former nobles, and the bourgeoisie, were not counted as workers and had no place in the social order. As priests they were outcasts. The government simply refused to recognize religion or any of its official representatives.

GROUND FOR UNPLEASANT RUMORS

I do not doubt that many cruel practices grew out of this state of affairs. Rumors of these inhumanities reached the United States and probably were founded upon a good deal of truth. And as for the mental suffering of priests, and monastic representatives, probably there will never come to light one small part of the total spiritual torture endured by good men and women who suffered for their religious ideals. Under the czarist regime they had received homage from people and government alike. Their church headed up in the czar himself. They were honored and obeyed. And then there came a terrible experience, when they were derided and abused, and left homeless and without a country. Their support was gone, and they saw their people deserting religion. It will be an epic story when told, that of the cross-bearing of the priests of the Russian church. And it is not a pretty story from the standpoint of the Russian government. In its worse aspects it is something no sound minded man can be proud of.

And yet there is something of importance to be said on the other side. Think of the hold the church had on the government; of government subsidized priests and monastic orders, of churches kept up by the government. The church was indubitably the mainstay of the order that then existed, defending it in every way. The church was not an organ of intellectual enlightenment. It did not stir hidden longings to progress and education. It did not condemn deep seated wrongs. It did not attack the landlord system, and the injustices to the peasants. Its priests were not free. They said what they were expected to say on civic and national matters, or they were silent. The church preached peace and submission. It stood for charity by the rich toward the poor, rather than justice for all. It was the mirror of the old order, the barrier against the new. No new order could come into existence without destroying the relationships between state and church.

BENEFICIAL RESULTS OF REVOLUTION

In bringing about this complete separation the present government has done for Russia, for both the church and the people, an incalculable good. It is one of the great achievements of the revolution. The situation had been such that no moderate or temperate measure could have sufficed. Only a cataclysmic breakup would avail. In doing this thing the soviet regime has accomplished that which the communists of the French revolution set out to accomplish as a part of their task. They succeeded, and the church lauds the effort. The great Madeleine church in Paris has inscribed over its portals, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." In Russia the soviet people swung to the extreme just as they did in France. It is to be hoped, however, that the pendulum will not similarly swing back to the place where again the church becomes a state institution.

This has been the development up to the present time. The attitude of the government today has brought about the following conditions: There is a complete separation of church and state. The state does not recognize religion; will not permit it to be taught in the schools; will not subsidize or assist the priests or the churches; will not regard the priests as "workers." On the other hand, the soviet government—as distinguished from the communistic party—does not seek to win people away from the church or from religion. It does not interfere with church services or with the work of the priests. It permits the priests to go about their tasks, and to receive contributions from their parishioners. It does not incite or permit the mutilation or destruction of church property, or the persecution of worshippers. In a word, it officially takes approximately the same attitude toward the church that the government of the United States would take, except that we acknowledge the unique place of the church by exempting it of taxes, and by a recognition of the clergy in such functions as invocations, benedictions, chaplaincies in the army, etc., while the attitude of the present government in Russia is one of obtrusive outward indifference and ill-concealed inner hostility to religion. But there is nothing there, I believe, which will prevent real religion from developing. There is much to make a gradual but strong growth possible.

SHORT-SIGHTED LEADERSHIP

The Russian leaders of the new regime are short-sighted and narrow in their attitude toward religion. They have confused ecclesiasticism with religion. They have meant to oppose the church rather than religion. In denying God and elevating the state, they have been impelled by the theological and ecclesiastical ideas of a state-controlled, mediæval-minded church.

There is possibly another explanation of this attitude of the present leaders which I can touch upon fearlessly because I believe my heart is right on the matter, and I am unprejudiced. It is this: There are many Jews in the leadership of the Russian nation today. Not so many are there as reports on this side have made out. We saw a number of soviet leaders who might or might not be Jews, but we were moderately sure that they were not. There were others whom we knew to be Jews. I do not believe it is a Jew-controlled government. If, however, the Jews did dominate, it would not mean that they would not be just as fair and wise as any others who might be there. But if I am right in thinking that there are a good many Jews, two important points must be brought into the open. The first is the age-long persecution of the Jews by the Russia of yesterday, inspired in too many cases, undoubtedly, by the church. It is only natural that they should desire reprisals. The second point is this: the modern, progressive Jew, of the type of the Russian leaders, has all too often lost its own religious idealism. Leaving the religion of his fathers, he leaps into a universe in which there is no place for God at all.

This frequent tragedy flaunts itself in our faces here in America in the case of individuals whom all of us know. But this is perhaps the first time in history where it has literally been set up as the ideal of a nation. We can sympathize with the trials through which the Russian church has been going, and yet can believe that the period as been on the whole inevitable and perhaps essential to the progress that can and must come to religion in Russia.

THE CHURCH CONSPICUOUS

In Russia, as in most other European lands, the church buildings, towering above all others, give one the physical impression of the important place occupied by religion. In every town the first object to catch the eye, and frequently the only clear-cut object, is the great white dome and tapering spire of the Greek Catholic church. It is so clearly in evidence that the traveler's first reaction will be of admiration for the place occupied by religion, or a feeling of repulsion, according to his point of view.

In the large cities there are many such churches. Moscow is veritably dotted with them. It is not so much the beautiful apartments, business blocks, hotels, and dwellings of Moscow as it is the churches that make it one of the most bewitchingly beautiful of all cities. The unique dome, characteristic of all architecture with Byzantine influence, gives opportunity for what might be called a spectacular flaunting of the church to the eye. The gothic architecture may be severely plain, like Notre Dame, or it gives play to the meticulous ornamentation of Milan. The Byzantine dome is usually severely fashioned, though at times it may be ornamented with twistings and convolutions, but even they are on an heroic scale. But the domes offer unmatched opportunity for brilliant coloring. Of all the primitive treatments, however, none is so common as the golden dome. Most of the churches in Moscow are white, with gilded domes. Enormous sums have been spent thus to serve the Lord. It certainly gives the general effect of matchless beauty to the city.

But I am stating these points about architecture not to give a travelogue on Moscow churches but in order to incite an analysis of the effect upon the people. One cannot get away from the church. It shines upon one at every corner, at all times.

But while this church architecture calls the people toward God, towering as it does above all other man-made things, it has no note of love of humanity whatever. A Russian priest in Tiflis is the brilliant executive of a bread line in connection with his church, and he does a marvelous pastoral work. But such work is an exceptional effort to meet an emergency and is not based upon any normal institutional principle or ideal. There are no club-rooms, no gymnasiums. The church stands for the worship of God; it does not stand for the brotherhood of man. Perhaps that is the expression of the temperament, and of the need. I am not debating these points, I am simply stating an impression of a situation.

NOT A PLACE OF REFUGE

Nor are the churches used for social purposes, even in crises. I presume public meetings are never held within the church walls. In the famine sections there are tens of thousands of women and children sleeping out in the open, along the Volga banks, and about the stations. But while we saw beautiful churches in these centers, they were not open to these famine refugees. The church of Christ was not a place of refuge! I certainly would not blame the soviet authorities for taking every church building and converting it into a refuge for these poor people. Yet they respected the old attitude toward the church. The people may die, but the church must be protected. Of course one understands and in a way respects this ancient reverence, and yet recognizes it as wrong nevertheless. I cannot imagine it in America with any church during a crisis such as exists in Russia. The church is too poor to assist materially in relieving distress, but at least it could offer a roof for the protection of the homeless.

Some of these churches are truly beautiful, within as well as in outer appearance. I think the "Church of the Saviour" in Moscow, with its enormous size and its severely plain square built walls supporting a massive golden dome, is one of the most beautiful I have seen anywhere. And its interior calls out all one's reverence and appreciation of beauty. Its high dome, below which streams of light pour through beautiful windows, lifts one's thoughts. Paintings of soft colorings of rare beauty, and of really high conception, are on the circular walls of the lower part of the dome while still lower down, extending from the top of the straight walls to the floor, are hundreds of "ikons," pictures of sainted leaders.

NEED OF MODERNIZATION

As I worshipped in this place of beauty on the last Sunday in July, while my spirit merged with the souls of the people kneeling there—evidently very plain folk, of peasant status, with a sprinkling of intelligentsia, but almost no workmen—I felt as I had seldom felt before the value of sheer worship. There was an invisible choir, beautifully trained, but it simply lead in occasional chants and responses to the words of the priests, the people frequently joining with a harmony and precision scarcely inferior to that of the choir. There were three services in different sections of the vast church, all held at the same time. These were following the principal service which I missed. I did not understand any part of these services but I was conscious of their effect upon my spirit. And I know they gave peace to the others.

For the "modern-minded" of Russia to cut themselves off or to be cut off from this wonderful thing, because of its lack on another side, or because of the frailties of the institution which fosters this worship, is indeed a tragic thing.

The need, however, for a modernization of this national Greek Catholic church is simply enormous. We must remember that unlike the Roman church it was unaffected by the Protestant reformation. The tendency to worship the virgin in the Roman church is here greatly accentuated by the worship of a multitude of saints whose very pictures become idols for the people. A home without its ikon is without protection. I saw dozens of men and women, and little children, pass the glassed-in pictures, in the churches, kissing the glass protecting the hand of the saint. They kneel and cross themselves before these ikons, both inside and outside the home or church. Ikons are everywhere about the city, for example, above the main entrance to the Kremlin. The cab drivers, even, and most of the people cross themselves on passing an ikon. If a priestly procession carries a great ikon down the street, to a funeral, or a wedding, or to some other function, the people bare their heads and make the sign of the cross. Truly, Russia, as I said before, is incurably religious. In spite of the revolution the people reverentially practice the methods of worship of their ancestors.

HOPEFUL NEWS

But there are apparently a few modernizing influences. I heard the other day in America that some of the church leaders over there were ready for a modern young people's movement. This is hopeful news. In general, however, there seems to be no middle ground between the medieval theology and practice on one hand, and the revolt therefrom, the atheistic fads of the more extreme bolshevists.

There is truly a crying need there for a progressive movement within the church, if possible; without, if impossible within. And it should not be like the Protestant reformation, a revolt from the old, with the loss of so much that is fine. There in Russia is the opportunity to build the kind of church many of us dream of—a church that emphasizes both the divine and the human in its theology, architecture, and service; a church that calls upon every instinct of beauty, and yet appeals to the modern intellect. If there could be a modern movement within the church of Russia, corresponding to the liberal movement today in Protestantism, it would disarm most of the enmity of the extremists in Russia, and especially it would prevent them from making of young Russia an agnostic, if not an atheistic people. The greatest evangelizing opportunity of the age is in Russia. I wonder if our western church will see it. For America to cut herself off from an opportunity of fellowshiping with those in Russia of kindred spirits, of whom there must be many, on account of a political theory that we should not recognize politically a certain form of government, like the soviet plan, is to permit politics to delimit the church, in precisely the same way that the church in Russia has delimited the government. People have given their lives for causes far less ideal.

When Street Cars Strike

DES MOINES, IOWA, has been witnessing, during the past few months, a unique kind of strike. Street car wage earners often go on a strike. When they do we are likely to see the cars operated with police or militiamen on both ends and all the police power of the government invoked to insure the company's right to operate, and there is usually much comment upon preserving the sacred rights of the citizens to get to and fro in pursuit of their business. All that is very good and citizens' right to get to and fro in pursuit of their business ought at least to be as sacred in law as is property.

But how goes it when the street car company strikes? Des Moines has furnished an interesting example. For many weeks no cars were operated. The men who formerly operated them were out of their wage and the citizens out of their right to get to and fro in exactly the same degree as when a strike of the men ties up the system completely. But neither the operating force nor the citizens undertook to run the cars with policemen or militiamen aboard, nor could they in law have done so; and the court, instead of declaring that the power of the law would stand behind operation of this public utility, expressly gave the company the privilege of ceasing operation. This was done for good and sufficient legal reasons notwithstanding the fact that the company had given the city a bona fide contract to operate cars under specific franchise conditions. It had for many years occupied the free streets of the city as if they were their own property and possessed a traction monopoly upon them. It seems to be possible for the law to protect property when it ceases to make dividends on any sort of a fictitious valuation if only that valuation has been sold across the counter, but it cannot protect a man's bread and butter even though his wife and children suffer hardship.

* * *

The Old Game of Financing

The financial history of the Des Moines street car company would not make good reading in these days of growing conscience on public utilities. It has never been told from the inside and it probably never will be. The blanket fact, however, as charged by the citizens, is that the property is worth just about one-half the $9,000,000 for which it is capitalized. It is bonded for $5,000,000 and the bonds sell at about forty cents on the dollar. Besides, the bonding company obtained possession of the property. The city council started an engineer's evaluation when the dispute came on and spent some $14,000 on it, then suddenly stopped it and refused even to receive representatives of the improvement associations who asked its completion. This partial evaluation, so far as carried out, citizens declare, warranted claims to an actual value of only a little over $4,000,000.

The original consolidation of six or seven lines some thirty years ago was effected no doubt by paying for some of the lines many times their actual cost. But cost was not a factor in those days of "all the traffic will bear"; it was merely a question of what would pay. There were many years which, if the whole story were told, would afford a sordid narrative of bribing councils and city officials and of spending money in any way that "would get results." The company had thus gathered a malodorous reputation and had the ill-will of the citizens at large. These factors of malodorous history and public ill-will have been prominent in the recent contest. The citizens furnished the streets and the nickels and the company conducted the business in secret, according to their own financial devices and ideas of ultimate profit, and possessed a franchise of their own making. The result is a stock value of double property value, common stock that pays no dividends, assignment to the bond holders, the ill-will of the public and an utter inability to meet the rising costs of operation under present prices.

* * *

The Story of the Strike

The company first asked for the abandonment of the "six tickets for a quarter" arrangement, then for a six-cent fare, then for a receiver. The men asked for raises in wages to meet the rising cost of living and finally obtained a seventy cent rate through arbitration. Taking a receivership granted the company release from all franchise requirements regarding extensions, repairs, etc. The receiver asked for an eight cent fare and the city protested, but the courts granted it. The city retaliated by allowing busses to run on the same streets as the cars. The busses charged only five cents and company receipts were depleted. Ill-will did as much as did cheaper fare; no one preferred the busses and most patrons found them much less satisfactory. They were irregular, bounced about, were cramped and crowded and the chauffeurs were not always safe drivers. But it was a battle with the citizens throwing discomfort into the discard for the sake of winning. The result was a petition of the receiver for the privilege of closing down traffic and it was granted by the court on the grounds that the property could not be operated at a loss. Thus came on the unique strike by a street car company.

For many weeks the citizens walked, caught rides with those lucky enough to have cars—and their name is legion in Iowa—rode the busses and waited. The receiver negotiated a new franchise, and the city council referred it to a referendum. Four out of five of the council were personally opposed to its terms but left it to the people to decide. And the people decided two-to-one that so far as they were concerned they preferred to ride under any sort of a franchise rather than walk or ride in busses. The company was obdurate when business men requested that a franchise be negotiated but men with money threatened to put on a complete, up-to-date, buss system that would serve the people well and satisfactorily and make scrap-iron of the street car tracks, and the franchise was negotiated.

* * *

How the People Lose By Their Own Vote

The city was once willing to accept a valuation of $5,000,000 and offered a sliding scale franchise that would reduce fare only after the company had made eight per cent. The new franchise reduces it to six per cent but fails to accede to the city's idea of valuation. The most direct solution would be a sale to the highest bidder under mortgage foreclosure and a re-start on the basis of the actual value of the property. The most just plan under a new franchise would have been to insist on actual value as the basis for fare, with a sliding scale arrangement and joint control by city and company. The real, ultimate solution is city ownership. But all these plans require time and long campaigns and big legal battles—meanwhile the people faced winter. The result was that they voted to ride right now under any sort of a franchise. The terms of the franchise actually cut little figure in the election; it was a question of convenience.

Down-town business men suffered losses and thus advocated cars; the wage earner found discomfort and long hours in walking and riding busses and organized to get back the cars; the car operators wanted jobs and canvassed the town for votes; the mothers wanted their children safely and warmly delivered to and from school and the woman's vote piled up the big majority. No one was against it except the property holders who could afford autos and that minority who put civic principle above all other considerations. Court decisions already rendered may make the election null and void or nullify the franchise voted, but the two-to-one majority will panoply the company for another franchise that will get by the courts. They boast that they have the "confidence of the people." Of course they have nothing except the power to keep the people from riding, and that power was sufficient to get them a franchise on twice the actual value of their property, with almost absolute control in these days of public control.

British Table Talk

London, December 5, 1921.

CHRISTMAS has begun to cast its healing shadow before; everyone is beginning to think Christmas; the Christmas numbers are on the bookstalls, and the buyers go about the streets. It sometimes seems as if we should be able to mobilize all this good will for the abiding interests of God's kingdom.

To an open house in the evening
Home shall men come,
To an older place than Eden
And a taller town than Rome.

To the end of the way of the wandering star,
To the things that cannot be and that are,
To the place where God was homeless
And all men are at home.

So says Mr. G. K. Chesterton in his own bold way; but when once a year we are bound for that place, and meet there, why do not things happen? Every Englishman will join in the procession of willing pilgrims towards Bethlehem; there is a spell cast over him. But if only we could stay there a little longer!

Quakers and Industry

Nothing of great moment has happened in the ecclesiastical world, since I wrote last week. There have been, it is true, some sectional conferences of more importance than their size would suggest. The Society of Friends has held a conference on Industry for Service. The Friends have long had a grave concern in this matter. They are deeply involved in industry, and though they have always stood high in the estimate of those who study the modern industrial situation, they and particularly their younger members, are not satisfied. They will not be satisfied, till service and not private gain is the motive of all work. The value of the Quaker contribution to the subject does not lie so much in theory as in practical experiment. The work of the Rowntrees at York, for example, is an admirable illustration in practice of the five conditions which they say must be secured to the workers.

1. Earnings sufficient to maintain a reasonable standard of comfort.

2. Reasonable hours of work.
3. Reasonable economic security during the whole working life and in old age.
4. Good working conditions.
5. Status of the workers suitable to men in a free country in the twentieth century.

These sound rather vague but they must be read in the light of things done in York and Birmingham. Nevertheless the Friends are not satisfied.

Religion and Bodily Health

In one of her lectures upon this subject Miss Evelyn Underhill has spoken of the sufferings of the saints. She is an acknowledged authority upon mysticism, and a writer of great power, and last but not greatest, a poet who has caught in her poetry many mystic strains. In a time when there is so much attention given to Brothier Ass, the Body, it is important to understand what the saints made of pain.

What does suffering mean to the saints? What lies behind their often passionate desire for it, their unearthly gratitude when they get it; the fortitude with which they support it? It means for them Love and the Cross. These two great ways of transmuting suffering are complementary in their scope. The first makes even of mere raw pain an offering, a turning outwards of the self, an act of surrender to the divine. But the second makes of it an inward mystery, an agent of change and readjustment of the passage from death to life. The mediocre soul finds, so to speak, a soft place on the heavenly hearth-rug, gives thanks for the sense of warmth and security, and settles down. These are the people who tell us that their religion is a comfort to them: but they are not the stuff of which the saints are made. Spiritual life is still offered as Christ offered it—in two manners. First, to the crowd that asked it he gave healing, health and consolation. But next, to the few that left all to follow him, he offered Love and the Cross."

A Great Catholic Explains

of the student Christian movement, there is a striking article by Baron von Hugel upon The Catholic Contribution to Religion. Baron von Hugel is without question among the great religious teachers of this age, and his influence goes far beyond the bounds of the Roman church, to which he belongs. Like the late Lord Acton, he is a layman who remains loyal to Rome, though he holds himself free to criticize it. These are some of the seven characteristics as he sees them of Catholicism: It stands for the great fact of Spirit and Sense. Spirit is awakened by Spirit, and Catholicism alone "remains ceaselessly aware of the sacred torch race across the ages." But the whole of the article should be read by any who would understand why such modern thinkers as Baron von Hugel remain within Rome.

A Generous Recantation

One day recently we read in the paper how Ghandi in India after the Bombay riots had confessed his own mistake; it seemed to many readers a hard and a noble thing to do; and they wondered whether in this country statesmen would have the courage to confess their former errors. Then to their joy they read the words of Mr. Austen Chamberlain in which he acknowledged in the most sincere and generous way that he had been in error, when he opposed the policy of Campbell-Bannerman in South Africa. With frankness and without any attempt to evade the facts, Mr. Chamberlain said as clearly as Ghandi: "I was wrong." It was reassuring to discover that the spirit of honesty and candor is not lacking. Needless to say, Mr. Chamberlain has not suffered in the estimate of his countrymen. They know that their statesmen make mistakes and they think the more of them when they acknowledge the fact. More might do likewise.

The Bishop of Durham and Anglicanism

It must be hard for people not in these islands to place Dr. Hensley Henson, the Bishop of Durham. He is without doubt a learned man, a fearless speaker, and a pungent writer. There is no one who enjoys more the friendship of the free churches. Yet in his latest volume on Anglicanism he sets forth a doctrine of the church which is poles away from the mind of the free churches. He shows himself a candid critic of his own church in which he often seems a solitary figure. He rejects the claim of the Catholic section to represent the fine tradition of his church. He holds strongly to the establishment. He has no great faith in democracy. And, curiously enough, he does not reveal any real sympathy with the free churches on whose platforms he so often appears. Removal of their grievances goes far, he thinks, to destroy the raison d'être of nonconformity. The bishop does not reveal any comprehension of a positive witness in these churches to eternal and fundamental truths—a witness which is quite apart from any question of social or political injustice. Yet just as free churchmen loved Mr. Gladstone who never understood their religious witness, so they love Bishop Benson. Yet with all his unbending churchmanship Dr. Gore in all probability is nearer to the best in the free churches than the brilliant and courageous bishop of Durham.

A Life of Percival

Percival was a great schoolmaster, certainly among the six greatest English schoolmasters in the nineteenth century. He founded Clifton, and presided over Rugby; at other stages of his life he was president of Trinity college, Oxford, and Bishop of Hereford. His life has been told by Bishop Temple of Manchester, and it makes a record which will convince all but the most diligent of their slackness and feebleness. Percival had not a slack fiber anywhere, and one may well believe that his appearance could be like aday of judgment to evil doers.

In his bishopric he was a courageous broad churchman, ready to give sanctuary in Hereford to hard-pressed "heretics." Once at least he crossed the Atlantic, to attend a peace congress at Boston. But though as a bishop and publicist he had weight he remains always in the memory of his people the schoolmaster who made Clifton and ruled Rugby for a time.

Do We Read the Bible?

In view of the following utterances, the Observer wonders how much the people of our time read the Bible:

"There was a connection between the brazen impropriety of female dress and the ghastly increase of sins against the Sixth Commandment."—Daily Mail.

"The whole world was made in seven days."—Mr. Justice Darling.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Strangers Who Are God's Servants*

EARLY one morning a widow of Zarephath went out to gather sticks. The famine was desperate. Many were dying. Carefully she had treasured her scanty store of oil and meal. She and her son had eaten such small portions for days, but now the inevitable end was at hand. Only enough meal and oil remained for one late breakfast. The widow and her son had talked it all over; they knew that only death awaited them—a few sticks, two tiny cakes, slow starvation. It was while she was employed in picking up the sticks, outside the wall, that the widow noticed a gaunt and travel-stained stranger. Instantly a great compassion for him took possession of her. How was she to know that it was God who was putting that impulse into her heart? Now the man was speaking; he was asking for that simplest and most human thing, a drink of water. There was plenty of that; she turned hastily to find it. Now the stranger is asking for a morsel of food. She had hoped against hope that he would not do that. A sudden desperate recklessness comes upon her: although there is only food enough for two, she will give the traveler her portion; she will die helping another. But the man is speaking again: "Do not fear," he is saying, "God will not allow your jar of meal to fail nor your cruse of oil to be exhausted until the new harvest." She took the prophet at his word and as the story goes, she, her son and the man of God ate for many days and the oil and meal failed not. It is a beautiful narrative and contains a fine moral.

The most important business that morning was to keep the prophet alive; God needed him as he needed no other person in all the world. How did the widow know that God was highly honoring her by making her the means of keeping Elijah alive? She followed her generous impulse, she shared her last portion of food; she lives, along with that other woman who counted not the cost.

Someway this story causes us to think of America's generosity in feeding the Belgians, Armenians, French orphans, and today the Russians. How do we know what important lives we are keeping in society? What statesmen, musicians, artists, social reformers, preachers and missionaries may be among these children whom we are feeding. They are not like flies to die and not be missed—they have unlimited personal possibilities. The cruel war blotted out poets whose sweet songs we all needed. Musicians, students, social enthusiasts and noble scientists were ruthlessly slaughtered. The world will always be the poorer. We need the child life of Armenia, Russia and India as well as China. The rising generation will do wonders for this planet. Twenty-five thousand eager students are in Peking today, almost as many are in Tokyo. Dr. Fosdick tells us of these earnest, capable students. Given Christ, they will make their countries over. Denied Christ, the miserable old ways will persist. Buddhism says that religion is a device to afford the mind peace in conditions as they are. Christianity changes the conditions! Buddhism initiates no reforms, starts no republics, abolishes no wars, builds no better homes, creates no better societies. Christianity fights prostitution, makes finer home life, demands right industrial relations, builds democracy, casts down military parties and establishes republics. Christianity does this because it makes character. Nothing is eternal, universal and vital about Christianity that does not affect character. Most theological battles, says Dr. Fosdick, are useless because no matter which way the decision goes character is not affected thereby. Apostolic succession or not—what effect on character? Immersed or sprinkled—what effect on character? Psalms or modern hymns—what effect on character? Bishops or congregational government—what effect on character? Collars buttoned in front or behind—what effect on character? Robes or plain clothes—what effect on character? Character alone counts and only the vita, Christ can change that. Someway, the more we share the more we have. Who ever lost by hospitality? Who ever injured himself giving for missions? Who ever felt that he gave too much to his church? Who ever regretted sending food to the starving peoples of Europe and Asia? May God put the same impulse into our hearts that he put into the heart of the widow of Zarephath until we shall risk all to share with the strangers in need. Thereby we shall save prophets, artists, poets, musicians and statesmen for the world.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Pacific Peace Pact

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

In your issue of December 15 you say: "The Washington pact for peace in the Pacific has none of the objectionable features of the Versailles treaty. It is conceived in a Christian temper."

The Christian Century is notably independent and acute in its interpretation of events, and therefore I am amazed to find you weakly echoing the tone that the Republican press has adopted in contrasting the results and methods of the Washington conference with those at Paris.

"None of the objections" is a much stronger phrase than the facts warrant, sad to say. One of the big objections to the Versailles peace was the secrecy of the proceedings. But did greater secrecy obtain in Paris than that which kept even President Harding ignorant of an important construction of the Pacific pact to his great embarrassment? Another criticism of the Versailles treaty and its League of Nations was the domination on the part of five big powers which it provided for. But at Washington three big powers reach an agreement in regard to the great theatre of world action for tomorrow, letting in a fourth power only at the last minute, and leaving every other people in the world voiceless in the matter. A further objection to the Versailles treaty was the surrender of German treaty rights in Shantung to Japan. Has this wrong been repaired in any substantial way so far at Washington?

Again, can you find "a Christian temper" in the frank reliance placed on military force in the cautious bargainings in the matter of the naval ratio, which, plainly, is indissolubly bound up with the Pacific pact in the minds of the delegates? Can you find "a Christian temper" in the administration's decision to assume a decent measure of responsibility for peace in the Pacific the while it refuses to play the good samaritan to Europe and all the world, as our entrance into the League of Nations would have enabled us to do?

I believe the Pacific pact should be ratified. It carries us a little way forward, though only a little. But it irritates me to see a prophet (and that you are) abdicate his critical function and acclaim as wonderful a bit of progress which is but tentative and halting, and which is infinitely more meager than might have been won had not some of the very delegates who have attained it, notably Mr. Lodge, helped to keep America out of a broader-gauged brotherhood of nations.

American "Justice"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read your correspondent's letter (John L. Murphy) in the Christian Century of December 15. It has the ring of truth in it, and carries conviction of the injustice done. Based upon these surmises my blood boils to think that America could stoop to such means to obtain evidence against one whom they wanted to get into their power (manufactured evidence). If one had not the privilege of protesting one would be ashamed to be called an American. The system of justice that deals with men as described by your correspondent, is more damnable than the combined deeds of all the I. W. W.'s in existence. What is there we can do to remedy this diabolical crime?

BOOKS

AVE ROMA IMMORTALIS. By Francis Marion Crawford. A new and revised edition of Crawford's classic. "The story of Rome is the most splendid romance in all history," he begins his narrative, and no one can read the book without coming into agreement with his statement. The book contains numerous illustrations, (Macmillan.)

URNS ABOUT TOWN. By Robert Cortes Holliday. Charming essays of an informal nature by the author of "Walking-Stick Papers." (Doran. $2.)

THE TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA. The second volume issued of the new Cambridge Shakespeare. This edition has as its distinguishing characteristic its attempt at a complete revision of Shakespeare's text, based upon a study, line by line, of the existing materials, using all light that is thrown upon the problems by the work of late scholars. (Macmillan.)

AMERICAN INVENTIONS. By Inez N. McFee. The stories of the origin of Howe's sewing-machine, Whitney's cotton-gin, McCormick's reaper, Fulton's steamboat, Morse's telegraph, Bell's telephone; the submarine and aeroplane, phonograph and motion picture. Edison's story brings the book up to date. An ideal gift for boys of the intermediate age. (Crowell.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Religious Education Association to Meet in Chicago

The Religious Education Association will hold its nineteenth convention in the city of Chicago, where it was born. The general topic will be "Problems of Week-Day Religious Education." The sessions will continue through March 29 to April 1. Extensive surveys and a number of intensive studies of week-day schools are being planned in preparation for this meeting. There will be abundant discussion in connection with each address, and religious workers of all sorts will be welcome at the meetings. Headquarters have been established at the Congress Hotel.

Street Preaching in Chicago Popular

Rev. Ernest A. Bell has been for years a street preacher in Chicago. In recent years his work has come under the administration of the Chicago Church Federation. He holds nightly meetings on Quincy Street in the heart of the loop. No more interesting evening can be planned than to hear one after another the propagandists on the streets of this great city. Socialism, anarchy, labor unionism and the various types of religious propaganda abound. Mr. Bell in recent years has given away scriptures printed in seventy-two languages, which fact sufficiently sets forth the cosmopolitan character of his audience. He reports that robbery and suicide are largely on the increase in Chicago on account of unemployment.

What a Battleship Is Worth

The price of a single battleship today is quite beyond the comprehension of the ordinary citizen. Dr. Arthur J. Brown, missionary secretary in the Presbyterian fellowship, has a statistical mind and he recently figured out what a battleship would buy in missions. He asserts that the entire missionary program of America, reaching sixteen countries, 4,000 cities and employing 24,000 American workers and 109,000 native workers is being carried on at an expense less than the price of one battleship. If the price of several battleships were put into Christian missions, there can be no doubt that peace and good will throughout the world would make larger progress.

Principal Forsythe Is Dead

Among the British religious writers familiar to most American ministers was Principal P. T. Forsythe. He was known for the carefulness of his scholarship and the liberality of his thought. Educated in Scotland, he was in his earlier days a parish minister. Later he went into teaching and became principal of Hackney College. At one time in his student days he studied under Ritschl, reading German with fluency. This grounded him thoroughly in the discussion of the problems relating to modern religion. The news of his death is received in this country with great regret. The funeral service was held in West Hampstead Congregational church, and was conducted by Principal Garvie, Dr. J. D. Jones and Rev. T. H. Darlow.

Detroit Has a School of Religion

The Detroit Y. M. C. A. has an institution that is unique among the Associations of the country. After having established a school of technology, it then proceeded to organize a school to teach leaders of religion. An ambitious curriculum is provided with well trained teachers. Dr. Charles M. Sharpe is dean of the school. Dr. Sharpe was formerly dean of the Disciples Divinity School of the University of Chicago. His leadership in the school guarantees its educational adequacy.

Various Religionists Unite for Disarmament and Peace

Bishop McDowell heads a Committee on the Limitation of Armament with headquarters in Washington. This committee includes members of the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish organizations. A brigade of speakers has been built up, and a budget of one hundred thousand dollars will be sought with which to send out these speakers to arouse the nation in behalf of world peace. Among the prominent religionists cooperating with Bishop McDowell in his plans are Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of the Free Synagogue of New York City; Rev. John A. Ryan, of the Catholic University of America, at Washington, and Rev. E. O. Watson, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches. Among the objects of the organization is to "press for the redemption of the Administration's pledge to bring the nations of the world into some organic and continuing relationship."

Negro Preachers Have Poor Educational Facilities

There are 20,000 Negro preachers in this country. Scarcely any of these men have any opportunity to secure the kind of education which is standard in the white churches. The Methodist Episcopal church claims to have the only regular theological seminary for Negroes to be found in the world. In the south there is an interdenominational institute which lasts ten days a year. There are, of course, a few Negro students in the white seminaries of the north. These facts, for which Bishop Robert E. Jones is responsible, indicate the seriousness of the problem of the Negro church. Negro laymen are receiving superior educational advantages, but the pulpit is not keeping up.

Baptist Board Will Yield No More to Creed-makers

The acceptance of a million and three-quarters dollars by the home mission board of the Baptist denomination last year with a creedal condition was the ecclesiastical scandal of the season. After the convention decided to take the money, it voted to appoint a committee which would say whether any more money with a creedal string attached would be accepted. This committee has recently reported, and the board of promotion now announces that no more of this kind of money will be accepted. Hints have been made of large gifts if the policy of accepting conditional gifts is reversed. The Baptist board's trap is much like the old Negro's rabbit trap which was open at both ends and "caught 'em a comin' and a gwine."

Conservative Journal Grows Less Belligerent

The magazine "Industry" was unknown to most churchmen two years ago, but it came into the limelight by its poorly informed and pugnacious article directed against the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal council last winter, which brought it to the attention of large numbers. This journal is evidently not anxious for any more of the sort of advertising it has received for it is now printing complimentary articles with regard to the associations and the Federal council, professing to see a radical change for the better in these organizations. Meanwhile, the social creed originally professed by both organizations stands as their declaration of principle on industrial questions.

Minister Analyzes World Situation

Rev. J. S. Dancey, pastor of Court Street Methodist church of Rockford, Ill., recently made an analysis of the causes of war. Speaking before many hundreds of his fellow citizens on a patriotic occasion he presented a carefully wrought economic and religious argument. The local newspaper prints "Danceyisms" from time to time as a feature of the paper and among those recently published were some excerpts from the above mentioned address. Dr. Dancey said: "We cannot hope for an end of wars until the world has come to appreciate that production by power-driven machinery has changed humanity from a deficit to a surplus basis. Our present need is for education and training in a wise and liberal spending. We must come to realize what Jesus meant when he said, 'Is not a man more than a sheep.' We must see that all production must be valued by what it is able to do to produce men."

Would Put Ecclesiastical Office-Seekers Out of Consideration

The political manipulation of religious denominations is a scandal that is being vigorously attacked by reforming spirits in many of the American communions. The Presbyterians elected a stated clerk last year who had not been considered a candidate at all. In southern Methodism there is vigorous protest: Rev. S. E. Wasson, a leader in that communion, says: "To some of us at least there appears little excuse for any thought of electing more bishops next year. It may be that we have no candidates to boost. However, rumors afloat indicate that a rather extensive and intensive grapevine campaign is in motion for certain ones. Has the episcopacy come to this? Is there a pre-convention scheme carrying on to set certain persons before the elective body? Have we driveled into a political machine? Heaven save us when perambulating, gumshoe methods waylay the ballot for episcopal leadership. At least some laymen, thank God, claim to be weary of professional episcopal designers, and also of the needless overhead expense of too many bishops."

Dr. Stelzle Heads Up Unemployment Committee

Dr. Charles Stelzle heads up a committee of prominent New York churchmen who will handle the unemployment situation for the churches this winter. He was in charge of a similar committee during the winter of 1913-14, when 400,000 men and women in New York were out of work. At that time the men were breaking into churches for lodging, but when Dr. Stelzle, head of the Labor Temple, asked that this practice cease, there was no more of it. The committee which has been appointed by the New York Church Federation will study the men and women on the bread line, and form first-handed contacts with the unfortunate. By this means it is hoped to secure the information which will result in a system of relief.

An Interpreter of "Revelation" Who Is Different

The study of the book of Revelation has all too often been in the hands of prophecy-mongers who offer grotesque interpretations of the meaning of the book. Recently the business men's Bible class of Cynthiana, Ky., Christian church brought Rev. Jasper S. Hughes to their city to lecture upon this obscure book of the New Testament. The class adopted a resolution commending the scholarly treatment of the book to the attention of teachers and students of divinity schools. Mr. Hughes has for a number of years given his time to lecturing upon the Bible among the churches.

Church School Institutes Economies in Administration

In 1914 Goucher College for Women was spending $700 per student annually, and charging $150 tuition. Reforms have been inaugurated in the administration, tuition rates being increased until expense and income almost meet. The expense met for each girl last year was $226.37 while the tuition rate was $225. This remarkable result has not been achieved by any slackening in scholarly ideals, as may be seen by the fact that the school is rated in class 1 by the United States Bureau of Education.

Disciples Lack Convention Funds

With the organization of the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ a few years ago there came at once the problem of a budget. The new organization took up the duty of providing publicity, railroad facilities, and local entertainment for the conventions. The various constituent societies were to be taxed one-half of one per cent of their income for convention purposes. This plan of finance has been opposed by some, and pronounced by competent attorneys of doubtful legality. This year the convention has asked for a place on the local budgets of the churches. The convention fee paid by delegates has been found to be utterly inadequate to the task of meeting convention expenses.

Methodist Episcopal Church to Send Delegate to Canada

Methodism grows more and more conscious of being an international movement. The general conference of the Canadian Methodists will be held next year, and fraternal delegates will be received from many other communions of the Methodist faith. The bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church at their recent meeting at Syracuse appointed Dr. Lynn Harold Hough as fraternal delegate to this conference. Dr. Hough is pastor of Central Methodist church of Detroit, and was formerly president of Northwestern University.

School for Boys With Christian Ideals

The revolt in this country against a system of education for youth which is intellectual without being moral and religious, has led to many new enterprises. Recently there has been established on Long Island the Stony Brook School for Boys. Prof. Frank E. Gaebelein of New York was recently elected principal and he will make Christian education the foremost aim of the school. He says of his enterprise: "The Stony Brook School for Boys will demonstrate that Christian teaching can be correlated successfully with the preparatory school curriculum. The building of Christian character is the primary aim of this institution. It will achieve this aim by presenting directly to the boy the central truths of orthodox Christianity. It will make no apology for these truths; it will make no compromise as to their orthodoxy. The Bible will have a place in the curriculum precisely as large as that occupied by the most important course in English or mathematics. The general atmosphere and environment of the school will be Christian in a very positive way. Emphasis upon the spiritual side of the boy's development will not, however, be allowed to obscure his intellectual or his physical growth. The educational standard of the Stony Brook School will be unimpeachable. Athletics and all forms of recreation leading to full-orbed development of the boy will be encouraged."

Ecclesiastics Speak for World Peace

Many metropolitan newspapers now include on their staff a religious editor. Mrs. Mary E. Spencer serves in this capacity on the New York World. She has recently secured from many of the most eminent religious leaders in the United States an opinion with regard to the cause of world peace. These have been published in the "World." Among the men who have responded generously to Mrs. Spencer's solicitation are Dr. Henry van Dyke, Dr. William Pierson Merrill, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Dr. Francis E. Clark and Dr. Charles M. Sheldon.

Sunday School Bus Reaches Chicago

The use of the bus in Sunday-school work, following precedents set by secular schools over the country, has at last reached Chicago. Second Presbyterian church, of which Dr. Josiah Sibley is pastor, has been operating an afternoon Sunday-school, but found the work hindered somewhat by reason of the transportation question. Recently a Sunday-school bus was installed, and the result is a largely increased school in the afternoon.

Buildings Are United As Well As People

Church union was given a visible demonstration recently at Frankville, Ia. The Presbyterian church purchased the property of the Methodist church, and the two buildings were made into one by the carpenters, a basement being constructed under the whole structure which provides room for certain kinds of institutional work. The Methodists have retired from the field, and now, where there was once a competitive situation with all that that involves, there is now a single community church with a program that commands the loyalty and good-will of everyone within reach.

Religious Liberals of Middle West Hold Meeting

The National Federation of Religious Liberals held its biennial meeting at Sioux City, Ia., on December 10-12. Iowa Unitarians and Universalists composed the major part of the organization. The invitation to the meeting was extended beyond the confines of these two organizations in cases where there was reason to believe that a man was interested. The speakers included Hon. Roger S. Galer, president of the Universalist General Convention; Rev. Curtis W. Reese, secretary of the Western Unitarian Association; Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon, of Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., and many others.

National Church of Prussia Disestablished

In the days of the empire there were twenty-two states in Germany, and each had its own religion. With the coming of the republic, the churches have been disestablished in the various states, Prussia delaying the longest. In September the National Church assembled in Berlin to discuss the question of policy. It was decided to seek disestablishment, and the affairs of this communion are now in the hands of a committee. The National Church of Prussia claims to be the largest Protestant communion in the world.

Churches Set Up Calendar for the Year

One of the valued services of the Chicago Church Federation has been the setting up of a church calendar for the voluntary use of the local churches. The various months have been set apart to emphasize various interests. Recently a committee was appointed for the consideration of the 1922 calendar. This committee is composed of Rev. P. J. Rice, Rev. Ernest Bourner Allen, Rev. C. Claude Travis, Rev. Charles T. Holman, Dr. Cleland B. McAfee and Rev. Emerson O. Bradshaw. One of the projects which the committee is considering for the new year is the adoption of 365 selections of Holy Scripture which would be useful for family worship.

Should these selections prove helpful they would be published in a handy volume for permanent use by the people. Thus the idea of the shorter Bible is about to find a new application in Chicago.

Agricultural Journal Prints a Sermon a Month

Journals devoted to business or technical subjects have not ordinarily found much time or space for religion. A notable exception in this regard is the Farm Journal, an agricultural journal which has over a million circulation. Each month a sermon is published by a minister of a different denomination. The Farm Journal announces the series as "destined to rouse the church into greater usefulness." It is interesting to note that a Jew has been appointed to write the sermon for February since in that month falls St. Valentine's day.

Will Bring the Church Into Court for Gambling

Rev. O. R. Miller, state superintendent of the New York Civic League, has in a recent issue of the Reform Bulletin threatened New York churches that he will bring them into court for violation of the state gambling act if they persist in certain practices. He notes an increase in the number of lottery schemes by which money is being raised by organizations of various kinds in the name of religion. He says: "While perhaps one religious denomination is more guilty than most others in this respect, yet various religious denominations—Protestant, Catholic and Jewish—some of which we have reason to expect better things from, have been guilty of operating gambling and lottery schemes. The 'contriving, proposing, or drawing of a lottery or assisting in a lottery' is a felony in our state, with a maximum penalty of two years in state prison and $1,000

Chicago Mass Meeting for World Peace

THROUGH a driving rain, Chicago turned out a great audience filling the large auditorium of New First Congregational church on December 16 to listen to some great interpreters of world peace. This mass meeting was the concluding session of the three day meeting of the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches. It was also the annual meeting of the Chicago Church Federation. Mr. Sherwood Eddy was the first speaker on the program, and he was in fine fettle. He set forth the terrible waste of war, and asserted that the after results of the war have taken or will take thirty million lives. With dramatic oratory he set forth the horrors of trench warfare, and the unchristian nature of armed conflict.

The Hon. D. Tagawa, a member of the Japanese parliament, set forth the views of the liberal party in Japan. This party is in favor of a generous settlement with China, and of peaceful relations with the whole world. He said: "I am greatly pleased with the progress made at the conference, and are sure the outcome will be the maintenance of cordial relations between the United States and Japan. It is significant that the Christian religion is the only one that has consistently prayed and fought for peace. The churches of America had a great influence in the conference." Dr. Tien Lu Li came to fill an engagement that had been made for the Hon. Wellington Koo, of the Chinese delegation to the conference. The former is secretary to the Chinese representative, and was trained in America. He asserted that China wanted only what the other nations of the world want at this time, the power of self-determination. With wonderful intellectual grasp he outlined the problems and prospects of China in the modern world. Chicago Christians who were present cheered to the echo all sentiments that were favorable to world peace. The church people seem in a fair way to impress their views upon the whole American public, and there are many evidences of a softening of the jingo patriotism which found expression in many journals not long since.

fine. Churches are not excepted from the operation of that law. Some people, even church people, do not seem to know what gambling is. They think it is wrong to run a gambling wheel or sell lottery tickets and draw out a number from a box by which to win a prize, but see no harm in selling chances on a raffling scheme by which they dispose of a book, umbrella, victrola, piano, automobile, etc. but these latter schemes are equally a violation of the penal law and of the state constitution."

Organized Theological Parties in England

The church of England is torn these days with theological difference. This is represented by the English Church Union and the Churchmen's Union. The first is high church in theology, while the latter is liberal. Bishop Gore heads the high church movement, while Dean Rashdall is head of the liberal movement. Dean Rashdall's position may be seen from the speech he recently delivered in which he asserted that Jesus was never conscious of any other relation to God than that of man to God. At the same time he claims his views are consistent with those of the historic creeds.

Captured by Bandits in China

The bandits of China made another raid recently on the missionary force, taking captive Rev. Herbert Parker, an English missionary. This kind of experience is no longer very disconcerting to the missionaries, for like Paul, they find in their captivity a new opportunity. Mr. Parker took his concertina and a hymn-book with him, and entertained his captors with Christian music. Opportunity came at last for the missionary to escape, and he returned to the scene of his former labors.

Bishop Manning Will Receive Staff from London

Bishop Manning of New York is the head of the leading Episcopal diocese of this country. Churchmen of London have raised a purse of money with which to secure for the New York bishop a pastoral staff as a symbol of their love for him. This action is designed to cement the good feeling existing between the two outstanding branches of the Anglican communion in the world.

Faith Cure Reaches the Congo Country

Humanity is after all not different on the Congo from humanity in the United States. There is a well defined faith cure movement which has spread "like the influenza" to use a native expression. The movement took its rise with Kibangu, a native Protestant Christian. This man called himself a prophet and soon stories were afloat that all of the new testament miracles were being reproduced, including the raising of the dead. African Christians have been trained to support their religious leaders and soon large gifts were being made to the prophet. Other prophets arose, and the whole Congo country was in a state of excitement. The missionaries resisted the movement, but to no avail. At last religious excitement was interfering with the food supply and the normal conduct of business so the government took a hand. The major prophet was arrested but succeeded in making his escape. The movement is checked, but the natural result has been a certain break of sympathy with the missionaries. The natives are disappointed that the missionaries did not believe in the movement. The suppressing of the prophets has also resulted in growth of prejudice against the government.

Y. M. C. A. Encourages Introspection

"Chew your food, save your pennies and say your prayers" is the advice given on a card issued by the Y. M. C. A. which has traveled around the world. The West Side Y. M. C. A. of New York started a movement recently of asking on a printed slip of paper the questions that a young man should ask of himself. Each young man is asked to take an hour to answer the following questions for himself: "What is my occupation? Am I making a success of it? Am I ahead of, or behind, the majority of those with whom I started life? How much do I know? How did

Laymen Move for Church Union

In the border states the scandal of competition between northern and southern branches of several denominations has become unbearable. Transylvania Presbytery of Kentucky was divided years ago between the northern and southern branches of the denomination. The laymen in this presbytery belonging to the two communions now insist that there shall be but one Presbyterian church in the area. The various ecclesiastical authorities involved are having a hard time getting these laymen into line again. It looks as if a new church unity movement had been born in Kentucky with which the ecclesiastical leaders will have to deal.

Reconciliation of Science and Religion

It is not so many years ago that Professor Huxley was waging a merry war with the theologians of his country, concerned with defending the freedom of scientific investigation, while the parsons were holding to the genuineness of the Christian revelation. This discussion has proceeded far enough that there is now peace between great scientists and competent theologians. In the issue of the Constructive Quarterly for December, Prof. F. R. Tennant makes a notable addition to his many valuable studies in the field of rational religious doctrine. The point of view of Professor Tennant is suggested by these words from his article: "That science is indifferent to the theistic hypothesis is a fact: that science precludes or denies the theistic hypothesis is no fact at all. . . . Science leaves room for religious faith, though she can no more be appealed to for proof than for disproof of the objects of faith. This, however, is not all that is to be said, not the last word on the subject of the relations of science to theology. . . . Science, as we have gathered, constitutes no assize

By KIRBY PAGE

A P P R O V E D

Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Pittsburgh:

"The book is nobly conceived and finely written and is in itself a high spiritual achievement."

Professor Rufus M. Jones, Haverford College:

"I have read your book, 'The Sword or the Cross,' with deep appreciation. I feel sure it should have a very helpful mission, and I hope it will have a large circulation. It is very convincing and is written in just the right style to accomplish its purpose. I have no criticism whatever to make of it."

Norman Thomas, Editor The World Tomorrow:

"My immediate reaction is one of unqualified approval."

F. Ernest Johnson, of the Federal Council of Churches:

"Here is a concise putting of Christianity's case against war. The author has done a valuable piece of work."

The Meaning of Paul For Today

BY PROF. C. R. DODD

"Here is real insight, not only into the experience of St. Paul, but into the depth of the Christian gospel, with its 'strange power which men call weakness.' Hence his vision, one of the most radiant that has glorified religious history, of the possibility of the universal redemption of man by mystical union with God in Christ—a vision the depth and meaning of which we have not yet fathomed. The interpretation of this vision in his technique, in his philosophy of history, in his enlarging experience, is followed out by Dr. Dodd with consummate insight and suggestiveness. Its meaning for today is so obviously significant and far-reaching, at once so inspiring and rebuking, that it need hardly be pointed out. Jesus shall reign, inevitably, but it will be the conquest of Love."

Such is The Christian Century's editorial comment upon Professor Dodd's new book, which bids fair to be read by many thousands of thoughtful ministers and other Bible students during the year. A most successful attempt is here made to read in frankly modern terms the permanent message of Paul to the world.

Social Rebuilders

By Charles R. Brown

THIS book by the dean of the Divinity School of Yale University contains the lectures delivered by him at DePauw University in 1921 upon the Mendenhall Foundation, and constitutes the seventh in that series of lectures. The five lectures are a study in reconstruction with certain ancient leaders of biblical history as the outstanding figures, and the present situation of the world, as an aftermath of the war, as the chief point of application. The book is distinctly a message for the day.

"The chief distinction of this little book is that it is a voice crying in the present wilderness of confusion and disorder showing the way out."—President Grose, DePauw University.

The Uncommon Commonplace

By Bishop W. A. Quayle

A GROUP OF ESSAYS that go to the very soul of things human, a gathering of poems, a sheaf of tender tributes to "Some Friends of Mine in Paradise," and "The Story of Margaret." The sort of book to break open the hard shell of ecclesiasticism that the spirit of vital religion may be manifest. Dr. Quayle is essentially a poet, as was his Master. The single essay entitled "The Uncommon Commonplace," is worth more than a dozen books of hard-shelled theology.

court before which the case of theology comes for trial; but she is a witness in the court. And if an involuntary witness, one of which the advocate for theism cannot afford to forego examination."

Pilgrim Preachers Silenced in London

For two years past twelve pilgrim preachers of varying social position have been traveling on foot through Great Britain preaching to audiences on the streets of the various cities. They arrived in London recently and attempted to hold a service in front of St. Paul's, but were informed by the police that no public meetings of any kind were allowed in front of St. Paul's or in front of Westminster.

Try to Kill Baptist Minister

Radical fanatics are thought to have made an attempt upon the life of Rev. W. W. Bustard, pastor of Euclid Avenue Baptist church of Cleveland recently. The telephone wires to the house were cut and five unidentified men overpowered the watchman. Fortunately the family were away from home at the time. Dr. Bustard has had wide publicity as the pastor of John D. Rockefeller. He was formerly pastor of Dudley Street Baptist church of Roxbury, Mass.

Consecrate Suffragan Bishop of New York

The only Anglican diocese in this country to require the service of three bishops is the diocese of New York. Bishop William T. Manning consecrated Rev. Herbert Shipman on November 30 as suffragan bishop, and on the same occasion set apart Bishop A. S. Lloyd to the same task. Bishop Lloyd had been a missionary bishop and not long ago had become rector of a parish. The address on this occasion was given by Bishop Thomas of Wyoming. He used the Einstein theory of relativity as an argument against religious bigotry and narrowness. The bishop spoke against too great confidence in the conclusions of formal logic.

Radio Church Has Been Opened in New York

The romance of preaching to people over wide distances through the medium of the wireless is appealing strongly to American preachers. A number of churches in Pittsburgh have been cooperating with the Westinghouse company in occasionally sending out the minister's sermon through the air. Now comes the announcement of a radio church in New York, whose chief function will be the sending of religious services through the air. Although only twenty people were present at the first service, the real congregation consisted of fifteen thousand people. Within the New York area there are 3,000 wireless receiving stations. The entire outfit for a radio church, including an amplifier, costs about fifteen hundred dollars. Most of the apparatus can be out of sight. It is freely prophesied that within a few years the most famous preachers of the land will be preaching for thousands of miles every Sunday, for it is possible by means of special instruments to take the message out of the air and send it on again increased in volume. The promoters of the Radio church are proposing to seat a congregation around the table and to permit the questioning of the preacher by the congregation in order to increase the interest of the service.

Baptist Minister Hires Theater to Reply to Dr. Kent

Prof. Charles Foster Kent was recently invited to lecture before the Central Y. M. C. A. of Minneapolis, and before an assembly of the University of Minnesota. In these lectures he set forth the scholarly views in interpretation of the Bible for which he has become famous. As soon as he had left town, Dr. William B. Riley, well-known "fundamentalist" leader of the Baptist denomination, hired the city auditorium with a seating capacity of 2,500. In several addresses he set forth "The Menace of Modernism."

The Prophetic Ministry For Today

By BISHOP CHARLES D. WILLIAMS

The Lyman Beecher Yale Lectures for 1920

FOR years Bishop Williams has tried hard to do the work of a prophet to his own times. He has practiced a persistent faith in the power of the spoken word to keep before men the high and unwelcome standards that alone save a people from perishing.

He talks here most intimately of the calling and work of the ministry, so understood, in the hope of aiding his colleagues and himself to stand fast in their allegiance to this great Commission to the end.

Genuineness, earnestness, courage, intellectual honesty, spiritual passion—these are some of the fundamental characteristics of Bishop Williams, according to Dr.
Joseph Fort Newton. An outstanding preacher-prophet, he is well able to discuss "The Prophetic Ministry for Today."

ers.

JessieBrownPounds

THE memorial collection of the literary work of Jessie Brown Pounds is being greeted with an almost sacred enthusiasm, as revealing in a marvelous way the spirit which was Jessie Brown Pounds. To those who knew her, it will be a cherished possession through the years; to those who did not know her personally but were acquainted with her work, it will bring delight and satisfaction; and for those who may not have known much of her writing but who have a liking for literature, the volume will bring with its reading the pleasure one has in a new and significant discovery.

SOME will like best the poems of Jessie Brown Pounds, with their beauty and charm, and with their revelation of her unusual personality. Some will care more for her hymns, of which "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," which was sung at President McKinley's funeral, was perhaps the most popular. Others will find in her essays not only a philosophy of life which satisfies, but also an atmosphere of humor which sets Jessie Brown Pounds far outside the class of dry essayists. It was as a story-writer that Mrs. Pounds first won fame, and thousands of readers will discover, with exquisite pleasure, some of their favorites in this collection. The play will perhaps bring more of surprise to her friends than any other portion of the book. As for the play, which is entitled "Forty Thousand Dollars," it may justly be said that it is extremely well done.

This book is just from the bindery this week, and orders will be filled promptly on their receipt. Price of the book $2.00, plus 10 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?
